licensed by the Confederate Government, has been captured by the United States brig Perry. She was provided with a crew of twenty men. Two days before her capture she had fallen in with the brig Joseph, of Rockland, Maine, from Cuba, loaded with sugar. The prize was taken to Georgetown, South Carolina, in charge of eight of the crew of the Savannah. The privateer mistook the Perry for a merchantman, and advancing to seize her fell an easy prey. Her crew were sent to New York, to be tried for piracy.—Several engagements, attended with no important results, have taken place between the Government vessels in the Potomac and the Confederate batteries at various points on the shore. On the 27th of June Captain Ward, of the Freeborn, with his own vessel, the Pawnee, and the Resolute, left Washington, intending to erect a battery at Mathias Point. Thirty or forty men were landed for this purpose, when they were attacked by a large force, who had been concealed in the adjacent woods. The men returned to the boats, which lay near the shore, to protect them. Captain Ward was struck by a musket ball, and mortally wounded. Several skirmishes between outposts and advanced corps have taken place, but no action of decisive importance has occurred.

Our Record closes on the 7th of July. There is every prospect that decisive action will be had before this number of the Magazine reaches its readers. On the 2d of July General Patterson's corps crossed the Potomac into Virginia above Harper's Ferry, and advanced upon Martinsburg, which was occupied on the 3d, the Confederate troops, after some skirmishing, falling back.—On the 7th of July large bodies of troops were sent from Washington across the Potomac.—John C. Frémont has been appointed Major-General, and placed in command of the Military Department of the West, embracing Illinois and the States and Territories west of the Mississippi, to the Rocky Mountains.

In Maryland the election for members of Congress took place on the 13th of June. The Union candidates were elected in all except the Baltimore district, where H. Winter Davis was defeated by Henry May, whose position is not clearly defined. He, however, received the secession vote. In Baltimore the feeling in favor of secession is very strong, and is apparently held in check only by the presence of the United States forces. General Nathaniel P. Banks, formerly Speaker of the House of Representatives, and more recently Governor of Massachusetts, has been placed in command of the Military Department of Annapolis, in which Baltimore is included. On the 27th of June he arrested George P. Kane, Chief of the Police, and superseded the authority of the Police Commissioners, appointing Colonel Kenly, of the Maryland Volunteers, Provost Marshal of the city. In a proclamation giving his reasons for this measure, General Banks says that it was not his purpose to interfere with the legitimate government of the people of Baltimore, or of Maryland; but there existed unlawful combinations for resistance to the laws, and providing hidden dépôts of arms and ammunition to be used against the Government. The Chief of Police was not only aware of these facts, but was proved to be a protector of the parties engaged therein; the Government could only regard him as the head of an armed force hostile to its authority, and acting in concert with its avowed enemies. Whenever a loyal citizen should be named as head of the police, the military would render him instant and willing obedience. A large amount of arms and ammunition was found concealed in the office of the Chief of Police. The Police Commissioners and the Mayor protested against the action of General Banks, and said that while they yielded to the force of circumstances, and would do nothing to obstruct the execution of such measures as the military commander might take for the preservation of the peace of the city, they could not recognize the right of the police force, as such, to receive orders from any other authority than the Board; and that the forcible suspension of their functions suspended the operation of the police law, and put the men off duty for the present. Nearly all the policemen resigned, and General Banks directed the Provost Marshal to fill their places with others. The suspended Commissioners continued to hold their sessions, refusing to recognize the officers and men appointed by the Provost Marshal. General Banks thereupon, on the 1st of July, in pursuance of orders from Washington, arrested the members of the Board, with the exception of the Mayor, and placed a body of troops within the city.—The Legislature of Maryland adopted measures tending if possible to unite that State with the Southern Confederacy. Among these was a resolution declaring that the debt now being incurred by the General Government in prosecuting the war is unconstitutional, and of no binding force upon the States which do not consent thereto, and that Maryland will not hold itself bound for any portion of its payment.

In Kentucky the special election for Members of Congress resulted in the choice of nine Union Representatives and one "States Rights" man, Mr. Burnett, who was re-elected by a reduced majority. The majorities were very large, amounting in the aggregate to nearly 60,000. Among the representatives chosen is Hon. John J. Crittenden, late Senator in Congress.

The Virginia Union Convention re-assembled at Wheeling on the 12th of June. Arthur J. Boreman was chosen permanent Chairman. About one-third of the counties of the State were represented. A resolution proposing a separation of Virginia, the counties represented in the Convention to be organized into a new State, was, after considerable debate, rejected by a vote of 57 to 17. On the 19th a Declaration and Ordinance for reorganizing the Government of the State was passed. The Declaration says that the Constitution gave the General Assembly no power to call a Convention without the express consent of a majority of the people; that the calling of the Richmond Convention was a usurpation; and that the Convention also abused the powers nominally intrusted to it by requiring the people of Virginia to separate from and wage war against the Government of the United States, transferring the allegiance of the people to an illegal Confederacy of rebellious States, and placing the military force of the Commonwealth under the control of this Confederacy, and bringing the allegiance of the people to the United States into conflict with their subordinate allegiance to the State, thereby making obedience to their ordinance treason against the United States. The delegates therefore declare that the preservation of the rights and liberties of the people of Virginia "demand the reorganization of the Government of the Commonwealth, and that all acts of said Convention and Executive, tending to separate this Commonwealth from the United States, or to levy and carry on war against them, are without authority and void, and the offices of all who adhere to the said Convention and Executive, whether legislative, executive, or judicial, are vacated." The ordinance for the reorganization of the State Government provides for the appointment by the Convention of a Governor and Lieutenant-Governor, to continue in office until their successors are elected and qualified; for a Council of five members to aid and advise the Governor. The Delegates elected in May, and the Senators who are entitled by the existing laws to seats in the next General Assembly, who shall appear and qualify themselves by taking the requisite oath of allegiance, are to constitute the Legislature of the State; a majority of the members so qualified to constitute a quorum. The following is the oath to be taken by all civil and military officers:

"I solemnly swear (or affirm) that I will support the Constitution of the United States, and the laws made in pursuance thereof, as the supreme law of the land, anything in the ordinances of the Convention which assembled at Richmond on the 13th day of February, 1861, to the contrary notwithstanding; and that I will uphold and defend the Government ordained by the Convention which assembled at Wheeling on the 11th day of June, 1861, and the Legislature, Governor, and all other officers thereof in the discharge of their several duties, as prescribed by the last-mentioned Convention."

The posts held by all officers who fail to take this oath are to be declared vacant, and are to be filled by others. Frank H. Pierpont was elected Governor, and Daniel Paisley Lieutenant-Governor. On the 22d the Governor issued a proclamation summoning the Legislature to meet at Wheeling on the first day of July. The President has formally recognized this new Government, by transmitting to it the official notice of the Congressional apportionment under the late census.—Governor Letcher has issued a proclamation to the people of the northwestern part of the State, in which he says that the people of Virginia, by a majority of nearly a hundred thousand qualified voters, have severed the ties that bound them to the Government of the United States, and united the Commonwealth with the Confederate States. The right to institute a new form of government was one that freemen should never relinquish. The people of the northwestern part of the State voted as well as those of the other parts; the majority was against them, and it was their duty to yield to the will of the State. There had been a complaint that the Eastern portion of the State enjoyed an exemption from taxation, to the prejudice of the Western part. The State, by a majority of 95,000, had put the two sections on an equality in this respect. By this display of magnanimity the East had shown itself ready to share in all the burdens of Government, and to meet all Virginia's liabilities.

In Tennessee the vote upon the ordinance of separation from the United States and representation in the Confederate Government was taken on the 8th of June. The result upon the adoption of the ordinance is officially stated by Governor Harris to be:

	Separation.	No Separation.
East Tennessee.....	14,780	32,923
Middle Tennessee.....	58,265	8,198
West Tennessee.....	29,127	6,117
Military Camps.....	2,741
Total.....	104,913	47,238

The vote for "Representation" is about the same. On the 24th of June the Governor issued a proclamation declaring that "the people of the State of Tennessee have, in their sovereign will and capacity, by an overwhelming majority, cast their vote for 'Separation,' dissolving all political connection with the late United States Government, and adopted the Provisional Government of the Confederate States of America," Tennessee is therefore "a free and independent Government, free from all obligation to or connection with the Federal Government of the United States of America." In a Message to the Legislature, the Governor says: "While it is to me a source of regret that entire unanimity was not attained at the ballot-box, in the decision of the vitally-important and exciting questions referred to, I have entire confidence that now, the deliberate and impartial judgment of the overwhelming majority of the people of the State having been recorded, the whole people, forgetting these differences of opinion, however earnestly and honestly entertained, will stand together as one man in maintaining the rights, honor, and dignity of Tennessee, and in preserving the domestic tranquillity of the community. The time for crimination and recrimination has passed. Threatened by a common enemy; imperiled by a common danger; bound together by ties which can not be severed, we are identical in interest: we must be so in action." He recommends that the payments upon the public debt, now by law to be made in New York, be made payable at Nashville, Charleston, or New Orleans, to "the people of all Governments which are on terms of peace and friendship with us, who are and were previous to the commencement of the war bona fide owners of our bonds, and that you adopt such policy toward the owners and holders of our bonds, who are citizens of States at war with us, as is recognized and justified by the law of nations, regulating their intercourse as belligerents."—In view of the impossibility of disposing for money of the State bonds authorized to be issued for the defense of the State, he recommends that three-fifths of the sum be issued in Treasury notes, which shall be received in payment of all taxes and Government dues.—He has caused to be organized and equipped twenty-one regiments of infantry now in the field; ten artillery companies and a regiment of cavalry are in process of organization; in addition to which there are three regiments mustered into the service of the Confederate States, now in Virginia.—A Union Convention of Eastern Tennessee met at Greenville on the 17th of June. Hon. Thomas A. R. Nelson was chosen as President. A declaration of grievances and a series of resolutions were adopted on the 21st. The declaration says that the election of the 8th was free, but with few exceptions, in no other part of the State than East Tennessee. In the larger parts of Middle and West Tennessee no speeches or discussions in favor of the Union were permitted. The unanimity of the vote in many counties where a few weeks ago the Union sentiment was strong proves that the Union men were overawed by the tyranny of the military power, and the still greater tyranny of a corrupt and subsidized press. For these and other reasons the Convention does not recognize the result of the election as expressive of the will of the people of Tennessee. Had the election been free the result would probably have been different. But whether this be or be not the case, East Tennessee has a better right to remain in the Union than the other sections have to secede. Neither the Constitution nor Congress has wronged Tennessee; the President has made no threat against her law-abiding people; there is no cause for rebellion or secession. While peace and prosperity have been enjoyed under the Government of the United States, rebellion has paralyzed commerce, and lessened the value of property; it has changed the relations of States and adopted Constitutions, without submitting them to the vote of the people; it has formed military leagues and opened the door for oppressive taxation; it has offered a premium for crime by directing the discharge of volunteers from criminal prosecution, and by recommending the Judges not to hold their courts; it has stained the statute-book by the repudiation of Northern debts; it has called upon the people to contribute their surplus productions for the support of a Government destitute of money or credit; it has attempted to destroy the freedom of speech and the press. In view of the foregoing list of wrongs, and many other grievances which are enumerated, "and of the fact that the people of East Tennessee have declared their fidelity to the Union by a majority of about 20,000 votes," the Convention passed a series of resolutions to the following effect: 1. Desiring the restoration of peace, and especially that East Tennessee should not be involved in civil war.—2. Pronouncing the action of the State Legislature in reference to secession and union with the Confederate States as unconstitutional, and not binding.—3. Appointing Commissioners to prepare a memorial to the Legislature of Tennessee, asking its consent that the counties composing East Tennessee, and such counties in Middle Tennessee as desire to cooperate with them may form and erect a separate State.—4. Appointing an election to be held in these counties.—5. Requesting the Union members of the Legislature to resume their seats unless prevented.

In Missouri, Governor Jackson, after fruitless attempts to induce the United States commander to consent to a virtual neutrality, has taken ground against the Union. He demanded that no United States troops should be quartered in or marched through the State, while General Lyon asserted the right of the Government to send troops into any part of the State, to protect loyal citizens or repel invasion. The Governor, on the 12th of June, issued a proclamation stating that all efforts toward conciliation had failed, and calling out 50,000 State militia "for the purpose of repelling invasion." The proclamation concludes as follows:

"In issuing this proclamation, I hold it to be my most solemn duty to remind you that Missouri is still one of the United States; that the Executive Department of the State Government does not arrogate to itself the power to disturb that relation; that power has been wisely vested in the Convention, which will at the proper time express your sovereign will; and that meanwhile it is your duty to obey all constitutional requirements of the Federal Government. But it is equally my duty to advise you that your first allegiance is due to your own State, and that you are under no obligation whatever to obey the unconstitutional edicts of the military despotism which has introduced itself at Washington, nor submit to the infamous and degrading sway of its wicked minions in this State. No brave-hearted Missourian will obey the one or submit to the other. Rise, then, and drive out ignominiously the invaders who have dared to desecrate the soil which your labors have made fruitful, and which is consecrated by your homes."

He then left the capital, giving orders to burn the railroad bridges behind him, and proceeded southward, pursued by the United States troops. A considerable body of the State militia having been gathered at Booneville, General Lyon advanced upon them on the 17th of June, and after a few minutes' action dispersed them with a loss of about 20 killed. Many prisoners were taken, who were subsequently set at liberty. General Lyon issued a proclamation inviting all who had taken up arms against the General Government to return to their homes, assuring them that they should not be molested for past actions, but warning them that this forbearance would not long continue.

EUROPE.

The present attitude of England and France in relation to America has evidently been taken in concert. It is one of absolute neutrality. The following dispatch, dated June 1, has been sent to the Governor-General of Canada, and similar orders have been given for other British possessions:

"SIR,—You are already aware that the Queen is desirous of observing the strictest neutrality in the contest which appears to be imminent between the United States and the so-called Confederate States of North America. I have now to inform you that, in order to give full effect to this principle, her Majesty has been pleased to interdict the armed ships and also the privateers of both parties from carrying prizes made by them into the ports, harbors, roadsteads, or waters of the United Kingdom, or any of her Majesty's colonies or possessions abroad. It is her Majesty's desire that this prohibition should be forthwith notified to all proper authorities within her dominions, and I am to desire that you take measures to secure its effectual observance within the limits of your Government."

In Parliament Mr. Gregory had given notice that he should present a motion for the recognition of the Government of the Confederate States. Being urged to postpone the motion he consented to do so. He, however, published in the Times a letter giving the reasons which he should have urged in favor of recognition. He writes: "I advocate the recognition of the Southern States, because I am of opinion that by this separation the area of slave-occupied territory will be circumscribed, instead of increased."

The Emperor of France has issued a decree stating that, "taking into consideration the state of peace which exists between France and the United States of America, he has resolved to maintain a strict neutrality in the struggle between the Government of the Union and the States which propose to form a separate Confederation." The following extracts from the decree define the position of the French Government:

"No vessel of war or privateer of either of the belligerent parties will be allowed to enter or stay with prizes in our ports or roadsteads longer than twenty-four hours, excepting in case of compulsory delay.—No sale of goods belonging to prizes is allowed in our ports and roadsteads.—Every Frenchman is prohibited from taking a commission under either of the two parties to arm vessels of war, or to accept letters of marque for privateering purposes, or to assist in any manner whatsoever, the equipment or armament of a vessel of war or privateer of either party.—Every Frenchman, whether residing in France or abroad, is likewise prohibited from enlisting or taking service either in the land army or on board vessels of war or privateers of either of the two belligerent parties.—Frenchmen residing in France or abroad must likewise abstain from any act which, committed in violation of the laws of the empire, or of the international law, might be considered as an act hostile to one of the two parties, and contrary to the neutrality which we have resolved to observe.—Every Frenchman contravening the present enactments, will have no claim to any protection from this Government against any acts or measures, whatever they may be, which the belligerents might exercise or decree."

The Spanish Government has issued a proclamation of similar import. The Queen is determined to maintain a strict neutrality. The building, arming, or equipment of privateers in Spanish ports is strictly prohibited. No privateer or prize can remain in any Spanish port longer than 24 hours, except in case of urgent necessity, and then they must leave as soon as possible. They can not ship any arms or munitions of war, and no articles belonging to a prize can be sold. Any Spanish subject engaging in privateering does so on his own responsibility, and forfeits all claim to protection from the Government, besides being liable to punishment.

Abdul-Mejid, the Sultan of Turkey, died on the 25th of June, aged 39. He was succeeded by his brother, Abdul-Azzis, born Feb. 9, 1829.

Editor's Table.

VALOR.—The mind of our people has most wonderfully changed its direction within a few months, and we who have for so many years given the peaceful, industrious faculties the highest place on the list of popular virtues, now find ourselves on the look-out for every trace of military genius, and ready to pardon any want of financial thrift in the man of undoubted and effective valor. We need not ascribe the change to any miracle, for it is no more than what was to be expected from our people under the circumstances. We have always liked pluck in every shape; and while business was our absorbing pursuit, other things being equal, we always gave the palm to the most enterprising, fearless merchant over the cautious usurer, and our model business men have a large spice of the soldier and sailor in their composition. Now that we have a new work to do, and a new capital to win, our common sense compels us to set a bounty upon the ability required for the object, and every shrewd man is well aware that in times of war the good soldier is the most practical of persons; for he saves the money of the nation, and secures the most speedy and the most advantageous peace. Meanwhile our instinctive respect for courage finds a more enkindling element; and we who are the children of brave sires find that the blood that has beat so long in the march of heroic industry, is all the more ready to answer to the old cradle songs of patriotism, and mount to the head at the names of the old battle-fields of liberty and nationality.

Our readers are probably all ready for the topic under treatment, and may perhaps give us their ear, even in these exciting times, while we try to say a few words upon the nature and power of Valor. We use this term instead of others that generally signify very much the same thing, because it better defines the virtue that our people prize in that respect for which they most prize it. Bravery denotes a certain fearless impulse, and Courage a certain dauntless resolution, and both agree in expressing qualities which all men honor; but they both indicate emotions rather than purposes, and point to a certain enthusiasm rather than to a positive object. Valor combines both ideas; brings the right spirit to bear on the right object; and, better than any other word, carries the idea of power as a virtue. The valiant man is he who can do things, especially difficult things; and while much bravery and courage have been spent in fiery impulses and fruitless enthusiasm, valor adds practical point to flaming emotion, and never fires without being careful to hit the mark, and hit it with a bullet, not with scattering shot. Moral courage may mean very much the same thing, although it is used often to denote the moral fearlessness that scorns dangers; while bravery often coexists with a very low grade of character—as, for example, in many a coarse mercenary, who will fight to the last gasp under any flag that best pays for his service. True valor is that manly force which makes the Right prevail, and, as such, it is a pre-eminent moral and religious trait, for what is morality and religion but the spirit that makes the right principle triumph, and sets up God's kingdom among men? It is not enough to mean well, for every dreamy or sentimentalizing driver, in his way, means well. It is our duty to do well; and he who does well, especially in the midst of dangers and difficulties, is by eminence the valiant man.

Do not smile at our simplicity or our excessive prudence in maintaining that the first element of valor is found in a true sense of value. Other things being equal, he is the most valiant man who sees the most and best and most lasting good to strive for; so that instead of trying to empty a hero of interest in his object, and making him supremely indifferent to whatever happens, the true course is to make him as much interested as possible. Whatever we regard as the highest good is sure to bring out all the strength of our nature; and he to whom the highest good is found in the absolute Right is moved to be valiant by the whole force of his affections and his conscience. Men, indeed, differ in the practical force of their character from certain distinctions of temperament, and some are brave by a native instinct, preferring a battle to a festival, and choosing the sword or lance instead of cards or dice for their play; but even these differences are, in a great measure, neutralized by master affections, and the most timid man becomes a hero when what he loves supremely is at stake. The most quiet citizen has the valor of a lion when his family is assailed, and, to defend his wife or daughter, he does not stop to ask how strong the adversary is. When her child is in peril every true woman is a heroine; and she who before trembled at the roar of the wind or the flash of the lightning, goes, by a divine instinct, through storm or fire or savage men to rescue the little creature whom God has confided to her care.

Even abject worldliness is valiant in its own way, and avarice and ambition can be daring when the gods of their idolatry are assailed. He to whom money is the supreme good may die rather than surrender his gold, and he who makes his idol of human breath will sooner renounce life itself than the world's favor. The great distinction to be marked in this respect is this, that some men measure value more by the amount of goods or wealth at stake, while others estimate it by the quality of the good or the worth at stake. We think it very desirable that both estimates should be regarded—that of goods or wealth, and of good or worth. The goods that make up wealth are certainly to be much valued, and it is every man's duty to keep and defend, by just means, his rightful property; and we are convinced that an advanced stage of civilization not only gives new comforts but new powers, from the ampler motives that it imparts to men to defend their possessions. Surely no savage can fight for his wigwam as bravely and persistently as the civilized man fights for his home, his country, and his altar. Yet the very list of goods that we have proves that the goods of a true civilization must needs ascend to the supreme good above all material things, or to a sacred justice which was in God before the world was made, and which is needed to keep the world within God's blessing, and to give to men the highest and most lasting motive. No man can love his home and family truly until he loves it sacredly, or under Divine law and grace, as well as under human affections; and the love of country as well as of kindred is never strongest apart from the inspirations of religion. For the supreme good crowns and blesses all other goods; and that is the strongest state of society which unites the most privileges under the highest and most lasting sanctions. This is the Christian State or Commonwealth; and certainly the facts of experience confirm the nature of things, and no nations have been so valiant as those who unite the most possessions with the best spirit. Of course, if either estimate is to be preferred to the other, it is the higher to the lower, and for the supreme good a man should be willing to live and to die; and if it ever comes between him and his ease or possessions, he should be ready to sacrifice the less to the greater—his many goods to the one absolute good, instead of trying to gain the whole world by the loss of his own soul.

We see at once the reasonableness of our position by applying it to the most important interests which men are called to defend. Consider the heroism that is shown in defense of the household, and we invariably find that the two elements named combine in its composition; and the men who have fought most stoutly for their firesides have been they who have added to their due share of goods a large leaven of moral and spiritual principle. Mere wealth is not enough to bring out the best powers of man, and may have in its very fullness the seeds of decay and the air of stagnation. Nor is mere enthusiasm, without fixed attachments and household property, of itself enough; for its fanaticism is too wild, fitful, and aimless to give a firm and lasting motive, and the leaders of fanatical hordes almost invariably aim to concentrate their mind upon some promised land, and so anchor their roving passion in some solid ground. Those have been the heroic nations in which there has been enough of plenty to give a fair degree of culture and comfort, so as to win the affections to the household and the native land, without the luxury that is so apt to enfeeble the frame and unsettle the faith. The most apt example that rises now to our mind is that of the Dutch, whose heroic struggles are presented to us with such life and power by our gifted and faithful countryman, Motley. Holland had nothing of the elegance and luxury of Spain; nothing of the richness of the Spanish soil, nor the splendor of Spanish arts; yet her people had a large measure of household comfort, and the industry that could make the measure larger year by year. The power of the Dutch, however, was in the union of indomitable faith with domestic thrift—the elevation and strengthening of domestic and national economy by personal religion. Compared with their adversaries, their means and forces seemed in number and cost contemptible. But take into consideration the quality as well as the quantity of their power—remember in how many heroic men and women that high sense of honor and responsibility lived which was the characteristic of the few commanding spirits of the Spanish empire—and the story of the Dutch Republic, without ceasing to be wonderful, ceases to be marvelous. The people thus moved are not to be estimated merely in the mass, whose soul may be found in one leading mind. Each man is a general because animated by the general motive; and the sum total of power is made up of the whole number of men and the whole force of moral and spiritual determination. The great energy that has always attached to Puritan communities may be accounted for in the same way. It is made up of two factors, one material, the other spiritual—the one worldly goods, the other the invisible good; and while the Puritans, on the whole, have had as great an average amount of wealth as any other people, and often more, because they have so few who are absolutely poor, and they do not breed any such generations of beggars as are found among the old despotisms and aristocracies, they have had a higher average quality of spiritual faith and zeal—every man of them reading the Bible for himself, praying in his own tongue, and taught to apply the law of Scripture and conscience to every duty and interest of life, whether in Church or State. Every true Puritan is bound to defend his home, not only as containing his goods, but as containing the infinite good; for there he is in his castle and church at once, and his creed bids him there exercise the lawgiving and the priestly power by judging between right and wrong, and asking God's blessing upon his family and his country day by day. If his goods are taken away the great good is not lost; and he maintains, with reduced fortunes and a scanty table, a dignity that princes might covet. Power still dwells with him, and goes forth from his home. It was from such households that the valor of our great War of Independence took its food and fire, and we have proof enough that the old stock has not yet died out.

We apply the same rule of judgment to national affairs, and measure the valor of a nation by the relation between its wealth and worth, its goods and its good. We do not say that a nation must necessarily be rich to be valiant; but it must be industrious and thriving enough to set a true value upon prosperity, and to strive for the products and the arts that secure it. The spur of anticipation is indeed more effective than the zest of enjoyment; and undoubtedly a nation is mightiest before its industry culminates in the highest luxury. The more vitally a true faith animates worldly thrift, the more secure are the people against the perils of luxury; and the greatest nations of Christendom teach us by their example that there is no fixed limit to the growth of material prosperity when material goods are interpreted and used humanely and religiously. Nations need humiliation at times, not because they are too rich, but because they use their wealth unworthily; and when their humiliation is wisely improved, the result generally is that larger prosperity flows in the channels that have been cut by the sharp tools of adversity. But fearful is the mistake that regards mere wealth as the measure of national welfare, and forgets the animating spirit in the pride of material fortune. What may be called by eminence the life of a nation—that supreme public good for which every patriot is bound to surrender his own ease, and time, and property, and, if need be, his blood—is by no means to be measured by any material standard, but it is a civil and moral organism which embodies the Providential history and experience of the people under a constitution and laws as vital as those that govern the human body. The property of a nation can be estimated by the census, and most of what are called its goods may be bought and sold; but the life of the nation can not be estimated in figures, and to undertake to appraise it in dollars and cents would be as absurd and impious as to appraise a human life. He is a traitor at the outset who begins to calculate the value of the nation; and no change of principle, but merely a change of balances, is needed to move him to translate his treason into deeds. True patriotism rests upon this great conviction; and while it is well to encourage citizens to understand and prize their material wealth, and rejoice in the extent and fertility of the land, it is clear that valor does not come from any such estimate by the tables of addition or multiplication, but from love for the nation itself. It is our country whether rich or poor; and because ours its life is sacred to us. This is the true principle; and as it possesses us it will be sure to raise up an active courage in accordance with its own dignity. Hence we utterly condemn and deplore the base huckstering spirit that treats a great nationality merely as an investment of capital, and stands up for it as long as it pays well, and is swift to desert it so soon as it becomes a losing concern. Why, in fact, should the nation be held less sacred than other institutions growing out of our social nature, and calling for the action of our best powers and our most cheerful sacrifice? What would be thought of the father who valued his family merely for their paying qualities, and abandoned his wife and children the moment that sickness and misfortune made the support of them burdensome to him? Or what would be thought of the Christian who insisted upon always making money out of his religion, and deserting the gospel and the church the moment the cross began to throw its solemn shadow along the path before gay with the sunshine? The merest tyro in history and philosophy knows well that men love and strive strongly and nobly only when they strive and love on principle, and because the life is more than the goods and the body is more than the raiment. Man is strongest only for the best good, not merely for the most goods; and when he looks devoutly and bravely to the highest reality or the supreme worth, both the fountains of power are opened within him—both the trusting and the commanding capacities and faculties. He at once depends upon and serves the highest power. Loyal in his faith and his action, he is doubly armed; and his valor, taking its commission at the headquarters of all force, acts with might answering to its commission, and can do all things in its strength. The same essential type of consciousness is found in all forms of valor, whether civil or religious; and every true man yearns to find his authority in the highest sanctions, and when he lifts his arm in defense of his country he shudders at the bare thought of following his own will instead of that supreme will which the providence of God has lodged in the laws and magistrates of the nation. Patriotic valor, when earnest, must needs then be religious, combining a sense of filial dependence upon the God of nations with the purpose of filial and fraternal service to the people. Our fathers were strong in this conviction, and the American type of valor has been of this character. The great leaders had a strong and living consciousness of divine law, and felt that they were doing a work not limited to their own interests, but destined to play a great part in the destinies of this continent and the human race. The Dutch Calvinists, the Massachusetts Puritans, and the Pennsylvania Quakers gave most emphasis to this conviction, although it was not wanting to the Maryland Catholics, the Virginia Cavaliers, and the Carolina Huguenots. It has not died out of the people yet; and with all our refinements and liberality the old Puritan leaven is still working, and the heart of the nation is not willing to sacrifice the supreme good to any amount of goods. In peace and in war the old Confession of Westminster still holds good in substance, of spirit if not of doctrine; and in camps as well as churches thousands are still ready to say that the chief end of man is to know and love God and enjoy Him eternally. We have always been taught to acknowledge the divine hand in every blessing; and the moment we regard the country as His gift, and the national life as in a measure the work of His spirit, patriotism becomes a part of religion, and valor a part of righteousness.

Reasoning thus of the constituents of valor, and tracing it to a true sense of a supreme good, above all material goods, and to a service according with this sense, we are in a better way to understand its working force. As it begins in true value, it proceeds in true validity, or in making good by deeds the worth that it accepts in idea. To put our doctrine in a single sentence, we call him valiant who makes value valid by his stout will and ready hand. What that force is that makes the Right mighty it is not easy to say; and all elementary powers, like primal truths, are the most difficult to define. It is safe to say, however, that valor, as an active power, comes from a peculiar vitality and exercise of the human will, and as such it is capable of a peculiar culture. A man may have a high degree of intelligence, and even of conscientiousness without valor, in part because he may never have been led to express his ideas in deeds, and may be feeble less from natural timidity than from merely meditative habits and an introversial spirit. Much of the culture of our time is of this stamp, and the strength of our age in comparison with former ages is by no means in proportion to our intelligence and refinement. Our mode of education has been defective in the especial training of the will, and we have coveted the Athenian taste far more eagerly than the Spartan hardihood. Sometimes we come short even of the Athenian sharpness of intellect, and, failing to apply to practice the ideas that we learn, they soon become vague and dreamy, and the school fails to nurture true scholars because it so lacks the active vigor of the camp. We are becoming aware of our error, and correcting it before it is too late. It may be that another generation of feeble study and inaction, with continued self-indulgence and ease, might have made the infirmity past remedy. It is well that life is speaking to us now in a new tone, and calling not for dreamers but doers, not for ideas of value but power to make it valid in the world.

To valor thus estimated as a working force we apply the same standard as that which we applied to its objects. We measure the power in which a hero strives as we do the good for which he strives. There is power that is estimated by its quantity, and one that is estimated by its quality. Thus in a certain sense we honor all effective power, and ascribe to it a kind of valor. He who can ford rivers, and climb mountains, and overcome wild beasts, is a valiant man, although his work may imply little more than physical force. The ancient heroes were usually giants, and it is an idea not wholly obsolete that a large man and a great man are pretty much synonymous terms. We would not disparage physical force in any way, and least of all when it is under such discipline as to do patiently and resolutely the great and constant work of industry. Honor to the vast hosts of working men who have subdued the wilderness and the wild beasts, and to whom we owe the marvelous results of our material civilization! No small amount of valor is needed to make a man labor every day in the week, year after year; and it would be a good thing for our sentimentalists, who are forever dreaming of great deeds, and doing nothing but eat the bread they never earned, if they would take the axe or the spade into their own hands, and learn from hard experience how much pluck and strength are needed to do a single day's work of ten hours. Yet we must not forget that there is a certain spirit whose worth is not to be measured by the number of days' works, and which is needed even to give the workman his motive. There is a valor that commands as well as one that serves, and certain master men have a fine and electric quality of spirit that gives force to all who come under its influence. We find it in the master's eye, and wherever its light falls the workshop or the store or the farm feels its magic; and although no word of caution or command may be spoken, a powerful presence is felt by all, and work speeds anew as if it were play. It is found in the orator, whose valor is in his lips, and the action, which is the soul of eloquence, is measured not by volubility of words or vehemence of gesticulation, but by inward force of will. His voice is a battle, and puts life into thousands before drooping and benighted. We find it in the apostle who subdues souls to God, and He is its great exemplar who is by eminence the Master, and who taught as one having authority and not as a scribe.

We pronounce him to have the truest valor who can make the most and best good valid by his power, or who substantiates the highest truth by his works. He must be a worker and something more, for although life goes forward by days' works, and a history and a cathedral are to be finished in a number of days, a fine essence, an ethereal spirit, must plan and cheer the work. The master will must preside, and all the powers at command must be subject to the one overruling power. This power needs patient discipline, not to create but to regulate its force, and active, like literary, genius must go to school to learn to use, but not to originate its fire. He is likely to do best who regulates the most native force by the most thorough and persistent training, especially if he shuns the frequent mistake of regarding the school not as the nursery but as the womb of power. Training will do much to shape the man, but can not make him out of nothing; and we make sad mistakes if we forget that heroes, like poets, are not made but born, and active genius comes from a native force of will quite as marked as poetic genius. The great poet needs diligence not to give but to guide his inspiration, and so too the hero needs training to guide his power; and the great soldiers have been those who, like Napoleon, best combined careful science and diligent discipline with native fire. That is the best army which unites the most spirit with the most endurance, the maturest powers with the most commanding power. Hence the monstrous error of those who disparage the worth of patient labor and of working habits in military affairs, and who take it for granted that the pride of the gentleman must needs conquer the plodding hardihood of the workman. An army of mechanics and farmers under good officers is more than a match for an equal number of proud cavaliers who mistake pride for pluck, or the aspiration of valor for its inspiration. The whole history of the struggle between the aristocracy and the people is constantly teaching this truth, and showing in signal passages the superiority of stout wills and brawny arms when animated by a valiant spirit over dainty tastes and feeble sinews, however flushed with pride and maddened by contempt. Invariably the combination of well-trained labor with deep enthusiasm, and especially with religious zeal, triumphs over brute force, however flattered by ambition, and, as the civilization of the future more effectually brings industry under moral and spiritual inspirations, we may expect new developments of heroism. All heroism, no matter in whatever sphere, rises in dignity as it partakes of the spirit of religious loyalty; and every work, however lowly, whether for the family, the nation, or the race, when done with a loyal heart, as under the government of God, partakes of the nobleness of the motive, and shares in the glory which it aims to promote. This is the highest power known among men, and its fruits are as memorable for their perpetuity as for their number and excellence.

The fruits of valor present a most important view of the subject, for this virtue is as marked in its results as in its objects and spirit. If its object be true value, and if its spirit makes value valid, we may say that its result appears mainly in the prevalence of its work in lasting institutions, especially in social organisms. Valor wins many victories, conquering nature, and covering deserts and wilds with the trophies of its mighty arts. Its great conquest, however, is over men—and not only in overthrowing enemies, but in building up its own people into civilized states, and making a nation of scattered multitudes. All great nations have been begotten, under God, by the spirit of valiant leaders. Valor is the virility that impregnates the womb of humanity from which states and empires are born. No mere diplomacy, no mere moralizing, nor philosophy can produce a nation. The hero is the founder of empires, the true king, or the man who can—as the name denotes; and his power is felt for centuries. They who succeed to his place, although without his original fire, inherit its flame, for it burns on the hearths and the altars which he has set up and kindled. Republics and kingdoms follow the same great law; and a Washington as well as a Frederick perpetuates his valor in the institutions that he founds and the incentives that he bequeaths. To appreciate the work of the valiant man we must consider his enduring power in raising up a succession of men like himself, who, either on the throne or at its side, defend the government that is established, for by a law of God every noble life seems destined to perpetuate itself; and sometimes, when the virtues of the heroic fathers seem to have died out, we are startled at the marvelous resurrection of them, as at the rise of forests from old fields that have long ago been burned down and given over to desolation. But valor perpetuates itself in another, and perhaps more signal and effective way; that is, by the power of permanent institutions. It perpetuates not only the spirit of a personal character, but the vitality of a great civil organism. Every great man embodies himself in some permanent institutions that contain and impart his ideas and powers. The customs and laws which he founds gather his followers into permanent relations with each other, and the office or offices which he establishes continue to govern with his authority, when sacred precedent takes the place of living force—or rather, continues the action of the old heroism. Thus it is in this country that our Washington still lives, not only as an immortal name and quickening example, but as an organized life, a constitutional power; and we all feel his presence and honor his work whenever the heart of the people is deeply moved, and we rally at the call of our country and our laws.

The head of a family may by his energy do something of the same work, whether he proves his valor by arms, or industry, or statesmanship, or letters. He establishes a certain habit, or order of habits, that lives with him and after him. When he is absent or weary, he rules in the standing order of the household; and when he is dead, he lives not only upon the tombstone or the family record, but in the whole system of ideas, discipline, and powers that he has organized. If he is a wise and devout man, he organizes divine as well as human powers, and his children are assured that in his house as well as in his garden he calls on God to work with him; and, in cheerful and sacred habits, the seeds that he has sown bear fruit for years after his death, long after the trees that he has planted in the orchard have gone to decay.

We, as a people, have every motive for gratitude that we have the example and institutions of valiant men for our heritage, and their work is perpetuated in the constitutional life of the nation. The life is there although we may sometimes forget it, and it has gone into our very blood. Our men and our women feel it, and we have ample proof that whenever the hour comes the needed valor will be forthcoming—forthcoming not only in instances of individual heroism, but in the organic life of a great people, disciplined under sound laws and true to the great instincts and habits of national liberty and order. Nothing human—surely nothing that is divinely human—can ever die; and of all the seed sown upon this earth blood is the most enduring and yields the noblest harvest, even the life eternal. The blood of the valiant lives forever, in the truth and virtues which they teach and in the institutions which they founded. It lives in the heart of the nation, and the body of this great constitutional republic, in its sacred and predestined vitality, bears the noblest blood of nearly three centuries of American heroes, and can die only when God annuls the law of creation according to which every seed must bear fruit after its own kind.

Editor's Easy Chair.

THE flags flying every where are still the symbol of the only topic of talk and interest. The soldiers come and go. The sons of many States, East and West, resident in New York, receive their brothers and friends who arrive, with military pomp, salute them, feast them, bless them, and send them on their way. The green islands near the city whiten with the increasing camps. The children play in the streets dressed like Zouaves, with little muskets for toys. The beat of the drum, the bugle-call, the shrill, passionate shock of martial music fill the air by night and day. The book-shops have only placards of books of tactics and the drill. The windows glow with portraits of the heroes. The photograph galleries are crowded with living soldiers looking at pictured soldiers upon the walls. The piles of brick and rubbish in the streets are covered with posters bearing a charging Zouave for illustration, and with General Orders, and calls for recruits, and notices of warlike meetings. The theatres revive old battle melodramas and invent new. The passengers in the streets wear badges, rosettes, and cockades of the trinity of patriotic colors. In shawls, in cravats, in ribbons, the same tricolor appears. Shops are suddenly opened on every hand for the sale of camp stores and military equipage. The newspapers are crowded with various details of the same general subject. Reports, speculations, guesses, indignation, criticism; and in the midst of the cloud the sharp dart of the truth flashing home into a hundred hearts. The crowds assemble daily before the bulletins of the newspaper offices, and the excitement of important news flutters along Broadway or Nassau Street like the widening ripples in water. You feel something in men's motions; you see something in the general manner of the throng in the street before you read it recorded upon the board or in the paper. There is but one thought and one question. The people are soldiers. The country is a camp. It is war.

To most of us war has been a tradition or a foreign romance. All our lives we have been reading of wars in Europe; and at school and afterward we read the tale of our own Revolution. Very few of us practically knew what war was, or how its aspect differed from the familiar peace. I have a venerable neighbor who remembers when the news of the Declaration of Independence came, and how she was told to read and ponder it. But such neighbors—honored and loved both for themselves and for their experience—are not in every street or town.

It is natural to think of every one in a time of war as being constantly and actively engaged in it. You fancy the ordinary pursuits of life suspended, the fields unplowed, the grass unmown, the crops neglected or trampled down. Instinctively you believe in the visible sympathy of nature with the discord and blight that have suddenly befallen men. From this feeling comes the curious surprise with which we read the memoirs of some recluse, some country curate, or retired gentleman in England during the fierce wars there. Some of these amiable diarists prattle of plants, and muse upon fish, as if there were no black cloud skirting the horizon or muttering thunder shaking the distant hills, dreaming so soft and green and quiet in the sun.

It is only when the cloud no longer skirts the horizon, but overhangs in terrible gloom the field and home of the citizen, that the aspect of war becomes what we heedlessly fancy it always to be. If the course of the campaign leads an army or a regiment in action through your fields, it is as if you dwelt upon the slope of Vesuvius, and the river of lava poured through your orchard. No wild summer gust so devastating ever blew, no swollen stream so desolating ever flowed, as the pitiless pelting of bloody battle upon a peaceful homestead. Forever after the ground seems red with blood; the air is sad with spectres. If the battle be wanton, its memory is a wound that will not stop bleeding. If the cause be holy, it is felt only as the pang of purification.

Thus, at this distance, while the hum of war is heard far away, we see only the romantic aspect, and feel only the stirring excitement. The ghastly spectacle of actual battle, the horror of wholesale human slaughter, we read of in the papers as we read history.

But because it is ghastly and horrible let no man suppose that it may not be necessary, nor that war is the worst of evils. Fear not those that kill the body, and can do no more. There are enemies that kill the souls both of individuals and nations. The day at Bunker Hill was terrible. Far away in the morning light of history the pass of Thermopylæ ran with blood. The provinces of the Netherlands stood to the death against Philip Second and political and religious slavery. But do not wish to wipe them from history because they were bloody. Do not suppose that the suffering of the few heroes who fall in maintaining principles which shall make all mankind happier, and finally spare their blood, is a worse thing than the canker of a false peace, which corrodes caution into cowardice, and for patriotism gives us pusillanimity.

A YEAR ago the Prince of Wales made a triumphal tour through the Northern part of this country.

We are republicans, but we gave him a royal welcome, for he was the representative of our great lineal and natural ally, England. Jenkins was in ecstasies. He did all that Jenkins could do. Every morning he spread, as it were, the Prince's linen and his dress for the day and evening before our enamored eyes. We knew what his Royal Highness had for breakfast; and if we did not know when, where, and how he tripped and tore his inexpressible unmentionables, it was because we did not read the papers.

The younger brother Alfred has been in Canada, but Jenkins was dumb. Four or five lines of ordinary telegram, and no more, disposed of his movements. What he had for breakfast, how often he changed his shoes, and whether he did or did not tear his trowsers, Jenkins forbore to disclose.

The "sensation" of royalty was exhausted last year. But the interest of this country in the royal family is not so dulled by any circumstances that we can hear of the possible grave illness of the Queen of England without concern. The rumor that she had shown symptoms of the sad malady of her family is not new. Ever since she has been upon the throne we have heard the same story. The incessant summer excursions, the trips to the Continent, were explained by the necessity of change of scene and excitement. And this summer there are more pointed reports, and it is openly stated that the Queen is partially insane.

As one looks closely at her photograph, the heavy mournfulness of the expression easily seems to portend a mental affection. It is a smileless face. And as you study it the look of old George Third peers spectrally out of it, and reminds you of his dismal story. It is forlorn fate enough to be a queen; but to be a mad queen, that is tragical. And she has been so decorous a ruler; not brilliant, nor beautiful, nor able, nor surrounded with great men, as Elizabeth was; but, on the other hand, so calm, so moderate, so sensible, so singularly fitted to the peculiarities of her place, that every heart is as loyal to her virtues as her Laureate, and sings in spirit with him as he sang in dedicating his poems to her:

"Revered, beloved—O you that hold
A nobler office upon earth
Than arms, or power of brain, or birth
Could give the warrior kings of old,

"Victoria—since your Royal grace
To one of less desert allows
This laurel greener from the brows
Of him that utter'd nothing base;

"And should your greatness, and the care
That yokes with empire, yield you time
To make demand of modern rhyme
If aught of ancient worth be there;

"Then—while a sweeter music wakes,
And through wild March the throstle calls,
Where all about your palace walls
The sunlit almond-blossom shakes—

"Take, Madam, this poor book of song:
For, though the faults were thick as dust
In vacant chambers, I could trust
Your kindness. May you rule as long,

"And leave us rulers of your blood
As noble till the latest day!
May children of our children say,
'She wrought her people lasting good:

"Her court was pure, her life serene;
God gave her peace; her land reposed;
A thousand claims to reverence closed
In her as Mother, Wife, and Queen;

"And statesmen at her council met
Who knew the seasons when to take Occasion by the hand, and make
The bounds of freedom wider yet

"By shaping some august decree,
Which kept her throne unshaken still,
Broad-based upon her people's will,
And compass'd by the inviolate sea.'"

Du CHAILLU, the African traveler, has been one of the celebrities of the London season. London demands its annual lion as voraciously as the anaconda its occasional ox. In the present case it found a very well-mannered and pleasant prey.

But while the Royal Society saluted and complimented the traveler by the appreciative welcome of Professor Owen and Sir Roderick Murchison—while the Gorilla became the pet of the drawing-rooms, so that Punch instantly made his acquaintance and introduced him to all his friends—while the traveler himself lectured, and officiated as a steward at the Literary Fund Dinner, Mr. Gray, a scientific gentleman of repute, began to throw hot shot at the traveler and his travels. According to Mr. Gray, Mr. Du Chaillu may have been upon the coast of Africa, but clearly he had not penetrated far. As for discoveries—why, perhaps not. Stuffed specimens bought where any man might have bought them—at least, said Mr. Gray, doesn't it look so? Because, he added, here is a discrepancy of dates; how could a man have been here to-day if he had been there yesterday? And what, continued the terrible Gray, what shall we say of a scientific traveler who announces that he has contributed novelties to the museum of natural history, yet who copies his illustrations from French works upon the subject? I am very sorry, says Mr. Gray, but I must really make a point of interrogation upon the excellent Mr. Du Chaillu.

It is always very easy to make out a case, as Dr. Whately knows. It will go hard with Napoleon or Julius Caesar, if you insist upon disproving their existence. And while the case of Gray is heard, and that of Du Chaillu is not, the case of Gray is quite strong.

The simple statement of the truth is, that Mr. Du Chaillu is not a scientific traveler in the technical sense, and does not pretend to be. He is not an artist, and he has made two trips into inner Africa. Those facts explain so much that seems suspicious to Mr. Gray. Mr. Du Chaillu's book speaks for itself. He is an enterprising, persistent traveler. In his story he wants to combine the results of more than one trip, and has been, perhaps, careless of some dates, which makes confusion. And if he finds a good representation of some specimen resembling his own, he readily adapts the likeness to his own purpose. The object is to tell the story in the most intelligible way. The adaptation is not a theft. The gorilla, for instance, has been drawn in works of natural history before this book; and in giving the artist a stuffed gorilla skin, and a tolerable picture of a gorilla, corrected by his own knowledge, to draw from, the traveler is in no way to be accused of tampering with the public.

As to the question whether Mr. Du Chaillu does or does not suppose the monkey to be a lesser man, that is a matter which can be important only in the degree of his scientific skill. If Professor Owen said that he believed so, we might all wonder whether the eager young lady in Tancred did not speak the truth: "We have been fish—we may be birds."

Du Chaillu's book is a charming and interesting record of personal exploration and adventure. If Mr. Gray has found a prodigious mare's nest in it, he has the discovery to himself.

THE charm of an artist's society is, that he lends you his eyes. Most of us are in the world like children in a library. They see the various print of the books, but that is all. It has no significance to them. So we look out over the landscape into the water, up into the sky; but our eyes are coarse and indiscriminating. It is all green below, all blue above. Then comes the eye of the artist to our aid, and teaches us what we see. Then the whole world is flushed with a myriad exquisite, evanescent, iridescent hues. Then the mountain is not a green knob or a brown cone, but a series of lovely details, blending with each other like the delicate splendors of bird plumage. If you live a month or a year with an artist in Italy, you bring away a very different Italy from that which your neighbor has put into his memory, who has lived at hotels and consorted with valets de place for years.

Thus it happens that a great many people pay large sums of money for self and family in the steamer; arrive in England, go to the inevitable Chester, the inevitable Morley's in London, the inevitable Westminster Abbey, and the rest; then cross to France, and pass through a course of the equally inevitable Meurice, the Mabile, the Café de Paris, et cetera; and so on, and so through to Cape Pattypan or the sources of the Nile; and then self and family return, and give out loudly in their conversation and conduct that they have been abroad—have traveled upon the continent—have seen Europe.

J'ne crois pas. No, no. Self has not seen Rome because he has paid huge bills and been taken to the "sights." Self has no more been in Naples because he has puffed perspiringly up Vesuvius and thrown a great copper Neapolitan grano into the viscous stream of lava, and had it fished out by the guide, and then carefully brought it home, as this Mr. Easy Chair brought home, a few centuries since, this identical lava'd coin at his elbow, which now serves as a paper weight—Self has no more been in Naples because he has done all this, than he has heard Lucrezia or the Trovatore because he has paid the highest price for the best seat at the opera.

Rome and Naples and the splendid secret of Italy are not to be bought for money. If you have no palate, do you think you can in any true or reasonable sense drink Johannisberger, such as the Prince Metternich has just sent to Richard Wagner, the diamond wine, the golden? You may swallow a liquid and quench your thirst. You may buy each drop with a pearl. You may boast of the beverage, and show the glass. You may be known as the man who drank Johannisberg by the gallon. J'ne crois pas. Can you buy a palate?

Mr. Easy Chair used to know in Italy (those few centuries ago) young artists who had literally fought their way thither through poverty and despair. They lived in the most starving way. They were more truly beggars than many who asked alms of them in the street. They dined cheap when they could afford to dine at all. Sometimes the American Hidalgo, traveling in state, took pity upon the poor fellow and asked him to dinner at the hotel. Sometimes, in his flashing chariot, he whirled him out beyond the walls to the Cecilia Metella, to the Grotto of Egeria, or even through the Galleria at Albano. It was courteous and kind in the Hidalgo.

To him it was an afternoon drive. To the artist it was that Johannisberger—the diamond, the golden. The Hidalgo went home, and had had all of Italy that could be bought. The artist had Italy in his heart and brain; and he had it packed in his portfolio in exquisite sketches.

Thus it happens that a great many people never go to Italy until they come home; and then they only see, but can not feel it. There are shreds and patches of studies which a painter takes out of his folio and holds before your eyes. They are pretty, you think. Warm in color—rich—mellow. Why, they are painted with his heart's-blood, they are so precious. "When I die," said Mary of England, "they will find Calais graved on my heart."

Italy is a passion. It is "a woman-country," Browning says, to be loved and wooed by all the male lands. If, then, we are cold, if our hearts do not make responsive music with their thousand chords when they are smitten by her glances, like a lyre by fiery fingers, let us listen to what her lovers say; and we may, at least, remotely understand what the word Italy means. The painters shall hear and see for us. They shall touch with glowing hand a piece of canvas, a bit of board, and Venice or Monte Beni shall magically rise. Painting what they saw and felt, we shall see what splendors are invisible to our eyes except through theirs. And when we begin to talk of "our time" in Rome and Sicily, and count the years and muse upon the changes, the painters shall touch their pencils to their pallets, wave the color-wand, and transport us to youth, romance, and Italy.

—In this wild way talked old Ether, that unconsionable friend who, at fifty, persists in being as blithe as twenty, as he and Mr. Easy Chair came out of the studio of Hamilton Wild, where they had been turning over a few sketches made by him in Italy.

Ma in Hispania, hummed Ether, suddenly turning upon the stairs. "You should see what he did in Spain. I don't want square miles of canvas. I don't know how much room you want in travel, good Mr. Easy Chair, but I can go to Spain and dance with gipsies, and bow in the Hall of the Embassadors, and dream by the fountained arcades, and feel the melancholy, barbaric moan of Moorish music pulse through my heart, and cry aloud in the mad joy of a bull-fight, upon a piece of tobacco-box two feet long and eighteen inches broad."

What could a patient Easy Chair do but listen to this extraordinary talk, and commend Ether to your sympathy?

THE watering-places are likely to languish this summer. Solomon Gunnybags was asked the other morning by Selina, who is not disposed to give it up yet, whether he meant to go first to Saratoga and then to Newport, or first to Newport and then to Nahant and the White Mountains and Sharon. Solomon Gunnybags looked gravely at his daughter, and replied, simply, "Nary."

"Papa! how can you be so odiously vulgar?"

"Don't you know what 'nary' means, my dear?"

"No, papa; how should I? I am not a fireman nor a vivandiere."

"If you were either, Selina, you would be of some positive use in the world."

"Thank you, papa! I suppose you would like to see me in a red shirt, running with a fire-engine."

"I shouldn't object to seeing you making a red shirt for some poor fellow who is running with the war-engine," replied Mr. Gunnybags, mildly.

Selina sniffed:

"I am sick to death of all this rub-a-dub business! I'm sure I wish people would stop fighting, and fall to polking again. What are we to do for partners, I should like to know?"

Gunnybags proceeded to tell her that he should not go to Newport or to Saratoga, because he wanted his money for other purposes. "It is a time when we are all willing to be poor," he said, "and when nobody feels very merry. If Newport were as gay as ever, I should really believe that we are as heartless as we are accused of being when we are there. No, no: Miss Selina, when husbands and brothers and sons and fathers are at the war, the sisters and daughters should not be dancing. That is the meaning of the vulgar word 'nary.'"

DESPITE the national troubles, which have paralyzed all but military and periodical literature, the beautiful Boston edition of "Bacon," of which the Easy Chair has heretofore spoken, continues to appear, and there are a thousand subscribers to the work. It is so sumptuous, solid, and elegant that, being a work of all time, it is only right that it should not suffer by the ill chances of any particular moment; and as the call for merely temporary and occasional literature dies away in the clash of arms, and yet a reading people must still read, Messrs. Brown and Taggart will certainly find that their undertaking was wise, at a time when all undertakings of the kind seemed to be dangerous.

THE other day a person who will read this sent an anonymous letter to the Easy Chair. Of course, dear Sir, you can not understand the profound meanness of such a thing. If you could you would not have done it. It was only a spurt of spite; a shrug of imbecile enmity. What else can an anonymous letter be? Show me a man who will insult a woman if he thinks no other man is near, and I will show you a man who probably writes anonymous letters.

For, suppose that you think another man wrong, do you not see that if you think so strongly enough to speak about it at all, you ought to speak to him upon your own responsibility? For instance, let us suppose that Mr. Easy Chair has annoyed Mr. Lambkin by something that he has said about Garibaldi. Mr. Lambkin is of opinion, let us say, that Garibaldi is a drunken ape and mowing idiot. When, therefore, he reads that Mr. Easy Chair thinks him a hero Lambkin is wroth. Now, if he speaks to Easy Chair about the matter, and says that he thinks him for this reason and the other reason to be wrong, Easy Chair listens, and knows, at least, that Lambkin has an honest opinion which may seem to be very erroneous, but is yet something of which Lambkin is not ashamed. If, however, Mr. Lambkin sends an anonymous note instead, Mr. Easy Chair smiles because he knows that here is somebody who does not dare to confess his own opinion, and that cowardice prevents the opinion from even seeming reasonable. The instinct of all decent men is, "What can be so contemptible as the opinion of any man who is capable of writing an anonymous letter?"

But an anonymous letter, you think, may be an alarming threat. Yes, it may be a threat. And you think that it may be executed? Yes, again; for every man is at the mercy of a coward. The meanest of the English soldiers might have poisoned the well whence Washington was to drink. And the danger which is menaced by an anonymous letter no foresight can avoid. The menace is the certificate of treachery.

See, also, what a confession it is. Why does not Lambkin sign his name to his letter? Because he knows that the name would give no weight to it, or because he is afraid that the name would be exposed, or because he is afraid that the recipient, in the language of the rude street boy, would "take the change out of his hide."

Moreover, does not the gentle Lambkin reflect that editors receive all kinds of letters, and that anonymous communications are the larger part? To an Easy Chair, which rusticates in its country cottage contemplating only kine in the pasture, such a missive may be very hot in the hand and explode under the glance of his eye, like a magazine when the spark touches it. But to a bomb-proof editor, to a man immured in the casemate of a sanctum! Go to, Lambkin! Write your terrible anonymous letters to the marines. Catch your neighbor's third daughter on her way to school, and make faces at her, and tell her you will burn her papa's house down if she doesn't give you a piece of the candy she is eating. That is the work for a fellow of your manliness, for you may frighten her.

Adoo, Lambkin!

It is amusing, but not very instructive in these days of war, to study the campaign as conducted in the newspapers. Each paper has its general theory of the essential military movement. It shows how such a step may be taken. It proves conclusively that it ought to be taken. It shows that utter ruin attends any other step. The other is taken and succeeds, and the good newspaper rubs out and begins again.

It was so in the Crimean war. What tremendous articles we had upon that campaign! It was a great pity that the generals engaged could not have had the New York papers served with their shells every morning. Of course the articles were written by the most competent and experienced hands. The shrug with which the hint of the author's name was conveyed to you was overwhelmingly significant.

"The very highest possible authority."

"No?" (in the delighted-interrogative tone.)

"Yes, the highest possible."

"Not—"

Here a nod anticipatory from the editor.

"You don't mean—"

Here the editorial head apparently succumbs to a hilarious form of St. Vitus's dance.

"Well, well, that is gratifying. What's the secret? How on earth did you do it?"

"Enterprise," replies editor. "Must have every thing. The daily Last Year and the tri-weekly Slow Coach may have what they can pick up; but the morning Middle of Next Week must come to time. You'd be astonished to know where those articles are read!"

"Not in St. Petersburg?" replies delighted friend.

"Better than that."

"Not in—"

Editorial head shaking as before.

"You don't mean to say that—"

"Yes, yes, yes, I do. Nothing less."

"Well, that is amazing; and I suppose they do some good, eh?"

"Some good! Do some good! You remember the charge at Balaklava?"

"Yes."

"Well."

"Not really?"

"Yes."

"Well, I give it up. I have always respected the power of the press. I have always thought, etc.; but I never supposed that Jones wrote your war articles."

"Jones! Jones! Blast Jones! Who said he wrote them?"

"Didn't you?" (with profound astonishment.)

"No!" (with voluble indignation.)

"Who does write them, then?"

"Why, Smith, to be sure, SMITH."

"Oh thunder! Blast Smith!"

Which of them writes the present campaigning articles it is not easy to say. But we may rest contented. If it is not Smith, it is Jones. There is always that comfort. And the only difficulty is that as neither Jones nor Smith know any thing of the numbers, movements, or plans of the enemy, we can not always feel, as we should like to feel, that they know what they are talking about.

In these mid-summer days there is little talk of opera, and the theatres languish. People are fond of saying that in the Reign of Terror in Paris the theatres were crowded. Very likely: but New York is not Paris, and this is not a Reign of Terror.

The singing birds have fled far away. One, the Patti, has wandered over the ocean to strange groves, and sings to English ears. Those ears are enchanted. Well, it only makes one reconsider Jenny Lind, for her fame was made in England. The Patti has a sweet voice, and warbles nimbly; but she is a child. She is still little past the phenomenon we all remember. Then the English audience was wild with the Piccolomini. Do you think the English a very sagacious audience?

Do not suppose that Mr. Easy Chair—who is nothing if not gallant—is insensible to the charm of Patti. Not at all. She is a delightful little singer. But there are stars of different glories. Is it splendor of voice? Is it magnificence of person and movement? Is it perfection of skill? Is it passion? It surely is none of all these. It is very brilliant, sweet, refined singing. Which would stamp your memory deepest, to hear this fresh lovely murmur of the Patti's voice, or to listen to the farewells of Giulia Grisi, which are simultaneous with the welcome of our pet and operatic darling?

Have we ever acknowledged that we did not appreciate Grisi when she was in this country? Of all the really great singers who have been here—and they are few—she is the greatest except Jenny Lind, and we were obstinately cold. The ermine mantle she used to wear upon the stage in our poorly-filled gilt barn was symbolic. The cold struck her. She shivered. She was not herself.

Only now and then she came out in the fullness of her power and sang. But she lost heart early in her visit. She felt that she had partly failed. There was no enthusiasm. There was rather a half feeling of indignation, as if she had brought to us the remains of her voice and her beauty and her power. "Oh me!" said Tiquet as he stood with Mr. Easy Chair one evening when she was singing La Vergine Vezzosa in the Puritani—"Oh me, I heard her recalled fifteen times in that when she first sang the opera in Paris—and now, oh! oh!"

"Oh! oh!" indeed! Was it her fault that she had not found the fountain of youth? Was it her fault that at forty-five she was no longer sixteen? Was she not Lucrezia still, and Norma, and Semiramide?

You will find pleasant reading in Anthony Trollope's "Orley Farm," which appears monthly in these pages; or, indeed, in any of his novels. They are very skillfully and neatly done. They have a thoroughly English tone and flavor, and the British complacent and rubicund complexion. They will be invaluable to the New Zealander when he arrives to sit upon the ruins of St. Paul's, and wants to know exactly what the general aspect of English life was in our day.

Mr. Trollope's specialty is the life of the rural clergy. One of his earliest stories was called "Barchester Towers," and it is one of the cleverest. In that he describes the life in a country cathedral close—the loves, and friendships, and jealousies, and intrigues, and virtues, and failures, and triumphs of the bishop and his wife and his chaplain and the dean, and so to the end of the chapter. It is not in the least caricatured. There is a kind of quiet, daylight naturalness in his pictures which is very charming. Upon the whole, you are rather surprised that you are interested and entertained. But you are; and you go steadily on to the end, and are very glad to meet the same people again in the next novel.

For in this Mr. Trollope is like Thackeray. He confides in the interest of his characters as human beings. As neither of them write for the purpose of exciting you with a plot, but of interesting you in a character, they naturally feel that your interest makes you want to know more of the character. How will the curate conduct himself as rector, as dean, as bishop?

Mr. Trollope's books are also racy with a dry, skeptical humor. It is not obtrusive. It is not a loud, laughing humor. But it smiles and glimmers, and gives meaning looks all the way. It is the betrayal of the English moral mauvaise honte, which is evident enough in Thackeray, but of which Dickens has no trace. It is a tone which says to the reader with a side-wink, as it were, "You know virtue is all very well, but it doesn't impose upon me: no, not in the least." It is not because the author does not believe, but because he doubts whether you do.

Anthony Trollope is now the most popular of English novelists after Dickens, Thackeray, and Bulwer.

Our Foreign Bureau.

A PRUSSIAN duel has attracted no inconsiderable share of public attention—the parties to it the General de Manteuffel, chief of the Military Cabinet of the King, and M. Von Twesten, Judge of the Tribunal of Berlin. The cause lay in certain aspersions upon the character of the General, in an anonymous pamphlet recently issued at the Prussian capital, entitled, "What may yet Save us." In this pamphlet the General was declared to be a man utterly unsuited to his position, who bestowed commands from caprice or court favor, and who for years had been a complete stranger to the army. Whereupon the General wrote to the reputed author, M. Twesten, asking if the rumors of authorship were well-grounded. M. Twesten avowed it. The General asked retraction; but the Councilor, in a moderate note, declined. The challenge then passed, and a meeting was arranged, with pistols, at eleven paces, either party having permission to advance three. On the ground a new effort was made to effect a reconciliation, and a paper drawn up with that view was again offered to M. Twesten for signature. He, however, peremptorily declined. The word being given, M. Twesten advanced rapidly three paces and fired, his ball grazing the forehead of the General. The General again asked of his antagonist to sign the paper which had been drawn up by their mutual friends. "At this juncture," said the Councilor, "it is quite impossible." The General turned, stepped back three paces, and wheeling around fired, his ball shattering the wrist of M. Twesten. The King has ordered a prosecution of the Military Chief of his Cabinet and of M. Twesten.

WE alluded last month to the disagreements that had arisen between the British and Prussian Cabinets in relation to the Macdonald affair. These have now culminated in a pithy and trenchant note of Lord John Russell, wherein the Foreign Secretary underscores the saucy language of Lord Palmerston, and gives to the diatribe of warm Parliamentary speech the chilling point and permanence of diplomatic utterance. We quote the most doughty portion of this letter:

"I have now to inform you that if Baron Schleinitz's dispatch had contained merely a renewed record of the opinions of the Prussian Government on the Macdonald affair, and a statement that those opinions had in no degree been changed by what was said in the House of Commons on the occasion in question, Lord Palmerston would not have considered it necessary to prolong by an answer a discussion which every well-wisher to a cordial good understanding between the Prussian and British Governments must regret, and must be desirous of seeing brought to an end; but as Baron Schleinitz has chosen in one part of his dispatch to accuse Lord Palmerston 'of heaping ungrounded reproaches on the Government and laws of Prussia,' and in another part 'of having put forth reproaches without grounds or justification against the Government and laws of Prussia,' he deems it right to state that what he said on the occasion in question was said advisedly and upon full conviction; that he deliberately abides by all that he then said, and that he sees nothing in it either to be retracted or to be explained away; and he is convinced that the opinions which he then expressed are entirely shared by the great bulk of his fellow-countrymen. Those opinions, however, he would observe, were confined to the conduct of the Prussian Government and of their subordinate officers; he said nothing that could justly give offense to the Prussian nation, with regard to whom he only expressed a regret that they should be liable to laws which vest in subordinate and irresponsible agents powers and authority which, as in the case of Captain Macdonald, are capable of being used with cruelty and injustice without any overstepping of the strict limits of the law. You will read this dispatch to Baron Schleinitz and give him a copy of it.—I am, etc., J. RUSSELL."

EVEN the most venturesome, and those who make a trade of venture, find protection under the magistratures of France. If you are cut up on some railway line, by breakage or collision, you may secure ample damages, and the conductor or engineer in fault will very likely repent in prison. A crime of railway management is as much a crime as the crime of a burglar: this we have long known; but the protective reach of the law has just now taken a step in advance; it has punished the manufacturer of a cable, by which two rope-dancers met their death. Five thousand spectators last summer in the Hippodrome were horrified by witnessing the fall of three gymnasts (father and two sons), by which the father and one son were killed, and the other maimed for life. This year action was brought against the manager of the Hippodrome in the name of the widows of the two victims, praying for damages in the sum of thirty-five thousand francs.

The manager objected that the gymnasts had undertaken their feats at their own risk, and that it belonged to them to have supervision of the cable and make judgment of its sufficiency. If, however, the Court should declare him liable, he begged to transfer the liability to the manufacturer, who had engaged to furnish a cable of sufficient strength for the purpose. This curious case came on latterly for trial; and the Court awarded twenty-five thousand francs to the plaintiffs, and farther ruled that, as the cable was constructed of imperfect materials, a like sum should be paid over to the manager by the manufacturer.

By this thread of connection we pass over to mention of M. Blondin, who is making his aerial voyages in sack and blindfolded, and driving barrows under the roof of the Crystal Palace at Sydenham. It is an inglorious use of a structure which was to give by its wonders a cheap art-schooling to the people of England, and which has had for special manager no less a personage than Sir Joseph Paxton. But the rare beauties of the Pompeian and Alhambra courts did not pay; and Monsieur Blondin's hair-brained trajets do. The great botanist and crystal architect is voted down by the shareholders who seek for dividends.

WE have made no mention as yet of a French book, of comparatively recent issue, which may well challenge attention, and which in happier times would certainly have found a translator and readers upon your side of the water. We refer to De Beaumont's Memoir of Alexis de Tocqueville. (Œuvres et Correspondance inédites, etc. Précédées d'une notice par Gustave de Beaumont.) A character so beautiful and true, a mind so penetrating and philosophic, have belonged to few Frenchmen of the current century. Born in 1805, and inheriting from a long line of ancestry the most alluring of aristocratic and kingly traditions, he yet became the stanchest and most consistent advocate of an enlightened democratic policy who has appeared in our time. His father was made a Count by Louis XVIII. The son studied for a time at the academy of Metz; and after an Italian tour, he held, just previous to the Revolution of 1831, a humble judicial position at Versailles.

Loving the Orleans family less than he loved the Revolution, which brought deserved punishment for the follies and weaknesses of the elder Bourbons, he entered upon that American exile which fortunately gave to us, in the year 1835, the most thorough inquiry into the character and tendencies of democracy in America which has yet been written. The sagacity and weight of his speculations are the more remarkable from the fact that he was hardly a year within the States, and was only thirty at the time of publishing the first installment of his great work. The success of it was unbounded. He married shortly after an English lady, Miss Motley (much to the regret of his aristocratic friends); and being elected in 1839 a deputy, he joined the liberal party in opposition to Guizot and the King. De Tocqueville was, however, no speaker; his words were too measured, his manner stiff and methodical; he never warmed into any outburst of rhetoric, or cultivated the arts which command the attention of a promiscuous assemblage. Every one knows the rest: how the Revolution swept away the King—how the calm De Tocqueville became for a while Minister of Foreign Affairs (favoring in this position the French occupation of Rome)—how the coup d'état of December swept away the men who had illustrated the short-lived Republic—how De Tocqueville, with his best hopes broken, again devoted himself to letters, fathoming with rare acuteness the subtlest and remotest causes of the old revolution (in his “Ancien Régime”); and finally dying a calm, Christian death down at Cannes, on the edge of the Mediterranean.

A letter of his about the death of Count Molé, in 1855, contains this: “Nothing strikes me more than the change which has taken place, and is every day taking place, with regard to the old French taste for intellectual pleasures. By that I mean a delight in great works and ingenious conversations. Nowadays it would seem that to seek for pleasure of this kind would be to employ time in a way that was dangerous, or at least frivolous.”

And again, in correspondence with Mrs. Grote: “I am surprised at a certain habit of the English mind in politics. In the eyes of the English, the cause the success of which will benefit England is always the cause of justice. The man or the government that serves England has all sorts of good qualities, and that which hurts England has every kind of defect; so that it would seem that the test of what is noble, honest, and just is to be found in that which favors or hurts the interests of England.”

You will have read of the pretty quarrel which has sprung up in England in regard to the authenticity and truthfulness of the recent entertaining book of M. Du Chaillu. The Franco-American traveler has, it is well known, been cordially received by the magnates of the Royal Geographical Society, and has been heartily commended and eulogized by such distinguished savans as Murchison and Professor Owen. Apropos to which a good story is told of an affront he has unwittingly shown to the Bishop of Oxford. It appears that the Bishop had invited him to breakfast to meet some half a score of his scientific friends. The day and hour arrived, but no M. Du Chaillu appeared; the bishop met him next day on the street, and proceeding to give him courteous challenge for his incivility, our African declared that he knew nothing of the invitation—he had received none.

“But,” said his lordship, “I left the note myself at your door.”

“Must have miscarried,” says Du Chaillu; “I have seen no breakfast invitation except one from a Mr. — (naming his lordship’s official title), and I make it a point to decline all invitations from people I don’t know.”

The Gorilla, notwithstanding the cool reception of Dr. Gray, maintains his distinction and prestige in the society of London.

Another American success has been that of the transatlantic Italian Mademoiselle Patti. Covent Garden has fairly forgotten itself to rapture in her presence, and no musical triumph over the popular heart since Jenny Lind’s day has been comparable with it. The Athenæum alone, of all the London journals which have fallen under our observation, takes exception to the enthusiastic applause, and sustains its dignity by giving a chilly approval to the actress, and a cautious expression of critical doubt in regard to the real capacity of the singer.

OF course American affairs just now gain very full range of discussion in the British journals; among which the Daily News, Spectator, and Examiner particularly distinguish themselves for their advocacy of the extreme Northern views; while the Times, Chronicle, Saturday Review, and London Review lean rather to a sympathy with the weaker party in the contest. Messrs. Bright and Cobden, with the great moneyed party which they represent, reserve any very decided expression of opinion until the developments of the summer campaign, and the exhaustion of the cotton supply now in hand, shall force them to quick decision and an open vigor.

THE late meeting of the Literary Fund had for its special interest the presidency of the Duc d’Aumale, whose recent historical tract met with the honor of condemnation and seizure at the hands of the French censor, and almost the honor of a personal challenge from his Imperial Highness the Prince Napoleon. Those assisting at the literary dinner speak enthusiastically of the suavity and good sense of the Duke, and express surprise that a Frenchman should carry off so well the duties of British chairmanship and the delicate manque de rigueur of a good dinner speech.

A RECENT pension of £50 per annum, bestowed by Lord Palmerston, as almoner of the Government charities, upon a certain John Close, Esq., poet of Westmoreland, and “Poet Laureate to Pepple, King of Grand Bonny, Western Africa,” is proving just now sadly afflictive to the critics in general. Indeed, judging from such specimens as we can find of the state pensioner’s verses, the premier must have intended a state joke, or an insult to poetasters in general. Mr. Close, it appears, is the proprietor of a small printing-shop in Westmoreland, where he struggles for a livelihood; and if one may judge from his poems, the struggle must be very desperate.

We give a sample in honor of a certain Dr. Rooke, the inventor of a purgative “Oriental pill,” who had sent the poet a package of them, with a douceur in coin: and the Close makes return:

Where is the man with such a heart?
A heart so large and free;
Who for a stranger felt so keen—
That stranger—it was me!

When ill in bed—no friend had we,
To whom for aid apply;
But Dr. Rooke Prescriptions sent,
When we were like to die.

Not merely Pills—but dazzling Gold,
Oh! when can we repay?—
This god-like man—all we can do—
For him we daily pray.

He had not seen our Portrait then,
Our writings all had read;
And thus he judged of “Poet Close,”
What Brains were in his head.

’Tis thus that we have ever found
Our writings most admir’d,
By those who many miles away
Our Muse she has inspir’d.

To Dr. Rooke we (under God)
Owe our prosperity;
He kept us up from Dark despair
In days of Poverty.

Mr. Whitwell, a carpet manufacturer of Kendal, has also commended himself to the poet with “dazzling gold,” whereupon “the Close” tunes his lyre:

Well may Kendal in him glory,
Well may nations chant his name,
When they gaze upon his carpets,
Which from Whitwell's warehouse came.

First at London's Exhibition,
Now to France he hastes away;
There to meet great Cobden musing,
On the Treaty—papers say.

Men of brains and perseverance,
Spread Britannia's name abroad;
And John Whitwell's carpets splendid,
Celebrated—none so good.

See the man! his fine eye beaming,
Full of kindness—love to all;
Oft he smiles on sons of poesy,
Listens kindly when they call.

May success his steps attending,
All his efforts ever crown;
May long length of days rejoice him,
While he lives in Kendal town.

We looked for something even better in return for Lord Palmerston's £50 pension to this deserving son of poesy; but unfortunately for him the pension was revoked, and the poem has not seen the light.

ALL other recent European events are overshadowed by the great calamity which has befallen the Kingdom of Italy. Before yet its union was established or fully recognized even by France; before the lava of the Neapolitan eruptions has grown cool; before a protective line of bayonets is thoroughly organized along the Mincio; before the Austrian army has fairly ceased to be a terror, or the reactionary cabals of Rome are stifled, the master and guardian hand of Italy is withdrawn.

Now indeed, if never before, must Italy "do for herself." Confidence in the ability of Cavour had become with Italians a second faith. No continental nation for ten years past has been so free as Piedmont—nowhere a man so much at liberty to live as he chose, to think as he chose, to speak as he chose, and to write as he chose; yet nowhere in Europe has the popular mind and action been so much and so unconsciously under the control of a single governing brain, and that brain was Cavour's. No other influence than his could successfully have opposed that wild tide of martial enthusiasm which was lifted by the miraculous career of Garibaldi, and which threatened to wreck all the best hopes of Italy in one mad dash against the battlemented walls of Verona. Not another influence than his could have controlled the violent reaction of the popular sympathies after the treaty of Villafranca. No other mind than his could have dealt as he dealt with the Imperial arbiter of the war.

His disease and death make only another story of a brain whose prodigious energy shattered and tore down the frame that carried it. He may have loved good living; the truffles of Savoy and Bordeaux vintages over well; but if he had lived in exile, his naturally firm constitution would have carried the truffles and the Bordeaux. As the case stood, these things only contributed to the nervous excitation under which he has been living constantly for the ten years last past. The English physicians say he was murdered by his doctors; they shudder at the blood-lettings, and with reason; it will take a generation to live down the traditions of the Italian doctors.

Years ago, when Cavour was a simple officer of engineers at Genoa, he was accustomed to take from the reading-rooms the journals of England and France, and to render into Italian aloud in his chambers the speeches of Theirs and Guizot and Peel—thus preparing himself for the parliamentary conflicts in which he was ultimately to engage. Yet never, except on great occasions, did he rise to any high oratorical level in his speeches. His observations in Parliament were mostly of a conversational and familiar cast; yet having such a winning clearness, and such logical sequence, that they compelled a hearing and conquered acquiescence. Every statement he made seemed true; every deduction inevitable; every vote he asked for seemed to follow as a matter of course.

People bowed to him reverently as he passed to his rooms in the ministry under the arcades of Turin (for he was simple in his habits and rarely rode), but they did not venture to delay him or interrupt him; for he had a habit of rubbing his hands together as he walked, or twisting his lips nervously, as if the labor of the day were always in his thought. He had, perhaps, fewer personal friendships than most men in such station; not because unfriendly in character, but because his great and engrossing friend was—only Italy. And that great friend will mourn him grievously for many a day.

The new cabinet is organized with the Baron Ricasoli at its head, and proposes to follow out the programme and purposes of Cavour.

The ultra republicans of Italy naturally rejoice in the removal of their most rusé and effective opponent; the reactionists of Rome and Naples also rejoice, and the Austrian Emperor without doubt indulges in a discreet thankfulness at the death of the man who tore away from him two-thirds of his Italian possessions. But the most hilarious and bigoted of those who give thanks for the death of Cavour are the popish sympathizers of France and England. The ultramontane journals of Paris do not scruple to give praise to God for the removal of the arch-enemy of the Church, and in both the upper and lower Houses of the British Parliament there were found men who offended the public sense and all decency, by obtruding expressions of their satisfaction at that death which is so justly counted a European misfortune.

THE Syrian question, since our last writing, has come, by reason of a compromise of the European powers interested, to a quasi settlement. The Governor of the Lebanon, named by a mixed commission, is to have the dignity of "muchir," whatever that may be, and is to reside at Deir-el-Kamar. Order will be preserved, or an attempt in that direction made, by a militia recruited in the country. The Turkish troops are not to enter the Lebanon except upon a requisition of the Governor, who is nominally a Christian. French and Russian fleets, joined to a few British ships, are to cruise off the coasts for the quick suppression of any mutinous spirit that may appear. The French troops, contrary to our expectations, are to be withdrawn; they are, however, withdrawn with a protest on the part of M. Lavalette, the French ambassador at the Porte, which will rankle like an arrow.

The new Governor of the Lebanon holds office for three years only; after which time he is not to be reinstated or replaced without the concurrence of the Allied Powers. Under these conditions the miserable and decayed nationality of Turkey resumes its nominal authority over one of its noblest provinces.

The Christian people of the Montenegro and of the Herzegovine, now that the Syrian question has its three years' quietus, are querulous for an interposition in their behalf. Meantime they keep alive both their faith and their patriotism by an active and harassing guerrilla warfare upon the outposts of the Turkish army.

The Austro-Hungarian imbröglío still lingers. Austrian troops are doing their best to collect taxes which are refused; Transylvania has not yet settled the terms of a proposed union with Hungary; Klapka is stated to be in intimate counsel with Garibaldi and Kossuth, maturing his plans in Piedmont.

Two petitions, signed by some fifty patricians and by ten thousand Roman citizens, have been, or are shortly to be, presented to the Emperor Napoleon and Victor Emanuel. The first, after giving due praise and honor to the conqueror of Solferino and the friend of Italy, proceeds: "You, Sire, have done all in your power to preserve the temporal domain of the Pope. If you have not succeeded in this, it is simply because it is impossible to restore life to convictions and institutions which are at war with the principles of 1789, and which do not accord with the necessities of the Italian nationality. The moment is solemn, Sire, and we tell you only the truth in saying, that if the Papal Court resist longer the necessities of the time, not only will it prove the ruin of all the moral and material interests of Rome, but even the existence of the Catholic Church in Italy will be compromised. We ask in this matter only that the wishes of the people of Rome should have authority."

The petition to the King is in similar vein—recognizing him as the duly appointed head of Italy, and closes thus: "Rome awaits you, Sire! She lifts her hands toward you. She asks that your flag—the flag of Italy—be unfurled from the steps of her ancient capitol!"

GIVING truce now to politics, we take up this pleasant on dit which is just now taking the round of the Paris salons. The scene is a first-class railway carriage upon one of the admirably conducted roads of France. Windows of plate glass, curtains of damask, Brussels carpet, cushions that invite sleep, and places for six. Four of these are occupied; two sitting opposite each door. Three are young military men in undress uniform, the fourth an elderly gentleman, somewhat wrinkled, careworn, and of a quiet, thoughtful expression. His vis-à-vis, one of the young gentlemen before alluded to, presently draws a cigar-case from his pocket, asks with the utmost courtesy if it is offensive to his opposite neighbor?

"Du tout," says the old gentleman, "I am no smoker, but it is not offensive; I shall only ask permission to drop the window." (Dropping the window of a French carriage is opening it.) The military gentleman accordingly lights his cigar, and the elderly gentleman opposite drops the window.

The air, however, is quite fresh and cool, and the young gentleman feeling it rather annoyingly, ventures to close the window.

His opposite neighbor drops it.

"The open window gives me a chill," says the military gentleman, raising it again.

"The close air is annoying," says the elderly gentleman, dropping it in his turn.

And thereupon the window flies up and down; the militaire waxing warm, but the elderly gentleman preserving the utmost composure. This play proceeds for a while, until the military voyageur, unable longer to control himself, pulls up the window with an oath, and placing his hand upon the lift, declares that it shall not be opened again.

The old gentleman coolly dashes the glass into fragments with his cane.

"Monsieur," says the infuriated Hotspur, "this does not end so. I must ask your card in exchange for mine."

"You shall have it presently," says the old gentleman, coolly reading the slip of paper the officer had placed in his hand. "Capitaine of the — regiment—already Captain, Monsieur—it is a pity you should be so rash; it may bring you trouble."

"A truce to pleasantries," says the officer, twirling his mustache, "I must have your address."

"La voici," and the old gentleman quietly hands him his card, on which the angry Captain has the satisfaction of reading, "M. —, Minister of Justice."

As we hear nothing of a challenge having been accepted at the Palace of Justice, it is to be presumed that the young militaire did not persist in his bravado.

Editor's Drawer.

LAUGHTER, as a medicine, is not prescribed by our modern medical authorities, though Dr. Solomon, who was great in his knowledge of herbs, thought a merry heart was good as physic. One of the New Haven papers has recorded a fact that must take its place in the books, or at least in the Drawer, to prove that our medicine is good in case of mumps and brain-fever:

"A short time since two individuals in this city were lying in one room very sick, one with brain-fever and the other with an aggravated case of mumps. They were so low that watchers were needed every night, and it was thought doubtful if the one sick of fever would recover. A person was engaged to watch one night, his duty being to wake the nurse whenever it became necessary to take the medicine. In the course of the night both watcher and nurse fell asleep. The man with the mumps lay watching the clock, and saw that it was time to give the fever patient his potion. He was unable to speak aloud, or to move any portion of his body except his arms; but, seizing a pillow, he managed to strike the watcher in the face with it. Thus suddenly awakened, the watcher sprang from his seat, falling to the floor and awakening both the nurse and fever patient. The incident struck both the sick men as very ludicrous, and they laughed most heartily at it for fifteen or twenty minutes. When the doctor came in the morning he found his patients vastly improved—said he had never known so sudden a turn for the better—and they are now both out and well."

OLD Dr. Levi Bull, an Episcopalian clergyman of Chester County, Pennsylvania, who died six or eight years ago, used to tell of a man and his wife—plain people—bearing the uneuphonious surname of Frog, and who came to him one Sunday morning, just at church-time, to have their child baptized. Without any preliminary observations, they were called up to the font at the end of the Second Lesson.

"Name this child," said the Doctor.

"We name it after you, Sir," whispered the woman, as she handed the baby.

"Oh, but," whispered the Doctor back, "you named the last one Levi, as I now remember."

"Well," said she, in a hurry, "call this one after your t'other name."

And so the Doctor did, and christened the baby by the name of Bull.

After the parents got home, and the excitement of the day had somewhat passed off, they began to reckon it all up, and they saw, for the first time that it had struck their attention, that their youngest darling was bound to go through life with the cognomen of Bull Frog!

"FORTY years ago," says a Trenton (New Jersey) correspondent, "the Delaware River Valley, above this place, which now has a railroad on the north side of the river, and a canal on each side of the river, then had neither; but the produce of the upper country, at that time sparsely populated, was floated down the Delaware to the head of tide-water at this place, in Durham boats and upon rafts. In those days Lambertville was known as Bungtown, from the number of black eyes carried by the rough and combative watermen, who there had frequent rows. Between Bungtown and Flemington, at a place called 'Head-quarters,' there dwelt a store-keeper named John Fernon, who was also an ex-Methodist preacher, but who then, as a lay brother, exhorted his customers on a Sunday, in a room in the rear of his country store. This Fernon was a sort of Hercules in physical strength, and with his stentorian lungs he made the name of John Wesley a terror to evil-doers. Among the boatmen along the river he was known as the 'Methodist peace-maker,' by reason of his extraordinary feats at camp-meetings, where rows with the 'up-river men' were not infrequent. One Sunday afternoon, while Fernon was reading a hymn to his neighbors assembled to hear him preach, a stranger—who had, doubtless, been sent 'on his mission' in the way of experiment—entered the store-door, and cried out,

"Hillo, Fernon! some apple-jack—quick!" at the same time holding out his flask to the horror of the assembled Wesleyans.

"Feron—who was of Irish birth, crossed with the Spaniard (his wife, an excellent woman, was a Scotch-Irish 'Campbell-Kirkpatrick'); and who was of the type of man who at Donnybrook fair annually inquires, with his shillalah on his back, 'Will no gentleman trid upon my coat-tail?'—threw down his hymn-book, and rushing upon the intruder, seized him by the nape of the neck, crying out, as he thrust him out of the door with fearful momentum, 'Here, Devil, keep your men on your own side of the line!'

"At another time, having an engagement to preach upon one of the hill-tops in his neighborhood, he lost his way in the dark upon the rocks, whereby he was belated. - But after a time he espied a light through the darkness, and making his way to it, and being saluted with, 'Brother Fernon, how late you are!' he replied, 'True, I am late, but the Devil will be later finding you among these fastnesses among the rocks. So to home with you, and thank Heaven that your lives are cast in safe places!' And with this he dismissed the meeting.

"Subsequently Fernon moved down the river to the farm on which the village of Titusville now stands, where he kept a ferry, a store, worked a farm, preached, educated his dogs to seize and hold trespassers by the trowsers, and raised a family of boys, who raised the neighborhood if any body disputed that John Wesley was the greatest man and the best Christian that ever lived. About the year 1830 Fernon moved South, since which time no one of his name has had a habitation on the Upper Delaware, though among the 'old inhabitants' there is no lack of anecdotes of his militant manner of enforcing his precepts, derived from the inspired volume, as he understood it by his free translation."

LIGHT BEYOND THE CLOUDS.

MARBLE-LIKE, leaning as over a grave,
Eyes with sad depths and lips tender but brave;
Soft sunlight bathing the pale, rigid brow,
Vainly, no beam can illumine it now.

Over the grave of pure visions too bright—
Over the grave of heart-warmth and heart-light—
Calmly and coldly, moveless all day,
Standeth the statue, unwarmed by a ray.

Twilight steals on, and deep-buried in shade,
Marble no more is the unnervate maid;
Brow to the damp earth, soul-thrilling the groan,
Unchecked the raining tears—poor heart, alone!

Kneeling and writhing with sharp inward pain,
Tortured face raised and quick buried again,
Throbbing arms listlessly laid in the dust,
Earth's light all faded, and shaken all trust.

Dark shadows veiling the ocean's calm breast,
Stars with their kindly eyes, blessing since blessed,
Fragrance from hidden flowers, all vainly woo—
Beauty that heightens joy deepens grief too.

Steals now a soothing voice on the rapt ear—
"Lean on me, daughter, and be of good cheer;
Render not worship that worketh such woe,
Thy nature's deep cravings God only can know."

Hushed is the tempest, the eyes glance above,
Yearns the bowed heart to the Father of Love;
Pleading the low tone for full, early rest—
"Wearied and lone, take me home to thy breast!"

"Trust in me, daughter, and toil on a while,
Guided and warmed by the light of my smile;
A mission of love to the stricken and lone,
Be thine to fulfill, child, forever my own."

Humbly then turns she her duties to meet;
Fainting, yet eager her task to complete;
Earth-shadows round her, but light in her soul—
The Father is beckoning on to the goal.

FROM Omaha City, Nebraska, we have the following:

"About a year and a half ago John P. Merlin, Esq., came to Nebraska City, seeking a recommendation from the Democracy for the office of Chief Justice of Utah, in place of Judge Cradlebaugh.

"Well, the Honorable Judge Merlin, the better to secure the influence of a few federal officials and others, gave a Champagne supper to about forty, at which a committee was appointed to draft resolutions expressive of the feelings of the assembled company, and which were to be transmitted, with the Judge's other recommendations, to Washington. The following resolutions were read, adopted, and washed down unanimously:

"Whereas we are convened here this evening at the invitation of a distinguished and eminent member of the high and honorable profession of the law—a bright particular star in that firmament of legal erudition whose effulgence illumines the fertile and magnificent Valley of the Missouri River—John P. Merlin, Esq., of Fremont County, Iowa;

"Therefore be it resolved—

"First. That in the intellectual economy of J. P. Merlin are all the elements and acquirements appertaining to the sound, practical, and profound lawyer, the ever-reliable, stanch, active, energetic, and sagacious Democrat.

"Second. That the said J. P. Merlin, for his honesty, integrity, liberality, and indomitable industry and sobriety, is peculiarly fitted for a seat upon the Bench of the Supreme Court of Utah, for which place he seems to us the man—the man furnished at this crisis in the affairs of that polygamous commonwealth, as Napoleon was to France, by the hand of a never-erring destiny.

"Third. That we earnestly, solicitously, anxiously, and prayerfully petition his Excellency James Buchanan, President of the United States, to nominate and, by and with the advice of the United States Senate, confirm our friend and host as Associate-Justice of the Supreme Court of Utah.

"And furthermore be it resolved, that we wish him long life, honor, happiness, and prosperity in this world—that we thank him for this entertainment—and that when late he may be called to return to heaven, his ecstatic psychological essence may evaporate to sing for ever and ever beneath the ambrosial palm-trees of that viewless world where the Hesperian Oligarchy bloom perennially for ever and aye."

"After the resolutions were adopted Judge M. rose and said:

"MR. CHAIRMAN AND GENTLEMEN,—In thanking you for the compliments paid me this evening, allow me to say that my heart swells with gratitude toward you all for the pleasure of your company; and should it be my fortune to receive the appointment I seek, I pledge myself to do all that I can to advance your welfare and that of your beautiful city. And whether I receive the appointment or not, I shall hold the remembrance of this night as a green spot in my existence; for I came among you a stranger, and you took me in."

"The Judge paid the bills, to the tune of something over a hundred dollars, perfectly satisfied that he was almost appointed. The meeting adjourned at 3 A.M., perfectly satisfied."

A CORRESPONDENT from Missouri sends a newspaper slip containing a report of the speech of GENERAL RILEY, in the House of Representatives, February 8, 1861. After a long and heated debate on the reference of a bill amending the charter of the city of Carondelet to a Standing Committee of the House, Mr. Riley obtained the floor, and addressed the House:

MR. SPEAKER,—Every body is a pitching into this matter like toad-frogs into a willow swamp on a lovely evening in the balmy month of June, when the mellow light of the full moon fills with a delicious flood the thin, ethereal atmospheric air. [Applause.] Sir, I want to put in a word, or perhaps a word and a half. There seems to be a disposition to fight. I say, if there is any fighting to be done, come on with your corn-cobs and lightning-bugs! [Applause.] In the language of the ancient Roman,

"Come one, come all, this rock shall fly
From its firm base, in a pig's eye."

Now there has been a great deal of bombast here to-day. I call it bombast from "Alpha" to "Omega." (I don't understand the meaning of the words, though.) Sir, the question to refer is a great and magnificent question. It is the all-absorbing question—like a sponge, Sir—a large, unmeasurable sponge, of globe shape, in a small tumbler of water; it sucks up every thing. Sir, I stand here with the weapons I have designated to defend the rights of St. Louis County, the rights of any other county—even the county of Cedar itself. [Laughter and applause.] Sir, the debate has assumed a latitudinosity. We have had a little black-jack buncombe, a little two-bitt buncombe, bombast buncombe, bung-hole buncombe, and the devil and his grandmother knows what other kind of buncombe. [Laughter.] Why, Sir, just give some of 'em a little Southern soap, and a little Northern water, and, quicker than a hound-pup can lick a skillet, they will make enough buncombe lather to wash the golden flock that roams abroad the azure meads of heaven. [Cheers and laughter.] I alude to the starry firmament.

THE SPEAKER. The gentleman is out of order. He must confine himself to the question.

MR. RILEY. Just retain your linen, if you please. I'll stick to the text as close as a pitch-plaster to alpine plank, or a lean pig to a hot jam-rock. [Cries of "Go on!" "You'll do!"] I want to say to these carboniferous gentlemen, these igneous individuals, these detonating demonstrators, these peregrinous volcanoes, come on with your combustibles! If I don't—Well, I'll suck the Gulf of Mexico through a goose-quill. [Laughter and applause.] Perhaps you think I am diminutive tubers and sparse in the mundane elevation. You may discover, gentlemen, you are laboring under as great a misapprehension as though you had incinerated your inner vestment. In the language of the noble bard,

"I was not born in a thicket
To be scared by a cricket."

Sir, we have lost our proper position. Our proper position is to the zenith and nadir—our heads to the one, our heels to the other, at right-angle with the horizon, spanded by that azure arc of the lustrous firmament, bright with the coruscations of innumerable constellations, and proud as a speckled horse on county court day. [Cheers.] "But how have the mighty fallen!" in the language of the poet Silversmith. We have lost our proper position. We have assumed a sloshindicular or a diaganological position. And what is the cause? Echo answers, "Buncombe," Sir, "buncombe." The people have been fed on buncombe, while a lot of spavined, ring-boned, ham-strung, wind-galled, swyneyed, split-hoofed, distempered, polleviled politicians have had their noses in the public crib until there ain't enough fodder left to make a gruel for a sick grasshopper. [Cheers and laughter.] * * * Mr. Speaker, you must excuse me for my latitudinosity and circumlocutoriness. My old blunderbuss scatters amazingly; but if any body gets peppered, it ain't my fault if they are in the way. Sir, these dandadical, supersquirtical, mahogany-faced gentry—what do they know about the blessings of freedom? About as much, Sir, as a toad-frog does of high glory. Do they think they can escape me? I'll follow them through pandemonium and high water! [Cheers and laughter.] These are the ones that have got our liberty-pole off its perpendicularity. 'Tis they who would rend the stars and stripes—that noble flag, the blood of our revolutionary fathers enbled in its red. The purity of the cause for which they died—denoted by the white, the blue—the freedom they attained, like the azure air that wraps their native hills and lingers on their lovely plains. [Cheers.] The high bird of liberty sits perched on the topmost branch, but there is secession salt on his glorious tail. I fear he will no more spread his noble pinions to soar beyond the azure regions of the boreal pole. But let not Missouri pull the last feather from his sheltering wing to plume a shaft to pierce his noble breast, or, what is the same, make a pen to sign a secession ordinance. [Applause.] Alas! poor bird, if they drive you from the branches of the hemlock of the North, and the palmetto of the South, come over to the gum-tree of the West, and we will protect your noble birdship while water grows and grass runs. [Immense applause.] Mr. Speaker, I subside for the present.

THE "Indiana correspondent" can not offer the Drawer any thing amusing this month, but wishes to contribute her humble mite of praise to the memory of a good man who has just "gone to his reward."

"I refer to Robert P. Letcher, of Kentucky, a genial, noble-hearted man. When he was Governor of that State I spent a winter at Frankfort, the capital. My father was a member of the Senate, and of the same political party, as well as an old friend of his Excellency, so that I became very well acquainted with him during the winter; but the little incident I will relate occurred on the first day I met him.

"The November preceding a couple of negroes, man and wife, had been tried in the Circuit Court of M—— County, for burning down the house of their mistress, a very old lady, who escaped almost by a miracle from perishing in the flames. They were found guilty, and condemned to death. A good many ladies had attended the trial, as they often did when it was known that our best lawyers would speak, and I had been one of the number. I heard all the testimony and all the speeches, and came to the decided conclusion that the woman had participated in the crime through fear of her husband. I determined I would try to save her from the gallows. I scarcely knew how to go to work to accomplish my object. All girls of sixteen are keenly alive to ridicule, and I was so much afraid of being laughed at that I kept my intentions to myself. Judge R——, the presiding Judge, had postponed passing sentence of death upon the poor creatures until the last day of the term. For many years he had been in the habit of making our house his home while his court was in session. I was a great favorite with him; and when I begged him to give them a 'long day,' he readily granted my request.

"In a few days after we went to Frankfort. I had made up my mind to go directly to Governor Letcher and ask him to pardon the woman; so the morning after I reached there I started out alone, without imparting my plans to my father or elder sister. I knew that the Governor transacted business in a room adjoining the office of the Secretary of State. With a heart beating loud enough to be heard, I found myself at the door of the room. I dared not give myself time to reflect. I knew if I hesitated an instant I would surely run. I gave a tremendous rap; it sounded like thunder in my ears, and in a moment I was face to face, for the first time, with Governor Letcher.

"I shall never forget the kind smile and pleasant voice with which he greeted me. 'Come in, my child,' he said, 'and tell me what you want with me; but sit down, you look a little frightened; though I don't think you can be afraid of me.' I first told him my name, and who was my father; then I scarcely knew how to begin my petition, but his whole manner and appearance was so good that I soon overcame my timidity. I told him the whole story: how the woman's husband had escaped from the county jail a day or two after their sentence had been passed; how she could have done so at the same time if she had been willing to desert her little baby; how young she was, and how—even to a poor slave—how dreadful to die such an awful death, and leave her poor baby forever. I don't remember all I said, but I plead with my whole heart, and became so much excited that I wound up by bursting into tears. Dear old man! I don't think that his eyes were quite dry. 'My dear child,' he said, after a short pause, 'it is very unusual to grant a pardon unless some petition is sent—signed by a sufficient number of respectable citizens—or some written appeal, to place upon record, to show that the Executive has not without good reasons interfered with the execution of the laws of the State. But I will do this: I will grant the woman a reprieve of six weeks; and,' continued he, 'I am sure you know some young gentleman who, for the sake of pleasing you, will draw up a petition and circulate it through your county; and if he can get even twenty names to it you shall have the pardon.' I thanked him over and over again; and he took me with him to the proper office, that I might see for myself that the reprieve was sent off immediately. I am making my story too long, but will close it in as few words as possible. I did know the sort of young gentleman he had referred to; and the same mail that carried the reprieve also carried an account of my interview with the Governor. In a few days my young friend sent me the result of his labors—a petition more numerous signed than I had dared to hope for. I rushed off with it to his Excellency. He seemed almost as delighted as I was; and as he handed me the pardon he placed his hand on my head, and smoothing the curls that had become rather disordered by my rapid movements, he said to me, 'Remember, L——, that any favor you can ask of old Bob Letcher will be granted as willingly as it would have been to a child of my own, had God seen fit to bless me with one.' Then he added words of praise that I can not place here, but I treasure them still in my heart. I loved him dearly, and will always revere his memory as one of the best men I ever knew."

"ADDIE's father and uncle have always been partners, till the firm name of A. B. and C. D. Root has become a household word, not only in both families, but the whole neighborhood. It is no great wonder, then, she made the following strange mistake the other day. Her mother had taken her down to the cemetery to visit the grave of her little sister Mary, which has just been adorned with a beautiful headstone. For a long time Addie stood gazing intently at the inscription, whose letters were somewhat different from those in her spelling-book. At last, with weeping eyes she read aloud, to the astonishment of her mother, 'Poor thing! Here lies Mary, daughter of A. B. and C. D. Root.'"

"WHEN about three years of age little Florence's sympathies were very much enlisted in behalf of a little orphan boy. One evening, to test her generosity, I asked what she would give him. After she had relinquished her little rocking-chair and all her toys, I asked her if she would give him her new hat (it was a very pretty open straw, trimmed with blue ribbons)? For a moment her eyes were downcast, and her lip quivered at the enormity of the sacrifice; but suddenly a happy thought presented itself, and, with blue eyes upraised, she said, beseechingly, 'Oh, auntie, 'twould fweeze him to def; it's all full of holes!'"

AUNT KE-ZI (as they used to call her). "Johnny, the pump won't work, and there's a case-knife missin'; I presume you've bin puttin' on't down the pump. Did you do so?"

JOHNNY (very firmly). "No, Auntie, I didn't;" and to this he pertinaciously stuck, in spite of Aunty's efforts to get him to "fess."

The pump had to come up, and then it was discovered that it was the case-knife, and nothing else, which had interfered with its valvular arrangements. Johnny was in for it.

AUNTY. "Johnny, why were you so wicked as to tell me a lie about that case-knife? Why didn't you remember what I told you about Washington?"

"Oh," said Johnny, "Washington said he couldn't tell a lie. He couldn't, and I could! AHA!"

The interjection had an accent which only a six-year old could give, and his novel interpretation of the Washington anecdote saved him "a birching."

THE early divines of New England were noted for their precision of habit, even in trifling matters.

Dr. Jonathan Edwards, when a boy, felt obliged to leave his shoes in a particular place overnight; and when once, by accident, he forgot this duty, he left his bed and rectified the disorder.

Dr. Hopkins, of Newport, could not sleep unless he knew precisely where his gloves were. Dr. West would come home from Hartford on the Saturday of election week—not Friday, but Saturday—and would turn the corner to go up from the plain to the hill where he lived at half past ten o'clock in the morning. For the winding up of his watch he had his fixed time. He studied in one place, had certain regular movements in his study chair, and left two cavities as the impress of his feet upon the floor.

Rev. Dr. Harris relates the following incident of Dr. Emmons, another of these punctilious worthies: "Having served as a soldier in the Revolutionary War, I went to read theology with Dr. Emmons; as I was expecting to remain several months a member of his family, he felt that he might be more free with me than with other strangers, and he wished to lose no time in training me to habits of order. After I had taken my seat with him by the fire, a brand fell upon the hearth; and as I was the younger man, and withal the pupil, I arose and put the brand in its place, but put the tongs on the left of the jamb. The Doctor instantly removed the tongs to the right of the jamb. In a few minutes more, the fire fell down the second time; I rectified the matter, and put the tongs again on the left of the fire-place. The Doctor rose again, and put them on the right. Soon the brands fell the third time, and as the Doctor's movements had appeared to me somewhat singular, I determined to find out what they meant. Having adjusted the brands, therefore, I placed the tongs, designedly, along with the shovel, at my left. My teacher then arose, and having corrected my third error, looked significantly in my face and said: 'My young friend, as you are going to stay with me, I wish to tell you now that I keep my shovel at the left of my fire, and my tongs at the right.' From this incident I learned one of the most useful maxims of a theologian: never to put on the left hand what belongs to the right; never to place together what ought to be kept separate; always to discriminate between things that differ; and to be accurate in small things as well as great."

Another anecdote illustrates the dignity of this New England minister. His salary never amounted to more than five hundred dollars a year, and he never intimated a wish to have it raised. He never went but once in seventy-six years to the treasurer of the parish in order to receive the pittance due to him. The treasurer knew perfectly that when the "pay-day" came he was to visit the parsonage, and take with him the hard-earned salary. But one year a new treasurer was elected, who thought it advisable that all the creditors of the parish should wait on him for the payment due to them, rather than be waited upon by him for their own benefit. The salary day came. He remained at home to receive the Doctor's call, but the Doctor remained in his study. The next day passed, and the next, and at length came the eleventh day, when, each party waiting for the other, there seemed to be a growing difference of opinion between the man who taught the people and the man who kept the bag. At last the treasurer saw the neat carriage driving up to his front door, and the three-cornered hat in the carriage. The Doctor alighted from the chaise, holding his reins and his whip. He knocked; the door was opened.

"Is Mr. A—— at home?"

"He is."

"I should be glad to see him."

Mr. A—— came and stood before his minister.

"Good-morning, Sir," was the minister's word.

"Good-morning, Sir," was the treasurer's reply.

"I have been expecting," added the minister, "for eleven days to see you at my house. Good-by, Sir;" and he added no more, but his fleet horse took him back straight to the parsonage, and the treasurer followed him before noon, carrying the delayed salary, and resolving to try no more experiments.

A neighboring minister, who held different views from Emmons, once wrote him the following curt note:

May 1.

"MY DEAR BROTHER,—I have read your sermon on the Atonement, and have wept over it.

"Yours, affectionately, A. B. C——."

The epistle was no sooner read than the following reply was written and sent to the post-office:

May 3.

"DEAR SIR,—I have read your letter, and laughed at it.

Yours,

"NATHANIEL EMMONS."

When a young man had preached a whole system of theology in one discourse, the Doctor asked him, on leaving the pulpit, "Do you ever mean to preach another sermon?"

"Yes, Sir."

"What have you got to say? you've preached about every thing this morning."

When one of his former pupils had delivered an oratorical sermon, and had waited in vain for some commendation from his teacher, he ventured to expedite the compliment by saying, "I hope I have not wearied your people by the length of my discourse."

"No, nor by its depth," was the reply.

A favorite clergyman undertook to apologize for the exuberance of metaphor in one of his discourses preached in Dr. Emmons's pulpit; but he was interrupted by the assurance, "My people are like the blacksmith's dog, not afraid of sparks."

A preacher once complained to him, "I find my greatest difficulty in drawing the inferences in my sermons."

"No doubt," was the Doctor's reply; "for you have nothing to draw them from."

There was a physician in the neighborhood of Franklin, where Dr. Emmons preached for seventy-one years, who was corrupting the minds of men by his Pantheism. This physician being called to a sick family in the Franklin parish met the Franklin minister at the house of affliction. It was no place for a dispute. It was no place for any unbecoming familiarity with the minister. It was no place for a physician to inquire into the age of the minister, especially with any intent of entangling him in a debate, and, above all, where the querist was too visionary for any logical discussion. But the abrupt question of the pantheist was, "Mr. Emmons, how old are you?"

"Sixty, Sir; and how old are you?" came the quick reply.

"As old as the creation, Sir," was the triumphant response.

"Then you are of the same age with Adam ^{ad}_{ak} Eve?"

"Certainly; I was in the garden when they ^{me}were."

"I have always heard that there was a third person in the garden with them, but I never knew before that it was you."

The pantheist did not follow up the discussion.

WHILE Dr. Franklin was in France, a friend of his in Boston wrote to him that a town in the vicinity of Boston had chosen his name by which to be known in the world, and he presumed, as they had no bell with which to summon the people to meeting on the Sabbath, a present of such an instrument from him would be very acceptable, especially as they were about erecting a new meeting-house.

The Doctor wrote in reply that he presumed the people in FRANKLIN were more fond of sense than of sound; and accordingly presented them with a handsome donation of books for the use of the parish.

A WELSH parson preaching from the text, "Love one another," told his congregation that, in kind and respectful treatment to our fellow-creatures, we are inferior to the brute creation. As an illustration of the truth of this remark, he quoted an instance of two goats in his own parish that once met on a bridge that was so narrow they could not pass without one thrusting the other off into the river. "And," continued he, "how do you think they acted? I will tell you: one goat laid himself down and let the other leap over him. Ah, beloved! let us live like goats."

IN the early days of New Hampshire railroads gentlemen were sometimes selected for directors, in addition to other reasons, because they had influence as politicians, etc., and not for any special knowledge they might possess in regard to railroads. On one occasion, when the "Board" of a road in the process of construction assembled, the various communications in regard to labor and supplies were read. Among these was a letter from a Boston iron importer desiring to supply the road with chairs. When this was passed to one of the more verdant directors, he read it, and, turning to his neighbor, exclaimed, "Chairs! one, two, three, four, five, six, seven of us—humph! Great business, ain't it?"

LITTLE JESSIE had a gossiping nurse-maid who, to save time and trouble, had been used to frighten the child in order to make her lie quiet at night. As the child was especially afraid of rats, she was often told that they would come to her unless she lay still and went to sleep. Being away from home, on a visit with her parents, Jessie missed the nightly excitement of fear, and was more wakeful than her wont for some time, until she discovered a remedy for this evil. Here it is, as she related it to her maid Nanny, after her return home:

"After I was undressed and had said my prayers," said she, "I used to stand up on the side of the bed and say 'Rats!' 'rats!' and then I fell down, and was just as 'fraid as I could be, and covered up my head, and went right to sleep."

At a Conference meeting, held somewhere in the northern part of our State during the great revival season of '58, were present, among others, Brother Brown—a weak, shy, but good man, considerably "forehanded," and a childless widower—and Sister and a strong-minded spinster, somewhat loud of na and fluent of speech, who, report said, was not averse to the thought of securing the control of Brother Brown and his fine house and farm.

In due course of proceedings Brother Brown was called on to relate his experience. As usual, he was humble and slow of speech; "he had very little to say—could not speak to the edification of the brethren and sisters—the time would be better occupied by others. For his part, he felt that it became him to be silent, and that his place was behind the door of the sanctuary." And so he sat down, and Sister Ames was soon after called on to speak. She too was humble and subdued; had little to say, and that in a low tone; and concluded by remarking that she felt that "her place was to sit behind the door with Brother Brown." Not even the solemnity of the occasion could prevent the meaning smile that ran round that circle of grave faces.

THE city of Salem, Massachusetts, once rivaled Boston in the extent and importance of its trade, but within the last fifty years it has fallen from its high estate, and dwindled into comparative insignificance. The people of this ancient burgh are very sore on this point, and their sensitiveness gives the point to the following, which occurred not many years ago:

A merchant of Salem meeting a friend from the adjoining town of Marblehead told him that he had been over to that town to engage summer lodgings for his family by the sea-shore, that his children might have the benefit of the pure air and green fields; and, in playful allusion to the well-known propensities of the urchins of that town, he added, "And, strange to say, for once the boys didn't mock me as I went along." The Marbleheader, a little touched, humphed once or twice, and said, as he walked away, "I don't see why you want to run such risks in sending your children to our town at all; the air of Salem is pure enough, and there is grass enough for them to play on in any of your streets."

'TIS ALL ONE TO ME.

A SONG BY A CONTENTED FELLOW.

Oh, 'tis all one to me, all one,
Whether I've money or whether I've none.

He who has money can buy him a wife,
And he who has none can be free for life.

He who has money can trade if he choose,
And he who has none has nothing to lose.

He who has money has cares not a few,
And he who has none can sleep the night through.

He who has money can squint at the fair,
And he who has none escapes from much care.

He who has money can go to the play,
And he who has none at home can stay.

He who has money can travel about,
And he who has none can do without.

He who has money can be coarse as he will,
And he who has none can be coarser still.

He who has money can drink the best wine,
And he who has none with the gout will not pine.

He who has money the cash must pay,
And he who has none says, "Charge it, pray."

He who has money must die some day,
And he who has none must go the same way.

Oh, 'tis all one to me, all one,
Whether I've money or whether I've none.

"IN a little village in the northern part of the State of New York lives a worthy deacon by the name of Hone.

"This same deacon was blessed with a very long nose, which was a continual source of disquietude to him, for whenever he appeared in sight the village boys used to cry out, 'Here comes Deacon Hone's nose!' One Sunday morning, perceiving one or two little sores on the tip end of that very conspicuous feature, he applied a small piece of court-plaster to it. While crossing the floor the plaster dropped off, and the Deacon stooped down, picked up what he supposed to be the plaster, put it on again, and went off to church. In the course of the morning, while taking up the collection, he noticed that almost every one was smiling and pointing at him. It did not trouble him much, however, and he soon forgot it in listening to the sermon. On returning home he went up to the looking-glass, and to his utter mortification and chagrin, he found that instead of the court-plaster he had picked up and applied to his nose the round label belonging to a spool of cotton, 'warranted 200 yards long.'

"THE science of 'Object Teaching,' from the German method, has lately been introduced into the primary Ward schools of our city. While one of our principals was making his monthly tour of examinations, he came into a room containing some sixty or seventy little girls between the ages of five and eight. Taking up a book, he saw the word 'deer;' and after describing this animal, its habits, beauty, swiftness, etc., he asked them about the word 'dear.' They knew this word, and told him readily that they had dear mothers, dear brothers, and other dear friends. 'Well,' said he, with archness in his look and tone, 'children, what will be dear to you after a while? what will you have dear when you grow up?'

"There was quite a pause. At length one sweet little girl of six rose, clapping her hands, and said, 'I know, Mr. O——; we shall have dear little babies.'

COLLEGE boys are great rogues. It was shortly after the Mexican War, and Barnes delivered himself of a "spread eagle" on that interesting question. It was furious, gesticulatory, verbose—"sound and fury," signifying nothing. The boys applauded vigorously throughout, especially whenever the speaker intended to make a hit. After the exercises were over, the boys crowded around Barnes to congratulate him on his great effort. Barnes stood it very well for some time, with modest look and downcast eyes. At last one of the boys, as a sort of climax to the stuffing, remarked, "Why, Barnes, you are the greatest orator that ever lived. Cicero and Demosthenes were nowhere compared with you!" This was too much for poor Barnes's vanity. Casting up a shy and half timid look, he said, "Gentlemen, I am only eighteen!"

A CORRESPONDENT in Wirt County, Virginia, describes a rich and brilliant scene:

"A gentleman in the oil region of Western Virginia was boring for oil on his lands, and anxious to complete the job, kept his darkeys at work night and day. The nights were cold, and a fire was built near the well. About midnight they struck a vein of gas, which rushed out with great force, and igniting from the fire, shot up a stream of brilliant flame one hundred and fifty feet in the air, illuminating the country round. The terrified darkeys broke for their master's house and cried out, 'Get up, Massa Tompkins, get up! we've broke through into hell!'"

SEVERAL years ago the circuit court was in session at —, Wisconsin, Judge — presiding. A man was on trial for some violation of the law to suppress gambling. Mr. K—— was defending him. The witness upon the stand talked glibly of "checking," "passing," "going blind," etc. The defendant's counsel seemed to understand the terms without difficulty. The Judge, who enjoyed a joke, said to him, "Mr. K——, you seem to understand the witness; will you explain the terms used by him?" A scarcely suppressed laugh ran through the courtroom. But K—— was equal to the emergency; he walked deliberately up to the Judge's bench, and reaching out his hand in the most innocent manner in the world, answered, "Certainly, Sir, certainly, if your Honor will be kind enough to lend me your deck."

WHEN the Rev. Mr. W—— first graduated at the University of Vermont the Methodist Conference licensed him to exhort. During his peregrinations as an exhorter he gave a course of lectures at the town of Johnson upon the "Middle Ages." At the next meeting of the Conference, W—— applied for a renewal of his license, and the resident minister of Johnson opposed indefinitely. W—— pinned him for a formal reason, and he finally stated that, "During the past winter, Brother W—— had preached at Johnson upon the 'Middle Ages,' and said in his discourse that the Church rose and waxed strong, like the Phoenix; and he did hope and pray that the Conference, for the honor of all, would not renew the license of a man who compared the Methodist Church to a horse." The worthy minister had heard of a noted horse of that name, and he supposed Mr. W—— referred to him in his lecture.

ONE of our correspondents in the army of the West writes to the Drawer:

"Being in camp (one of the 84,000 sons of Ohio who responded to the President's call upon this State for 13,000), I use a moment's leisure to dot down the following experiences of the last day or two among the volunteers.

"One raw captain of a rural company yesterday marched his men into the long narrow mess-booth for the first time. After dinner, feeling anxious to bring them out in military order, and thinking it wrong to have the left in front under any circumstances, he ordered the separated ranks to counter-march where there was not room to execute the movement. The result, of course, was great confusion. The captain raved, swore, and commanded impossible things. Result, still greater confusion. At last the men poured out of the doors pell-mell like sheep. The disgusted captain, placing his back against a tree, shouted the only command they could obey, thus: 'Any way you please, hang you — MARCH!'

"Another captain (lately a railroad conductor) was drilling a squad, and while marching them by flank turned to speak to a friend for a moment. On looking again toward his squad he saw they were in the act of 'butting up' against a fence. In his hurry to halt them he cried out, 'Down brakes! down brakes!'

"Still another one wanted yesterday to leave the squad he was drilling for a moment, and brought them to the 'rest' in this style: 'Squad, break ranks! but if any of you leave your places till I come back, I will have you put in the guard-house!'" last week," writes a friend, "while watching the evolutions of a battalion drill, a captain of one of the companies attracted my attention. I turned to my friend and inquired his name. 'Why,' said he, 'that is the famous John W. Dean.' I said, 'Why famous? I never heard of him.' 'He is famous for the form of oath he administered to his men at their enlistment; which was this: 'You solemnly swear to obey, fight for, and maintain the laws of the Federal Government and Constitution, and support John W. Dean for Captain of this Company.'" Upon inquiry, I learned that the reason the last clause was inserted was because he had been quite active in getting up a company before, and when they elected their officers he was left out; so this time he was determined to make it sure.

"BEING at Camp Wilkins (at or near Pittsburgh)

"After the company was filled they met for the purpose of electing officers. Being formed in line, Mr. Dean stated to them that the first duty of a soldier was strict obedience to the orders of the officers, and any one guilty of any act of insubordination would be dealt with in the most summary manner. Officers were to be voted for viva voce. Mr. D. immediately nominated himself for Captain, there being several 'Ayes' distinctly heard. Without calling for the contrary, he immediately declared himself elected. Things worked smoothly, all being declared unanimous, until the vote for Orderly Sergeant, when there was a 'No' heard from the rear rank. The Captain immediately rushed in, seized him by the collar, and gave him a thorough shaking, at the same time exclaiming, 'You scoundrel, how dare you show signs of mutiny and insubordination so soon after the instructions I gave you? Take your place in the ranks, and never be guilty of such an offense again!'

"No instance of mutiny has since been known in Captain Dean's company."

AN Indiana lady writes that she has a little niece, three years old, who is very fond of playing with boys, but has no taste for sports with the little ladies of her own sex. One night the lady was teaching the little girl the Lord's Prayer, repeating it to her several times. The child listened attentively as her aunt repeated the prayer, and finally, at the close, exclaimed, "Aunt Sally, don't say 'A-men,' say, 'A-boys!'"

ANOTHER lady writes: "My youngest sister, Allie, is one of the slow ones, and one day she was complaining that we always put her last, when Mary, a little older, whirled round to her, and said, 'Allie, you ought to be thankful that you are at all.'"

"A FOUR-YEAR OLD," on a visit to our city from the "little State of Delaware," we soon found was "pretty smart." After trying to surprise her by showing or telling her what we could—but all to no purpose—she was taken to the window to look at the moon, shining beautiful and bright, then in her first quarter, and the question asked, if they had any thing in Delaware to beat that? She answered instantly, and with perfect confidence: "Yes; our moons are prettier than that: it's only a piece of a moon!"

IN one of the middle counties of Massachusetts, a little boy of four years asked his mother what extinguished meant. His mother told him it meant to put out, as you would put out a candle.

The next day the mother heard her little son talking loudly to his dog Carlo, in the next room. She went out to see what the difficulty was. "Sammy, what's the matter with Carlo?" "Why, mother, I told Carlo to extinguish his paw (put it out), but he won't mind."

RETURNING from England, a contributor to the Drawer sends the following epitaphs, gathered in the cemeteries of his native land:

In Barbram church-yard, Derbyshire—

"Here lies Horatio Palavazine,
Who robbed the Pope to lend the Queen.
'He was a thief,' 'A thief! Thou liest,'
'For what?' 'He robbed but Antichrist.'
Him Death with besom swept from Babram,
Into the bosom of old Abram;
But then came Hercules with his club
And knocked him down to Beelzebub."

In Cheltenham church-yard, Gloucestershire—

"Here I lies with my 3 daughters,
All through drinking Cheltenham waters:
If we had but stuck to Epsom salts,
We shouldn't have been buried in these here vaults."

In Manchester—

"Here lies (alas, the more's the pity!)
All that remains of Nicholas Newcity."*

* N.B.—His name was Newtown, but that doesn't rhyme.

In Hampshire—

"Him shall never more come back to we,
But us shall surely one day go to he."

In Ireland (in the neighborhood of Killarney)—

"Here lies two babes whom we deplore—They've gone, and they'll never come back no more."

In Whitby church-yard (Yorkshire)—

"His illness lay not in one part,
But o'er his frame it spread:
The fatal disease was at his heart,
And water in his head."

Also in Whitby—

"Pure, modest, evanescent, chaste as morning dew,
They sparkled, were exhaled, and went to heaven."

A SIGN hangs over a store in the town of Hillsborough, Massachusetts:

"Goods at cost, and More too."

PEOPLE'S STORE.

A FRIEND in Philadelphia sends us the following as a specimen of the obituary department of one of the daily papers in that city:

"So sweet a flower to bloom on earth!
The rose that crowned our little plot
Has withered here, to blossom forth
In a superior flower-pot.
His body lies in Union ground,
His soul has gone to him who gave it;
And shall we never hear again
The prattling of our little Jacob?"

The idea of designating heaven as 'a superior flower-pot,' is irresistibly comic; and few parents, I imagine, are so patriotic as to find a consolation for the death of a child, because 'his body lies in Union ground.' By-the-by, I see by the advertisement that he is not buried yet."

"LATELY, a gentleman, waiting for a friend in Third Street, Philadelphia, observed a party of newsboys who were waiting for the afternoon papers. A well-dressed lad walked up to them. They eagerly saluted him, and examined him on every side, and seemed to admire him very much. Soon a little fellow, with a coat reaching to the ground and elbows out, began to question him thus:

" 'Why, what are you at now?'

" 'I'm in a store.'

" 'What do you do?'

" 'I sweep out the store and run errands.'

" 'Well, tell me. You don't feel as good now as when you were in business for yourself, do you?'"

OUR mulatto boy, "Will," was looking over a work on Anatomy the other day. He came to a picture of the venous and arterial systems, as they ramify the body. After eying it for some time in mute astonishment, he suddenly exclaimed, pointing to it, "Miss Laura, ain't this a man God's just a making?"

A GERMAN gentleman wrote an obituary on the death of his wife, of which the following is a copy :

"If mine vife hat lived untill next Friday, she would have been dead shust two weeks. Nothing is possible wit de Almighty. As de tree falls so must it stand."

AN M.D., on one of his visiting rounds, was met by Mr. S——, who inquired after the health of a neighbor who had had a severe illness and was just recovering. To his inquiry the Doctor replied he was convalescent.

"Convalescent," says S——. "Well, if he has got that he is a gone case. He never will get well sure!"

A NEW ORLEANS newspaper man tells a very clever story, just about good enough to be true:

"A gay young blood from Texas, visiting New Orleans, found his entrance into the city illuminated by glaring signs and waving banners, informing him to go to Moody's and get his shirts. Arriving at the St. Charles Hotel, the Texan visitor, as a first step in the direction of personal comfort as well as decoration, gave out what in professional language is called a 'wash.' Included in the said 'wash' were some very nice shirts. Our Texan friend entered into the amusements of the town, and enjoyed all the fun usually to be found in New Orleans. The Texan's 'wash' failed to be returned as ordered, and, consequently, his shirts were missing. The day which ushered in this mishap placed also in the visitor's hands a neat little envelope, directed to our hero, in his proper and full name. Breaking the seal, he read: 'Get your shirts at Moody's.' Dressing himself in hot haste, the man of lost shirts presented himself at the store of the man who makes shirts, and whom he was informed had his.

" 'Is Mr. Moody in?' asked the Texan. Mr. Moody was in and desired to know of what service he could be to this visitor, all expressed in Mr. Moody's politest manner. 'I want my shirts,' quoth the Texan. 'Certainly, Sir. Your name?'

" 'Ovode,' replied the Texan, giving the initials as well.

"Whereupon diligent search was made for Mr. Ovode's shirts. The first search proved a failure.

" 'Are you sure, Mr. Ovode, that your shirts are here?'

" 'Positive.'

"Search number two resulted also in a failure.

" 'Mr. Ovode,' said the immortal Moody, 'are you absolutely positive that your shirts are here? There must be some mistake.'

" 'No mistake at all,' rejoined the Texan. 'No mistake at all. Stopped at the St. Charles Hotel, and lost my shirts. There is your own printed note, telling me to go to Moody's and get my shirts. They must be here somewhere!'

"What Moody did we know not, but our Texan friend told him to make another search, and that he would call again."

My father was an old ship-master many years ago, before shipping-masters were much employed, when every master of a ship obtained his own crew. Being ready for a voyage to India he proceeded to ship his crew, and as sailors at that time were very scarce, to make up his complement he shipped a green Irish boy. After he had got to sea he found that his mate was a man that could not be depended upon, as he would go to sleep on his watch. When the ship fell into the northeast trade-winds, one pleasant night, the captain went on deck in the middle watch, found his mate asleep in the after-hatch and a smoke coming out of the galley. Looking in to see what was going on at that time of night, to his surprise he found his Irish boy had taken advantage of the mate's nap to take from the harness cask a piece of pork, and stole from the ship stores some eggs, and was having a bit of a fry. The captain, in his stern way, being very much annoyed at the occurrence, called out to the boy, "Jerry, I will have none of that!" To which the boy immediately replied, "Faith, captain, I've got none for ye."

A CAIRO correspondent sends us the following letter of advice and criticism:

"DEAR EDITOR,—You seem to be quite uneasy because some courteous friend takes exceptions to your favorite pets—Now to tell you the candid truth it is a tolerably well settled opinion—Amid all the fogs and mist of your easy chair your foreign Bureau and drawer can be found excellent jewels by which to adorn both body and mind—But your Make-peace your Tackeray are insupportable—Among your fashionable superficial literati it is consideered as treason of the blackest dye as much as to be a union man down below here and are lik sheep when they make a break stampede all must follow or the wolves will have them.

"The easy Chair should recollect that novelle writing is only an improvement by our best men upon the old fire-side childrens Spook stories—willow the wisp tom thumb and the two blind men that went to se two cripples run a race &c. &c.

"Now I hereby enter my salemn and everasting protest against any such baby talk. It has accomplished the design all for which it was intended to cultiv a taste for reading with the great mass of the people—But Sir we are a great people—We have beet the world from woden nutmegs to the game of poker from brewing mountain dew by the jugfull to catching lightning and we intend to beet the world Sir at revolutions.

"But we do not wish to protest against story telling by no means Truth is stranger than fiction and alway something to be learned from the naration of facts and no case can have its counterpart Whence there is an infinite variety of material—and there might be a poetical licence or as lawyers will have it a licence to make out a clear case That is all that is required.

"Dear Editor—it is with the kindest of motives that has prompted the writer to answer to the irrepressable demand of your thousands of readers hoping that by clearing away the cobwebs and putting your house in order your readers may be counted by the million."

THE following from Mississippi comes by way of Washington. We do not care to reveal the secret of the "funny" communications that we have with all parts of the country, but earnestly hope and pray that our national difficulties may not be so serious as to affect the sentiments of the Drawer:

"When George Yerger was in the Legislature of Mississippi, Green County was represented by an old fellow by the name of John M'Innis. Jack was a genius in his way, and though excessively green, was a very good and keen debater. One day Jack made some motion which was strenuously objected to by Mr. Yerger, and a running debate ensued. In the course of his remarks, Mr. Yerger attacked Green County, proverbially the poorest in the State of Mississippi. 'Mr. Speaker,' said he, 'I believe that Green County is so poor that if Job's turkey were to go there, in a week he would be too poor to gobble.' After the laugh had subsided M'Innis rose to reply. After some remarks in reply to Mr. Yerger, he said, 'Mr. Speaker, I heard before I come here that Mr. Yerger was a mighty smart man; but I didn't think he was the smartest man in the United States, for we've got some right smart men down in Green County. You might know that, judging from the representatives they send to the Legislature. [Laughter.] But now, I proclaim it to the House and to the country, that Mr. George Yerger is the smartest man I ever saw. For he is the only man I ever have met who could tell whether Job's turkey was a gobbler or a hen.'"

THE stock of "Hard Shell" sermons is inexhaustible. They are certainly spirited if not edifying, and we give them with the intention of removing the prejudice against an educated ministry.

In the county of Pendleton, Virginia, where this sect is neither very numerous nor intelligent, the Rev. Mr. B—— was preaching a doctrinal sermon, and wishing to enforce the virtue of water, he did so somewhat in the following style:

"My brethering, I was once on a time out a hunting, and I saw a great big buck come bookety, bookety, bookety [imitating the running of the deer] down the mountain, and jump right kerslosh into a stream of water and swim over, and away he went, bookety, bookety. Presently I saw a whole pack of dogs come on the buck's track as hard as they could clip it, bow wow wow, bow wow wow, and they followed the track till they got to the stream, and there they come to a dead halt. They rummaged about both sides of the stream; but as the water had washed the scent off, they couldn't smell him on the side he come out on. So the chase stopped, and the buck got safe away in the mountains. Just so it is with you, my friends. You are all a-going bookety, bookety—bookety, bookety, as straight down as you can go, and the devil is after you, bow wow wow, just like the dogs. But presently you get to the water, you plunge in, head and ears, and when the devil gets there the water has washed all your sins away, and he can't trail you any farther, and so you get safe home to glory."

WE give the following anecdote because of its connection with a gentleman who occupies a prominent position in a quarter of our country just now out of sight, but by no means out of mind:

"Many of the readers of the Monthly have heard of the wit and tact of Hon. Alexander H. Stephens, especially when on the stump. During the last contest for President, Little Alex (as he is familiarly known in Georgia), had an occasion to speak with Rance Wright. Wright's turn for speaking came, and by way of a tale he said that Mr. Stephens had said he could eat Ben Hill for breakfast, Rance Wright for dinner, and Bob Trippe for supper. Mr. Stephens possessing very little storage room, of course this brought out a shout. Mr. Stephens rose, and, after denying having made any such statement, said, if he had contemplated such a feast, he surely would have changed the order; he would have taken Ben Hill for breakfast, Bob Trippe for dinner, and remembering the advice of his mother, always to eat a light supper, he would have tipped off with his friend Colonel Wright. After this the laughter was on the other side."

It is curious to notice how much we are indebted to our Southern friends for Drawer matter.

"There was an old gentleman in this county who was very much opposed to fox-hunters passing through his farm, leaving his fences down, and knocking out his cotton. His negroes complained to him that 'dem fox-dogs knocked out de cotton mity bad, and he ought to stop em.' So one night he heard the horns of the hunters, and he sends negro Bob out with the gun to shoot at the dogs, as a scare for the hunters. Bob goes out and takes his stand, and along come the hunters. Bob managed to shoot off his gun near the hunters, and, for fear that he would be caught, ran home to his master. The old gentleman rested very uneasy that night for fear that Bob would be found out; so next morning he and Bob walked into the field to see the position of parties. One of the hunters, in jumping a deep ditch, had lost and left his wig, believing the old man was shooting at them sure enough. Bob, passing the place, found the wig, and hallooed to his master, 'Oh Lordy! marster, I'se killed a man! and de hogs is done eat him up all but his head!'"

LADIES troubled by help can see in the following some of the difficulties encountered in the region of the "contraband:"

"My story is of a lady who moved from a distance into the neighborhood where she had passed her childhood, and in the hurry and confusion attending the trouble she was compelled to call in a field hand. In the midst of the confusion the lady was quite 'flustered' by the appearance of the wag of the neighborhood, an old friend, who complacently fixed himself to spend the day. Dinner-time came, and with it the dinner; and the lady took her seat at the head of the table, trembling for fear her new waitress should commit some terrible faux pas, which would be food for her friend's well-known love for joking. Now there happened to be on the table a dish of baked sweet potatoes, which the mistress requested to have handed to her. As if in verification of the proverb, 'To them as look for frecks, frecks will come,' the girl gave an ominous stare, made a stride or two, and taking a potato in her hand, offered it to her mistress, who took it hastily and laid it beside her plate, congratulating herself that the incident had escaped the notice of her waggish friend. 'The baked potatoes!' repeated her mistress, emphatically, and as she thought distinctly, though in an undertone. With another stare and another stride the girl approached the surprised guest, and grabbing a big potato which was on his plate, carried it triumphantly off and deposited it beside her mistress! Do you think you can imagine the sensation?"

TRAVELING in the western part of Georgia a few years ago, I met a "cracker," a "poor white" farmer, and asked him if he could tell me the population of that county. He answered: "Pitch, tar, and turpentine, and a right smart chance of lightood!"

THE MAN IN THE ROCKING-CHAIR.

man in the rocking-chair has a head which is so uncommonly thick (through) that no other man in town can begin to keep on his hat unless he lets it fall down on to his ears or shoulders, as the case may be. So when Baculus put on accidentally the said sombrero, it fell quickly down and rested on his ears, producing the effect here given, and a fat, healthy, good-conditioned laugh from the casual spectators. It may be well that Hinney didn't see him then, for there is no knowing what effect such a sight might have produced upon her. Not that I am by any means sure that Hinney is any thing to Baculus, or Baculus any thing to Hinney (I wouldn't for the world blast the budding hopes of any of my dear maiden readers by even remotely hinting at such a thing so long as I am not quite sure that it is so), though they do sometimes look at each other across the table (they sit opposite each other), and I have heard them speaking with one another before now.

"Who may Hinney be?" inquires some rose-and-lily miss, with a deepening of the rose, or, perchance, a paling of the lily on her cheek as she thinks of the estimable young magister, and the possibility of—of—any thing that might happen, if, or if it were not for, et cetera.

Hinney, my dear chick, is our young lady. Here is her ambrotype, daguerreotype, or photograph, as you please to call it. She is the best housekeeper, the best friend, the best bread-maker (hear, oh ye! Audite, O homines, qui non sunt sub jugum matrimonium!), the best keeper at home and of secrets, the best-natured girl, the best sewer-on of buttons (Audite, et attendite, O viri!) in the whole region roundabout. She gaddeth not abroad; she spinneth nither long yarns, false yarns, nor street yarn; she nither mindeth other bodies' business nor neglecteth her own; but goeth willingly and cheerfully about whatsoever her hand findeth to do, singing lightly as a lark all the dear, blessed day through. Why Hinney doesn't get married I can't in the name of wonder tell, especially here, where there is a whole houseful of gentlemen (and pretty much all pedagogues); but so it is; Hinney is yet in the market; and, I know it not, but I shrewdly guess, Hinney hath her own notions and her own reasons for as yet remaining single.

Now if I were not such a miserably, unfortunately bashful old bachelor myself, and withal half past the meridian of life, I know what I'd do, and that, too, without delay; but it's no use! I can't, there! She wouldn't have me, I know, if I should beg her to.

Here is a man, though, that wouldn't be afraid to do it. He is our Dominus Mathematicorum—a wonderful worker of all sorts of crooked and crabbed problems in any branch of mathematics, and a widerer. He can do any question in that line that any body else in the United States can't; and whenever any of the college professors throughout the land find an arithmetical, algebraical, geometrical, or conic-sectional nut with a shell too thick to penetrate, they send it to him to crack.

I said "our" Dominus. He isn't exactly ours, for he don't belong in the family, nor even in the town, but he comes here occasionally to give the other pedagogues lessons (he is also one of the fraternity himself) in higher mathematics. I don't think Hinney takes lessons of him. (Another whisper to the ladies, who are, I know, pardonably curious about such matters.) If she does, I have never heard of it. I know things may happen in the world of which I may not hear. So of this momentous matter I will presume to affirm nothing positively.

"What an awful hombly man! awful hombly!"

"Who?"

"Why, your marster of 'rithmetic 'n algebray. Who else should I mean, I sh'd like to know?"

"My dear Miss! I am sorry to hear you say so. He is a most estimable as well as most remarkable man—a man that has made his mark in the world. Never assuming to be even as much as he is, to say nothing of more, never seeking notice or applause, he, like good gold, wherever he is, is known, and wherever he is known, is truly prized. He is one of the very best and most substantial sort of men, for he is a self-made man. Who ever found pearls floating on the top of the ocean? Who ever plucked golden apples from the beautiful mock-orange? Who ever gathered a bouquet of the flaunting peony for its fragrance?"

"Wa'al, any how, I wouldn't have no such looking feller as that, ef he was ever so likely. No, I'm sure I wouldn't have such a man as your Dominus, if there wa'n't another man!"

"And I am quite confident that you never will have such a man as our Dominus upon any contingency. Butterflies and elephants do not mate. Surface beauty, like paint, crackles and comes off, or is defaced by time. Worth, like polished mahogany, grows handsomer as it grows older. Wise people daub no paint upon polished mahogany. They belong not together."

In Medias Res.

Mr. Jones goes to sleep in his library, resting his head upon a theological tome;

And is thereby awakened to the fact that he has become a medium

Hastening to inform the wife of his bosom of his newly acquired power, he, unfortunately places his hand upon her chair, with the above result;

And finds that she too can impart motion to articles of furniture.

Nurse having occasion to place baby on the table for a moment -

It is discovered that baby is also a medium.

And matters are really becoming very unpleasant, when -

Mr. Jones wakes !

Fashions for August.

Furnished by Mr. G. BRODIE, 300 Canal Street, New York, and drawn by VOIGT from actual articles of Costume.

FIGURE 1.—PEIGNOIR.

Of White Muslin, with an edging of Mazarine-blue taffeta ribbon. The front has a mock under-skirt of Nansouk.

HARPER'S NEW MONTHLY MAGAZINE.

No. CXXXVI.—SEPTEMBER, 1861.—VOL. XXIII.

STRATFORD-UPON-AVON.

THERE are few districts even in historic England that can vie with the County of Warwickshire in delightful associations of the past. Within its borders is the quaint old town of Coventry, where, in the olden time, the good Lady Godiva took an airing on horseback in a very singular manner; Warwick, with its noble castle, where the King-Maker and the Giant-Killer lived—the castle of Cæsar's tower, erected before the Norman conqueror appeared in the land; Beauchamp chapel, where sleeps the red-faced lover of Queen Elizabeth and the Regent of France, Richard Beauchamp; the remains of the regal palace of Kenilworth, with its ivy running rejoicingly and protectingly over its decayed magnificence—the old work of De Monfort; John of Gaunt and the Gipsy Earl; the grand monastic remains of Evesham; Stoneleigh, the princely seat of the Leighs, where Charles the First was entertained when the Coventry men shut their gates on his rueful and elongated countenance, and which was, in “the long ago,” a Cistercian abbey, and granted to Charles Brandon, the lover and husband of the beautiful Princess Mary; Guy's Cliff, where Guy of Warwick turned hermit (if indeed there ever was a Guy), and where Mrs. Siddons used to go to breathe the fresh country air after the fatigue of a London season; the noble Elizabethan mansion of Charlecote; the little sequestered hamlet of Shottery; and Stratford, which but for one circumstance in its uneventful history, had else been unknown and unvisited.

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the year 1861, by Harper and Brothers, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court for the Southern District of New York.

VOL. XXIII.—No. 136.—E E

To that spot genius has imparted an interest that does not attach to any other place on the globe. Many a pilgrim has walked the quiet streets of that quaint old Warwickshire village and sought out a rude thatched house in Henley

Street, where, during the month that the trees put forth their buds and blossoms, in the seventh year of the reign of “good Queen Bess,” in a low-roofed apartment with huge oak beams and roughly-plastered walls, on whose surface myriads of autographs cross each other, so closely written and so continuous that it has the appearance of being covered with fine spider-web, was born the immortal Shakspeare. There you may still see the church in which he was baptized and buried; the same sweet silvery Avon where he fished and sailed and swam; the school-house in which he was taught the same pathway through woods and flowery fields that led the poet to the cottage of his lady-love, “sweet Anne Hathaway,” and the old mansion of the Lucys, intact as in the days of “the myriad minded,” to use Coleridge's happy expression, almost the only epithet of the many applied to Shakspeare that is to be tolerated.

“Small Latine and less Greeke;”

Stratford is situated on the right bank of the Avon. It is a place of great antiquity. The name, according to Dugdale, “was originally given from the ford or passage over the water upon the great street or road leading from Henley, in Arden, toward London.” In Anglo-Saxon times a monastery existed here for four centuries before the Norman Conquest. In the days of Richard the Lion-Hearted and King John charters for markets and charters for fairs were granted to Stratford, and in good time it became a town of considerable traffic. The municipal government was settled in the seventh year of the reign of Edward the Fourth (1553), by a regular charter of incorporation. Ecclesiastical foundations were numerous at Stratford, and such were in every case the centres of civilization and refinement.

WEST END OF TRINITY CHURCH.

In the year of Shakspeare's birth, judging from the number of baptisms and deaths upon received principles of calculation, the town contained a population of about fifteen hundred. It was a town of wooden tenements, many of them doubtless mean timber buildings and thatched cottages. During the reigns of Queen Elizabeth and James the First the place was nearly destroyed by fire, and as late as 1618 the Privy Council represented to the Corporation of Stratford "that great and lamentable loss had happened to that town by casualty of fire, which, of late years, hath been very frequently occasioned by means of thatched cottages, stacks of straw, furzes, and such like combustible stuff, which are suffered to be erected and made confusedly in most of the principal parts of the town without restraint."

The Stratford of to-day is but little changed from what it was nearly three hundred years ago. It has now a population of less than four thousand; twelve principal streets, well paved and well lighted; some modern houses, but for the most part the same old-fashioned tenements that were in vogue when Will Shakspeare was born, and not a few of the identical buildings, unaltered, as they were in the year 1564. The most notable is the cottage in which the most universally-minded man who ever lived opened his babe-eyes on our beautiful world; the Grammar-School, and Guild Hall; the Chapel of the Guild, and the Church of the Holy Trinity. Another ancient structure is the stone bridge over the Avon. In the time of Henry the Seventh a wealthy alderman of London built it, and from that day to this it has borne the name of "Clopton's Bridge."

The view of Stratford accompanying this article is taken from the opposite side of the river, at a point known as Cross on the Hill. The venerable church, with its clear, sharp spire, which is a little retired from the town, where he lies buried whose memory shall be "fresh to all ages," is seen surrounded by noble trees, with the Avon flowing near. The scenery, although lacking boldness, is picturesque. The traveler sees around him, if in spring time, the greenest of all green low-lying meadows, rising on both sides into gentle knolls and rich pasture lands, with the Avon passing through the broad valley beneath; and he may here observe all the flowers of Nature's great poet—the daffodil, the dim violet, the pale primrose, and bold oxlip—and may listen to the lark and his other song-birds. Doubtless "the myriad minded" often sought out this spot, and viewed with loving eyes the village of his birth and the beautiful scenery that surrounds it.

HOUSE IN HIGH STREET.

Let us to Henley Street. Here stands the "birth-place"—the small, mean-looking edifice where tradition says William Shakspeare was born. A rudely-painted sign-board projecting from the front of the upper story informs us that "The immortal Shakspeare was born in this house." It is now but a fragment of the original building, purchased by John Shakspeare, with its orchards and gardens, from Edmund Hall, for forty pounds. It passed at his death to his son William, and from him to his sister,

THE HOUSE IN HENLEY STREET, 1564.

Joan Hart, who was residing there in 1639, and probably until her death in 1646. Its original features may be seen in the accompanying cut. It was a large building, the timbers of substantial oak, and the walls filled in with plaster. The dormer-windows and gable, the deep porch, the projecting parlor and bay window, all contribute to render it exceedingly picturesque. The changes which it has undergone since the days of Shakspeare may be seen by a glance at the illustrations representing it as it appeared in 1855 and as it now stands. The buildings on both sides of the house have been removed, and the old tenement now stands isolated and secure from any chance of demolition by fire, and around it and over it a glass house is proposed to be constructed, so that the winds of heaven may not visit its hallowed walls too roughly. This will render as far as possible the birth-place of William Shakspeare as imperishable as his works; and in the years and ages to come our posterity will still possess the great privilege of standing beneath the roof that gave birth to the immortal dramatist.

Unable at first to gain admittance—the birds being the only inhabitants astir, and the good people of Stratford, in common with their countrymen having their habitation in towns and cities, being given to late hours—we strolled through the quiet and deserted streets, noting the ancient and old-world appearance of the half-timbered thatched houses, and passed out into the open country. Drops of silver dew decked each wild flower and blade of grass; amidst the rich fields of grain were armies of scarlet poppies; on every side we saw the beautiful blue flower with its cerulean bells; the hedges and bushes were mantled and festooned and the morning air rendered fragrant by the wild hop, the white convolvulus, the clematis, or traveler's joy, and other climbing plants, all breathing forth their morning sweetness upon us; and as we stood gazing upon a snug farm-house and its sur-

THE HOUSE IN HENLEY STREET, 1855.

ROOM IN WHICH SHAKSPEARE WAS BORN.

roundings, a lark arose with silvery song from an adjoining field, and we “Beheld him twinkling in the morning light,

And wished for wings and liberty like his.”

What more could any one wish for who had long desired to see and hear an English lark, than, like ourselves, to make his acquaintance in the home and haunts of Shakspeare?

Joining our friends, we again presented ourselves at the door of the “small, mean-looking edifice,” and—the hour being more seasonable—with better success. Ascending the steps we pass into the shop—a cold, cheerless apartment, with dilapidated stone pavement, and hooks sticking in the wall. Behind is the kitchen, which has been compared to the subjects which so frequently employed the talents of Van Ostade.

A narrow staircase ascends to the chamber where William Shakspeare was born, on the 23d of April, 1564. It is a good-sized apartment, but somewhat low-roofed and dingy, receiving its only light from the large window in front. The fire-place projects close to the door leading into the room; an immense beam of oak forms the mantle-tree, from which a large piece is cut out of one corner, said to have been done by an enthusiastic young American lady, while her companion kept the late proprietors in conversation in the room below. The old oak floor has remained unchanged, although much worn. The original ceiling is covered with lath and plaster work, which, together with the walls, are covered with autographs of persons from every Christian land. Among others still to be seen are those of Lord Byron, Sir Walter Scott, and Washington Irving—the latter repeated three times. Some of the names are accompanied by stanzas and attempts at poetry, which have been thus commented upon by one among the number:

“Ah, Shakspeare, when we read the votive scrawls
With which well-meaning folks deface these walls;
And while we seek in vain
some lucky hit,
Amidst the lines whose nonsense nonsense smothers,
We find, unlike thy Falstaff
in his wit,
Thou art not here the cause of wit in others.”

We were equally amused with the following parody on the inscription upon Shakspeare's tomb, the authorship of which,

THE HOUSE IN HENLEY STREET, AS RESTORED, 1861.

like that of the lines quoted above, belongs to this side of the Atlantic:

"Good friend, for Jesus' sake forbear
Thy wit or lore to scribble here;
Blessed are they that rightly con him,
And curs'd be they that comment on him."

A melancholy fate had nearly befallen the names and inscriptions upon the walls and ceiling. The old lady "with keen blue eye and frosty complexion" getting into a quarrel with her landlord about the rent, which threatened to swallow up the profits of showing the place, with a coat of white-wash soon extinguished these interesting reminiscences. Most fortunately, however, in her haste she omitted to put in size, which allowed the coating to be washed off and the writing restored. An eminent commentator on Shakspeare, who visited Stratford in the year 1820, for the purpose of gathering traditions, states that he saw the old lady, then upward of threescore and ten. "She claimed a descent from Shakspeare, and had evidently inherited a full share of his love of the drama. Her high ancestral feeling displayed itself by her saying, I writes plays, and producing a tragedy called 'The Battle of Waterloo.'" As regards her syntax, she seems to have been what the French critics were wont to call her great progenitor, "A wild, irregular genius."

Among the few articles of furniture in the house—none of which can be considered as belonging to the home of Shakspeare—is a chair whose history has been admirably drawn by Washington Irving in the following words:

"The most favorite object of curiosity, however, is Shakspeare's chair. It stands in the chimney corner of a small gloomy chamber, just behind what was his father's shop. Here he may many a time have sat, when a boy, watching the slowly-revolving spit with all the longing of an urchin, or of an evening listened to the cronies and gossips of Stratford dealing forth church-yard tales and legendary anecdotes of the troublesome times of England. In this chair it is the custom of every one that visits the house to sit; whether this be done with the hope of imbibing any of the inspiration of the bard I am at a loss to say—I merely mention the fact; and mine hostess privately assured me that though built of solid oak, such was the fervent zeal of devotees that it had to be new-bottomed at least once in three years. It is worthy of notice, also, in the history of this remarkable chair, that it partakes something of the volatile nature of the Santa Casa of Loretto, or the flying chair of the Arabian enchanter, for though sold to a Russian princess, yet, strange to say, it has found its way back again to the old chimney corner."

The tastefully-designed ancient font which we saw in a neighboring garden, now but a fragment, is supposed to have been used when the poet was christened, as it is known to have belonged to the Stratford Church at that date. It has a curious history. In the middle of the seventeenth century it was superseded and flung into the charnel-house, and when that was destroyed—

OLD FONT.

some sixty years since—was thrown into the church-yard. This beautiful relic of the olden time was afterward removed by the parish clerk to form a trough of a pump at his cottage. From the parish clerk it passed into the hands of the late Captain Saunders; and from his possession came into that of the present owner, a builder of Stratford.

Our next visit was to the house of a Shakspearian antiquary, where we saw various objects of interest, and many rare editions of the poet's works, including the two first, published in 1623 and 1632. A letter written by Richard Quyny, whose son afterward was married to Shakspeare's youngest daughter, addressed "To my loving countryman, Mr. William Shakspeare," was an object of the deepest interest to us. The burden of the epistle is, that the writer stands in need of the kind offices of his friend, and solicits the loan of thirty pounds. We have evidence that the letter was received and opened by Shakspeare, as a charge appears a few weeks later in Quyny's account-book of "£30 returned to Mr. William Shakspeare."

SHAKSPEARE'S SIGNET RING.

Another object of equal interest, and of which we brought away an impression, was Shakspeare's signet ring, the only existing article that belonged to him except Quyny's epistle. It was found near the Stratford church-yard, and is deemed an undoubted relic. Its owner informed us that he purchased it of the finder—the wife of a mechanic—for about nine dollars, the value of the gold. It bears the initials W. S. connected by an ornamental string and tassels, the upper bow presenting a resemblance to the true lover's knot. Poor Haydon the painter says, in a letter dated 1818, about the time of its discovery: "My dear Keats, I shall go mad! In a field at Stratford-on-Avon, that belonged to Shakspeare, they have found a gold ring and seal with the initials W. S. and a true lover's knot between. If this is not Shakspeare's whose is it? A true lover's knot! I saw an impression to-day, and am to have one as soon as possible; as sure as you live and breathe, and that he was the first of beings, the seal belonged to him. O Lord!" Little doubt can exist that it was originally worn by Shakspeare, and that it is the ring that he lost before his death, and was not to be found when his will was executed, the word hand being substituted for seal in the original copy of that document. The true lover's knot indicates that the ring must have been a gift; and there is every reason to suppose that "the gentle Shakspeare" received it from sweet Anne Hathaway—she "who had as much virtue as could die."

BACK OF GRAMMAR-SCHOOL AND GUILD CHAPEL.

The Guild Chapel is a building of great antiquity. The guild to which this chapel belonged was an association partly for civil and partly for religious objects, and had its origin in the reign of Edward the First. The original chapel was erected by Robert de Stratford, in the year 1296. During the reign of Henry the Seventh it was taken down and the present structure erected on its site by Sir Hugh Clopton, a great benefactor to Stratford, and the person who built the before-mentioned bridge. The architecture is pointed and in the perpendicular style of the Tudor period, and is a good specimen of the ecclesiastical architecture of that day. The interior of the building was originally decorated with a series of remarkable pictures, the principal being the legendary history of the Holy Cross. They were mutilated to a considerable extent at the Reformation. In this chapel at one time a school was held, and an order in the corporation books, dated 1594, directs "that there shall be no school kept in the chapel from this time following." The occupation of the chapel as a school-room may have been temporary, but Shakspeare may have imbibed a portion of his learning within its sacred walls.

Around the Grammar School, a venerable pile adjoining the Guild Chapel, cluster many Shakspearian associations. It was founded during the reign of Edward the Fourth by Thomas Jollyffe, SHAKSPEARE'S DESK.

who gave certain lands and tenements to maintain "a priest fit and able in knowledge to teach grammar freely to all scholars coming to the school in the said town to him, taking nothing of the scholars for their teaching." At a later date it was amply endowed by that most excellent prince, Edward VI. In Shakspeare's time the ascent was by a curious outer staircase, roofed with tile, which remained unaltered until quite recently. The interior of the school-room has undergone essential changes since its immortal pupil each day crossed its threshold with "shining morning face." The oaken roof, with its large supporting beams, is now hid from view by a ceiling of plaster work, and the desks are not those that were in use in the days of the youthful Shakspeare. An old worm-eaten oaken desk in a room below, which has suffered greatly from the ravages of relic hunters, is still pointed out as the one used by William Shakspeare. The tradition that assigns it to Shakspeare may be very questionable; but let us not disturb the belief that at this old desk the poet daily sat and learned and first began to discipline that wonderful mind that was to bequeath to the world those matchless productions that will endure "to the last syllable of recorded time."

"Small Latine and less Greeke,"

In this connection we wish to mention a pleasant anecdote, related by William Howitt. He says: "As I was walking through Stratford one morning I saw the master of the village school mustering his scholars to their tasks. I stopped, being pleased with the look of the old man, and said, 'You seem to have a considerable number of boys here; shall you raise another Shakspeare from among them, think you?' 'Why,' replied the master, 'I have a Shakspeare now in the school.' I knew that Shakspeare had so descendants beyond the third generation, and I was not aware that there was any of his family remaining. But it seems that the posterity of his sister, Joan Hart, who is mentioned in his will, still exist, part under the name of Hart at Tewsbury, and a family in Stratford of the name of Smith. 'I have a Shakspeare here,' said the master, with evident pride and pleasure. 'Here, boys, here.' He quickly mustered his laddish troop in a row, and said to me, 'There now, Sir, can you tell which is a Shakspeare?' I glanced my eye along the line, and instantly fixing it on one boy, said, 'That is the Shakspeare.' 'You are right,' said the master. 'That is Shakspeare; the Shakspeare cast of countenance is there. That is William Shakspeare Smith, a lineal descendant of the poet's sister.'" Mr. Howitt adds: "It sounded strangely enough as I was passing along the street in the evening to hear some of the boys say one to another, 'That is the gentleman who gave Bill Shakspeare a shilling.'"

REMAINS OF SHAKSPEARE'S HOUSE AT NEW PLACE.

We wish it were in our power to present our readers with a view of the house in which Shakspeare lived after his retirement from London. We only know that it was the largest house in Stratford. The garden was spacious. The Avon washed its banks. Within its inclosures were sunny terraces and green lawns, honey-suckle bowers, and flowers of all hues. Dugdale, speaking of Sir Hugh Clopton, who built the Stratford bridge and repaired the chapel, says, "On the north side of this chapel was a fair house, built of brick and timber by the said Hugh, wherein he lived in his later years." This "fair house" was purchased by Shakspeare, who repaired and modelled it to his own mind, and changed the name to "New Place." By his will he left it to his daughter, Mrs. Hall, with remainder to her heirs male, or in default, to her daughter Elizabeth and her heirs male, or the heirs male of his daughter Judith. Mrs. Hall died in 1649, and there is little doubt but that she occupied "New Place" when Queen Henrietta Maria, in 1643, coming to Stratford in royal state, with a large army, resided for three weeks under her roof. The property descended to her daughter Elizabeth, first married to Mr. Thomas Nash, and afterward to Sir John Barnard. She dying without issue, New Place was sold, and ultimately fell into the hands of the Rev. Francis Gastrell, in 1757. Malone thus relates the story:

"The Rev. Mr. Gastrell, a man of large fortune, resided in it but a few years, in consequence of a disagreement with the inhabitants of Stratford. Every house in that town that is let or valued at more than forty shillings a year is assessed by the overseers, according to its worth and the ability of the occupier, to pay a monthly rate toward the maintenance of the poor. As Mr. Gastrell resided part of the time at Lichfield, he thought he was assessed too highly; but being very properly compelled by the magistrates of Stratford to pay the whole of what was levied upon him, on the principle that his house was occupied by his servants during his absence, he peevishly declared that that house should never be assessed again; and soon afterward pulled it down, sold the materials, and left the town. Wishing, as it should seem, to be "damn'd to everlasting fame," he had some time before cut down Shakspeare's celebrated mulberry-tree, to save himself the trouble of showing it to those whose admiration of the great poet led them to visit the poetic ground on which it stood."

The destruction of the mulberry-tree, which the previous possessor of New Place had always shown with pride and pleasure, greatly enraged the good people of Stratford, and we were informed by the Shaksperian antiquary before mentioned "that he remembered hearing his father say that he had, when a boy, assisted in the revenge of breaking the reverend Vandal's windows."

TRINITY CHURCH, STRATFORD-UPON-AVON.

Nothing now remains of what would have been the most interesting spot in Stratford but the site, and that has been divided and built upon. Of how much did that ignorant Englishman deprive the world by his Gothic barbarity? Under that roof Shakspeare composed the grandest of all his glorious creations—his Hamlet, Lear, Othello, and Macbeth, plays exhibiting his wonderful genius at its very point of culmination. Under that roof he spent the closing years of his too brief career, surrounded by his children and the loved scenes of his childhood. Who would not wish to have walked reverentially in those halls, hallowed by his presence and his labors?

We will now visit the tomb of Shakspeare, in the chancel of the church of the Holy Trinity—a spot possessing, in common with his birth-place, an interest to Britons and Americans that does not belong to any other spot on the habitable globe. The approach to this venerable and picturesque fane is through an avenue of beautiful lime-trees, clipped in such a manner as to form an arbor extending from the gateway of the church-yard to the porch. The church is built in the form of a cross, the chancel corresponding to the upper portion, the transepts to the short arms, and the nave to the longest portion. There are aisles on each side of the nave, and a charnel-house formerly stood on the north side of the chancel. Portions of this "solemn temple" belong to different ages. The tower, which is in the Norman-Gothic style, is believed to be as old as the days of William the Conqueror. Its height is eighty feet, and that of the gray-stone spire surmounting it eighty-five feet. The chancel, or choir—much the finest portion of the structure—was built about the middle of the fifteenth century, as a substitute for a more ancient one.

CHANCEL OF THE CHURCH OF THE HOLY TRINITY.

PORCH OF THE CHURCH.

Passing into the chancel you see directly in front of the communion-rails the tombs of the Shakspeare family, which, in harmony with Christian usage, lie east and west; and on your left as you face the altar, Shakspeare's monument. How soon it was placed there after the poet's death is not known, but that it was there before 1623 we can ascertain from Leonard Digges's verses prefixed to the first edition of Shakspeare's works. A half-length figure of him is placed in a niche, which is arched over and fronted by Corinthian columns of black polished marble, with gilded capitals and bases. The architraves are of marble, and the arms of Shakspeare are supported above the entablature. The crest is a falcon grasping a golden spear, and the supporters are two boys in a sitting posture, representing Death and the Grave. The one on the right, emblematic of the former, holds an inverted torch in one hand and rests the other on a skull. That on the left is figured holding a spade, and turning its eyes toward the other, and on the apex above is another skull. The sculptor of the bust, the material of which is bluish limestone, was Gerard Johnson; it is supposed to have been made from a cast taken after death. It was originally painted from nature. The face and hands were flesh-colored, the eyes a light hazel, and the hair and beard auburn. The dress was a scarlet doublet slashed on the breast, over which was a loose black gown without sleeves. The upper part of the cushion was crimson, the lower green; the cord which bound it and the tassels were gilt. In 1748 the original colors were restored by an ancestor of Mrs. Fanny Kemble. Malone, in an evil hour, was allowed to coat the bust, in 1793, with white paint; also the effigy of Shakspeare's friend, John Combe, who lies beside the altar. This act has been most justly stigmatized as one of "unscrupulous insolence." Beneath the cushion on which the poet is writing is inscribed,

IVDICIO PYLIVM GENIO SOCRATEM ARTE MARONEM
TERRA TEGIT POPVLVS MERET OLYMPVS HABET.

Stay Passenger why goest thou by so fast?
Read if thou canst, whom envious Death hath plait Within this monument, Shakspeare with whom Quick nature dide; whose name doth deck y^e Tombe
Far more than cost; sieth all y^t he hath writt
Leaves living art but page to serve his wit.

Obiit Ano Doⁱ. 1616.
Ætatis 53. die 23 Apr.

There can be no doubt that this bust is the best portrait of "the gentle Shakspeare." The features are handsome and intelligent, but it is evident that such a head depended on its living expression, and that then it must have been eminently prepossessing.

BUST OF SHAKSPEARE.

The first of the grave-stones of the Shakspeare family is that of his wife, immediately beneath his monument. It is a flat stone, the surface injured by time, having a small brass plate let in it, with this inscription—here literally given, as are all the others:

Here lyeth interred the body of Anne
Wife of William Shakspeare, who depected
This life the 6 day of Avg. 1623, being of
The age of 67 years.

Vbera, tu mater, tu lac vitamq; dedisti,
Væ mihi: pro tanto munere saxa dabo.
Quam mallet amoveat lapidem bonus Angel' ore'
Exeat ut Christi corpus imago tua.
Sed nil vota valent, venias cito Christe resurget
Clausula licet tumulo mater, et estra petit.

Next is the grave of William Shakspeare, on which lies a large slab of coarse stone with the following inscription, which has been attributed to the great dramatist. A peculiarity which it possesses over ordinary inscriptions is the abbreviation of the word that, and the grouping together of some of the letters after the fashion of a monogram:

GOOD FREND FOR IESVS SAKE FORBEARE TO DIGG THE DVST ENCLOASED HEARE
BLESE BE ^EY MAN ^TY SPARES TIES STONES AND CVRST BE HE ^TY MOVES MY BONES.

In a letter dated 1693 the writer, after describing the monument to Shakspeare, and giving the inscription, says: "Near the wall where the monument is erected lies the plain freestone underneath which his body is buried, with this epitaph, made by himself a little before his death." The writer gives the epitaph, and subsequently adds: "Not one, for fear of the curse above said, dare touch his grave-stone, though his wife and daughter did earnestly desire to be laid in the same grave with him." Here is unquestionable authority for the existence of the inscription within less than fourscore years of the poet's death. Many question the fact of its having been written by Shakspeare. De Quincey pronounced it to be "equally below his intellect no less than his scholarship."

The next tomb is that of Thomas Nash, who married the only daughter of Shakspeare's eldest child, Susanna; this lady afterward married Sir

ANNE HATHAWAY'S COTTAGE.

John Barnard, and with her death the direct line of William Shakspeare's family ceased. Then comes the grave of Dr. John Hall, a man of education and wealth, who married Shakspeare's eldest daughter. Next to Dr. Hall's tomb is a stone commemorating the final resting-place of his wife Susanna. On it is seen this inscription:

HEERE LYETH YE BODY OF SVSANNA
WIFE TO JOHN HALL GENT: YE DAUGHTER OF WILLIAM SHAKESPEARE, GENT:
SHEE DECEASED YE 11th OF JVLV, A^O.
1649, AGED 66.

Witty above her sexe, but that's not all,
Wise to Salvation was good Mistris Hall,
Something of Shakspeare was in that, but this
Wholy of him with whom she's now in blisse.

Then, Passenger ha'st ne're a teare,
To weepe with her that wept with all?
That wept, yet set herself to chere
Them up with comforts cordiall.
Her love shall live, her mercy spread,
When thou ha'st ne're a teare to shed.

Before leaving this interesting and beautiful church with its charming associations, the sexton showed us several books containing the autographs of visitors. Among them were the names of pilgrims to the shrine of genius from every Christian clime. Kings and princes; great soldiers and greater statesmen; men eminent in the Church, eminent in the law, eminent in literature, from all lands seek out that secluded Warwickshire village to do homage to "the gentle Shakspeare." Inquiring for the signature of Washington Irving, we were told that the book containing his name, as well as those of two of our greatest poets, had been stolen by a countryman of ours.

A mile or two distant is another spot intimately connected with Shakspeare—the home of "sweet Anne Hathaway." Following a pleasant path that led through luxurious meadows gayly bedight with wild flowers, we in a half hour's walk reached Shottery, a quaint little hamlet of about a dozen old thatched half-timbered tenements, numbering among them a petite road-side inn—"The Shakspeare"—and Richard Hathaway's cottage, built before Sir Philip Sidney was born, and which remained in his family until within the past twenty years. By the same path that we pursued did the youthful Shakspeare oft wend his steps to this spot to visit his lady-love, the village belle. The home of the Hathaways, situated in the midst of a quiet and luxurious landscape, is but little changed from what it was in the days of Shakspeare. Proceeding down a pretty lane you cross a murmuring brook; a few yards further and you are at the porch. It is a long, low thatched tenement of timber and plaster, substantially built upon a foundation of squared slabs of lias shale, which is a characteristic of Warwickshire cottages. This house, like Shakspeare's birth-place, has been subdivided into three. By referring to the engraving this will be clearly understood. The square, compact, and taller half of the tenement to the left forms one house. The other two are divided by the passage which runs entirely through the lower half, and which serves for both buildings. That to the right on entering consists of one large room below, with a chimney extending the whole width of the house, with an oven and boiler, showing that this was the principal kitchen when the house was all in one. The door to the left leads into the parlor.

COURTING CHAIR.

CHARLECOTE HALL.

It is a large low-roofed room, with strong oak beams, much resembling the kitchen in Henley Street. A Shakspearian commentator, who visited Shottery some sixty years since, saw and purchased an antique carved oak chair called "Shakspeare's courting chair." With a similar desire to please relic-hunters to that which has been already shown to exist elsewhere, this chair, although removed threescore years ago, has a successor dignified by the same name. It is, however, but fair to add that skeptical persons are not met by bold assertions of its genuineness, while all credulous and nothing-doubting individuals are allowed the full benefit of their faith. In addition to the chair, the purchaser was shown a purse which had belonged to the poet, and handed down from him to his grand-daughter, Lady Barnard, and by her to the Hathaways. At the time of the Stratford Jubilee a brother of the eminent tragedian, David Garrick, bought this purse, also a pair of fringed gloves said to have been worn by Shakspeare. David, with characteristic caution, purchased no such doubtful wares. In the chamber over the parlor stands an antique carved bedstead of oak, certainly as old as the Shakspearian era, and which may have been used by the Hathaways at that time. The tradition is that the bed, and the room in which it stands, were "Sweet Anne's." A dilapidated dog-eared Bible was produced, which the simple woman who showed the house assured us had been used by Anne and her lover, sitting side by side on a rude bench that stood near the entrance. Although the bench seemed a product of more modern days, we were very willing to believe that we might be mistaken, and that "Gentle Will" and Anne Hathaway might have sat thereon, while he was stealing away her heart with many a vow of love. But in the fact that either had ever seen or opened the venerable volume, our faith was considerably shaken by the discovery that it was printed in the year 1676; showing a trifling discrepancy of nearly ninety years—William and Anne Shakspeare having been made man and wife in the year 1582. On our return from Shottery we were met by an aged mendicant, who claimed alms from us as being a descendant or in some way related to Shakspeare. Without very closely investigating the correctness of his claims we presented him with half a crown, quite willing to believe that we had possessed the privilege of assisting a person related, however distantly, to the great dramatist.

Truly has Washington Irving said of Stratford-upon-Avon, "The mind refuses to dwell on any thing not connected with Shakspeare. This idea pervades the place," and also, we may add, Charlecote. Charlecote! who is not familiar with the name? There stands the old Elizabethan mansion intact as it appeared three hundred years ago, in the glorious days of Sidney and Spenser and Sir Walter Raleigh. The same hills and valleys—the same gnarled oaks and venerable birches dotted over the noble park, through which flows the same sweet Avon. There may still be seen “the native burghers” of the forest, browsing under antique elms, or standing by the water side.

SIR THOMAS LUCY.

Dugdale has given the history of Charlecote and its lord with much minuteness. Its old Saxon name, Ceorlcote—the home of the husbandman—carries us back to years before the Conquest. The present structure of brick was erected by Sir Thomas Lucy, who was knighted by Queen Elizabeth in 1593. It forms three sides of a quadrangle, the fourth being occupied by a large central gate-house some distance in advance of the main building, between which is a spacious court-yard ornamented with shrubs and flowers. The great hall is a noble room, with a fine arched roof and a large bow window. A few armorial bearings of the Lucys, some with the date 1558—the year of its erection—are still to be seen on the stained glass. On the ancient fire-place are the initials T. L., and the date 1558, in relief and gilt. The hall is hung with numerous family portraits, some of which are of great antiquity.

A five-minutes' walk from the mansion, through the park—in which were herds of deer—brought us to Charlecote Church, near which is the manse and a little group of ivy-embowered cottages. In this tasteful temple are buried the remains of Sir Thomas, and his wife, Lady Joyce Lucy. They are executed in a masterly manner, and are deemed reliable portraits. Sir Thomas appears to have been an exemplary country gentleman, and that he had a good heart is most conclusively shown by the beautiful epitaph on one side of the monument. With singular good taste his own name is not mentioned, but his wife's virtues are recorded in the following touching inscription :

Here entombed lyeth the Lady Joyce Lucy, wife of Sir Thomas Lucy, of Cherlecote, in the County of Warwick, Knight, Daughter and heir of Thomas Acton, of Sutton, in the County of Worcester. Esquier, who departed out of this wretched world to her Heavenly Kingdome, the tenth day of February, in the year of our Lord God 1595, of her age lx. and three. All the time of her life a true and faithful servant of her Good God, never detected of any crime or vice; in religion most sound; in love to her husband most faithfull and true; in friendship most constant; to what was in trust committed to her most secret; in wisdom excelling; in governing her house, and bringing up of youth in the feare of God that did converse with her, most rare and singular. A great maintainer of hospitality; greatly esteemed of her betters; misliked of none unless of the envious. When all is spoken that can be said, a woman so furnished and garnished with virtue, as not to be bettered, and hardly to be equalled by any. As she lived most virtuously, so she dyed most Godly. Set down by Him that best did know what hath been written to be true.

THOMAS LUCY.

The absurd story of the Shakspeare deer-stealing exploit and the harsh trial that followed, as well as his having been a hanger-on at the Blackfriars' Theatre, gaining sixpences by holding the horses of play-goers, has been most successfully refuted by Charles Knight; and we think that no one, after reading the above touching tribute to his wife, and looking upon the accompanying cut, a careful copy of the noble head of Sir Thomas Lucy, can possibly identify him with Justice Shallow upon any such shallow evidence as that the armorial bearings of the one was twelve, of the other three, pike.

We must not omit, in our brief description of Stratford-upon-Avon, to make mention of their genuine old-fashioned English inns, in one of which each of the rooms is named after some

THE AVON AT WIER BRAKE.

play of Shakspeare's ; and it is no unusual occurrence for mine host to be heard crying out, "A mug of 'alf an' 'alf for Macbeth," some "sack for Othello," or "a bottle of Heidsick for Hamlet." Our quarters were elsewhere : at the cozy and comfortable "Red Horse Inn," where we occupied the chamber known as the "Washington Irving room." During our last evening in Stratford, the worthy wife of honest John Gardner, mine host of the Red Horse Inn, invited us into her little parlor, as she wished to let us see something occasionally shown to American occupants of her house. Taking from her capacious pocket a formidable bunch of keys, with one of which a drawer of her bureau was unlocked and opened, there appeared an oblong object, carefully wrapped in baize. Lifting it with great care and untying sundry pieces of tape with which it was bound, there appeared imprimis a shovel, next a poker, and lastly a pair of tongs, all bright and apparently new. In answer to our looks of amazement and inquiry, good Mistress Gardner informed us that they were used by Washington Irving when he last honored her poor house with his presence, and that since that time they had not been used by any other person, and should not be, "unless the kind and good gentleman should come back again."

In the beautiful words of Irving, who now sleeps on the banks of that noble river he loved so well, and amidst the scenes he celebrated, "How would it have cheered the spirit of the youthful bard, when wandering forth upon a doubtful world he cast back a heavy look upon his paternal home, could he have foreseen that, before many years, he should return to it covered with renown ; that his ashes should be religiously guarded as the most precious treasure ; and that its lessening spire, on which his eyes were fixed in tearful contemplation, should one day become the beacon, towering amidst the gentle landscape, to guide the literary pilgrim of every nation to his tomb !"

OTTAWA CITY.

THE CAPITAL OF THE CANADAS.

THE Grand, or Ottawa, River of Canada, deriving its source from innumerable lakes and tributaries in the heart of that terra incognita lying to the north and east of the French River and Lake Nipissing, in about the forty-eighth degree of north latitude, with broad and circuitous flow for upward of four hundred miles, rushes into the still greater St. Lawrence in two channels at the island of Montreal. This island is formed at the confluence of the Ottawa branches with the St. Lawrence, and is the highest point of ship navigation from the Gulf.

Sixty-five or seventy years ago Montreal was the ultima Thule of Canadian civilization, and the waters of the Ottawa above the island were seldom disturbed by white men, except occasionally by the adventurous fur traders. The Indian alone on this river was ruler. The forest waved in primeval luxuriousness and grandeur, and the Ottawa, unchecked by dam or bridge, ran beneath its canopy as free as the untamed horse of the Ukraine.

The Ottawa in these days of newspapers, tourists, and travelers, is celebrated for the number and variety of its falls and rapids; but the most striking, grand, and fearful is the fall called by the early French pioneers the Chaudière, or, in unpolished English, the "Big Kettle." It occurs in the course of the river at a distance of about one hundred and twenty miles from the island of Montreal. Above it, for a few miles, are several small chutes, indicating the abrupt descent of the bottom plane, and the rapidity and force of the immense river are augmented for the grand rush at the Chaudière, where it falls perpendicularly some fifteen or twenty feet over a precipitous limestone rock. Here the river is about a quarter of a mile wide, and the term Chaudière is only properly applicable to a part of the fall. There is a gap of about two hundred feet in width, and some three hundred indenting back or up the river in the straight line of the cataract. Within this gap, or "kettle," the great volume of the Ottawa boils and foams and hisses, and, rushing in wild masses around from side to side, eventually escapes in a high mountain of foam, and expands to half a mile in width in a short distance in its course below. Above the Chaudière the banks on both sides are nearly level, with a gradual ascent from the water; but immediately at and below the falls walls of decayed limestone rise perpendicularly, lessening off abruptly on the north side in half a mile to a plain, but on the south rising higher, and circuitously higher, to a precipitous altitude of one, two, and three hundred feet.

Coming up the river, these heights, clothed with stubby pine and wavy hemlock, are most striking and impressive. These, with the Fall of the Chaudière and the undulating banks of the northern side, present altogether a variety and picturesqueness of scenery unsurpassed in Canada, or perhaps in America. The fur trader or voyageur in the old days here no doubt paused in admiration of the beauty of the prospect; or, if he had no taste for the striking scenes in nature, here he had to pause from necessity. On the one side were lofty hills; before him the great river came down with roar and foam and mist with sudden leap, frightening away all thought of attempt at navigation. To explore above these dangers, then, the alternative was in the pleasant bank of the north side, which, with gradual ascent, would bring him in a few miles above the Chaudière and rapids to the quiet waters of the Upper Ottawa. Thus, to pass the Chaudière and the rapids above it—the portage of eight miles in a straight line across the circuit of the river, which is here at least twelve or fifteen miles—was by the first adventurers tramped out. These adventurers were, as I have already said, fur traders. They paddled their way quietly through from Montreal, camping out at night on the banks of the silent river, keeping vigilant watch for the stealthy Indian, and looked forward to the weary portage of the Chaudière—across which canoe and traps were to be carried—as the heaviest work of the route. Occasionally, on a little cleared spot at the beginning of this portage, would they find the camp of the Indian and his family. It was, no doubt, from its situation—at the foot of the Chaudière—a very old resting spot of the native. Here, too, was he buried, as a recent exhumation of bones testifies. But beyond this little opening of the forest on the bank of the river, with its line of portage behind, were no evidences of the settlement of man, white or red.

One autumn day, toward the close of the last century, an unusual sight might be seen, if any body had been there to see, in the bay below the Chaudière: several canoes laden with white men and a very unusual amount and variety of freight. They came wearily up the river, and as the voyageurs came within full view of the magnificent scenery shining and looming around, they instinctively stayed the stroke of the paddle and gazed. The precipitous heights on the left looked gravely back in return; the mist shone and looked up brightly from the Chaudière; and the little cleared spot at the portage on the right looked and said in the glance as plainly as ever glance spoke, "This is the place to land: there is no other around."

"Here we are to land," said Mr. Wright, the leader of the party, after a long and steady inspection, and pointing to the portage, "and the sooner the better."

Mr. Wright and his party had come all the way from Boston by the sea-shore, and sought a home in the almost untracked wilderness on the Ottawa, near the Chaudière. Whether it were a desire for gain, or a repugnance to the new state of political matters in the State of Massachusetts, history saith not; but Mr. Wright and all his followers went to sleep this eventful night with the intention of going at hard work the next morning, and before the hardest of the work should commence to fix on a site for a village, a site for mills, and for other edifices of importance to new settlers. The hard work was, however, postponed for two or three days. With the aid of a couple of Indians the land on both sides was examined. That beyond the hills was utterly condemned as unfit for farm or town; being composed altogether, and truly enough, of rock, sand, and swamp. That on the portage, or north side, was pronounced better; and on this side, with due resolve, Mr. Wright determined to plant his settlement.

About a mile from the portage landing, on a rocky plateau, and right opposite and alongside the Chaudière Falls, Mr. Wright said, "Here will be our village, and we shall call it Hull!" for this was the name of the locality from which he and his followers came in the State of Massachusetts. And so the hard work commenced!

The history of all settlements is much the same; it is generally made up of great and continuous labor and much privation. The difficulty of traveling, the distance to Montreal, which was their only and nearest market, rendered the settlement of Hull—or Wrightstown, as it was sometimes called—peculiarly hard. Unlike most new settlements, it had none other near it; and there was only one as late in existence as itself, a French seigneurie, between it and Montreal; and this one was some fifty miles away down the river. Still Mr. Wright's settlement extended along and backward from the old portage road of the Indians and fur traders: still can be seen old frame-houses and barns of this era in the last stages of tottering consumption here and there along this road, now smoothened off into the dignity of a Macadam, a poor portage no longer. Scarcely a settler would for years enliven the solitude of the opposite or southern side of the river. That quarter was evidently condemned to eternal sterility and quiet.

Mr. Wright and his followers, in their steady advance of settlement, did not, however, condemn all the trees to fire and ashes. They lumbered, and in consequence became dealers in pine and farmers at the same time, as all their successors on the Ottawa yet continue to be.

Thus an impetus to the great timber trade of Canada was given in this quarter. Rafts of square pine were floated through manifold dangers to Quebec every spring, and with the return of the lumberers, after the timber was disposed of, came necessities for the settlement, and for the trade, gradually springing into strong existence. With the growth of the trade and of the settlement came luxuries, came rum, and came immigrants; and the township of Hull was a fact in its way as fixed as the State of Massachusetts which the settlers had left.

Mr. Wright had early obtained a grant of large tracts of land, on both sides of the river, from the Canadian Government of the day. Land was cheap, and easily got in those times. Although not appreciating the soil on the southern side beyond the grave precipices, he secured a large quantity there. It might be useful at some time or another, he thought; but the north side was, par excellence, to be the locality of any future greatness that might inadvertently drop on this part of the world; and Mr. Wright, like every settler that has knocked down a tree in the wilderness, had his hopes of the importance of the spot he had selected. He had made up his mind, from the recent and increasing growth of the settlement, that his village of Hull was destined, at all events in his time, to be a town of consequence.

The lumber trade was not now confined to him. Every day brought voyageurs bent upon cutting down pine, supplied with necessities for its manufacture by merchants in Quebec and Montreal. They did not even confine themselves to his township, but getting to the end of the old portage road—commonly called "The Head," and even yet so denominated by the old inhabitants—they pushed up Lake Deschênes, as this part of the Ottawa was and is called, and commenced their operations. With them came quiet French Canadians, wild Irishmen, Englishmen, and Scotchmen, and by degrees Hull settlement lost its peculiar Yankee character.

The war of 1814-'15 between Britain and the United States was over, and military men swarmed in the frontier towns and villages of Canada. Now and then disbanded sons of Mars made their appearance in Hull, for it was in those days an out-of-the-way place; and if they were inclined to work, got it. More pretentious soldiers, or rather officers, the war being over, got grants of land wherever they thought land worth taking, and finally a military settlement grew up on the south bank of the river, opposite the end, or rather "The Head," of the portage road of Hull. All, however, seemed to shun the condemned land beyond the precipitous hills below the Chaudière.

Still these hills towered up from the Ottawa in sullen dignity, as if they looked with contempt upon all around; and the Chaudière foamed, and hissed, and roared as loud as usual. Still down went the trees before the restless white man, and the light of civilization took the place of the forest gloom, and the Ottawa country became gradually pretty well known through Canada.

The village of Hull increased with the growth of the country, and became the principal, or rather the only mart of this part of the province. In its streets could be heard at a certain season of the year—about the fall, when the lumberers and raftsmen were on their periodical voyages up to "make timber"—the English language, spoken in a variety of ways. In the nasal of the "Down-Eastern," in the brogue of the Irishman, and in small bits chopped finely by the French Canadian. Here could be heard, indeed, various English, French, Gaelic, Irish, and occasionally Dutch. Here rum was cheap and all had credit, for cash was scarce; and, availing themselves of the credit, many a poor raftsmen exhausted his prospective wages. Scarcity of cash was a prevailing vice in Hull, and the working men of Mr. Wright—or of the Wrights, for there was a strong clan of this name—were paid generally in any of three ways: in "store pay" or goods, in "rum," or in "land." Three-fourths availed themselves of the first two, and the prudent one-fourth of the other.

One fine day Mr. Wright had a settlement of accounts with one of his men who owned the lively name of Sparks. Mr. Sparks, although an Irishman, was not of a lively turn of mind; he was rather of the plodding cast, a "good worker," and a first rate ox-teamster, and had wrought for some years for Mr. Wright, tradition says, without any settlement taking place between them. The balance was now, however, struck, and Mr. Wright was found to be in debt to Mr. Sparks some two hundred dollars or thereabout. Cash was out of the question. Even Mr. Sparks had no idea that he would obtain all his balance of wages in that useful and convenient medium.

"You will have to take land for this," said Mr. Wright.

"And where is the land?" asked Mr. Sparks.

"Let me see," said Mr. Wright, arranging all the huts and their occupants in the township in his mind; "now all the land is taken up between here and 'The Head,' unless you would go back of the Gateneau," a river at the rear of Hull.

"Well, I won't go back there," said Mr. Sparks, doggedly.

"Or up the lake," suggested Mr. Wright.

"How the d—l could I live up there," remonstrated Sparks, "not a living soul within miles av me?"

"Well, then," said Mr. Wright, "what do you say to the land across the river?"

Mr. Sparks, it is said, in a fit of uncontrollable rage, burst out of the office, and there was no settlement on that day. Nor was there a settlement for several days. History records that Mr. Sparks was in a very disconsolate mood, indeed, for some time after this. He looked upon his wages as absolutely lost, and all his hard work gone for nothing.

He crossed the river, however, and examined the land up and down beyond those grave-looking hills, and found—what he expected to find—plenty of rock, plenty of sand, and plenty of swamp. Higher up the river, however, he thought that something might be made out of a piece of soil on the banks, and near to one of the upper rapids; but lower down, and near those diabolical precipices, he looked upon as utterly valueless.

Mr. Wright was in his office, and Mr. Sparks again appeared before him.

"Did ye make up yer mind yet what land I am to get?" demanded, not blandly, the latter gentleman.

"Unless you take some near the Gateneau, or up the lake, as I offered you before," said Mr. Wright, "I have no other except—hem—across—" He saw that Mr. Sparks stood his ground this time, and he took courage and continued, "And I'll tell you what I'll do besides, Sparks; I'll give you a yoke of oxen in, and I'm sure, in spite of all they say, that you'll get on well."

"They" meant general opinion.

Mr. Sparks had made up his mind before he entered the office; but he was determined on another trial, and was unexpectedly pleased when the offer of the yoke of oxen fell upon his ear.

"Well," said he, "I won't go to the Gateneau or up the lake, and as I can't do better, I suppose we'll have to settle."

And the settlement took place. He got the land near the rapids, and all he liked to take beyond the precipices, and the yoke of oxen. The hills he would have nothing to do with; the swamps beyond might be useful for cedar for fencing purposes, and even the sand might be of some avail. All these were granted, and Mr. Sparks departed for his property, and Mr. Wright ceased to be his debtor.

A bright idea got into the heads of the Canadian authorities immediately after the close of the war of 1815. And this was to find a channel in the interior for the conveyance of the munitions of war to the upper lakes, the St. Lawrence being too exposed to the assaults of the American enemy. And so the grand scheme of the Rideau Canal was inaugurated. Surveyors were set to work, and after a time the bright idea was developed in plans, and practically carried out at an expense of some two million pounds sterling, from which the British Government, who were the builders, never reaped one farthing's profit. There is a river called the "Rideau" in Canada. It has its source from various lakes to the north and east of Lake Ontario, and after a straggling, wide-spreading, zigzag flow, as if it hadn't made up its mind as to the particular course it ought to run—in a neat little Niagara—falls into the Ottawa River below the precipices which Mr. Sparks would not take for love or money. A gorge among these precipices and Lake Ontario were designed as the termini of the Rideau Canal; and the Rideau Canal was built, and sluggishly exists at the present day.

About the year 1823 the work was commenced, and one bright day Mr. Sparks, to his astonishment—upon the highest and most central of the precipices which looked down upon the Ottawa, and also upon the gorge alluded to—beheld a motley crowd of engineers, laborers, and soldiers. In fine, the hill was taken possession of, and also an adjacent one, as the ordinance property of the British Crown. The gentleman in charge of the construction of the canal and the appendant works bore the abrupt, dissonant, and monosyllabic name of By.

The work went on. Laborers increased, and so did their shanties. And in the train followed the usual appurtenances of the white man's settlement; to wit, grog-shops, blacksmith-shops, and shops for vending all things. They sprang up at both ends of the circuit of the two hills outside the Government line of demarkation with Mr. Sparks—with long vacancies between—and extended at least a good long mile. By way of a joke, they called one end "Upper," and the other "Lower Town."

In a year or two the straggling place, named in playfulness Upper and Lower Town, got a united designation, and, in compliment to the chief-engineer, was called By-Town—a poor name, as far as sound was concerned; but a title of promise and hope to the man who owned nearly all the land beyond the fall of the hills inward. In the mean time a rude bridge had been thrown across the face of the Chaudière, connecting Wrightstown, or Hull, with Bytown; and as the latter increased in shanties and population, the former became more and more stationary. The star of one was rising; that of the other setting.

Years passed away—nearly as many as would change a stripling into a full-grown man—and the modest Bytown, growing in prosperity, all of a sudden got ashamed of its name, and by Act of Parliament had it changed to the name of the noble river that roared and flowed at its base. In the mean time Mr. Sparks, it is probable, ceased personally to direct the movements of the yoke of oxen obtained in his bargain with Mr. Wright, and retired to good and large quarters in the town. He also went into good and large business, as money flowed in upon him for building lots on the despised rock, sand, and swamp of a few years before; and yet did the old and once lively Hull become more fixed—like the long, steady glare of a dying man's eyes—and more stationary. Hull, the place of early promise, was dead. His town was swelling with vitality.

Canada was vexed. From Sandwich to Gaspé it was angry. Angry was the country, but mad were the towns. The Houses of Parliament shook with furious declamation. Politicians agreed on many points, but on one they could not agree. Quebec abused Montreal, and Montreal abused Quebec. Kingston abused both, and Toronto abused them all; it was really a jolly scramble, and a lively one!

Still the despised precipices of old in the new city looked as quiet and as serious as ever.

At length the Parliamentarians came to an issue. They would refer the matter to her Majesty for arbitrament and final settlement. And her Majesty quickly and definitely settled it. The grave and dignified hills were to sustain the Parliament buildings of United Canada!

Ah, Mr. Wright! Ah, Mr. Sparks!

Not long ago that agreeable and promising young man, ALBERT EDWARD, heir to the British throne, in the course of his tour over the American continent, and as a part of his business, laid the foundation stone—which, in deep indentations, records the fact; and no doubt, in a year or two, the finest architectural pile on this continent will raise itself on this majestic summit.

Still the hill looks as seriously grand as ever—as it did fifty or sixty years ago to the eyes of the wondering voyageur. The Chaudière rushes, boils, and roars as of old; and Hull shows some signs of revivication. Mr. Wright has passed away, and is succeeded by others of the same name. His humble workman, who was forced to take the ground of the City of Ottawa, the capital of Canada—a yoke of oxen being his principal inducement—is alive yet, and worth some half million of pounds.

And this is the history of the Capital of the Canadas.

CANADIAN PARLIAMENT HOUSE, NOW BUILDING AT OTTAWA.

WINFIELD SCOTT, 1827, ÆT. 41, MAJOR-GENERAL U. S. A.

WINFIELD SCOTT IN THE WAR OF 1812.*

IN the "new camp" of the United States Army near Natchez, established in the autumn of 1809, was a young Virginian, a graduate of William and Mary College, a law disciple of the eminent Benjamin Watkins Leigh, and then a captain of Light Artillery, only twenty-three years of age. He was very tall and muscular, frank and generous in disposition, bold in courage, and ardent in temperament. He could "speak and write and fight," and by these intellectual and physical qualities, combined with a lofty sense of honor, unflinching integrity, and simplicity of manner, he had become endeared to the best officers and men in the Army of the Southwest. He had been with Wilkinson in the fatal camp on the plain of Chalmette, below New Orleans; and was now under General Wade Hampton, of South Carolina, who had fought nobly with Marion, Sumter, Lee, Pickens, and others, in the old war for independence.

The young captain had attracted the special notice of both Wilkinson and Hampton, but neither of them could win his personal attachment, nor command even his genuine respect. He well knew that Wilkinson had, for ten years, as far as circumstances would allow, been a sometimes active and sometimes passive instrument in the hands of Sebastian and other secessionists of the Mississippi Valley; and had been intimate with Burr during the earlier months of his career while planning the dismemberment of the Union, as a part of his scheme for establishing an independent empire in the far Southwest. These schemes had failed, and efforts to convict the actors of treason had also failed; yet, while those men assumed an attitude of injured innocence, they suffered the blight of public distrust.

* The pictures illustrating this article are from Lossing's "Pictorial Field-Book of the War of 1812," now in course of preparation, and to be published by Harper and Brothers.

Having incurred the displeasure of Wilkinson, and been subjected to his petty annoyances, the young captain used great freedom of speech concerning the conduct and character of his former commander. "I never saw but two traitors," he said, at a public table, "and these were Wilkinson and Burr." For these, and other equally severe words, he was soon called to account before a court-martial on a charge of unofficer-like conduct, in speaking disrespectfully of superiors. He was found guilty, and sentenced to suspension from rank, pay, and emolument for one year. Many of the army officers and leading citizens soon gave to the youthful captain the compliment of a public dinner, in testimony of their appreciation of his character.

Such was the beginning of the long military life of WINFIELD SCOTT, the Commander-in-chief of the Armies of the United States. Because of his expressed abhorrence of those who then sought the dismemberment of the Union, he was reviled and persecuted. After a lapse of fully fifty years he is now subjected to like reproaches from those who are striving to effect a similar object, because he again stands in their way. And now, as before, he receives the plaudits of all true and loyal Americans.

Apparent misfortunes are often mercies in disguise. It was so in the case in question. The year of his official degradation was employed by Scott, under the roof of Mr. Leigh, in the earnest study of the military art; and he became thoroughly prepared, theoretically, for the performance of those great and important duties to which his life has been devoted. Very soon after the expiration of his sentence there were omens in the political firmament of an impending storm, when all his skill would be called into service. The repeated insults offered to the American flag by Great Britain, through her cruisers, at length produced the legitimate results. When self-respect would no longer allow forbearance, the United States defied British power, and declared war against the British Government and all the vast interests of the realm. The proclamation thereof was promulgated in June, 1812, and in July Scott received the commission of Lieutenant-Colonel in Izard's Regiment, Second Artillery; and, with the companies of Towson and Barker, hastened to the Niagara frontier. He took post at Black Rock, near Buffalo, charged with the duty of protecting the little Navy-yard there.

The war was just kindling upon the Northern frontier, at points remote from each other. Startling events were beginning to stir the hot blood of young soldiers. The United States Government had been tardy in informing the commanders of distant posts of the declaration of war, while British merchants in New York, at their own expense, had sent swift couriers with the intelligence to Montreal, Kingston, York, and Queenston. The consequence was that the American posts in the far Northwest were surprised. Michilimackinac, in the strait between Lakes Huron and Michigan, was taken by a British party at the middle of July, the little garrison stationed there being perfectly ignorant of the causes of the hostile movement. Two days afterward a British squadron of five vessels entered Sackett's Harbor, at the eastern end of Lake Ontario. The Americans there were on the alert. It was a warm, bright Sabbath morning. Signals summoned the people of the surrounding country. An old iron 32-pounder lying upon the shore, half-covered with mud, and called The Sow, was dragged to a rocky promontory at the foot of the Main Street, placed upon a mound, and greeted with derisive laughter by the enemy. That laughter soon ceased. For two hours she "blazed away" at the ships, and they at the town and people. On shore "nobody was hurt." On the ships several bodies were hurt. A shot from the old Sow sent splinters from the hull of the Royal George mast high. The squadron bent their sails, and fled to the open lake as fast as a gentle breeze and good seamanship would allow, followed by the cheers of the people on shore, and the lively air of Yankee Doodle from fife and drum.

SACKETT'S HARBOR IN 1813.

THE PORT OF BUFFALO IN 1812.

News soon came of skirmishings on the western shores of Lake Erie, and of a terrible massacre by Indians at Chicago. Almost simultaneously couriers brought the astounding intelligence of the surrender of Detroit by General Hull, with the Army of the Northwest and the whole peninsula of Michigan, without resistance! Alarm, sorrow, and hot indignation stirred the people of the whole land. The excitement was intense; and thousands of brave and patriotic men in and out of camp resolved to retrieve the loss and wipe out the disgrace at all hazards.

No man shared more largely in these feelings than Lieutenant-Colonel Scott. He was as restive as a hound in the leash in the narrow field of action to which he was assigned. His duties were very important and honorable, but he longed to be at the head of troops, flushed with the excitement of the march or battle. His wishes were not long ungratified. At first the indulgence was small but grateful.

Only a narrow, but deep and rapid river—the outlet of vast inland seas—flowed between Scott and the enemy. Upon a gentle eminence two or three miles up the river, on the opposite shore, was Fort Erie—a considerable fortification of earth and stone, fairly armed and manned. The British had batteries, also, opposite Buffalo and Black Rock.

Under the guns of Fort Erie lay two armed British brigs—the Adams, captured at Detroit, and the Caledonia, belonging to the Northwestern

Fur Company, laden with a valuable cargo of skins from the forests. It was early in October, 1812. These vessels had anchored there on the morning of the 8th. Lieutenant Jesse D. Elliot, of the United States Navy, had just received at Buffalo a detachment of unarmed seamen. He wanted the two vessels to strengthen his own little navy on the lake, and he planned measures for their capture. He applied to Scott for aid. It was readily granted, by permission of his senior officer. Captain Towson, with fifty of his men, was detailed for the purpose, with arms and ammunition for the seamen. The combined force was about one hundred men. These were accompanied by some citizens of Buffalo and Black Rock. At a little past midnight, on the morning of the 9th, they left Buffalo Creek in boats to execute the plan. Success followed. The Adams was taken by Elliot in person, assisted by Lieutenant Roach of Scott's command, and the Caledonia by Towson. The crews were made prisoners in less than ten minutes, and the vessels were put under way. The wind was so light and the current so strong that the brigs could not be taken up the river. They ran down the stream under a warm enfilading fire from the fort and batteries. The Caledonia ran ashore under the guns of an American battery at Black Rock. After some manœuvring, the Adams grounded upon Squaw Island, near Black Rock, and was put under the protection of Scott. The British determined to recapture her, and boarded her for that purpose. Scott was as determined to defend her, and he soon drove the assailing party to their boats with great loss. The heavy guns on both sides of the river were brought to bear upon her all the morning, and she was so terribly battered that she was soon afterward consumed by the Americans. The Caledonia afterward performed good service in Perry's fleet on Lake Erie.

QUEENSTON IN 1812.

A wider field of action for Scott now opened. The British had erected batteries at Queenston village and upon the heights near, seven miles below Niagara Falls, and occupied strong positions at Fort George and vicinity, near the mouth of the Niagara River.

Early in October a considerable body of New York militia, under General Stephen Van Rensselaer, and a corps of regulars under Lieutenant-Colonels Fenwick and Chrystie, accompanied by Major Mullaney, were at Lewiston, opposite Queenston. Notwithstanding the militia were raw, undisciplined, and most of them unwilling to cross the boundaries of their State, it was resolved to attack the British at Queenston—that point being one of importance, as the northern terminus of the great portage between Lakes Erie and Ontario, around Niagara Falls.

The advance detachment of the invading force was intended to be six hundred strong, composed of an equal number of regulars and militia, the former commanded by Lieutenant-Colonel Chrystie, and the latter by Lieutenant-Colonel Solomon Van Rensselaer, who was also the commander-in-chief of the expedition. Lieutenant-Colonel Fenwick and Major Mullaney were to follow with regulars and flying artillery, and then the militia in order, as fast as the boats could carry them. A battery was placed upon Lewiston Heights, to cover the landing-place of the troops on the Canada shore. These arrangements were completed on the evening of the 12th of October; and in a cold rain storm, at three o'clock the next morning, the leading detachment of troops were mustered upon the river bank at Lewiston, preparatory to embarkation.

Meanwhile Lieutenant-Colonel Scott had heard of the intended movement. Anxious to be engaged in the expedition, he made a forced march, partly by water, and partly through rain and mud on land, to Schlosser, where the remains of the old fort still present a picturesque object. It was now late in the evening of the 12th. Leaving his companions to rest, he pressed forward to Lewiston, eight miles below, and offered his services to General Van Rensselaer as a volunteer. They were declined, because the arrangements were all made; but Scott was permitted to march his troops immediately to Lewiston, to act according to the requirement of circumstances. He immediately rode back, brought forward his command, and arrived at Lewiston at four o'clock on the morning of the 13th. He placed his train in battery on the shore near the present Suspension Bridge, under the immediate command of Captains Towson and Barker, and was ready at dawn to open a fire upon the opposite shore.

REMAINS OF FORT SCHLOSSER, 1860.

Scarcity of boats was a great impediment, and the troops were compelled to cross the swift-flowing current in detachments. This produced confusion and delay; yet nearly the whole of the first attacking party were landed safely at the designated spot, now marked by a large rock directly under the Canada shore end of the Suspension Bridge.

General Brock, who was in command of the British forces, with his head-quarters at Fort George, did not expect an invasion at a point so high up the river, and the only force at Queenston was composed of two flank companies of the 49th regiment and the York militia. These were early apprised of the invading movement, and under the command of Captain Dennis, a portion of them were ready to oppose the first division of the Americans when they landed. The latter consisted of three companies of the thirteenth regiment of regulars, commanded respectively by Captains Wool, Malcolm, and Armstrong; forty picked artillerymen from old Fort Niagara under Lieutenants Gansevoort and Rathbone, and about sixty militia. They landed in the face of a severe fire from the foe. Chrystie not having arrived, on account of a wound received in a drifting boat, the command of the regulars devolved upon Captain John E. Wool, now the most distinguished Major-General in the army of the United States, and next in rank, as in the value of his public services, to General Scott.

LANDING-PLACE OF AMERICANS AT QUEENSTON, 1860.

Captain Wool formed the troops immediately, and pressed forward, unmindful of the missiles of the enemy. He soon reached the plateau on which the village of Queenston stands, and there a severe engagement took place. The British fell back. Wool's command suffered terribly in the short conflict. He was shot through both thighs, but kept his feet gallantly. Every commissioned officer was killed or wounded. Lieutenant-Colonel Van Rensselaer received four wounds, and was disabled, yet he was strong enough to note the position of affairs, and order the troops to fall back to the margin of the river, out of the range of the British guns. Faint from loss of blood, he gave up the command to Captain Wool, and was conveyed to Lewiston.

VIEW FROM THE SITE OF VROOMAN'S BATTERY, 1860.

Wool recommended the immediate storming of the batteries on Queenston Heights as the chief object of the expedition, and received orders to do so. A fresh company of regulars, under Captain Ogilvie, had just arrived. They were placed on the right of the attacking column. Led by Wool, they all ascended the Heights by a fisherman's path, and were soon in possession of one eighteen-pounder and two mortars in battery half-way up the acclivity. A few minutes later, time to escape to the village below when the shout of victory was heard upon the Heights. He immediately placed himself at the head of the royal troops, and led them toward the Heights, intending to drive back the Americans and secure a strong position upon the crown of the mountain, where the monument to his memory now stands. For a few moments he was successful. The Americans fell back toward the river, and were about to break in confusion when the voice of Wool reassured them, and nerved them for another effort. They pressed forward, and the British line, in turn, gave way. Seeing this, Brock brought forward reinforcements to their support, and had just uttered the words, and they were in possession of another and more important battery on the northeastern slope of the mountain, as the higher portion of the Heights were called, having driven the British to the shelter of a stone building near the river.

BROCK'S MONUMENT ON QUEENSTON HEIGHTS, 1860.

While these stirring scenes were in progress on the Canada shore, Scott's battery at Lewiston, with the one on Lewiston Heights, were in full co-operating play. At the same time a British battery upon Vrooman's Point, a mile below Queenston, had been performing active service all the morning in throwing heavy balls upon the American boats when crossing the river.

The sound of battle aroused the brave General Brock at Fort George, seven miles below. He was soon in the saddle, and with his aids, M'Donell and Glegg, he hastened to Queenston. He was with them at the upper battery when Wool fell suddenly upon it, and they had barely "Push on the York Volunteers!" when he fell, mortally wounded by a musket-ball. Thus perished a brave, good, and generous man. His countrymen and colonial friends have testified their love and veneration by erecting a splendid monument to his memory on Queenston Heights, and a more modest one on the spot where he fell, in the suburbs of the village. He was buried in a bastion of Fort George, near the old French magazine, now used for a dwelling. His aid, M'Donell, also fell on that occasion, and the British troops were driven beyond Queenston.

At this moment Lieutenant-Colonel Scott appeared upon Queenston Heights. He was dressed in full uniform, and commanded the attention and admiration of all the soldiers. He was six feet five inches in height, with the finest manly proportions of figure and dignity of bearing. As superior to all others upon the field in rank, he assumed the command of the regulars ; and on the request of General Wadsworth of the New York militia, he became the commander of those troops likewise.

Reinforcements having arrived at about this time, Scott found himself in command of three hundred and fifty regulars, and two hundred and fifty volunteers under Wadsworth and Colonel Stranahan. The accomplished Captain Totten, Van Rensselaer's chief engineer (now Brigadier-General and chief of the Engineer Department), was with him, and a plan for permanent occupation was at once conceived. But they were allowed a very short time for deliberation. Brock had sent an order to General Sheaffe at Fort George to forward reinforcements ; and five hundred Indians, under Captain Jacobs and a son of Brant, the Mohawk warrior against the patriots of the Revolution, had rushed toward Queenston, as soon as the roar of cannon was heard. They joined the British light troops at Queenston, and fell upon the Americans. They were routed but not subdued, and they kept the little band of Americans constantly employed, while Sheaffe was approaching with a detachment more than eight hundred strong.

Chrystie had arrived and assumed the command of a portion of the troops ; Wool had been conveyed to a place of repose to have his wounds dressed ; and Scott, as chief, with magnetic power infused his own enthusiasm into his soldiers.

General Sheaffe arrived with his reinforcements late in the afternoon. Very few of the militia had come over from Lewiston during the day. A pressing demand was now made for them. It was a critical moment. Scott had not more than three hundred effective men, while Sheaffe had at least thirteen hundred. Scott looked anxiously toward Lewiston, but not a single boat was seen in motion. Indeed there were few there. A panic had seized the militia.

MONUMENT WHERE BROCK FELL, 1860.

The commands and pleadings of General Van Rensselaer were equally vain. Not a company would cross the river ! This fact was communicated to Scott when the strong foe was manoeuvring cautiously with the intention of striking fatally. Retreat and succor were equally impossible at that moment ; so the gallant commander resolved to fight as long as battle should be possible. He mounted a log in front of his wearied band, and said : "The enemy's balls begin to thin our ranks. His numbers are overwhelming. In a moment the shock must come, and there is no retreat. We are in the beginning of a national war. What Hull surrendered is to be redeemed, and the disgrace wiped out.

Let us then die, arms in hand. Our country demands the sacrifice. The example will not be lost. The blood of the slain will make heroes of the living. Those who follow will avenge our fall and their country's wrongs. Whodare to stand?" "ALL!" was the cry from every lip.

The shock soon came. For a while the Americans stood firm. They finally gave way as the enemy began to surround them, and they fell back to the brow of the high bank overlooking their landing-place.

FRENCH MAGAZINE, FORT GEORGE, IN 1860.

Some let themselves down by holding on to the bushes, and escaped. It was speedily agreed to surrender, and messengers with offers of submission were sent, but never returned. The Indians were between the American and the British lines, and murdered or captured those who were sent on the humiliating errand.

Scott determined to carry a flag of truce himself. He fastened his white handkerchief upon his sword, and, accompanied by Captains Totten and Gibson, went out to seek a parley with Sheaffe. They kept close along the edge of the river, under shelter of the bank, until they reached a road leading up to the village. There they were confronted by two powerful Indians, who attempted to seize Scott. In an instant the blades of his attendants came from their scabbards, and the menace was met, first by rifle shots from the Indians, and then by their knives and hatchets. At that critical moment a British officer and some soldiers appeared, and Scott and his companions were conducted in safety to General Sheaffe. Terms of capitulation were soon agreed upon, and Scott and his little band of less than three hundred were surrendered with the honors of war.

During the series of engagements on that memorable day Scott was a conspicuous object to the enemy on account of his stature and his full uniform. The Indians, who lost many of their number, were greatly exasperated, and singled him out as a precious mark for their bullets. But he remained unhurt. His companions urged him to change his dress. He smiled, and said, "No, gentlemen, I will die in my robes."

Scott and his fellow-prisoners were taken to Newark (now Niagara), a village near Fort George, at the mouth of the Niagara River. He and other officers were placed under guard in a tavern. They had not been there long when Scott was informed that some one wished to speak to "the tall American." He went into the passage, and found his visitors to be the two Indians who had met him with his flag. One of them was Captain Jacobs, the other Captain Brant, a powerful young man. They could speak but few English words. With these and signs, they professed to be anxious to know how many bullet marks he had received, as they had leveled their pieces at him several times. Jacobs seized him rudely by the arm, and turned him half round. The indignant soldier threw the savage from him, exclaiming, "Off, villain! You fired like a squaw!" "We kill you now!" answered the angry savages, at the same moment seizing their knives and tomahawks. The swords of American officers were standing at the rear of the passage. Scott sprang quickly backward to them, snatched a heavy sabre and was about to cleave the head of Jacobs, when a British officer entered, called for the guard, and at the same moment seized the arm of the chief. The two warriors were quickly humbled, and they marched off muttering curses upon all white men, whether friends or foes.

The prisoners were taken to Quebec, and were soon afterward sent in a cartel to Boston. When they were about to sail from Quebec, a party of British officers came on board the cartel, mustered the prisoners, and commenced separating from the rest those who, by their accent, were found to be Irishmen. These they intended to place on board a frigate lying near, and send them to England for trial and execution as traitors, the doctrine of the British Government being that a subject of the realm can never expatriate himself. His allegiance is perpetual, and therefore, when found in arms against that government, he is a traitor.

Scott was below. Hearing a noise upon deck, he hastened up, and was soon informed of the position of the prisoners. He at once entered a vehement protest against such proceedings, and commanded the soldiers to be absolutely silent, that their accent might not betray them. He was repeatedly ordered to go below, and as repeatedly refused. His command of silence was obeyed, and not another prisoner was separated from him. When the unfortunate ones were about to be conveyed to the frigate in irons, he gave them the solemn assurance that his Government would fully avenge the death of any or all of them (should they be executed), either by stern retaliation upon prisoners in its hands, or by refusing to give quarter in battle. He boldly defied the menacing officers, and comforted the manacled prisoners tenderly.

FORT NIAGARA IN 1813.

We will anticipate the order of the narrative a little, by giving the conclusion of this matter. Scott was exchanged in January, 1813, and on the 13th of that month he laid before the Secretary of War a full report of the proceedings at Quebec. At his instance the report was laid before Congress the same day, and on the 3d of March following an act was passed, "vesting the President of the United States with the power of retaliation." Although hostages were held, the President never had occasion to exercise his delegated power, for the British Government never presumed to act upon its doctrine of perpetual allegiance in the case of American prisoners.

Almost three years after the event at Quebec, Scott was greeted by loud huzzas while passing along the East River side of New York City. These came from a group of Irishmen who had just landed upon a pier. They were twenty-one of the twenty-three prisoners for whom he had cared so tenderly. They had just returned after a long confinement in English prisons. They recognized their benefactor, and "nearly crushed him," says Mansfield, "by their warm-hearted embraces."

At the beginning of May, 1813, Scott joined the army at Fort Niagara, at the mouth of the Niagara River, nearly opposite Fort George. General Dearborn was in chief command, and Scott was his Adjutant-General, holding the reserved right of commanding his own regiment on extraordinary occasions. Being at the head of the staff, upon him devolved the duty of arranging the details of the several departments. This he performed with singular ability and dispatch.

The campaign had just opened. Toronto (then York), the capital of Upper Canada, had just been taken by the Americans, but with the great loss of General Pike. General Dearborn resolved to follow up this victory by an attempt to capture Fort George. He was in command of almost five thousand men, and had the co-operation of a fleet under Commodore Chauncey.

On the morning of the 27th of May the expedition embarked three miles east of Fort Niagara, and proceeded in six divisions of boats. Colonel Scott was in the first, and led the advanced guard, for which service he had specially volunteered. He landed at nine o'clock, half a mile from Newark (now Niagara), and about the same distance from the present Fort Mississauga, at the mouth of the river. The bank was several feet in height, and covered with an opposing force at least eight hundred strong. Scott formed his troops on the beach, under cover of the guns of the fleet, and at their head pushed forward to scale the bank. Three times they were repulsed. Dearborn, with a glass on Chauncey's flag-ship, saw Scott fall backward from the bank, and exclaimed, "My God, he is killed!" But he immediately recovered his feet, and then, supported by Colonel Moses Porter's artillery and a part of General Boyd's brigade, he rushed forward, knocked up the bayonets of the British, gained the summit of the bank, and after a desperate struggle of twenty minutes, completely routed the foe. He followed them in hot pursuit, and was joined at Newark by the sixth regiment under Colonel Miller.

While pursuing the fugitives through and beyond Newark, Scott was informed that the garrison of disabled Fort George was about to blow it up. He wheeled immediately, and, with two companies, he hastened in that direction to save the property. A small magazine exploded as he drew near, and he was knocked from his horse and severely hurt by a flying piece of timber. He soon recovered, forced the gate, and, with his own hands, pulled down the British flag and hoisted the stripes and stars, at the same time ordering the seizure of the lighted matches intended for firing the train leading to the magazine. Colonel Porter had pushed forward to perform the same service, when, finding Scott already there, he said: "Confound your long legs, Scott! you have got in before me."

FORT MISSISSAUGA IN 1860.

OLD FORT AT TORONTO IN 1860.

When the fort was secured—a work of only a few minutes—Scott dashed on after the still flying British, and halted only, after a pursuit of five miles, when he was recalled by General Boyd in person. He had already disregarded orders to return, sent by General Lewis of the New York militia, saying: "Your General does not know that I have the enemy within my power: let me alone, and I will capture his whole force in seventy minutes." No doubt he would have done so. The main body of the fugitives were in full sight, and his own troops were in good spirits.

About six weeks after the capture of Fort George Colonel Scott was promoted to the command of a double regiment, composed of twenty companies, when he resigned the office of Adjutant-General. Meanwhile he had been performing monotonous camp duty, varied only by foraging and the attendant skirmishing. At length an expedition against Burlington Heights, at the west end of Lake Ontario, was planned. It was supposed that the British had a large quantity of provisions and stores there. Scott volunteered to command the land troops. They were conveyed in Chauncey's fleet. But no provisions nor stores were found at Burlington Heights; so the expedition crossed the lake and made a descent upon Toronto, which the Americans had abandoned as soon as captured in the spring.

Scott led the invading troops and marines on shore. The barracks and public stores were burned; a large amount of provisions were taken; and a quantity of ammunition, several pieces of cannon, and eleven armed boats were among the spoils. The building of the fort, now a partial ruin, had just been commenced by the British.

In the autumn General Wilkinson, Scott's old commander and personal enemy, led an expedition down the St. Lawrence for the purpose of capturing Kingston and Montreal. Scott was anxious to accompany the expedition; but he was left to perform important duty. He was made commander of the post at Fort George, the key of the peninsula, with eight hundred regulars and a part of Colonel Swift's militia, with instructions to strengthen it. In this he was aided by Captain Totten. For some time he was in daily expectation of an attack; but at length, toward the middle of October, the British in that vicinity followed Wilkinson, though upon the opposite side of the lake, to secure Kingston.

FORT WELLINGTON IN 1860.

CHRYSLER'S IN 1855.

This movement gave much joy to Scott; for, according to discretion given him in his instructions, he was thereby allowed to place the fort under the command of M'Clure, at Niagara, and join Wilkinson's expedition. He accordingly pressed forward with his troops, through almost incessant rains, over almost impassable roads, until he met Armstrong, the Secretary of War, on his way from Utica to Sackett's Harbor. By his permission Scott left his men with his second in command, and hastened forward to join the army on the St. Lawrence. This he accomplished, a little above Ogdensburg, on the 6th of November, after a most fatiguing journey through rain and mud. He embarked on the flotilla, and had the honor of receiving, in the leading and largest boat, the first fire from the British at Fort Wellington, opposite Ogdensburg.

On the day after joining the expedition Colonel Scott was appointed to the command of the battalion of Colonel Macomb, one of the finest in the army, and now made the advanced guard of the expedition. On the 10th of November he had a short but severe encounter with the British near Fort Matilda, on the north side of the St. Lawrence. He captured the fort, took an officer and some men prisoners, and on the following day, while Brown and others were fighting at Chrysler's, he was fifteen miles below, at a narrow pass near Cornwall, engaged, with seven hundred men, in a conflict with Colonel Dennis and an equal number of British troops. He effected the passage while enduring a severe fire, landed and routed the British, pursued them a long while, and captured many prisoners.

There being very few British troops between Cornwall and Montreal, and but a small garrison at the latter place, Scott felt sure of an easy conquest of that city within forty-eight hours. While flushed with success and impatient to advance he was astonished and mortified by an order from Wilkinson to halt. Hampton had refused to join Wilkinson; and because of the jealousy and mutual ill-feeling of those old officers, whose inefficiency was lamented by all, the expedition was abandoned, and the army went into winter-quarters at French Mills, now Fort Covington, at the head of navigation on the Salmon River. Had Brown or Scott been in chief command at that time, the Canadas would have been in possession of the Americans by the Christmas holidays. The passions and blunders of the chief commanders on the northern frontier compelled many brave and high-spirited young men to experience a hard school of adversity, out of which, however, they came as accomplished officers with the plaudits of their countrymen; and "many an empty fop, young and old," said the first biographer of Scott, in the Analectic Magazine, "who had been seduced into the service by the glitter of epaulets, and lace, and military buttons, had been severely taught his own incompetency."

Colonel Scott spent a part of the winter of 1813-'14 at Albany, and, in consultation with Governor Tompkins, was busily engaged in preparing materials for the next campaign. He was promoted to Brigadier-General in March; and early in April he joined Major-General Brown while on his march from French Mills to the Niagara frontier.

Almost immediately after their arrival at Buffalo, General Brown was called to Sackett's Harbor. He left the forces under the command of General Scott, with instructions to assemble an army at Buffalo as rapidly as possible, and to establish there a camp of instruction. For more than three months Scott was engaged there, preparing the army for the summer campaign. He introduced the modern French tactics. He thoroughly drilled the officers, and they in turn as thoroughly drilled the men, while whole battalions were frequently drilled by Scott himself. These instructions were of incalculable benefit in the service that soon followed. The army was perfectly organized, and made capable of performing every evolution with the precision of veterans. Not a single movement was omitted, nor was less attention paid to etiquette. A single instance will illustrate this point. Scott observed a captain pass a sentinel without acknowledging the salute of the latter. He rebuked the impoliteness by informing the captain that if he did not repossess the sentinel, and "reform the fault" within twenty minutes, he would be tried before a court-martial.

RUINS OF FORT ERIE IN 1860.

General Brown returned to Buffalo at the close of June with reinforcements, and on the third of July the campaign was opened. On the morning of that day Scott led the van of a considerable force that crossed the Niagara River to attack Fort Erie. The garrison soon surrendered, and the fort was taken possession of by a battalion under Major Jesup, of Scott's brigade.

On the following morning, the Anniversary of American Independence, Scott moved down the Canada side of the Niagara toward Chipewa, where lay a strong British force under General Riall. He was followed by the remainder of the army, several hours in the rear. For sixteen hours he was compelled to have a running fight with the enemy under Lieutenant-

STREET'S CREEK BRIDGE IN 1860.

MOUTH OF LYON'S CREEK IN 1860.

Colonel Pearson. At twilight Pearson was driven across the Chippewa Creek, and Scott took position a short distance above Street's Creek bridge, near the banks of the Niagara opposite Navy Island, and two miles from Riall's camp. Between the belligerents lay a narrow, open plain, flanked by the river on one side and woods on the other. The latter swarmed with scouts and British Indians.

Both armies were in motion early on the morning of the 5th. Almost the whole of that long, hot summer day was spent by the belligerents in reconnoitring and skirmishing. Finally Brigadier-General Peter B. Porter, with militia, volunteers, and friendly Indians, cleared the woods on Chippewa plains and drove the fugitives back to the British lines. There he found the whole British column in order of march. Thus supported, the fugitives turned upon Porter. Some of his command were awed by the formidable array of British regulars, and fled toward Street's Creek in confusion.

It was now between four and five o'clock in the afternoon. Scott was advancing toward Street's Creek bridge, for the purpose of crossing and drilling his men on the open plain beyond. He was met by General Brown riding in haste from the direction of Chippewa, who said, in passing, "The enemy is advancing; you'll have a fight." He gave no instructions, but left the whole matter in the hands of Scott, while he pushed on to bring up the reserve.

A cloud of dust in the direction of Chippewa announced the approach of the foe; and when Scott and his brigade reached Street's Creek bridge Riall had displayed his forces in battle order on the plain, supported by a battery of nine cannon, arranged within point-blank shot of the Americans. Scott did not hesitate a moment. He moved forward and crossed the bridge in the face of a heavy fire. The battalions under Majors Leavenworth and M'Niel were immediately formed in front of the enemy, while another battalion, under Major Jesup, obliqued in column to the left, to keep the right flank of the British in check. Towson's battery took a position on the right of the Americans, which rested on the Niagara River.

The action soon became general. Jesup, in the woods, held the British right wing in check, and Scott pressed forward, alternately advancing, halting and firing, until he was within eighty paces of the enemy. He then threw M'Niel's battalion obliquely upon the British right, calling out, loudly, "The enemy say that we are good at long shot, but can not stand the cold iron! I call upon the Eleventh instantly to give the lie to that slander! Charge!" The order was promptly obeyed, and Leavenworth's corps made a similar attack at the same time upon the British left. These were sustained by Towson's artillery. The movement was so quick, powerful, and effective that the British army broke and fled in confusion. Jesup also routed the left wing, and the whole line of the enemy was driven from the field of action to the intrenchments beyond the Chippewa, hotly pursued by Scott.

Such was the activity of Scott in this battle that it was all over before the arrival of the reserve. Scott's force actually in conflict did not exceed fourteen hundred men, while that of Riall was about twenty-four hundred. Both parties suffered severely; and the plain of Chippewa, after the battle, was strewn with the dead and dying. One of the American flags, borne in the conflict, and yet preserved, attests the abundance of bullets in the air during that hot conflict. At twilight the survivors of both armies sunk to rest within the respective lines.

The battle of Chippewa gave immense moral strength to the American army, and the soldiers seemed eager to follow wherever Scott might lead. Accordingly, two days after that conflict he moved forward, crossed the Chippewa at the mouth of Lyon's Creek, and menaced the British right wing so seriously that Riall broke up his camp and fell back, first to Queenston, and finally in the direction of Burlington Heights, near the present city of Hamilton.

At the close of 1813, the whole Niagara frontier, from Buffalo to the mouth of the river, had passed into the hands of the British. General Brown now determined to dispossess them. For this purpose he pressed forward to Queenston, intending to retake Fort George, and capture Fort Mississauga, lately erected at the mouth of the river. The illness of Chauncey made him hesitate, for he needed his co-operation ; and he concluded to attack Riall, then at Burlington Heights. He finally determined to draw the enemy from that strong point by retreating up the Niagara and taking position at Chippewa.

Toward the evening of the twenty-fifth of July, Brown was startled by the false intelligence that a thousand British troops had crossed the river, from Queenston to Lewiston, with the probable intention of capturing his stores at Schlosser. To recall them, he immediately ordered an attack on Forts George and Mississauga ; and within twenty minutes after his command was issued Scott and thirteen hundred of his men were in motion. Just above Niagara Falls they discovered a few mounted British officers. Supposing a considerable detachment to be near, Scott sent word to General Brown, and then dashed through a piece of woods to reconnoitre. To his great astonishment he there found a larger force than he had encountered at Chippewa, drawn up in battle array in a road called Lundy's Lane. General Riall was there with a large reinforcement under Lieutenant-General Sir Gordon Drumond, lately arrived at Niagara. He was in a most perilous position. To stand or retreat was equally dangerous, for a heavy fire of cannon and musketry was opened upon him. He therefore resolved to fight, and keep the enemy in check until Brown should bring up the main body of the Americans. This bold resolution deceived Riall, and he did not venture to attack Scott's flank. The latter thus gained an initial advantage, and the British were kept on the defensive.

It was just before sunset when the battle began ; and Scott's advancing troops were enveloped in a rainbow created by the sunlight upon the mist that rises eternally from the great cataract. It must have presented a strange sight to the vision of the foe. It soon passed away, the sun went down, the twilight faded, and night fell upon the scene. The fight was desperate. Scott's forces consisted of four battalions under Colonel Brady, and Majors Jesup, Leavenworth, and M'Neil, with Towson's artillery and Captain Harris's detachment of regular and volunteer cavalry. The enemy were at least eighteen hundred strong, and advantageously posted, chiefly upon a gentle eminence. But at nine o'clock in the evening the advantage was with the Americans. The skill and celerity of Scott's movements astonished the British. Major Jesup had gallantly turned the British left, and by a sudden movement made General Riall (who was wounded) and several other officers prisoners. He then charged back, cut off a portion of the enemy's left wing, and took his position in line.

The centre, alone, of the British line now remained firm, posted upon a ridge (the eastern slope of which is now covered by a burial-ground) supported by a battery of nine cannon. General Brown had arrived with the brigade of General Ripley and Porter's volunteers, and proposed to withdraw the wearied troops of Scott and hold them in reserve. But the brave brigadier would listen to nothing of the kind. He had borne the brunt of the battle, and was determined to fight to a decision. The carnage was great and still continued. The British battery on the hill was doing dreadful execution, and it became evident to all that its capture or silence was essential to the success of the Americans. Colonel James Miller, whose bravery was well known, was appointed to the task. "Can you take that battery?" he was asked. "I'll try!" was his curt reply. Scott was well acquainted with the ground, and he led Miller to a fence that bounded one side of the lane, half covered with bushes. Up the slope in the dark, concealed by these bushes, Miller crept cautiously, and when within musket-shot of the battery he chose nine sharpshooters, each of whom picked his man at the guns, and shot them. Miller's party then rushed forward, seized the battery, and turned the tide of war. The enemy rallied with reinforcements and attempted to recapture the battery. Again there was a desperate conflict. The scene was lighted only by the flash of powder from cannon and muskets. Every where on that bloody field, where personal courage or military skill was needed, the majestic form of Scott was seen, moving in the gloom, and made visible only by the fitful flashes of the guns. At ten o'clock he had been badly wounded in the side. At eleven he was on foot, two horses having been killed under him. Suddenly he was prostrated by a ball that passed through his left shoulder, and he was carried from the field. Brown had been wounded and carried off a few minutes earlier. Both fell when the heat of battle was over. It ended at midnight; and over the dead of both nations that strewed the field the awful voice of the great cataract chanted a thundering requiem.

VIEW AT LUNDY'S LANE IN 1860.

On the fall of Brown and Scott General Ripley took chief command. The Americans fell back—first to Chippewa, and then to the ferry opposite Black Rock. Owing to a want of horses, harness, and drag-ropes the captured artillery could not be removed, and it remained the property of the British.

General Scott was taken to Buffalo, and thence to Williamsville, eleven miles distant, where he was placed in the charge of good nurses, under the same roof with the wounded General Riall. He suffered intensely; and for a month his recovery was considered doubtful. He was finally conveyed in a litter, first to Batavia, and then to Geneva; and at last, after a lapse of several weeks, he reached Philadelphia, and placed himself under the care of the eminent Drs. Physic and Chapman. Every where upon his journey he received the homage of the people. He halted at Princeton, in New Jersey, at the time of the Annual Commencement at Nassau Hall. The fact was soon communicated to the Faculty, and they sent a deputation to invite him to participate in the ceremonies. He was carried to the Hall, and was placed upon the stage prepared for the exercises. He was received by the audience with the greatest enthusiasm. The men cheered and the ladies waved their handkerchiefs. It was a most grateful ovation for the young and gallant soldier. The orator of the day made a happy allusion to him and his services; and he was complimented on the spot by the presentation of the honorary degree of Master of Arts.

The Governor of Pennsylvania marched out of Philadelphia, at the head of the militia, to receive him; and as that city and Baltimore were then (September, 1814) threatened by the British, he was solicited by the delegates in Congress from Pennsylvania and Maryland to take the nominal command of the troops assembled for the defense of their respective capitals. Accompanied by his aid-de-camp, the late General Worth, he passed on to Baltimore, where, under the hands of that skillful surgeon, Dr. Gibson, his wounded shoulder healed. At the middle of October he assumed the command of the Tenth Military District, with his head-quarters at Washington City; and there and at Baltimore he passed the early part of the winter of 1814–'15. In anticipation of another year of conflict, he had commenced, by direction of the Government, the preparation of plans of the campaign of 1815, when intelligence of the negotiation of a treaty of peace came, and gave joy to the whole country. Grateful for his services in the field, and impressed with the abundance of his executive abilities, the President of the United States invited General Scott into his Cabinet as Secretary of War. He modestly declined, on account of his youth; and he also declined acting as Secretary until the arrival of William H. Crawford from Paris, who had been appointed to that place. This he did out of deference to Generals Brown and Jackson, his superior officers; because at that time the Secretary of War was the acting Commander-in-chief of the Army.

General Scott was employed in 1815 in the delicate service of reducing the army from a war to a peace footing. This accomplished, and still feeble from the effects of his wounds, he was sent to Europe on a confidential diplomatic mission, the chief object being to ascertain the temper and views of the several courts in relation to the struggles for independence then going on among the Spanish-American colonies. He was so successful that he received from his Government a special letter of thanks. In Europe he was treated with marked attention. His military fame had gone before him. Among others, he received an autograph letter from the venerable Polish patriot Kosciuszko, addressed to a mutual friend. "Be pleased," he said, in conclusion, "to convey my compliments to General Scott, and especially for his victories in Canada. I hope the Americans will follow his example—his courage, his energy, and his virtues."

On his return to the United States General Scott was assigned the command of the sea-board, with his head-quarters at New York; and in March, 1817, he married Miss Maria Mayo, of Richmond, Virginia. He then held the commission of Major-General in the Army of the United States.

The promotions of General Scott were rapid beyond precedent. In 1809 he was Captain. When, in 1812, he was nominated to the President for a Lieutenant-Colonelcy, Madison objected on the ground of his youth. But the Executive yielded. When Scott's name was presented for Colonel, after the campaign of 1812, Madison made the same objections, but yielded. When, at the close of the campaign of 1813, his name was presented for the commission of Brigadier-General, again the President made the same objections, but again yielded. When the battles of Chippewa and Niagara had been fought, the friends of Scott again presented his name to the President for promotion. Madison replied, with a smile, "Put him down a Major-General; I have done with objections to his youth." By this appointment he stood at the head of his profession, in rank, when a little more than twenty-eight years of age. The Congress of the United States had also conferred its highest honors upon him, by voting him thanks and a gold medal commemorative of his distinguished services. This gold medal was presented to General Scott at the beginning of 1825. Many years ago he deposited it, for safe keeping, in the vault of the City Bank, New York. That bank was robbed of bullion and other funds to the amount of $250,000. Among the bullion was this medal, but it was left. All else in the trunk had been taken. Some time afterward General Scott was robbed of his purse on board a Hudson River steamboat. The thief was caught, and in the course of the investigation the robber of the City Bank, who was also in custody, reproached his comrade in crime for robbing the General. "When I took the money," he said, "from the City Bank, I saw and well knew the value of that medal, as I examined it with my lantern; but I scorned to take from the soldier what had been given him by the gratitude of his country!" That man was not wholly a criminal.

Such, in brief outline, is the record of the early military services of the distinguished Commander-in-chief of the Armies of the United States, who, in 1861, was intrusted with the conduct of the military operations in defense of the Government, the Constitution, and the Laws, against a conspiracy of demagogues to overthrow them.

WINFIELD SCOTT, 1861, Æt. 75, COMMANDER-IN-CHIEF U. S. A.

The Three Tells.

(FROM THE GERMAN OF WETZEL.)

"Oh! once again to Freedom's cause return,
The Patriot TELL—the BRUCE of Bannockburn!"

THE three great Tells are sleeping
In noble Switzerland;
Their motionless watch they're keeping
In Rütli, on the strand.
By the lake where the roaring waters
Of the Forest-Cantons flow,
They ceased from wars and slaughters
Five hundred years ago!

Who wakes them from their slumber—
Old saviours of the land?
The skies are dark and sombre.
Storms rage on every hand;
Scarcely can the Alps withstanding,
Free as of old remain,
While Discord foul is rending
The holy bond in twain.

Thus runs the legend olden:
In time of sorest need,
When patriot hands are holden,
And Fatherland must bleed—

Then, then, will rise the stillers
 Of tumults, in their might—
 The three great Tells, the pillars
 Of the old League for the right.

A pious herd-boy, keeping
 His Alpine watch alone,
 Strayed once where they were sleeping,
 In sepulchre of stone:
 Then to his startled vision
 Did true old Tell appear,
 With shining eyes uprisen,
 And visage bold and clear.

Gently the boy he greeted:
 "And what's the time, I pray,
 On earth?" The lad repeated,
 "Sir, it is yet high day."
 "No later?" quoth he, "marry!
 My time I still must bide."
 And laid him down to tarry
 By his two comrades' side.

Down the steep path retreating,
 The herd-boy homeward sped,
 The wondrous tale repeating,
 Of what the great Tell said.—
 A trusty band have taken
 The mountain way with speed,
 The three old Tells to waken
 In Fatherland's sore need.

Intent and eager ever,
 They sought it night and day;
 But found the cavern never,
 Where the great leaders lay.
 And still through weary ages,
 Upon the rocky shore,
 Sleep the three hero-sages,
 Forever—evermore!

Oh! could I but discover
 Such Tells for Germany,
 My search should ne'er be over,
 But eager, steadfast be,
 Until my zeal succeeded,
 Though I should find their grave
 At the world's end, unheeded,
 Washed by the utmost wave!

Then, like a tempest's roaring,
 My voice should lifted be,
 Deliverance imploring
 With a nation's agony—
 A wronged and injured nation,
 With none to hear its cry,
 Or heed its supplication,
 And not a helper nigh.

Then surely he will waken,
 The glorious German Tell,
 Out of his slumber shaken,
 As if by thunder's swell.
 He will arise—he must not tarry,
 Our rescuer in need,
 Our standard sheet to carry,
 Till every tyrant bleed!

ALBANY, July, 1861.

L. E. P.

VALLANDIGHAM.

I.—A WOMAN.

ELEANOR LEIGHTON was what people called the highest stepping girl in the village. But in a woman a good wholesome hearty pride is a core of strength, and when it is so blended with sweetness that you can not tell where one ends and the other begins, the thing is as near perfection as it can be found. But Eleanor Leighton had the right to step high, provided she wished to indulge in that exercise; not because there was no bluer blood in the country than ran in her veins, not that her ancestors had for generations been among the bulwarks of the state, not that the fact of present poverty and former wealth is inspiring, not for any such factitious circumstance, without which she had still been Eleanor Leighton, but simply from the innate dignity and reserve of her character. It was the nobility of womanhood that put on its crown in her and trailed the purple. But that was when Eleanor first impressed her individuality upon her world. Later, she found it possible to wander through the avenues of pride to the very confines of self-contempt.

Outdoor nature and she seemed always to be consonant. If you saw her under wintry skies, and in an atmosphere of crystal clarity, the sapphire's brilliance of the one painted in her eyes, and the keen breath of the other reddening the answering blood of her cheeks, she seemed to have escaped from the cleft ice-blocks behind her, since one would need to be rosy and strong and gay as she to keep comfortable in so cold a haunt as an ice-spirit's; and in summer, as she stepped from under green shadows, you would have believed again in Dryads, and said a prayer to the next white-stemmed maiden birch you met. But it was only with outdoor nature that she stood in unison; human nature and she had unpleasant misunderstandings; so, while some dubbed her vixen and some dubbed her shrew, some called her haughty and some called her fierce, there grew to be a general touch-me-not feeling in regard to her, which was highly congenial to the person concerned, and allowed complete liberty. But in my experience I have found such bitter terms most often applied to those who will on no account receive meddlesome and impertinent interference, who decline replying to obnoxious questions, and who meet inquisitive offense and advice by cool rebuff. But that is a rare faculty, and Eleanor Leighton was fortunate in possessing it.

The house where dwelt the Leightons, mother and child, stood in the very heart of a forest that extended around it for miles. This old mossy growth was traversed by many exceedingly narrow roads, where the grass and wild vines had grown across the ruts, and where the great hemlock boughs bent low and close to brush the cheek of the passer. The house was of brick, a one-storied affair, nondescript in gables and dormer-windows, overhung with trailers—honeysuckles, roses, sweet-brier—so that in June it seemed more a bower of tangled blossom than any thing else, as it stood centred in rods of the greenest turf that ever rose elastic from a springing tread, and bathed in floods of sunshine. All about, the winds in the tree-tops, or the murmurous motion of gently swaying boughs, made a wild music like the song of a shell, and so wrapped in perpetual ease and warmth Eleanor Leighton had been bred. This place had formerly been their own, but having passed into other hands, they still managed it for the absent owner, and retained a stipend for themselves from the profits of the farm lands that lay beyond in the village.

Eleanor had several sisters, all well married as the world goes, to old names, old fames, and old gold. Eleanor had had one or two such lovers herself, but declared she found the soil so long tilled that it was utterly exhausted, and she preferred to try the virgin mould, at which her five sisters held up their hands in holy horror, and, to prevent so vulgar a thing as a mésalliance, laid traps for her heart, and whisked her off to the city. But there are no such fools as those who meddle with marriage; the world crystallizes into lovers and loved; and if one should take a sunbeam and stir the gathering diamond, less necessary atoms would be separated than those others which have fallen apart where a jewel of purer water forever wears its flaw. But Eleanor was as shrewd as determined; it needed but a short sojourn in her sisters' homes to teach her the value of the unions they had made or the lives they led. She entered with the spirit of youth and novelty the society they afforded her, she enjoyed the admiration she received, bore her sceptre regally, and to all appearance was completely ensnared in the brilliant life before her. One day when it was supposed she had pledged herself to these enjoyments too deeply to withdraw, it was judged prudent for a certain stately Dives to make his addresses, and great was the fluttering in the dovecotes when he met with rejection. In vain they urged, in vain they plead, and when, as a final argument, they declared that unless Mr. Ethelwolf Endicott were given encouragement, the sight of her would be agony to them: "Very well, then," said Eleanor, "I won't stay!" and was off before they could gainsay her. So bitterly was this breach felt by the haughty dames of the house of Leighton, that she knew it would be impossible ever to seek their aid or comfort again, to whatever dire extremity she might come.

But there were certain pleasant recollections connected with that winter which it was impossible to rend from her, if indeed any one had known their existence.

There was a morning in an art salon where a young painter superintended the hanging of his picture, brushes and pallet in hand, and then stood and gave the last strokes, deepening a shadow, lightening a distance, while she, in her unrustling gown of thick cloth, remained simply beside him, and now watched the flexible fingers, and now askance the soul just veiled in that countenance that yet wanted something to be clear as the air that filters light, remained naturally and naïvely and without a second thought, not merely from curiosity, but because there was that about this youth touching her as nothing else had ever done. And when at last he finished, he looked up and met her eye, and so continued for a space, breathless and wordless, but with color gathering and thickening on the sallow cheek, then bowed in grave courtesy and turned away with something like a sigh.

There was another day when a wonderful antique, but just unearthed, had been brought to the place to be saluted by throngs; and earlier than others, that she might the more enjoy it, Eleanor has stolen out, and again this youth opposed her as he sat studying some fabulous line of beauty on lip or nostril. A small port-folio had half slipped from his knee, and as he saw her, with a start, it fell and scattered its contents before her. What was there to hinder her seeing a penciling of clear-cut features, a drooping eye, a heavy brow tressed in darkness, with curls that rolled low upon the bosom? Nothing but the will—perhaps her pride bound her, this youth was guilty of a great liberty—or was it that she felt he had beheld her in that look she treasured merely as a subject of art? Judge.

Then there were drives on which his form had perpetually recurred, as if each of them were the magnet for the other; and evenings when music surged up in divine choruses around her, and bending forward from her curtained seat, that face lustrous in its strange tinge alone flashed upon her. In some manner it came to pass that the whole of this winter was put away in her thought and sealed with the device of this one identity. Such little memories the Leighton ladies could not destroy, and it was with a very unconscious happiness that she retained them.

These sisters of hers were much older than she; her mamma was not their mamma; she had never been indebted to them for a single bank-note of all those that rustled in their hands as carelessly and as unvalued as yellow leaves rustle in an autumn forest; there was no reason why she should suffer them to interfere with her future; and so she set them aside, and devoted herself to the home life, which was in as fine contrast to the life she had lately lived as sunlight is to flaring gas. There were the gardens for her to oversee, the flowers for her to train, a thousand cares to lift from her mother, the daily walk to the village, that skirted the nearer edge of the wood, at a mile's distance. Then there were books and studies to fill the afternoon; and for some unknown motive she even began to sketch vague outlines, in which her creative eye found delight. But all this left much emptiness, and evenings, when the mother dozing in her soft arm-chair dreamed again the dreams of her youth, Eleanor leaned from the window and caught the fresh air of evening, where the dew steeped in fragrance was shaken round her, and felt a new, strange loneliness.

The summer heats are not often very provoking of new ideas; but here in these woods, shut from the free winds, they brooded too intensely to maintain their habit, and so it occurred one day to Eleanor to escape from them. "Mamma," said she, "why shouldn't we go to the mountains?"

Mamma had become so exasperated with a piece of unruly knitting that she found the heat trebled, and rolled up the work at once, as if the thought struck her for the first time in her life. "Let us start to-night!" said she. And the consequence was, that the next night found them comfortably ensconced in rooms whose windows opened on ranges of heaven-kissing hills and gave clear advent to all the fresh-blowing breezes. In the mornings before her mother rose, in the noons when she took siesta, Eleanor ranged over these trackless places, trusted to an unerring instinct for safe retreat, and enjoyed a freedom to which she was never unaccustomed. It was on returning one sunset from these rambles that she found a once well-known form stretched at ease on a sofa, whence he had watched her headlong descent and scamper.

"Brown as a berry!" he cried. "Well, Elle, I always knew your capacity! My fine wood-nymph, have you never a word for your Cousin Vallandigham?"

"Why—why, how came you here?"

"Warm and courteous. I proceeded to the Wood to find you, where nobody welcomed me. I came several miles by divers conveyances, and here I am, where also nobody welcomes me!"

"Oh, nonsense, Val! You know I'm real glad to see you."

"Then why don't you come and kiss me, like a sensible little cousin?"

"Well, in the first place, I'm not your cousin, and so, in the next place, it wouldn't be proper."

"Oh, I remember; you're great on proper. But I suppose you can shake hands?" And by this time the young officer had lifted himself, and having exalted an altitude of stature, reached her with two steps and took her in a pair of strong arms before she could say him nay. But there was something in her face that repelled his caress before it was given; he only bent then and raised the hand. "Dear little hand!" said he. "And still it wears my ring."

Then a thing flashed on Eleanor's mind. Had Val meant any thing when, parting from her two years ago to join his corps on the Western frontier, he slipped that ring on her finger and kissed it? He had been godson and adopted child of her father, so that their youth had been passed together; though his superior age made her little but a plaything for him, they had become like sister and brother, had indeed called each other cousin. Did he dream of drawing nearer? But that was not the finale of Eleanor's thought. In the instant, by the light of Val's hope, she saw that some strange flower had already blossomed in her heart; love, and not for him. But love? Yes, and toward an unknown; one of whom she had heard nothing, not even the name. The red flushed her temples at the thought, and no sooner had she felt the thing than she shut her pride down over it to stifle it from her own knowledge forever. Then he who still held her hand saw the glow rise, deepen, and die, and with a second access of boldness bent and kissed the forehead. But one who has a secret is always bristling with suspicion lest it lie as open to all the world as to one's self; and rather than he should guess the true source of that hasty flush, she endured that he should think it for him, and so it happened that at the very moment when Vallandigham should have received his ring it still remained on her finger. Yet the young man saw that something was wanting to complete his dream; what, he knew not; much, he feared. That afternoon of his return he had not risen and hastened to meet her, because he wished to see if she would come to him, and now he was unable to tell if it were indifference that kept her away, or if it were the timid pride of passion. At least he learned that this black-browed woman was not to be wooed as the little damsel of former years had been, and that only by constant devotion could he hope to win and wear. This was a task for the indolent habit of the lover who had seldom accustomed himself to a whit more exertion than eked out necessity, but he met it bravely—and Elle lost her freedom.

II.—TWO MEN.

One morning they had gone out early to catch sight of some distant mountain peak struck by light in its sunrise vapors. They had long left trampling down the fern and wild juniper, and were scrambling from rock to rock, his length of limb striding over the steep ascents without an effort, and she mounting by the clasp of both his offered hands, or making his knee the step for some height beyond her scaling, when at last they reached the airy platform of their destination. Eleanor stood without turning, and looking up the precipitous cliff before her to watch a little cloud curl round its sharpest angle. Vallandigham strode on, passed some one with a cool "How are you?" and awaited her. She had not glanced round, nor swerved aside, yet she knew at once who sat there—knew it perfectly in every bound of her quickening heart. How, I am sure I can not tell, but it is to be presumed that lovers must have some subtle sense with which less gifted individuals are unacquainted. Then suddenly she faced him. He was not aware of her presence, for his whole soul was absorbed in the splendors that rose far away and before him—a valley full of rolling azure clouds, pierced by one needle that now seemed of glittering ice and now of soaring flame, at whose base, after a moment's gaze had refined the vision, gold and carmine and violet warred in tumultuous waves of turbid glory. As they stood their shadows fell at their feet aslant, a long spear of light shot athwart the valley, the azure beneath it paled and thickened to a fleece of snow, colors fled, and the peak rose one shaft of white radiance, belted only by a steadfast rainbow. The painter sprung to his feet. "Great heavens, it is impossible!" he cried. "Never again will I put a flake of color on canvas!" and over the edge dashed pencils and easels and all. And then again his eye met Eleanor's.

"Now I am free!" he exclaimed, in the first words he had ever addressed her.

"And you were in bondage before?"

"Yes."

"And why?"

"I longed for the beautiful. I felt the creative passion. But I was a dolt! I am a fountain's basin to hold the pool, not the river god's urn to pour it forth!"

"Are you sure?"

"Of course," he said, half petulantly. "Have I ever done any thing but fail?"

In an instant her memory retraced the sketch of herself.

"Yes, yes," he said, with her thought. "But then it was not art that led the pencil," and turned away.

"Elle!" cried Vallandigham, "are you trying to see if you can't melt into a little pink cloud yourself? Come along, or I'll turn the corner, and then where'll you be?" At this he walked backward a few steps, not caring much for the prospect, feeling breakfastly inclined, and something sleepy; for if he ever had his grandiose moods, this, under the spell of early rising, was not one of them. The scream rose to Eleanor's lips, but before a sound could pass them the painter had sprung and clutched his shoulder, and bracing his own foot against a projection of the rock, had hurled Vallandigham forward with the strength of a young giant.

"Good for you, Etienne!" cried Vallandigham, with fine sang froid, as he recovered his balance.

"I should say it was better for you," replied the other.

"What, Elle, you're not going to faint?" asked Val, as he saw her cheeks whiten.

"I never faint."

"Come, have you seen enough of this cursed damp stuff? I've no inclination to heel and toe so near eternity again. Well, Etienne des Vignes, when you picked me out of the Red River you didn't expect me to avail myself of your services so soon again? Third time lucky. Next opportunity I afford you of saving my life I hope it will be to some good purpose."

"You lazy giant! It shall be to make you take care of it. You are going? Good-morning."

"Breakfast with us?" cried out Val, as they left him. "We'll reserve a seat. Going up higher? Hark! hear the echo, Elle. Higher? Up higher?"

Elle tied the rosy ribbons beneath her chin, tangled the silky black curls in the knot, smiled with exultation as she remembered the words Des Vignes had exchanged with her as if she were his second self, bit her lip a moment after in wrath with her spiritless heart, and plunged down without a word.

But at the table whose sight Val had so coveted Eleanor meant to grant herself no indulgence, and hurried through her preparatory toilet, that she might finish before the painter appeared; for conscious of weakness, she had that contempt for it, and that desire to thwart it in herself that she would have had in another. But her labor was quite in vain; for before she was served, and while the hungry Val was prolonging his starvation that he might concoct various little messes for her delectation, the painter sauntered in and took the opposite chair, and by some chemistry of his own found cream and coffee and cakes at once before him. But a person whose life has just swung on a pivot to the very opposite pole of its desire, does not instantly avail himself of the creature comforts at hand, and so the painter drank bitter coffee in cup after cup of the blackest asperity, and forgot to eat.

"Not going to try the trout?" asked Val. "Where's your gallantry? Miss Eleanor Leighton decoyed these to shore—"

"With a silver hook?"

"Not she! Why, she's the greatest little sportswoman in the country. Have one? They don't look the same fellows they did when we brought them in; do they, Elle?"

"I wish you had seen them!" said Eleanor to Des Vignes, suddenly warming with the remembrance. "There were the little flames going and coming in their sides, the mouths so firmly outlined, the eyes so full and bold and black; they looked like singular pieces of carving."

"There is no form, I think," he replied, "that with the bizarre so combines beauty as the fish. There's a sinuosity that allows every liberty, and an adaptability of curve that makes me wonder it is not oftener used in decoration."

"Nobody wants fish out of water," said Val, shaking at reluctant cruetts.

"Alive, you mean," said Eleanor.

"Nobody wants any thing out of its element," muttered the painter.

"After all, do you know," said Eleanor, bending forward and speaking to him alone, "I don't believe much in art. Nature is so full, so lavish, so utterly satisfactory, that it is only heart-burning to try and reproduce her. There is just the difference between the two that there is between divine love and human love."

He smiled dreamily as he replied: "But your very illustration proves you mistaken. Because the divine is so perfect nobody expects us to go without the human."

But Eleanor had already said more than she intended, and leaned back in her chair till her mother should finish. Des Vignes relapsed into silence, one arm resting on the table, with the other hand idly laying tracks in the crumbs on the cloth, while Eleanor obliviously watched him. Suddenly he looked up, and through the usual fatality their gaze met. Taken by surprise, Eleanor at once hung out her colors, and then, in mute anger at herself, the blue flashing, and the white lost in red, she rose abruptly, and left the room.

So high-spirited a maiden decided at once that this was no place for her, and accordingly signified her intentions that morning to her mother. But Mrs. Leighton was not so pliant to her will as when under the influence of the exasperating heat and knitting; she had that perversity by which alone very weak-minded people seem to keep their hold upon life. No, they had engaged the rooms for six weeks; they couldn't afford to go; she liked here; it was one of Eleanor's absurd whims to leave, and she meant to stay. In this she was valorously upheld by Vallandigham, and Eleanor was forced to yield. In her heart of hearts she could not regret it; she had done the duty of pride, now the responsibility was on other shoulders. There are very few of us who like to take it on our own; we had rather wade through a slough of despond at another's command than follow an open road from personal choice. But without so much as admitting the resolve to her own heart, she was determined to meet this Etienne des Vignes, as Val called him—this unknown—no more. But then the creamy pallor of the Louisianan face; the clear, great eyes that melted in such depths of dark-lashed shadow; the low, long brow where the black straight locks swept away in one heavy line, rose before her, half blotted out her will, and drove her up and down the floor, and then out into the wild places; because she was resolved to forget it, because she was stung to the quick to find its owner's power over her, and because she felt herself to be half pledged to Vallandigham. But how could she stay here, and be shut up in a room forever? Yet of all places in the world where to avoid the other outdoors was the last. Still Mr. Des Vignes was a newcomer in these regions, although Val had known of his presence, as Val discovered every thing without seeming ever to lift his head to look behind him, and Eleanor flattered herself, forgetting to count upon an artist's spontaneity, that there were a thousand threads in these hills which she held, and he could not.

So she went springing up that afternoon into the wind that came blowing down over the crest of the mountain, or following up the course of the shrunken torrents, and gradually, as she lost herself and her vexations in abandonment to the place, little rills of singing came bubbling up to her lips, or great Scotch mountain songs poured forth with a resounding ring that would have been given the freedom of no drawing-room. She went, like Bettine, hands on sides, skirts just tucked beneath them, the wind blowing out her hair, the tune in her teeth, leaping down from jag to jag, as gay and defiant as the brook that tumbled beside her. But there a sudden spur sent the cascade flying off widely into space, and left beneath it an arch of tempting slippery darkness, guarded by shifting rainbows at either side. She passed under the shimmering veil of powdered spray, and peered into the cavern. Two eyes, so large and dark that they seemed at first to belong to some wild hill-creature, met her search; directly afterward

Etienne sprang up and offered an assisting hand.

"Did you ever see such a wilderness of unruly color?" said he. "I should have no surprise at seeing the whole solid fabric of this range—if it has any—dissolve into rainbows. Sit here but a moment and watch."

"Was that your occupation?" asked Eleanor.

"Why do you ask?"

"Because there are a myriad such places, and I think you only choose this for its seclusion. Now I am not to interrupt your meditation, but to go by on the other side."

But hardly had she escaped when the firm, rapid step came up behind her.

"Pray, if you will not stay with me, may I not walk with you?" said the voice of the moment before.

Eleanor paused. Was there any possibility that he could have read her heart? He had an aptitude. And could that account for this presumption? To be sure their acquaintance had not the warrant of formality, but was he not authorized to ask her companionship now by her familiarity of speech a moment since? She did not wish to be rude, and so she must pay the penalty of her imprudence. After but a second's waiting she took up her way beside him, but only when all the high spirits had forsaken her. Yet high spirits are not always indices of happiness; and as they still ascended Eleanor found herself listening to his words, accepting his aid, sitting at length beside him where they delayed for rest, with a pleased and deep content. Once or twice she caught her heart back to question why she were so dangerously enjoying the hour, but put the fear to sleep again, and suffered the delight to continue. At first they spoke of the place, and then again of art, and then he told her how he became a painter. But it was not what he said; not the account of his home beside that wild river of the South; not the incidents of his youth, for he was by no means unreserved; not the tropical flora that he made in one sentence unroll its petals, flaunt its dyes, and scatter its intoxicating breath before her; not plains of cacti, nor forests of magnolia; not bright-plumed birds, nor jeweled serpents, nor alligators mailed in their bronze scale armor; not all the scenes of Southern luxuriance, as eagerly and impassioned by memory he unspread their emblazoned rolls—it was nothing that he said, but the mere fact that he was speaking, speaking of all these things that were in a manner sacred remembrances to him, speaking, and to her.

"It was my dream, from the day when I first woke to a perception of beauty, that I should be what I have failed to be," said he. "It is true that I have met with a certain success; that Mexican Moonrise among rank reeds and rushes that you saw me hang last winter"—Eleanor winced—"was applauded to the skies again. But they were fools! I knew the gaps, the flaws, the lies in it! I can not face Nature honestly and strive in this way longer. I never shall paint again."

"I don't understand," said Eleanor, "how when your heart is so fired your hand should fail to answer."

"My heart may be fired again and yet communicate no spark."

"Tell me about that time when you first woke to a perception of beauty," she said, turning toward him and forgetting herself since she saw how very sad he was.

"Oh, I was a boy then, some dozen years along. It was supposed that music was to be my destiny; when we were in the town I always sung in the cathedral choir, and I was to be sent to Europe for the correct culture. But they waited; wisely, as it proved; because now I do not sing at all. One evening there had been a shower just before the sunset, and there was yet a great rainbow, almost overhead, so low was the sun. But a rainbow is a rainbow the world wide over, and it was no whit more vivid than those that lie on the wet grass down there in the intervals at our feet. It struck me then for the first time as if I had never seen one. While it faded it seemed retreating, and I think its arch must have lifted my soul up with it. An arch always does, you know. The clouds were burning red in behind the stems of the wood, and then all went out together, and there filled the void of splendor a clear darkness that seemed softly to cling to every thing like oil, and the stars flowered out above it. I was in the midst of a wilderness of jasmine that had been beaten down by the rain and that was to be restored to its place, I stood waist-deep in the tumbled sprays, and almost drowned in the unutterable depth of sweetness. Then I remember thinking that I must not be made drunken with any thing, and I threw it all down and waded out. I remained then apart, unsupported, looking out; and slowly, and gently, and caressingly, the spirit of the night, the sense of beauty, stole up and surrounded me. There are no words for this: an intense joy like suppressed laughter brimmed me, and then it melted into the divine melancholy that you may have felt yourself, and quickly came tears. I threw myself on the grass, sobbing and weeping; it seemed to me that great tender voices spoke singingly to me, that strong, beautiful arms inclosed me. I even fancied the fragrant winds, that rose and curled around and died again, came from the fanning plumes of vast shadowy wings close above me. An ineffable longing seized me, only to see, to see clearly what I felt—only for one instant of vision. Eleanor! my eyes were not anointed, or I had seen. It is because I can not see, but can simply feel, that to-day I cease effort. In vain for me is the burning bush one of the perpetual mysteries of Egypt or of Florida. Never, never has that instant of vision come to me! I have faith and love, but I can not see God."

"Blessed are the pure in heart, for they shall see God," said Eleanor, musingly.

"I know! I know! That means oneness,

VOL. XXIII.—No. 136.—H H

unity of object, of purpose, to be single-hearted. And I think I have been so. Then why do I not? It must be because I am miserably weak."

"One who can so bravely resign the hope of a life, as you have done this morning, has no right to imagine himself weak."

"Oh, there are hundreds who do the same. Many a man cherishes as long some phantasm of poesy in his soul, some determination to be among the world's laureled singers, but he wakes one day to find the banks broken and the channel cut in another line."

"Well then, what is there you will do?"

"Plenty of things. For instance, my real profession is that of an engineer. But I hate it."

"Think. Do you not need to be as single-hearted for one kind of work as another?"

"To be sure."

"Yet then—"

"Oh, I know your drift. But it is not necessary for all the world to have their feet beautiful upon the mountains as they bring the good tidings. The warders of the race are enough, the rest can grope on in semi-darkness, do their duty blindly, and bide their time."

"Not a very perfect scheme. You will not succeed in any thing by that. Now I think the delver among a mine's crystals should work as thoroughly as the man who sketches in the sharp lustre of some commanding ice-peak or moulds the arm of Achilles."

"One is blind, and the others see."

"See God?"

"Yes. It is not to imitate, to reproduce Nature, as you said this morning, but to see God in Nature, to catch the Divine, at which art aims. Oh, if I could but glimpse the trail of his garment, could see where he had brushed the dew from the grass, the bloom from the hill!"

"Now, Mr. Etienne des Vignes, let me tell you!" cried Eleanor. "When you lead the life you ought to lead as a man, you will never know this yearning without more satisfaction as an artist. And when dawns the morning of that day that your soul accords with the laws of the universe, do you dip your pitcher in again and see what comes of it!"

"Unless the pitcher is broken at the cistern first," said he, with a something sardonic air.

"You long to see God, because you feel by a correct instinct that then you will see the extremest beauty. Selfishly. Now when you truly love God, Mr. Des Vignes, you will have this beauty in your own soul, and if you only scratch a line from it on paper Apelles could not better it!" And before he brought back his wandering gaze from the clear sunshine of the scene below Eleanor had risen and was gone.

"What have you been doing on the mountain, Elle?" asked Val, coming to meet her.

"Talking with Mr. Des Vignes."

"Seems an unhappy kind of fellow—lost all his property and all his friends. Well, little Elle, you must be very kind to him, and we'll cheer him up. He swallows every crochets he finds, and they don't digest, but get into his head."

After that morning it would have been difficult to meet Etienne with any formality; there was broken ground between them. He had given her confidences too personal to be ignored, her very pride refused to play him false, and then her whole soul went out to him. From their manner, when it occurred to his rather slow perception to observe it, Vallandigham carelessly decided that they were old friends. This latter individual shared with many another athlete quite a thorough contempt for the present apparent pursuit of the other; when he should resume his more stalwart profession he would become a more formidable rival.

A month had slipped away; Eleanor had no occasion to remember her resolutions, because Etienne sought her society so frequently that feminine pride was quelled and self-torture obviated. Gradually, too, that melancholy of his which had so softened her wore away or only came again in fitful flashes. A certain evanescent grace informed all his action; his natural temperament ruled once more; he became changeable as an iris—a sparkling merriment to-day, as if his soul were a fountain gushing to the light; to-morrow, dreamy, indolent, lounging, and with all the sleepy languor of the South; and then returned the dark mood, when smiles forsook him, and he buried himself in the recesses of the hills. But in his sunny seasons no one was ever more irresistible. He was at once not only the elegant, polished, courteous man, but the boy whose frank sweetness might have been fostered with caresses. In the latter phase he overflowed with daring pranks and interferences, always taking the mamma into his confidence when brewing some inordinate mischief, and then bewailing its effect with sighs and sadness out of the midst of bursts of gayety, mingling laughter and lamentation like a moral lemonade. But in the former—more frequent and more serious—phase, he was always so quiet, never reserved, yet, in spite of that, somewhat stately, that you forgot the possibility of his ever having appeared otherwise. It was then overflowed the wonderful wealth of words he held, and of which all were so many fetters to the attention even of Vallandigham. He related, in such a manner as to make you feel each was but one out of a myriad strange experiences that had befallen him in his wanderings; wanderings not few, for he had encamped among the ruins of ancient Aztec cities, crossed sandy Texan deserts, arid, and fervid, and glaring as some strip of the very sun itself, lost himself in a mere skiff on the great Gulf swells that he might catch the bareness of the loneliest sea, prowled through Louisianian morasses. He knew, moreover, a thousand dark legends concerning the old French and Spanish civilization of those alluring lands; he could recite bold buccaneer ballads of the haunted Main, or let the tones grow sibilant that whispered of silent, shadowy, inland lagoons—lagoons black beneath boughs rank and dank with poisonous vegetation and long-hung trailing moss—lagoons whose sullen waters, never but once disturbed with plash of oars, heard then the single shriek that still might cry among the desolate, deathly hollows of surrounding forest.

But poor Vallandigham did not possess these fascinations; he was not fond of poetry, and so remembered none; if he told a story it was a comic one, or a joke with a fine point to it, and was through in two words; when Etienne and Eleanor talked abstrusely of art, he floundered in depths of impatient ignorance. And by degrees he found himself unconsciously watching the breath, the words, the countenances of the two, nor could he tell how long he had been so engaged. Then there opened before Vallandigham a vista of possibilities down which he quailed to look—a traitorous friend, an inconstant mistress, and a jealousy, which partook, as all jealousy does, of the savage, began to domineer him. If he possessed none of these seducing arts, he had, however, an inventive genius of which the Southerner could claim no iota: this helped him to tell a great many lies, was the source of countless devices to lead the two astray from each other (the self-disgust for which commissions he transferred bodily to Etienne), and finally was the occasion that, as an offset to the other's capacities, he one day set up in the open window a grandiose Æolian lyre, perhaps in the hope that it would make too much noise for Etienne to hear himself talk. But here Vallandigham made a blunder. Could any thing bid better speed to a love affair, than when in gentle pauses of speech it listens to the sweet capriccio of the wind through answering wires?

III.—TWO MEN AND A WOMAN.

But slowly Vallandigham woke to stouter anger as he saw his feminine friends sharing the day with Des Vignes, to his own exclusion in such pleasure—for there was in Etienne's manner that relic of the old chivalry that no woman ever contemns, and he had long since carried captive Mrs. Leighton. He woke also in bitterness to discover for himself his own mentality at a far lower pitch than the other's. And he woke too, to offer him then every silent affront and vexation that was possible. Eleanor at this point took up her observations; she wondered if he would have continued, had he known that as Etienne was of that temper that is always striking fire, he had also the courage to maintain his position. For, indeed, it is noticeable that those who refuse the right of duello are not always the most scrupulous to avoid necessity of such demand. But in this she wronged Vallandigham, for he had here attained such pitch of wretchedness that, as he said to himself, one or the other of them must leave the world, and he didn't much care which. Perhaps Etienne perceived something of this—people have pores for feeling such things—and whether determined to give him satisfaction finally, or glad to find himself of such consequence in another's life, or whether it was a matter of profound amusement to him, it is certain that then he became much lighter and gayer than he had ever been since his renunciation. But near the close of this period there came two days of shadow upon him. He did not leave his friends, as his wont had been, but remained by Eleanor constantly, fixed her and followed her with his serious eye, replied to few of her questions, smiled at none of her sallies, slept none, ate nothing, and scarcely spoke.

They were sitting in the twilight, the other two together, Mrs. Leighton having nodded off to sleep, Eleanor in the window, Etienne on a footstool not far away, when Vallandigham entered. He swung a double loop of yellow straw in his hand, round the whole length of whose cord he had braided the long-stemmed wild strawberries, and he tossed it into Eleanor's lap.

"How fragrant!" cried Eleanor. "And how red! And how sweet! Have you had any yourself?"

"Plenty."

"Well, then, Mr. Des Vignes," she said, tossing him the other end, "dip your fingers into their heart's blood, and we'll see who'll meet the other first."

"I'll meet you at Philippi," said Etienne, accepting her challenge.

"He'll dip his fingers in redder blood if he touches one of them!" cried Val, fiercely.

"Swords or pistols?" asked Etienne, with a smothered laugh of cynical cadence, as he picked.

"Swords, Sir! And as you've shown me, you've the other in your trunk!"

"At your service."

"Enough said."

"I should think there was!" exclaimed Eleanor, with a start of vivid apprehension. "And too much. Come here, Val. Don't be a bear, except in the liking of honey; come here, and let me drop these little thimblefuls of sweet into your mouth!"

But Val strode out, and when shortly he returned there was a cruel glitter in his hand that he laid away on a side-table. Eleanor sprang to reach, but in an instant Etienne had withdrawn it and stood, when Vallandigham flared up the candles, bending its point and trying its edge.

"The very mate," said he. "Whips like a lash."

"Not here!" cried Val, in a terror.

"Nor any where else! I really know no reason we have to fight."

"Reason enough, if you've a particle of honor!"

"Don't drag honor into the affair, or we shall fight."

"And you don't mean to?"

"I should regret mingling your cousin's name in our difficulty. I should regret endangering the life of one dear to her. I should regret—"

"You should regret taking the life you had twice given!"

"I should regret making a fool of myself to-night, when to-morrow I might welcome here my affianced wife and her father!"

"In short, Etienne des Vignes, you are a coward!" cried Vallandigham, with a gleam of savage joy, ready to kill Etienne and at the same time to embrace him.

"There need be no more words between us, Sir!" And Etienne's glove flew and lay at Val's feet.

Eleanor rushed and caught it and thrust it in a little crumpled heap into the owner's hand without turning on him her face.

"Val, for God's sake have some mercy on me!" she exclaimed, where she knelt.

"Elle, I don't know how this scene blazed out in your presence. I beg your pardon. Pray, rise."

"I never will till you are friends!" she replied, vehemently, and in the most approved style.

"Make the South pole kiss the North!" exclaimed Val, in response.

He tore himself away, but came back. "What do you care?" he asked, roughly.

Eleanor only caught his hand again and held it like a vice.

"This man has trifled with your honor," said he.

"Honor that can not take care of itself is not worth the keeping!" she responded, with branded cheeks. But there it all rushed over her. What words a moment before had been trembling on Etienne des Vignes' lips! What significance had not his manner, his silence, his glance, held! What unspoken passion had he not suffered to shine and melt in those eyes! What devotion had he not made to woo out her according soul! And here was his affianced wife on the morrow to flaunt it over her! The old pride sprung to the rescue; she was triply mailed as she knelt there after that instantaneous flash of thought, still clutching Vallandigham's hand. Yet not for all her pride should blood be shed. Her eyes were still imploring.

"Eleanor," he said, in a tone whose condensed volume well expressed the weight of feeling within it, "There is only one way in which you have the authority to ask this!"

"Well," she cried, rising and meeting his fervid glance, "in that way I ask it!"

Vallandigham paused a moment. It seemed too much, and yet too little. Was it a reluctant gage wrung from her? He had given her his whole soul, and now she seemed to pay him with a whim. But what then? he asked himself. Love does not demand payment. Let him but be allowed to love. And besides, he was so stupid, like some great creature but half endowed with any thing save tenderness, that he might not see the whole. All this time his gaze, searching and deep, lay on her; he extended his arm once more to take her to his heart; half-shrinking, half-timid, with deepening blushes, she suffered it.

Etienne stood by, growing livid with suppressed torment; his eyes seemed to be pits of blood.

"You love him? You will marry him?" he hissed, rather than said.

"I will marry him!" said she, firmly and haughtily.

"God bless you, Elle! God grant you never regret it!"

Etienne seemed then to tremble and totter, as if through the throbs of some tremendous engine within him, whose course he endeavored to check. Slowly he regained himself; the danger was past; a smile broke over his face and illuminated it to the old dazzling beauty; his grace and sweetness of manner stole back.

"We can not quarrel, Captain Allingham Vallandigham," said he, "for all our swords. You have taken a bond to keep the peace. And as for me, wherein I have offended, I did so unwittingly. I most sincerely beg you to forgive me."

"Don't mention it, man!" said Val, flushed with his happiness, and shaking hands heartily. "And for the swords—exchange them—why not? Yours becomes precious to me. Good tidings of great joy it brings!"

"Keep it and welcome. I shall not want to see it soon again." He approached Eleanor, and took her hand. "To-night," he murmured, almost inaudibly, "I had vowed should be my last of bliss. It will not be my first of misery!" and bowing, he retreated. But at the door Eleanor caught that look in his eyes, a wide darkness of bold reproach and passionate despair, and as he vanished hid her face in her hands to hold and restrain the hot, fast bursting tears. Poor Vallandigham, who in the openness of his heart fancied them to be tears of relief and joy, went and led her to a seat, coaxed away the hands, smoothed the tangled curls, and pressed light kisses in among the glossy rebellious rings.

"Elle," he said, when with great efforts she was growing calm, "have you loved so long as I? Do you love so well?"

Then the deception of the moment and of her promise started up under the glare of her pride, which again wrapped her like a robe of fire. That she cared for Vallandigham was true, but with a natural and deep affection, an affection that had flowed so quietly as to be almost unfelt, and that knew in its current none of the hollows, the shallows, the rapids of love. In this affection she should have found it impossible to trifle with his feelings; and yet she had done so, done so on that day, that wretched day of his return, when she failed to restore him his ring—ever since, when to appease his impatient regard she had bestowed some casual kindness, had deferred to his counsel, consulted his wishes, had listened to his unveiled intimations and given them no hush, had willfully and artfully suffered him to hope, that he might not discover the real reason he had for despair. All this rose and struck her to the soul.

"Oh, Val!" she cried, flinging her arms round him, "I haven't—I don't—but I will! Dear Val! as you sit there afraid to caress me lest you repel me, it breaks my heart. Oh, I will do my best to return such care. Do not love me so much; wait till I love you more. Don't look so; don't doubt but that I shall be utterly happy when I am your wife."

"I hope you will," he said, with a grieved tenderness; for his heart had given a great throb, and out of its turbulent joy and expectation had turned over forever on a darker side. "But that will never happen while you cry so at the thought of it. Oh, little Elle! Why didn't you tell me in the first place, and not—"

But here his voice broke. A moment he tried to withhold them, and then, bowing his head to his knees, shook with heavy sobs.

"Give me back my ring, Elle," he said at length. "To-morrow I shall go away. I expected to take with me a happy plight. But all that I put behind me."

"To-morrow? to-morrow?" questioned Eleanor, in whom a sharp sense of total desertion was annihilating every thing else. "Oh, Val! I want to love you! Do you fling me away?"

That was too much. He only rose blindly, and put his arms again about her, and folded her into his soul it seemed. And for her, here she felt was rest, here was shelter. Oh! if he never had to leave her for an instant she need not think of that other. She would not think of that other. And so Eleanor still wore the ring.

The morning came, and Val was to depart. If it had not been for a novel timidity she would have begged him to marry her then, to take her with him, to make all sure, and give her a duty. But here came fear unfelt before: he might not choose to marry yet; perhaps he had changed in a night's reflection; pride forbade it, all womanly pride, in the name of all her kind—and so she was silent. But as she stood leaning on the great form beside her she felt how strong and loving was the heart that beat against her hand—how large and warm the nature, how unselfish the love that would have enwrapped her. She went to her mother and uttered a dozen vigorous words; stepped swiftly about herself; spurred the maid to haste; and while good Mrs. Leighton wondered, and hesitated, and feared, and wondered again, she found the trunks packed, and locked, and ticketed, her own bonnet tied beneath her chin, the bill paid, and the coach at the door.

"We are going too," cried Eleanor to Val, as he came for the final adieux. "At least as far as the Wood. You will go there too, Val?" For she desired that he should leave about the house the remembrance of himself in their new connection, in order that her youth might be forever banished. How much she found could pass in how few weeks! She had come here light-hearted, gay, not twenty: she was going back with a black gap half full of the blasted ashes of passion, and with gray threads in her curls.

As they waited a moment on the piazza, their coach was delayed by the arrival of another. There stepped from this last a rather pompous and very handsome gentleman, with little rings of silver hair shining beneath his traveling-cap, assisting down a tall, large-moulded girl, who had been closely veiled. As she touched the ground and threw back the double folds of violet tissue, she disclosed the spotless skin they shielded and the dazzling beauty of an imperious blonde. Eleanor had been looking in another direction; when she turned she heard the elderly gentleman inquiring for Mr. Des Vignes, and bowed distantly both to Mr. Ethelwolf Endicott and to his daughter. In a thought the case stood before her. Mr. Endicott, never a covetous man, had been sufficiently flattered by the promise of fame in the artist to give to him his daughter. And Etienne had sold himself; for in spite of the Endicott's magnificence, Eleanor knew that he loved no one but herself. A true scorn sprung up in her heart and overflowed the curving shores of her lip, and she looked in yet more hope to Vallandigham, whom she knew with the knowledge of years to be incapable of meanness. Nevertheless there was an attraction for her in these people, and as they drew nearer she made no attempt to avoid them. It needed scarcely more than the few sentences they there interchanged, if even she had not previously known her, to convince Eleanor that this girl wore all her warmth in her coloring, and was more incapable of love than a sunset cloud. She shuddered as she thought of Etienne's fate. With a generous devotion this rival might at last have won him to herself; but now he had planted his tent in a desert. A little old-fashioned mandoline, in its case, was passed on with the other luggage of the new-comers. It gave Eleanor something to remember. She ran back through the halls, up stairs, and into the forsaken rooms where Val's Æolian wires were yet murmuring. As she entered there was a sudden snap, and then a wail in the hollow case, and she saw the thing in ruins. Etienne stood beside her as she disengaged it.

"You are angry that I have broken the bauble?" he said, shortly.

She gave him no reply.

"It was a ruder hand that rent my heart-strings last night!" he muttered, as she disengaged it, and confronted her.

Eleanor again dared no word; she only caught that dreadful look on as wild, impassioned, and desperate a gaze of her own, and fled from the room. Of what use, she thought, were her efforts, when one glance at that woeful face—haggard now in the midst of its power—destroyed them all. She saw her mother in the inside, and climbing with Vallandigham to the top of the coach, sat rigidly, without a word, looking steadfastly into the horizon. It was after sunset, and the soft summer dark had fallen before either of them spoke, and they were still plunging downward. The moon rose before them, over the tops of low and distant pine-trees, putting away masses of purple shadow, and shedding her soul on others till she seemed like a great pearl melting away in some revelry of the courts of heaven.

"That is just like a picture I bought last spring, Elle," said Val; "at a price as good as itself too, I found. One of those great Southern moonrises where darkness and light go mad, with a fore-ground of marsh grass, and a dancing flower or two holding up its head to watch the show. Exactly the thing I've so many times seen in the lonely hours out there, when I was glad to gaze, because soon I hoped my little Elle's gaze would meet me there. I left the picture at the Wood for you."

"You are very kind. We shall see it together, then, this time, because I have seen it before."

"I wanted to surprise you," he said, with a disappointed cadence.

"Dear old Val! Won't you ever leave off being kind to me?"

"Darling! how could I? But we sha'n't see it together, Elle. I must leave you at the boat. My orders are imperative, and I go another way."

Eleanor did not care for any thing, so she expressed no regret. Her conscience, that longed for something to lean against, something strong enough to hold her, might have urged him stay; her heart, like the sick wild creatures, only longed to be alone. And so, pallid and silent and miserable, no support to herself, and but little joy to another, she saw him depart.

Once at home, and of course Eleanor was ill; and of course the five sisters declared in chorus by letter that it all came of the willful jaunt taken by Mrs. Leighton without a word of advice from them. While she lay full of pain and delirium, she lived over again those mountain days, and trod exultingly up the paths with Etienne at her side; when she recovered, and wandered aimlessly round the house, nothing but these vivid scenes spread before her aching memory. Val's deepest impression had been but momentary, a thing of pity and self-pity; Etienne's individuality had burned in as with a burning iron.

The autumn flared itself out in the woods; letters from Vallandigham came in great spaces, and then with but little of his personality about them, being mostly brief detail, and by no means bearing the burden of his confiding heart. Before her hung Etienne's Moonrise, in her portfolio rustled the sheets over which he had guided her hand. All winter long, immured behind the snow-drifts, she worked up vigorous bunches of the October leaves, first sketched in their perfect ripeness. Forever rose before her that sad pale face, and blotted out her colors. At last came the spring. The willows showered about their fragrant gold; honey-suckles and sweet-briers budded and put out their fresh shoots; the glad birches quivered in their veils of green; here and there a maple lighted up the shadowy hemlock depths like a torch; the Venus sabot, the arethusa, and bloodroot shot up in the paths; wings darted every where in fearless circles; the gray prime under waning moons grew instinct with song; spring flooded every hollow, and overran the skies. But Eleanor's soul seemed to have lost eternally its vernal season. She knew that it was April; she dreaded when it should be June. Purpose and energy forsook her; she dared not write and tell Vallandigham that this bond was stifling her heart; she only awaited in awed suspense the month that should make her his wife. Her mother became alarmed at her looks, roused herself, and succeeded in getting her into the saddle every morning. Once accustomed to this, she learned a certain joy in the new experience; put it to all perilous tests; galloped down the slippery, mossy hills; leaped the great storm-fallen trees, and perhaps, if chance had but taken the initiative, she would not have been sorry if the leap had been into infinite space itself.

One morning the servants told Eleanor that strangers had been seen lurking suspiciously about a portion of the wood known as the Great Gorge, some two miles from the house, and disregarding her mother's remonstrances, she mounted and rode away to look into the affair.

It was still so early as to be little lighter than sunrise among the trees; the dew was yet showering from the heavy branches that brushed her hat; the shadows were yet black in the tempting hollows; the birds were piping drowsy tunes from half-forsaken dreams. But all the sweet freshness of the dawn, the fanning winds, the flowing streams, touched her heart as they would have touched a rock. The reins hung loosely on her horse's neck; he had chosen his own path, and had as frequently gone astray as to the purpose. Suddenly some breeze seemed to blow athwart her cheek, some whisper to touch her ear; her heart for a moment stood still, and then beat up in great bounds; she gathered the reins and dashed off between the tree-stems, over thickets, through swamps and briers; and then, with light in her eyes, smiles round her mouth, and her cheeks the color of carnation, pulled up at the verge of the Great Gorge, dismounted, and bent to look over. At the same instant another face there below aspired to look up. And there the gaze of the two continued as if they had been slowly changed to stone, and were doomed for a thousand years to such penance, she to gaze down into the tempting blackness, he to gaze up into the impossible light. There were others below, yet she saw no one; then there came blankness, and before she recovered herself he was beside her. Then she remembered.

"You stood there," said he, "the woman's form beside this black horse's head, like some wild conjunction of demonology, if ever such were half so fair. And, indeed," he added, more quickly, "they needs must, to be one half so enticing!"

Truly, as she stood there, backed by the forest and an edge of sky, alone, and clearly outlined, the hat blown partly off, the curls massed on the ivory throat, the flush going and coming in wave after wave, nothing was ever lovelier. But as he finished the old pride rose and commanded her.

"I am not here for posturing," said she, "but to inquire your business below."

Her manner was too haughty to be borne. She had assumed it for safety from herself. She did not dare trust her lips with any such sentence as she might have addressed a friend. Her very pride betrayed itself. Such coldness was never indifference. Meantime he would reply, as she should have questioned, in a quiet, unruffled way.

"My business, of which I am happy to inform you, because you will approve it, is to lay the Breakneck Railroad, and to run it through these beautiful woods."

"Approve of it? Run a railroad through my beautiful woods?"

"Exactly."

"I can not understand you. This estate is Captain Vallandigham's, although we have a life-interest—"

"Yes. And he has been requested to state the value—"

"He never will."

"It makes no difference. It will still be taken, and the price be arranged for him."

"Is it inevitable? You speak as if you were Fate."

"A railroad company is Fate."

"But to have traffic, and dust, and noise, and speed—roaring wheels, and yelling whistles, and such strange eyes, come dashing through our dear old wood. Oh, it is wretched! I had rather leave it! I hate railways! We will go live in some dusty little city alley first!"

"Pray do not regard me with such displeasure. I am but the instrument. It was unavoidable to cross the wood, and I have even made a curve in order to occasion as little change as possible and to bring the track into the gorge."

"Oh, but it is ruin!"

"Is it so? To me here is a new charm. It is better than all the sun-dials that ever were set up; that far, far scream, like an eagle's on the wing, never fails the hour; it is a perpetual excitement. It flashes the city through your forest, it brings in the savor of the sea and the spice of foreign climates; the mountains send down their messages by it, the tall prairie timber shoots through it; it is an artery up and down which ever pours the great current of human life. It will bind you to all the wide world outside, when at the dead of night the ground throbs in distant tremor, and you hear the panting creature trail its thunderous music far off and low on the edge of the horizon. You will watch it, too, by irresistible attraction. I never see a great engine crashing along in its plates of shining iron and its fiery, invincible strength without having my heart beat with a wild propulsion inside me, and feeling a daring wish to attempt impossible things!"

Eleanor forgot the attitude she had previously taken, while her fancy warmed in listening. Her eye wandered over the gap, bathed, in its deeper distance, with thin rising and rolling mists, that were every where pierced and scattered by the warm sunbeams.

"And what becomes then of all my tangle down there?" she said. "The columbines and harebells and rues in the rock, the tall ferns and golden brakes and asters that plumed the edge, the great rosy clouds of laurel half down the side? The cardinals and gentians grew deep there by the brook. And now comes smoke to trail round and kill them out!"

"No, they will blossom just the same the year round. Why are you not thankful that so many a dusty heart will be gladdened at its flying glimpse of such cool airy loveliness blowing forever to itself whether they come or whether they go?"

"I have enough to do to take care of my own heart!" she exclaimed, without a thought, and then ready to wring her hands at her words.

"Eleanor," he said, stepping nearer, "if it were at right angles with my course, I would yet bring my work here, for it is where you are!"

She caught the bridle and led her horse off through the trees. He called to know if he might come and see her, but she did not turn her face or answer him a word; he only saw the slender figure walking on with drooping head and nerveless hand deep and deeper into the wood until the jealous spring hid her from his view.

All the evening Eleanor remained within; her mother fell off in little naps, and Eleanor withdrew herself into the furthest arch of the long room, without book or candle, dreaming, and unwittingly listening. She started at length upon the striking of the clock, and becoming irate to find with what a flush expectation and waiting and disappointment had dyed her cheek, woke her mother and went up stairs. To her room, but not to her sleep; sitting, instead, into the starlit midnight, and looking out across the lawn to its dark screen of silent boughs, where, ever and anon, she dreamed she saw one shadow come and go.

When Etienne did appear it was a warmer evening, and they sat on the veranda. Mrs. Leighton welcomed him with a surprised warmth that taught him Eleanor's silence concerning their meeting; the good lady was delighted to see again one who had the bearing that recalled her younger days, for the village people scarcely filled her fastidious fancy; she was gratified, moreover, at the opportunity of spreading her patronage, not often exercised; and she begged him to repeat his visit. It was not Eleanor's virtue that she added no words to the request; her eyes spoke for her. So again and again he came, every evening, every day, sometimes in the morning, or appearing with the sunset, joined them at the simple tea-table now so often spread under the open sky.

"I thought I had heard that by this time you were to have been married, Mr. Des Vignes," said Mrs. Leighton, simply, on the first evening.

"My engagement was broken, Madame," he replied, "many months ago."

"That is unfortunate!"

"You are kind to say so. But jilting is such a favorite pastime that I should be sorry in failing to afford it to any one."

"A young man is so much happier with a home that he makes himself, I have always believed."

"He is indeed," then said Etienne, gloomily.

"We have a wedding ourselves, you know, in June," she added, in a significant aside, with a glance at Eleanor. "A thing to which I have always looked forward. Captain Vallandigham is too dear to me to sustain any other relation than that of a son." And the good lady erected herself, bridling, and stroking her cap-ribbons.

Etienne looked at the daughter, and delayed with his bold glance the crimson that was sweeping her brow, and fixed the look of tormented disgust in her eyes till it melted to something fairer while the falling lashes strung themselves with tears. He needed nothing more to banish sadness and satire and let the old sunshine and sweetness of his nature have sovereign sway again. It was always with this potent wand that he proved himself a wizard, and certainly one more consummate never wove his spells round a woman's heart. Gradually again Eleanor's reserve faded before it; the sense of approaching summer stole into her soul; she suffered herself to bask in these rays, and never lifted a startled thought to question the future. Then the house became filled with needle-work and women; June was drawing near. Letters from Vallandigham came oftener: she piled them on her dressing-table with unbroken seals. As one day she crossed the wood with another in her hand, and the gloom from it overshadowing her face, Etienne met her, turned, and walked with her.

"Pardon me," said he, "but I see, I can not fail to see, that you are most miserable in your engagement."

"How do you dare—" she began, with an old gleam.

"Not to me. Not so to me!" he said; then withdrew his gaze and kept it on the ground, until at length and abruptly, "why do you not break it?" he asked.

"That way honor lies!" she exclaimed, savagely.

"Honor lies in an empty gift? Honor lies in the truth. You change."

"Do you remember when once we spoke of singleness of heart?" Eleanor asked, turning hastily, lest she should repent and keep silent.

"Do I not!"

"Very well, then. It is through that that this Vallandigham holds his power over me. When I gave him my promise I felt the same as now; there is no reason why I should retract it. There is something colossal about him that dwarfs me and takes away my will. He is so noble that I can not be ignoble. Moreover, why should I break his heart?"

"You prefer to break mine and your own."

"Never speak to me such words again!" and at her haughty motion he bowed and passed on in another path. But Eleanor might have laughed bitterly at herself as she thought what a craven heart had ordered such a lordly gesture.

Yet nothing long made any difference. If he did not come again that night, he rose by her side like a wood-spirit next morning as she rode, smiles upon his lips, sunbeams gathering where he stood, and with just that difference between his old, careless gayety of the mountain days and his present and apparent clear quiet, that lies between rose quartz and the white rock crystal. He had already become as necessary in the household as years could have made another. He came with rare foreign prints; he brought them strange and exquisite things that had been upturned in the gorge, leaf-marks from an antediluvian world, fossils, old glacial treasures. One morning he bore in his arms a South American trophy—some tall plant where a little white bird hovered all day with spreading wings over a great crimson flower, and at night sank away to sleep in its bosom; and at another time he suddenly let flutter into Eleanor's lap a pair of tiny partridges with restless brown eyes and panting breasts—a handful of feathers and fear. In her wood rambles it seemed her fatality to encounter him; and in the evenings, when Mrs. Leighton commenced to nod, what more natural than for them to step down and stroll along the fragrant twilight walks? In renouncing Art, Etienne seemed to have possessed himself of all accomplishments: whether, as a troubadour, he gave her the key to all Provence in songs that he taught her to sing from his rapid sketch on paper; whether, when rain shut them in behind veils of soft-falling gray, he read to her, and became to the life some passionate Romeo or trenchant Benedick. One night, too, he put together a little flute, and piped the very tunes of Arcady; but it was Vallandigham's flute—she could not answer why, but inexplicably sacred; and Eleanor had that grace left next day to hide it. Wretched girl! not to have known, from the dim intuition that this was but the effervescence of her heart, not to have waited till the bead fell, and she could reach its sweet, strong body! But in action how can there be reflection, which implies rest? and it seemed as if destiny were hurrying on the drama whose crisis to-morrow should be at hand. These days had been divine! Etienne had become identified in Eleanor's mind with all their sweetness, their pathos, their beauty. She knew, too, that he suffered, and for her; and such suffering—all suffering—commands the heart. Partial and crude before, she felt as if she had become a completed spirit; sympathy met her at every point; and love, love softened those flaming eyes to twilights of passion. She wondered why Etienne never again spoke of their relation, and forgot that she had herself forbidden it. Of every thing else he spoke; spoke of his work here that was done; spoke of his next route, down among tropical hills and over fierce tropical rivers; spoke of a life that was to become lonelier than a grave—and there the light and blithe forsook his face—but never spoke of what might have been. And so in this sphere of silence did they live and move, and each drew free breath only when some wild forgetful gaze, brief as the flash in the sky, told the one old story.

Mrs. Leighton threw down a letter.

"Vallandigham will be here in the morning," said she.

"And I leave you to-night," said Etienne.

"Dear me! You are not going to stay to the wedding?"

"I leave you to-night."

Eleanor's fingers pinched the little shell with which they played to powder. She gasped for strength only to let him go. Mrs. Leighton, with a word of regret—because she had that kind of mind not capable of double action, and just now she was busy with bustle and pleasure—adjusted her glass for another look at the letter. Etienne remained half lying back in the corner of the sofa—his face fixed, his eyes bent upon the fire-screen—remained so a long time. Suddenly and unexpectedly he raised those eyes, and they rested on Eleanor's. He rose and reached her; bent, and his words fell like water-drops in a parched night.

"What is the use of all this? Do you dare meet him? If you wait he will overpower you again. You will marry him with a lie—Your vows are slippery withes!"

His hand was on her shoulder; his eyes, his breath upon her. She did not look up. She saw nothing, but felt the sand slipping under her feet. He stooped lower; the dark, dropping hair brushed her brow.

"You love me!" he said. "Then fly with me!"

IV.—A MAN.

The village bells were ringing nine away on the dark edge of the wood that night; and with a tread that in its attempt at noiselessness could by no means be disguised, the martial stride and bearing, a form, made greater and stronger by shadow, was drawing near the house. Vallandigham had written that he should arrive in the morning; and then had come the wish to take his little Elle at unawares—and here he was. On the veranda he stooped to look in, but the drawing-room was dark. Mrs. Leighton had probably retired, that she might rise betimes on the morrow. So much the better. He would see his little Elle alone. A rough vine-wreathed pillar shielded him; he leaned upon it, because his heart beat so plungingly against his side, the blood burned so in his sun-fanned cheek, his breath so choked his voice, the tears were so ready to spin forth in gladness, that he did not want to go in till self-command resumed its rule.

The door opened gently, and some one closed it after them, then stole across the veranda and descended the flight of stone steps. On the last one she hesitated; swayed to and fro in a pained indecision; looked back at the dark door and casements an instant. Then the slender figure erected itself, the foot fell firmly, she looked back no more, but went down and on, and disappeared beneath the hemlock shadows.

Something leaped through the mind of Vallandigham! He knew, as if he had read it written on heaven, that departing she was to return no more. It had been noon with him—full, radiant noon—noon that hastily fell, quenched in night; but even in that night it seemed that his vision was supernaturally clear. He had that perfect faith in Elle that, though he might have been unaware of it, his whole scheme of life diverged from the central point of belief that she was incapable of a baseness. There was only one fierce breath, during which the world seemed rushing into chaos, and he doubted her. In that breath he recalled among the shadows a darker shadow lurking as he entered; recalled the horses that he had seen waiting on the edge of the wood; recalled and remembered now that the impatient step which crushed the crackling brush was Etienne des Vignes! But what of that? What though she had taken the very path that would lead her to his arms? His conviction remained the same: Elle, his pure, proud Elle, was in no danger from herself or another. And yet, so startlingly, stunningly rent from hope with pangs that pierced his soul as he was, if it had been to Etienne that she went, he himself would have taken her, have given her—this great, strong Vallandigham. He stood looking after her; he seemed yet to see her, sliding through the starlit glades, stepping along the swampy mosses, lifting the wide low boughs that guarded the deep-rutted ways. Elle had gone—his bride, his wife—and left him desolation.

The noises of the woodside, the crash of a falling branch, the slipping of a snake, the bird who nestled and chirped, each one became a terror of the night—for now he remembered the stragglers from the railway who might be haunting the by-paths, the great browsing cattle who wandered under the shadow, those fierce gigantic dogs of his, turned loose at bedtime, and knowing no odds 'twixt friend and foe. He started at thought of the fears that might beset the lonely girl, and stepped forward to follow her. But she had chosen to go alone—she had desired no shield, she had withdrawn from any watchful eye. His heart yearned too much that way to let it lead him into dishonor. If trouble befell her he should hear her voice, and there he would await it. He came back with a heavy, dragging step, and seated himself upon the stones that were thickly gathering dew. On the sound the big dogs came tearing round the corner of the house; but at an old gesture, so well recalled, they cowered, then sprang caressingly to reach his shoulders, fawning upon him, and at length crouching on either hand like guardant lions. So he sat listening, waiting, with no thought of his own desertion other than a blind, blackened sense of woe behind; with fears, and wishes, and hopes for her alone. The hours went on, he heard them tolled by the old house-clock within there. Lyra flung out her banner of blue flame above him, and slipped away; the constellations shifted silently over the darkness that seemed so full of weight and sorrow and some hushed, un-whispered secret. But to all that could be seen he was insensible; his whole soul was centred in listening. Still he waited upon Elle, with the big dogs beside him. The sky became great and hollow at last; damp cold winds breathed up and down the place; gray dawn was upon him, with no splendor of sunrise, but ushering in the rains; the birds stirred and sent about the news of dew, broke into brief chorus, shivered back to their nests again. All the noises of day asserted themselves in the woods, and drowned the phantom sound for which he hearkened. He drew up his weary limbs, and rose as an old man rises, stiffened and sore, with the weight of years that had been compressed into that single night. The dogs rose too, shook off the dew in showers, and went bounding away, frolicking and rolling, into the wood. Vallandigham betook himself to another portion of the house where he knew of an old entrance, found it, made free with it, and was within. Then striding to the door through which Eleanor had passed he slid the bolts, upper and lower, inserted the chain, turned the key, and put it in his pocket: that door should never again be opened till Elle came to recross its threshold or he himself went to be carried out feet first. For now Vallandigham knew that he should never die in the din, and rush, and mad heart-boundings of battle. His determination was taken; he should resign his commission, and leave the place no more.

Many years ago, when the father of Elle had needed money for some transaction, he had arranged a transfer of the great farm to his ward, and taken instead the ready funds of the other. His transaction failed; and he at the same time dying, left his wife and child little except the devotion of Vallandigham. The young man chose then his profession, left Mrs. Leighton to manage the estate for him, as she was well able to do, and yearly he funded the profits which she rendered him therefrom to the account of Eleanor. But of this no one knew; nor did Eleanor ever suppose herself to be mistress of a portion which her father's fortunes, if unruffled, could hardly have awarded. Now Vallandigham would take the burden and care on himself; and this woman, whom he had so long regarded as a mother, would still need to lean on him, for he was all she had left.

There began to be a stir in the house. The crowing cocks had waked the maids. Mrs. Leighton had overslept herself in the cloudy morning; but rising and drawing aside her curtain, and lamenting that they had such a sorry day for the wedding, went to rouse Eleanor. Vallandigham never left the room that he paced to and fro. Commotion then disturbed all the region—doors slammed, agitated voices crossed each other—there were cries, and mandates, and loud, confused rumor. Some servant seemed to have snatched from one of the dogs, as they came pitchpolling toward the house, a little silk handkerchief; it was the one that Eleanor so often tied round her throat when she went out. There came no subsidence then in the tumult, and affairs must have been at their height when the five sisters, gorgeous in the stiff robes that nearly enveloped their husbands as well as themselves, arrived to find Mrs. Leighton in hysterics in the midst of the shining bridal paraphernalia, and to learn from her that Eleanor had gone off—run away—over night—with—a surveyor or something.

In the afternoon there came a letter mailed in the village, brief, and to the point:

"DEAR MOTHER,—I can trust you with Vallandigham, and so I shall not fret."

"Dear! dear!" exclaimed the mother, "as if she'd any right to fret! I should think I was the one!" And here her woes again overcame her. "Oh, poor child!" she cried. "What has she done? Where can she be? Oh, I am going distracted!" But being composed with valerian, and having a handkerchief drenched in ether, she finally resumed the letter.

"As for me, I can not stay. I am gone to take care of myself. If any thing happens to you I shall know it and return."

"How's she going to know it? And how can she take care of herself? Can't stay? Run away? Oh—she's a living disgrace. Eleanor!" Here, however, she remembered there were other lines of the letter.

"Be at rest about me; the very spirit that sends me away is proof armor against the world. Be sure, dear mother, that my affection for you remains forever the same. E."

"Oh!" groaned Mrs. Leighton, at the general exclaim as she concluded, and the reiterations that she'd brought it all upon herself—she shouldn't have expected any thing different after the willful way in which she'd let that headstrong girl grow up; they were sure it didn't surprise them. "Oh, if every one knew what it was to be a mother, there'd never be another child born into the world!" For she had a way, not uncommon, be it known, of viewing a child as if the mother alone had any part or parcel in it.

But at this point Vallandigham came to her side, banished the others by his mere presence, soothed her and stilled her, and through the perpetual care which thenceforth he extended over her, at length gladdened her heart as Eleanor had never been able to do. But for that it took weeks, and months, almost years; to quiet her just now needed only hours; the forlorn little woman, as he carried her up and down in his arms, remembered how the strong loving arms of her husband had done the same when she was young, and fair, and tender, and sighed away to sleep with the gentle motion. Then he laid her in the pillows and sat beside her. Night fell again as he sat, and Vallandigham kept his second watch. It was not of Eleanor now that he thought—not of pity, not of love. He thought of the forsaken mother slumbering so heavily there; but then he forgave that. He thought of himself; and this he could not forgive. He thought of himself: through the livelong hours images of his misery crowded down upon him, till he was like one who has passed the night with horrid phantasms; he remembered how all his love had been allowed to sweep on in its great current and dash headlong against a rock; he thought with fierce self-pity of the heart so ruthlessly shattered; looking into his soul he tried to measure that depth to which the iron had entered. He grew stern and merciless. Eleanor had gone—gone and left him not a word, not a sign; he was the last, the least, in her thought; he too would forget—he swore he would cease to love this woman. But in a dogged despair he swore; and with the great rush of tears a moment after he forswore himself.

And here Vallandigham took up his life.

There was much to fill this life, and yet how hollow it seemed! The cares of the vast farm, the wants of some distant tenants, the household affairs, the daily papers; he had but little time for more than these; yet it did not seem to him like duty done, steps taken on the solid earth; it was just a bridge, and a broken bridge at that, across which he trod what distance there might be between the days of his youth and the hour of his death. And in the evenings, the long dull evenings when the chess-table had been pushed aside and he took up his book, the book fell in an oblivious hand, and he heard Mrs. Leighton talk on as if in a dream, while he contemplated never what might have been, what yet might be, but only what was. Then he dragged himself from the chair and went out into the night, to pace with that long stolid stride the walks in the grass under the clear summer stars, till stung by the recollection that here she had wandered with Etienne (for he had heard all that her mother knew, perforce, and whether he would or no), he tore his feet from the spot and went in again.

Vallandigham was in the depth of his misery when some one brought him word concerning a sick man in the village. What were sick men to him? and why should he go? he was sick himself, sick at heart and ill at ease; but go he did, and go again, every day he went, staid all day long, and sometimes throughout the fierce-fevered nights.

Did the sick man think some demon haunted him, some Nemesis had fallen upon him? In those wild ravings that told Vallandigham all, did he—with that face bending above him—accuse Fate of baring her sword, Heaven with stooping to crush him? And when he woke, fainting it seemed into death, did he dream that his adversary sat there already waiting to judge him. If it had been so, indeed, lenient judgment would he have received; for this dark, patient man with the sympathizing eye and the tender mouth was not the same as he who entered—this soldier who had learned how to be a woman. Vallandigham had found that he was not the only one who suffered, the only one who loved. It had never entered his mind how much pain and more these others had had to endure. Full of sorrow and utter compassion for them, of recrimination for himself, the depths of contrition in his great heart called unto each other. If he but knew where Elle was, he said to himself, he could make it all right. Perhaps the other knew. But no, she had left them both in equal darkness; there was nothing but to wait—wait and grow toward the light. In the mean time there was no magnanimous devotion, no lavish solicitude in his nature, that here he did not pour forth. His very incoming, after any brief absence, seemed to revive the object of his care. It was his turn to beguile tedium, to tell what he had amassed, to hum the wild frontier ballads, to devise a thousand jests. And by degrees a fraction of Val's old cheer returned to him as he did so: much, perhaps, he counterfeited, some, indeed, was genuine. He was so rich, so happy then, in generous resolve. One day as he sat near the bed where the wan man lay no longer sick, the latter rose unexpectedly on one arm, caught both his hands and covered them with kisses. A simple childish impulse, followed by what seemed to himself to be babyish tears; but then he doubted, as he felt that strong warm hand on his shoulder, if this man had not been an evangel to him, a very saviour, if in his forgiveness he had not gotten his lost youth again, if his soul had not found perchance its second birth.

And so, when he was strong enough, he went back with Vallandigham to the Wood. It was red autumn then; the pines breathed resinous balm, soul-satisfying sweetness; the orchards were giving up their golden hoards; the grapes dripped their clustered purple drops from the vine; and later, as here and there the leaves in bunches of juicy oak and maple flamed up among somber growth, Etienne felt as if the angel of the Lord had dropped his coals of living fire in passing. So strength returned to him, and he went out at length, out to his work, the work that had ever awaited him, with eyes opened, vision purified, seeing God.

Winter found Vallandigham as autumn had, in this softened and glorified mood, this atoning, sacrificial spirit. He longed for Elle to give some sign by which he might find her, and lead her over shining ways to peace. His love for her was none the less, but greater; he gave her himself, his very soul, he wished so to fill the chasm between her and happiness. But he would have spurned himself if in that devotion he had recognized any wish to possess her for his own; he looked upon her already as the wife of another; he believed that all that was over. Yet still the lonely hours recurred; the memory of a grief that he could not forget, of the desolation that had sealed him, he once in a while turned anew to read the impress. But he stifled the sigh, and refused to give voice to the murmur. The year came round again, crowned with plenty. He had been faithful in one thing, and was made faithful over many; all undertakings prospered with Vallandigham. But among the spring blossoms he plucked up a new purpose. Why should Elle waste all the flower of her youth? He would put away foolish scruples, and seek her now, not for himself, but for another; he was so sure of himself that he could.

Vallandigham was in the city on the day that he fully formed this resolution, whither he had gone at Etienne's summons. A painting lay on the easel there, which he, first of all the world, was to behold. Vallandigham went, wondering that he should be chosen, expecting some scene of equatorial richness, where there should be too much for you to feel how little; he was not prepared for the thing before him.

A large canvas reigned by semi-tones of color, nameless and ineffable sea-tints, that on the right seemed fusing into purple; but as you gazed there you saw, instead, that dimmest veils of azure wrapped a region where breakers gored the turbid swell, and where some island splinter pierced it forever, plumed in snow. But beyond and all round was calm—no dead glassy calm, but one in which the clouds are gathered for the land, varied in hue through light and shadow by that mighty inner motion sufficient to itself. Nothing but sea—no shore line, no approaching billow, infinity that broke no more with showers of spray on any scattering point, that amassed itself in the deep bosom of that far horizon which seemed to compass the roundness of the globe, that line of lapis lazuli, in which were centred all the broad fields of ocean, all icy tracts of tempest, all summer sheets of swooning stillness. It was the sea that seems to roll in from eternity, to drown regret and pain, to solace and to rest you with its vast idea, to carry forth your spirit, and to lose it in mighty depths. Over the great plain, where emerald broke to beryl and beryl flashed to amber, stretched a tented sky, that served only to screen the dazzling light behind it. Far above, in the middle distance on the left, a frigate spread its long wings and rested in sleep on the airy tides; while close at hand, amidst the shimmering gray, rocked a mass of the wandering Gulf weed, strung with its scarlet berries.

As Vallandigham stood speechless and rapt before it, viewing it as no critic, but simply overcome by its spell of grandeur and burden of immortality, he groped in his own soul for the knowledge that it gave him; and though he could not fashion it into distincter thought, he felt that the one who had wrought here was at peace, and in league with all the beneficence of the universe.

"See!" said Etienne, at length. "If I had married, as I meant, I should never have done this."

"Why not?" said Vallandigham, turning upon him with something like anger.

"No," replied the other. "If I had met Eleanor differently; if there had been no gulf of honor and of right between us; if, in loving, we had used our highest faculties, and had not perpetually drawn upon selfish artifice—pique, pride, deceit; had soared, not sunk, marriage would have been for us that perfect state out of whose exceeding happiness I should have climbed to broader work and higher finish than this. But now I need no wife. Eleanor was to me my Rosalind. Art is my Juliet. Art is sufficient to me."

Down fell all poor Vallandigham's splendid dreams in the dust.

"And Eleanor—if she loves yet?" he said, between his teeth.

"That—that, indeed, would change all!" exclaimed Etienne, with a singular shadow sweeping over his face, and leaving it again white and radiant. "But she does not. While she did, I felt it still in every pulse. Then I was unworthy; now she has overlived it."

"And you, Etienne?"

"I am going away; I shall see you no more, until something warns me of my last winter, and I return to pass it with you. Then things will have faded to mist in our memories, like the clouds of the morning at noon. And then I can see her again, for she will be with you."

V.—A MAN AND A WOMAN.

Vallandigham went out with a heavy sorrow. His poor, forsaken Elle! If he could but find her; find her, and comfort her; give her his heart itself to tread on, instead of the shards and flints! Etienne was still beside him; and as they walked, suddenly the latter stopped, with a sharp, stinging syllable on his lips. Vallandigham staid to look also. It was a pawnbroker's window. His eye roamed up and down the hurly-burly of trinkets sprinkled there in the midst of dust and cobwebs, but saw nothing; then turning to Etienne he caught the parted lip, the flushing cheek, the glowing eye, and followed the direction of the glance till he found the object which seemed to have cast such a light upon the other's face. A tiny beetle fashioned from a single emerald, interlaced and filleted with gold, that seemed, as a sunbeam sparkled on it, to be winding through the intricate ways before it, the very Egyptian scarabæus. The color shot over Vallandigham's face as well. Here was a clew to Elle at last! here was her ring! So intent was he on the thought that he did not feel the wringing of his hand; but when at the door he turned for Etienne he was gone.

The jewel was for sale, and the pawnbroker knew its value. But that comprised the sum of his knowledge. He knew nothing of the young woman who had brought it, except that she was a stranger in town and had been in haste for a train. So Vallandigham put the ring in his pocket, no wiser, much sadder, turned and resought the house that would never now, he felt, be any thing but the dreary tomb of dead desire.

As, having left the cars, he crossed the village and walked home through the wood he wondered that he had seen any joy in the year, any promise in the spring; the glooms always fell earlier, lay longer in this wood than elsewhere; when the mother died he would leave it and seek some wild, adventurous life. But before he had traversed it the sweet influences entered his soul once more—the mood melted, he kept dashing tears from his eyes and fancying that some gentler shadow flitted ever in advance before him under the verdant canopies—an inexplicable gladness welled into his heart from the old intermittent springs, and before he was aware he caught himself caroling out in a bold clear voice,

"Sweet's the lavrock's note and lang,
Lilting wildly up the glen;
But aye to me he sings ae sang—
Will ye no come back again?"

While the tune was yet on his lips, some one came down and met him—some one who had heard his light-hearted singing, and who preferred to meet him beneath the boughs. She stood at a little distance, not able to look up, waiting for him to move.

"Vallandigham, I have come home," she said.

"To stay, Elle?"

"If you will let me."

His heart gave a great bound, but he feared to show the gladness, lest in her capricious pride she should flutter away again, not daring to reflect that going as she did her heart returned a beggar. And so, side by side, and in silence, they went up to the house.

At tea, all the evening, there was a tender regard of her wants manifested by him, a perpetual solicitous attention, but the silence was broken only by casual talk on indifferent things; his old slowness of apprehension prevented his reading that in the hastily dropping eye, the half-drawn respiration, the lips parted and closed again, there was a desire for speech, for some allusion to be made by him, some point that might hinge explanation. So nothing came of it; the old pride rose and forbade her initiative, the old honor rose and forbade his awaking a slumbering past. Or would have risen; but in very truth it was too intuitive a thing with him ever to be at rest, and here it was not in himself and his past that his thoughts were plunged, they soared and wandered only round Elle and her future. She sat and looked at him while her mother chatted on the delighted current of uninterrupted, wondered that he asked no questions, that he cared nothing about the life she had led in all these weary months, if he had just magnanimously forgiven her, or if there were any warm pity, any old tenderness remaining in his heart for her. When he left the room it seemed to be vacant indeed—her mother's happy little voice to be but the hum of empty air. She felt his returning foot along the passage again before she heard it; and as he re-entered her face lighted up so clearly that she bent over her work to hide it. The mother had already recited all his filial care for her. It seemed as she had listened that he grew ever larger in her view; he reached, too, fully the height to which, ever brooding on his memory during the last half year—remembering the wrong she had done him, conjecturing the way he had endured it—she had raised him. There seemed to be a virtue in his very presence—it was so still, so soothing, and her soul was so vexed and pained. She saw the grand calm to which he had lifted himself; but then there was a trace of melancholy in the countenance, a touch of gray in the hair. He never used to stoop as he walked. Great emotions had furrowed that soul; and feeling out of what tumult he had gained the rest, her very heart bled again. Then, too, it was impossible to penetrate his thoughts. He could not help remembering their mutual circumstances—why did he not choose to speak of them? In that lay much to pique her fancy and her longing. It grew later in the evening, and still he continued the same—quiet, gentle, most kind; but was that to be all? Here was her mother, no pillar of support, no comfort, no strength, but one to whom she must be whatever those words implied; and for herself, she yearned for some strong heart to beat for her, some strong conscience to direct her, some strong arm to uphold her. She was weary with her journey, weary with her warring thoughts at length, and rose to go to rest. She knew she must go first or last, or perhaps she would never have risen to go at all; for being near him, she felt like some creature warmed and eased in the sun. She was so glad to be here once more, to touch upon the old delight of home. Of course he cared, sympathized there, felt as he used to feel a dozen years ago for his little cousin Elle—but only so? As she bade him good-night the petulant tears filled her eyes, and she turned away quickly, that he might not see them fall. But Vallandigham's serious eyes grew full of tears themselves as he thought she little knew the reason she had for her own.

But in the morning, refreshed and alert, daylight's courage entered Eleanor's will. She must know the truth—stay here as she had hoped—wildly, vainly hoped in coming—or go away again. Pride must fall, and as she said it she saw from her window Vallandigham coming with a springing step out of the hemlocks, shaking the boughs till the dew made a thousand prisms, and all his heart full of the yesterday gladness that again and unaccountably overcame him. It argued ill for her, but down she went a second time and met him. He turned about with her, and they wandered round their old haunts, recalling the old days of their childhood, living again in the old memories. At length they sat down on the opposite boughs of an old fallen oak.

"Val!" she said, suddenly. "Do you know why I came home?"

Home!—it was such pleasure for him to hear her call it by that name once more.

"Dear Elle," he replied, "I don't ask."

"I wish you would."

He looked up in astonishment, and, after a minute, "Why, then?" he asked.

"To get my ring."

"Your ring! How did you know I had it?" he demanded then in blanker amazement.

"After I was ill—I was very ill—I had no money to pay my bills, and the people pestered me. And so—I had nothing else—and so I went to the city and pawned my ring; and then I came home for a day, and saw you and mamma, though neither of you saw me. When I had earned enough to redeem it—I earned a good deal, with painting leaves, and sewing, and music-lessons—I went. That was yesterday. The time had expired and it was sold. But when he described the purchaser I knew it could be no one but you, and so I had the courage again to come home. Dear Vallandigham, if you can ever forgive me and let me stay—" All this she said standing, not once glancing up, but calling out a great, piteous passion in his heart as he saw her, so sad, so appealing, so subdued, pale, and thin—the old luxuriant curls bound away, save here and there a little ring—rebellious as before, the elegant array vanished, no extrinsic ornament upon her, yet filling his heart with her simple, forlorn beauty more utterly than ever, when replete with smile and sparkle, as in the days gone by. He rose and crossed to her side. Every shade was melting in his soul before the rising sun.

"Your ring, Elle?" he said. "Do you want it?"

She extended her hand, and just indicated the waiting finger that had always worn it.

"Elle, dearest," he said, and his heart left its quaking, in a confident strength, "if I put it on your finger, do you know what it implies?"

"That I am going to—that I shall be—"

"My wife, darling?"

"Yes."

"And now most certainly?"

"Most certainly."

The ring slipped to its place as she spoke, and then the hand snatched away to clasp about his neck, while he bent with kisses to seal the face that lay on his bosom, white and still, in some ecstacy of repentant gratitude and love. All the world seemed changed to him—all the future brightened before him—and as they walked the wood itself seemed a living temple.

Elle gazed upon her ring once more. "It is the symbol of resurrection," said she.

"And our love has risen from the dead," replied Vallandigham.

But there they saw Mrs. Leighton stepping down through the dew to find them. Eleanor sprang to her mother's side, and began whispering, amidst tears and smiles, the joyful news.

Mrs. Leighton dared not trust her senses, and, at least, dared not trust time.

"She is mine! she is mine!" exclaimed Vallandigham, with exulting earnestness, on a returning flood of doubt.

"And what will you do with her?"

Vallandigham looked out through the wood glittering with morning, brimming with song, felt the little returning thing that clung to him, and with the sudden and intimate recognition of his perfect joy the tune burst from his lips again:

"And neist my heart I'll wear her,
For fear my jewel tine!"

SHAKSPEARE AND HOLLINGSBED.

"GREAT as was the genius of Shakspeare," says Coleridge, "his judgment was at least equal to it." This judgment is nowhere more clearly shown than in the use which he makes of the works which furnished the skeletons of his plays. Every student knows that Shakspeare obtained not only the naked outline, but many of the principal incidents and characters of his Historical Plays from the Chronicles of Hollingshed. But few are aware how much of language and expression he found in the Chronicles, which needed but a master touch, here and there, to become immortal. Hence passage after passage in the Plays is almost a verbal quotation from the Chronicles. In other cases a sentence contains a hint for the creation of a whole scene or an entire character. Shakspeare is so rich that he can afford to be indebted. His obligations to Hollingshed are nowhere greater than in Macbeth. This play was written during the last dozen years of his life, when he had leisure to perfect his work before giving it to the public, and is perhaps the most magnificent production of his genius. It is certainly the most complete. While some of his plays—Hamlet, for example—were revised, altered, and corrected, Macbeth seems to have been fully wrought out and elaborated before any part of it was written, and when once written to have received no after touches. Every speech is thoroughly Shaksperian, and none more so than those which have their original in Hollingshed. In perusing the following parallel passages the reader can not fail to note the unfailing judgment which has retained in the drama every word of the Chronicle which was worth retaining, and which often, by the mere change of a word or phrase, has transmuted bald prose into the highest poetry. The citations from the Chronicles are from the folio printed in 1587, which may be assumed to be the very edition in the hands of Shakspeare.

MACBETH.—ACT I.—SCENE 3.

(A Heath. Enter the three Witches.)

ALL.

The weird sisters, hand in hand....

(Enter Macbeth and Banquo.)

BANQUO.

How far is't called to Fores?—What are these,
So withered and so wild in their attire;
That look not like th' inhabitants o' the earth,
And yet are on't?

FIRST WITCH.

All hail, Macbeth! Hail to thee, thane of Glamis!

SECOND WITCH.

All hail, Macbeth! Hail to thee, thane of Cawdor!

THIRD WITCH.

All hail, Macbeth! that shalt be king hereafter!

BANQUO.

My noble partner

You greet with present grace and great prediction
Of noble having, and of royal hope,
That he seems rapt withal:—to me you speak not.

FIRST WITCH.

Lesser than Macbeth, and greater.

SECOND WITCH.

Not so happy, yet much happier.

THIRD WITCH.

Thou shalt get kings, though thou be none.

[Witches vanish.]

BANQUO.

Were such things here as we do speak about?
Or have we eaten on the insane root,
That takes the reason prisoner?

MACBETH.

Your children shall be kings.

BANQUO.

You shall be king....

BANQUO.

Are ye fantastical?....

ROSSE.

He bade me, from him, call thee Thane of Cawdor.

ANGUS.

Treasons, capital, confess'd and prov'd,
Have overthrown him.

CHRONICLES, VOL. II. P. 170.

It fortun'd as Makbeth and Banquho journeyed toward Fores, where the king then laid, they went sporting by the waie together, without other Companie, save onelie themselves, passing through the woods and the fields, when suddenlie in the midst of a laund, there met them three women in strange and wild apparell, resembling creatures of the elder world, whome, when they attentivelie beheld, wondering much at the sight, the first of them spake and said, All haile Makbeth, thane of Glamis (for he had latelie entered into that dignitie and office by the death of his father Sinell). The second of them said, All haile Makbeth, thane of Cawdor. But the third said, All haile Makbeth, that hereafter shall be king of Scotland.

Then Banquho, What manner of women (saith he) are you that seeme so little favourable unto me, whereas, to my fellow here, besides high offices, ye assigne also the kingdome, appointing forsooth nothing for me at all. Yes (saith the first of them) we promise greater benefits unto thee than unto him, for he shall reigne in deed, but with an unluckie end, neither shall he leave any issue behind him to succeed in his place, where contrarilie thou in deed shalt not reigne at all, but of thee those shall be borne, which shall governe the Scottish kingdome by long order of continuall descent. Herewith the foresaid women vanished immediately out of their sight. This was reputed at the first but some vaine fantastick illusion by Makbeth and Banquho, in-somuch that Banquho would call Makbeth in jest king of Scotland; and Makbeth againe would call him in sport likewise, the father of manie kings. But afterwards, the common opinion was, that these women were either the weird sisters, that is (as ye woulde say), the goddesses of destinie, or else some nymphs or feiries, indued with knowledge or prophesie by their necromantick science, because everie thing came to pass as they had spoken. For shortly after, the thane of Cawdor, being condemned at Fores of treason against the king committed, his lands, livings, and offices were given of the king's liberalitie to Makbeth.

ACT II.—SCENE 4.

DUNCAN.

We will establish our estate upon
Our eldest, Malcolm, whom we name hereafter,
The Prince of Cumberland.

MACBETH.

The Prince of Cumberland!—That is a step,
On which I must fall down, or else o'erleap,
For in my way it lies.

Lady Macbeth is barely mentioned by Hollingshed. He says: "The words of the three weird sisters also greatly encouraged him hereunto, but specialie his wife lay sore upon him to attempt the thing, as she was very ambitious, burning with unquenchable desire to beare the name of a queene." From this bare hint Shakspeare has created the whole character of Lady Macbeth. Compare with this brief sentence of

ACT I.—SCENE 7.

LADY MACBETH.

When Duncan is asleep....

....His two chamberlains

Will I with wine and wassail so convince....

ACT II.—SCENE 2.

LADY MACBETH.

That which hath made them drunk, hath made me
bold:

That which hath quench'd them, hath given me fire.

....The doors are open,

And the surfeited grooms do mock their charge with snores....

That death and nature do contend about them.

Whether they live or die....

MACBETH.

O, yet I do repent me of my fury,

That I did kill them....

....Here lay Duncan,

His silver skin laced with his golden blood

....There the murderers

Steeped in the colors of their trade, their daggers

Unmannerly breeched with gore.

ACT II.—SCENE 3.

LENNOX.

The night has been unruly.

MACBETH.

'Twas a rough night.

ACT II.—SCENE 4.

ROSSE.

By the clock, 'tis day.

And yet dark night strangles the travelling lamp.

It's night's predominance on the day's shame

That darkness does the face of earth entomb

When living light should kiss it....

OLD MAN.

A falcon, tow'ring in his pride of place,

Was by a mousing owl hawk'd at and killed.

ROSSE.

And Duncan's horses....

Beauteous and swift,

OLD MAN.

'Tis said they ate each other.

.....

ROSSE.

Where is Duncan's body?

MACDUFF.

Carried to Colme-kill,

The sacred storehouse of his predecessors.

CHRONICLES, VOL. II. P. 171.

Duncan having two sons....he made the elder of them, called Malcolme, Prince of Cumberland, as it was thereby to appoint him his successor in his kingdom immediately after his decease, Makbeth sorelie troubled herewith....he began to take counsell how he might usurpe the kingdom by force....

the Chronicler the wonderful temptation scenes in Macbeth, the murder of Duncan, the banquet, and the final breaking-down of that strong nature, overborne by the effort to uphold her husband's weaker nature. The four following citations from Hollingshed belong to the murder of King Duff by Donald. Shakspeare has interwoven them into the murder of Duncan by Macbeth:

CHRONICLES, VOL. II. P. 150.

At length, having talked with them a long time, he got him into his privie chamber, onelie with two of his chamberlains, who having brought him to bed, came forth againe, and then fell to banquetting with Donwald and his wife, who had prepared diverse delicate dishes, and sundrie sorts of drinks for their reare supper or collation, whereat they sat up so long till they had charged their stomachs with such full gorges, that their heads were no sooner got to the pillow, but asleepe they were so fast that a man might have removed the chamber ouer them sooner than to have awakened them out of their droonken sleepe.

Donwald....in the morning, when the noise was raised in the king's chamber, how the king was slaine, his bodie conueied awaie, and the bed all beuraied with blood....with the watch ran thither, as though he had knowne nothing of the matter, and breaking into the chamber....and finding....blood....he forthwith slue the chamberlains as guilty of that heinous murther, and then like a mad man running to and fro....he burdened the chamberlains whome he had slaine with all the fault.

CHRONICLES, VOL. II. P. 171.

After the murder of King Duffe, for the space of six months together there appeared no sunne by daye, nor moone by night, in anie part of the realme; but stille the sky was covered with continuall clouds; and sometimes outrageous winds arose....

Monstrous sights also that were seene within the Scottish kingdom that yeere were these: horses in Louthian being of singular beautie and swiftnesse, did eat their owne flesh....There was a sparhawke also strangled by an owle. Neither was it anie lesse wonder that the sunne, as before is said, was continually covered with clouds for six months space.

The bodie of Duncane....was conueied unto Colme-kill, and there laid in a sepulture among his predecessors.

ACT III.—SCENE I.

MACBETH.

Our fears in Banquo

Stick deep....

They hailed him father to a line of kings:
Upon my head they placed a fruitless crown,
And put a barren sceptre in my gripe,
Thence to be wrenched by an unlineal hand,
No son of mine succeeding.

ACT IV.—SCENE 1.

APPARITION.

Macbeth! Macbeth! Macbeth! beware Macduff.
Beware the Thane of Fife....

Be bloody, bold, and resolute, laugh to scorn
The power of man, for none of woman born,
Shall harm Macbeth....

Macbeth shall never vanquish'd be, until Great Birnam wood to high Dunsinane hill
Shall come against him.

ACT IV.—SCENE 3.

MACDUFF.

Each new morn,

New widows howl; new orphans cry; new sorrows
Strike heaven on the face, that it resounds
As if it felt for Scotland, and yell'd out
Like syllable of dolour.

MALCOLM.

What I believe, I'll wail....

What you have spoke, it may be so, perchance....
You may deserve of him through me....

MACDUFF.

I am not treacherous.

MALCOLM.

But Macbeth is.

A good and virtuous nature may recoil
At an imperial charge....
When I shall tread upon the tyrant's head,
Or wear it on my sword, yet my poor country
Shall have more vices than it had before;
More suffer, and more sundry ways than ever,
By him that shall succeed.

MACDUFF.

Whom should he be?

MALCOLM.

It is myself I mean....

....There is no bottom, none,
In my voluptuousness: your wives, your daughters,
Your matrons and your maids, could not fill up
The cistern of my lust;....

....Better Macbeth
Than such an one to reign.

MACDUFF.

Boundless intemperance

In nature is a tyranny; it hath been
The untimely emptying of the happy throne,
And fall of many kings. But fear not yet
To take upon you what is yours: you may Enjoy your pleasures in a spacious plenty,
And yet seem cold, the time you may so hoodwink.
We have willing dames enough....

MALCOLM.

With this there grows,

In my most ill-compos'd affection, such
A stanchless avarice, that were I king,
I should cut off the nobles for their lands;
Desire his jewels, and this other's house

....I should forge

Quarrels unjust against the good and loyal,
Destroying them for wealth.

CHRONICLES, VOL. II. P. 172.

The words of the three weird sisters would not out of his mind, which as they promised him the kingdome, so likewise did they promise it at the same time unto the posterity of Banquho.

CHRONICLES, VOL. II. P. 174.

He had learned of certeine wizzards how that he ought to take heed of Makduffe, who in time to come should seeke to destroie him. And surelie hereupon had he put Makduffe to death, but that a certeine witch, whom he had in great trust, had told him that he should never be slaine with man borne of anie woman, nor vanquished till the wood of Birnane came to the castell of Dunsinane.

CHRONICLES, VOL. II. P. 174.

Makduffe was....gotten into England unto Malcolm Canmore....At his coming into Malcolme, he declared into what great miserie the estate of Scotland was brought....

....Malcolme hearing Makduffe's words bewailing the miserable state of his countrie....yet doubting whether he were come as one that ment unfeinedlie as he spake, or else as sent from Makbeth to betraie him....answered as followeth:

I am trulie verie sorrie for the miserie chanced to my countrie of Scotland, but though I have never so great affection to relieve the same, yet by reason of certeine incurable vices, which reigne in me, I am nothing meet thereto....

....First such immoderate lust and voluptuous sensualitie (the abhominable founteine of all vices) followeth me, that if I were made king of Scots, I should seeke to deflowre your maids and matrons, in such wise that mine intemperance should be no more importable unto you, than the bloodie tyrannie of Makbeth now is. Hereunto Makduff answered: This suerlie is a verie evill fault, for manie noble princes and kings have lost both lives and kingdoms for the same; nevertheless there are women enow in Scotland, and therefore follow my counsell. Make thy selfe king, and I will conveie the matter so wiselie that thou shalt be so satisfied at thy pleasure in such secret wise that no man shall be aware thereof.

Then said Malcolme, I am also the most avaritious creature on the earth, so that if I were king, I should seeke so manie ways to get land and goods that I would slea the most part of all the nobles of Scotland by surmized accusations, to the end I might

MACDUFF.

This avarice
Sticks deeper; grows with more pernicious root Than Summer-seeming lust, and it hath been
The sword of our slain kings: yet do not fear;
Scotland hath foisons to fill up your will,
Of your mere own: all these are portable,
With other graces weighed.

MALCOLM.

The king-becoming graces,
As justice, verity, temperance, stableness,
Bounty, perseverance, mercy, lowliness,
I have no relish of them; but abound
In the division of each several crime,
Acting it many ways....
If such a one be fit to govern, speak:
I am as I have spoken.

MACDUFF.

Fit to govern!
No, not to live!—Oh nation miserable,
With an untitled tyrant bloody sceptred,
When shalt thou see thy wholesome days again
Since that the truest issue of thy throne
By his own interdiction stands accursed?

....Fare thee well!

These evils thou reportest of thyself
Have banished me from Scotland.—Oh my breast
Thy hope ends here!

MALCOLM.

Macduff, this noble passion,
Child of integrity, hath from my soul
Wip'd the black scruples, reconcil'd my thoughts
To thy good truth and honour. Devilish Macbeth
By many of these trains hath sought to win me
Into his power; and modest wisdom plucks me
From over-credulous haste: but God above
Deal between thee and me! for even now
I put myself to thy direction, and Unspeak mine own detraction; here abjure
The taints and blames I laid upon myself,
For strangers to my nature. I am yet
Unknown to woman; never was forsworn;
Scarcely have coveted what was mine own;
At no time broke my faith; would not betray
The devil to his fellow, and delight
Not less in truth than life: my first false speaking
Was this upon myself. What I am truly,
Is thine, and my poor country's, to command:
Whither, indeed, before thy here-approach,
Old Siward, with ten thousand warlike men,
Already at a point, was setting forth:

ACT V.—SCENE 4.

MALCOLM.

Let every soldier hew him down a bough,
And bear't before him.

ACT V.—SCENE 5.

MACBETH.

I pull in resolution; and begin
To doubt the equivocation of the fiend
That lies like truth: Fear not, till Birnam wood
Do come to Dunsinane; and now a wood
Comes towards Dunsinane.—Arm, arm and out!—
If this which he avouches doth appear,
There is no flying hence, nor tarrying here.

VOL. XXIII.—No. 136.—I 1

injoy their lands, goods, and possessions.... Makduffe to this made answer, how it was a far worse fault than the other: for avarice is the root of all mischiefe, and for that crime the most part of our kings have been slaine and brought to their finall end; yet notwithstanding, follow my counsell and take upon thee the crowne. There is gold and riches enough in Scotland to satisfie thy greedie desire.

Then said Malcolme againe, I am furthermore inclined to dissimulation, telling of leasings, and all other kinds of deceit, so that I naturalie rejoyse in nothing so much as to betraie and deceive such as put anie trust or confidence in my words. Then, sith there is nothing that more becometh a prince than constancie, veritie, truth, and justice, with the other laudable fellowship of those faire and noble vertues which are comprehended onelie in soothfast-nesse, and that lieing utterly overthroweth the same;
you see how unable I am to governe anie province or region: and therefore sith you have remedies to cloke and hide all the rest of my other vices, I praie you find shift to cloke this vice among the residue....

Then said Makduffe.... Oh ye unhappie and miserable Scottsmen.... Ye have one cursed and wicked tyrant that now reigneth over you, without anie right or title. This other that hath the right to the crowne.... by his owne confession, is not onely avarritious, and given to unsatiable lust, but so false a traitor withal, that no trust is to be had to anie word he speaketh. Adieu, Scotland, for now I accord my selfe a banished man forever, without comfort or consolation....

Malcolme said.... I have none of these vices before remembered, but have jested with thee in this manner, onelie to prove thy mind; for diverse times heretofore hath Makbeth sought by this manner of meanes to bring me into his hands.

Old Siward Earle of Northumberland was appointed with ten thousand men to go with him into Scotland.

CHRONICLES, VOL. II. P. 176.

Malcolme.... came the night before the battell into Birnam wood.... and commanded everie man to get a bough.... as big as he might beare to march forth therewith.

When Makbeth beheld them coming in this sort
.... he remembered himself that the prophesie.... of the coming of Birname wood to Dunsinane Castell, was likelie to be now fulfilled. Nevertheless he brought his men in order of Battell.

ACT V.—SCENE 7.

MACBETH.

Thou lovest labour :
As easy may'st thou the intrenchant air
With thy keen sword impress, as make me bleed.
I bear a charmed life, which must not yield
To one of woman borne.

MACDUFF.

Despair thy charm ;
And let the angel whom thou still hast served,
Tell thee Macduff was from his mother's womb Untimely ripp'd.

.....

SIWARD.

Had he his hurts before

ROSSE.

Aye, on the front.

SIWARD.

Why then, God's soldier be he !
Had I as many sons as I have hairs,
I would not wish them to a fairer death.

.....

MALCOLM.

My thanes and kinsmen,
Henceforth be earls, the first that ever Scotland,
In such an honour nam'd.

CHRONICLES, VOL. II. P. 176.

Makbeth perceiving that Makduffe was hard at his backe, leapt from his horsse, saing, Thou traitor, what meaneth it that thou shouldest in vaine follow me that am not appointed to be slaine by anie creature that is borne of a woman ?

But Makduffe...answered, saing, It is true,
Makbeth...for I am even he that thy wizzards have told thee of, who was never borne of my mother, but ripped out of her womb.

CHRONICLES, VOL. I. P. 192.

Earle Siward...sent his sonne with an armie to conquere the land, whose hap was there to be slaine :
and when his father heard the news, he demanded whether he received the wound whereof he died, in the forepart of his body or the hinderpart, and when it was told him that he received it in the forepart ;
I rejoise (saith he) even with all my heart, for I would not wish either to my sonne nor myselfe anie other kind of death.

CHRONICLES, VOL. II. P. 177.

Immediatelie after his coronation he called a par-lement at Forfair, in which...he created manie earles, lords, barons, and knights. Manie of them that before were thanes, were at this time made earles.

Parallels with Hollingshed, not less striking and numerous than those in Macbeth, occur in all the Historical Dramas. They show that Shakspeare must have been a diligent student of the four folios of the old Chronicler. We have here only space to present a single example from King Henry VIII. The two characters of Cardinal Wolsey, put into the mouths of Queen Katharine and Griffith, are taken almost word for word from Hollingshed. Yet the few changes made by the Dramatist have so stamped upon them the impress of his genius, that there are few passages in his works more thoroughly

Shaksperian in thought and expression :

HENRY VIII.—ACT IV.—SCENE 2.

KATHARINE.

He was a man

Of an unbounded stomach, ever ranking
Himself with princes ; one, that, by suggestion,
Tied all the kingdom : simony was fair play ;
His own opinion was his law : i' the presence
He would say untruths ; and be ever double,
Both in his words and meaning. He was never,
But where he meant to ruin, pitiful :
His promises were, as he then was, mighty ;
But his performance, as he is now, nothing.
Of his own body he was ill, and gave
The clergy ill example.

GRIFFITH.

This cardinal,

Though from a humble stock, undoubtedly
Was fashion'd to much honour from his cradle.
He was a scholar, and a ripe and good one ;
Exceeding wise, fair spoken, and persuading :
Lofty and sour to them that lov'd him not ; [mer.
But, to those men that sought him, sweet as sum-
And though he were unsatisfied in getting,
(Which was a sin) yet in bestowing, Madam,
He was most princely : ever witness for him,
Those twins of learning, that he rais'd in you,
Ipswich and Oxford ! one of which fell with him,
Unwilling to outlive the good that did it ;
The other, though unfinished, yet so famous,
So excellent in art, and still so rising,
That Christendom shall ever speak his virtue.
His overthrow heap'd happiness upon him ;
For then, and not till then, he felt himself,
And found the blessedness of being little :
And, to add greater honours to his age
Than man could give him, he died fearing God.

CHRONICLES, VOL. IV. P. 922.

This Cardinal was a man of a great stomach, for he compted himself equall with princes, and by craftie suggestion gat into his hands innumerable treasure : he forced little on simonie, and was not pittifull, and stood affectionate in his own opinion :
in open presence he would lie and saie untruth, and was double both in speech and meaning : he would promise much and perform little ; he was vicious of his bodie, and gave the clergie evill example.

CHRONICLES, VOL. IV. P. 917.

This Cardinal (as Edmund Campion in his historie of Ireland describeth him) was a man undoubtedly borne to honour...exceeding wise, faire spoken, high minded, full of revenge, vitious of his bodie, loftie to his enemies, were they never so big, to those that accepted and sought his friendship, wonderfull courteous, a ripe schoolman...insatiable to get, and more princelie in bestowing as appeareth by his two colleges at Ipswich and Oxenford, the one overthrowne with his fall, the other unfinished, and yet
...incomparable through Christendom.... Never happie till this his overthrow wherein he shewed such moderation, and ended so perfectlie, that the houre of his death did him more honour than all the pomp of his life passed.

ORLEY FARM.

BY ANTHONY TROLLOPE.—ILLUSTRATED BY J. E. MILLAIS.

CHAPTER XVII.

VON BAUHR.

IT will be remembered that Mr. Crabwitz was sent across from Lincoln's Inn to Bedford Row to ascertain the present address of old Mr. Round. "Mr. Round is at Birmingham," he said, coming back. "Every one connected with the profession is at Birmingham, except—"

"The more fools they," said Mr. Furnival.

"I am thinking of going down myself this evening," said Mr. Crabwitz. "As you will be out of town, Sir, I suppose I can be spared?"

"You too!"

"And why not me, Mr. Furnival? When all the profession is meeting together, why should not I be there as well as another? I hope you do not deny me my right to feel an interest in the great subjects which are being discussed."

"Not in the least, Mr. Crabwitz. I do not deny you your right to be Lord Chief Justice, if you can accomplish it. But you can not be Lord Chief Justice and my clerk at the same time. Nor can you be in my chambers if you are at Birmingham. I rather think I must trouble you to remain here, as I can not tell at what moment I may be in town again."

"Then, Sir, I'm afraid—" Mr. Crabwitz began his speech and then faltered. He was going to tell Mr. Furnival that he must suit himself with another clerk, when he remembered his fees, and paused. It would be very pleasant to him to quit Mr. Furnival, but where could he get such another place? He knew that he himself was invaluable, but then he was invaluable only to Mr. Furnival. Mr. Furnival would be mad to part with him, Mr. Crabwitz thought; but then would he not be almost more mad to part with Mr. Furnival?

"Eh; well?" said Mr. Furnival.

"Oh! of course; if you desire it, Mr. Furnival, I will remain. But I must say I think it is rather hard."

"Look here, Mr. Crabwitz; if you think my service is too hard upon you, you had better leave it. But if you take upon yourself to tell me so again, you must leave it. Remember that." Mr. Furnival possessed the master mind of the two; and Mr. Crabwitz felt this as he slunk back to his own room.

So Mr. Round also was at Birmingham, and could be seen there. This was so far well; and Mr. Furnival, having again with ruthless malice sent Mr. Crabwitz for a cab, at once started for the Euston Square Station. He could master Mr. Crabwitz, and felt a certain pleasure in having done so; but could he master Mrs. F.? That lady had on one or two late occasions shown her anger at the existing state of her domestic affairs, and had once previously gone so far as to make her lord understand that she was jealous of his proceedings with reference to other goddesses. But she had never before done this in the presence of other people; she had never allowed any special goddess to see that she was the special object of such jealousy. Now she had not only committed herself in this way, but had also committed him, making him feel himself to be ridiculous; and it was highly necessary that some steps should be taken; if he only knew what step! All which kept his mind active as he journeyed in the cab.

At the station he found three or four other lawyers, all bound for Birmingham. Indeed, during this fortnight the whole line had been alive with learned gentlemen going to and fro, discussing weighty points as they rattled along the iron road, and shaking their ponderous heads at the new ideas which were being ventilated. Mr. Furnival, with many others—indeed, with most of those who were so far advanced in the world as to be making bread by their profession—was of opinion that all this palaver that was going on in the various tongues of Babel would end as it began—in words. "Vox et præterea nihil." To practical Englishmen most of these international congresses seem to arrive at nothing else. Men will not be talked out of the convictions of their lives. No living orator would convince a grocer that coffee should be sold without chicory; and no amount of eloquence will make an English lawyer think that loyalty to truth should come before loyalty to his client. And therefore our own pundits, though on this occasion they went to Birmingham, summoned by the greatness of the occasion, by the dignity of foreign names, by interest in the question, and by the influence of such men as Lord Boanerges, went there without any doubt on their minds as to the rectitude of their own practice, and fortified with strong resolves to resist all idea of change.

And indeed one can not understand how the bent of any man's mind should be altered by the sayings and doings of such a congress.

"Well, Johnson, what have you all been doing to-day?" asked Mr. Furnival of a special friend whom he chanced to meet at the club which had been extemporized at Birmingham.

"We have had a paper read by Von Bauhr. It lasted three hours."

"Three hours! Heavens! Von Bauhr is, I think, from Berlin."

"Yes; he and Dr. Slotacher. Slotacher is to read his paper the day after to-morrow."

"Then I think I shall go to London again. But what did Von Bauhr say to you during those three hours?"

"Of course it was all in German, and I don't suppose that any one understood him—unless it was Boanerges. But I believe it was the old story, going to show that the same man might be judge, advocate, and jury."

"No doubt; if men were machines, and if you could find such machines perfect at all points in their machinery."

"And if the machines had no hearts?"

"Machines don't have hearts," said Mr. Furnival; "especially those in Germany. And what did Boanerges say? His answer did not take three hours more, I hope."

"About twenty minutes; but what he did say was lost on Von Bauhr, who understands as much English as I do German. He said that the practice of the Prussian courts had always been to him a subject of intense interest, and that the general justice of their verdicts could not be impugned."

"Nor ought it, seeing that a single trial for murder will occupy a court for three weeks. He should have asked Von Bauhr how much work he usually got through in the course of a sessions. I don't seem to have lost much by being away. By-the-by, do you happen to know whether Round is here?"

"What, old Round? I saw him in the hall to-day yawning as though he would burst." And then Mr. Furnival strolled off to look for the attorney among the various purlicues frequented by the learned strangers.

"Furnival," said another barrister, accosting him—an elderly man, small, with sharp eyes and bushy eyebrows, dirty in his attire and poor in his general appearance, "have you seen Judge Staveley?" This was Mr. Chaffanbrass, great at the Old Bailey, a man well able to hold his own in spite of the meanness of his appearance. At such a meeting as this the English bar generally could have had no better representative than Mr. Chaffanbrass.

"No; is he here?"

"He must be here. He is the only man they could find who knows enough Italian to understand what that fat fellow from Florence will say to-morrow."

"We're to have the Italian to-morrow, are we?"

"Yes; and Staveley afterward. It's as good as a play; only, like all plays, it's three times too long. I wonder whether any body here believes in it?"

"Yes, Felix Graham does."

"He believes every thing—unless it is the Bible. He is one of those young men who look for an instant millennium, and who regard themselves not only as the prophets who foretell it, but as the preachers who will produce it. For myself, I am too old for a new gospel, with Felix Graham as an apostle."

"They say that Boanerges thinks a great deal of him."

"That can't be true, for Boanerges never thought much of any one but himself. Well, I'm off to bed, for I find a day here ten times more fatiguing than the Old Bailey in July."

On the whole the meeting was rather dull, as such meetings usually are. It must not be supposed that any lawyer could get up at will, as the spirit moved him, and utter his own ideas; or that all members of the congress could speak if only they could catch the speaker's eye. Had this been so, a man might have been supported by the hope of having some finger in the pie, sooner or later. But in such case the congress would have lasted forever. As it was, the names of those who were invited to address the meeting were arranged, and of course men from each country were selected who were best known in their own special walks of their profession. But then these best-known men took an unfair advantage of their position, and were ruthless in the lengthy cruelty of their addresses. Von Bauhr at Berlin was no doubt a great lawyer, but he should not have felt so confident that the legal proceedings of England and of the civilized world in general could be reformed by his reading that book of his from the rostrum in the hall at Birmingham! The civilized world in general, as there represented, had been disgusted, and it was surmised that poor Dr. Slotacher would find but a meagre audience when his turn came.

At last Mr. Furnival succeeded in hunting up Mr. Round, and found him recruiting outraged nature with a glass of brandy-and-water and a cigar. "Looking for me, have you? Well, here I am; that is to say, what is left of me. Were you in the hall to-day?"

"No; I was up in town."

"Ah! that accounts for your being so fresh. I wish I had been there. Do you ever do any thing in this way?" and Mr. Round touched the outside of his glass of toddy with his spoon. Mr. Furnival said that he never did do any thing in that way, which was true. Port wine was his way, and it may be doubted whether on the whole it is not the more dangerous way of the two. But Mr. Furnival, though he would not drink brandy-and-water or smoke cigars, sat down opposite to Mr. Round, and had soon broached the subject which was on his mind.

"Yes," said the attorney, "it is quite true that I had a letter on the subject from Mr. Mason. The lady is not wrong in supposing that some one is moving in the matter."

"And your client wishes you to take up the case again?"

"No doubt he does. He was not a man that I ever greatly liked, Mr. Furnival, though I believe he means well. He thinks that he has been ill used; and perhaps he was ill used—by his father."

"But that can be no possible reason for badgering the life out of his father's widow twenty years after his father's death."

"Of course he thinks that he has some new evidence. I can't say I looked into the matter much myself. I did read the letter; but that was all, and then I handed it to my son. As far as I remember, Mr. Mason said that some attorney at Hamworth had been to him."

"Exactly; a low fellow whom you would be ashamed to see in your office! He fancies that young Mason has injured him; and though he has received numberless benefits from Lady Mason, this is the way in which he chooses to be revenged on her son."

"We should have nothing to do with such a matter as that, you know. It's not our line."

"No, of course it is not; I am well aware of that. And I am equally well aware that nothing Mr. Mason can do can shake Lady Mason's title—or rather, her son's title—to the property. But, Mr. Round, if he be encouraged to gratify his malice—"

"If who be encouraged?"

"Your client, Mr. Mason of Groby—there can be no doubt that he might harass this unfortunate lady till he brought her nearly to the grave."

"That would be a pity, for I believe she's still an uncommon pretty woman." And the attorney indulged in a little fat inward chuckle; for in these days Mr. Furnival's taste with reference to strange goddesses was beginning to be understood by the profession.

"She is a very old friend of mine," said Mr. Furnival, gravely, "a very old friend indeed; and if I were to desert her now, she would have no one to whom she could look."

"Oh, ah, yes; I'm sure you're very kind;" and Mr. Round altered his face and tone so that they might be in conformity with those of his companion. "Any thing I can do, of course I shall be very happy. I should be slow, myself, to advise my client to try the matter again; but, to tell the truth, any thing of this kind would go to my son now. I did read Mr. Mason's letter, but I immediately handed it to Matthew."

"I will tell you how you can oblige me, Mr. Round."

"Do tell me; I am sure I shall be very happy."

"Look into this matter yourself, and talk it over with Mr. Mason before you allow any thing to be done. It is not that I doubt your son's discretion. Indeed we all know what an exceedingly good man of business he is."

"Matthew is sharp enough," said the prosperous father.

"But then young men are apt to be too sharp. I don't know whether you remember the case about that Orley Farm, Mr. Round."

"As well as if it were yesterday," said the attorney.

"Then you must recollect how thoroughly you were convinced that your client had not a leg to stand upon."

"It was I that insisted that he should not carry it before the Chancellor. Crook had the general management of those cases then, and would have gone on; but I said, no. I would not see my client's money wasted in such a wild-goose chase. In the first place, the property was not worth it; and, in the next place, there was nothing to impugn the will. If I remember right, it all turned on whether an old man who had signed as witness was well enough to write his name."

"That was the point."

"And I think it was shown that he had himself signed a receipt on that very day—or the day after, or the day before. It was something of that kind."

"Exactly; those were the facts. As regards the result of a new trial, no sane man, I fancy, could have any doubt. You know as well as any one living how great is the strength of twenty years of possession—"

"It would be very strong on her side, certainly."

"He would not have a chance; of course not. But, Mr. Round, he might make that poor woman so wretched that death would be a relief to her. Now it may be possible that something looking like fresh evidence may have been discovered; something of this kind probably has been found, or this man would not be moving; he would not have gone to the expense of a journey to Yorkshire had he not got hold of some new story."

"He has something in his head; you may be sure of that."

"Don't let your son be run away with by this, or advise your client to incur the terrible expense of a new trial, without knowing what you are about. I tell you fairly that I do dread such a trial on this poor lady's account. Reflect what it would be, Mr. Round, to any lady of your own family."

"I don't think Mrs. Round would mind it much—that is, if she were sure of her case."

"She is a strong-minded woman; but poor Lady Mason—"

"She was strong-minded enough too, if I remember right, at the last trial. I shall never forget how composed she was when old Bennett tried to shake her evidence. Do you remember how bothered he was?"

"He was an excellent lawyer, was Bennett. There are few better men at the bar nowadays."

"You wouldn't have found him down here, Mr. Furnival, listening to a German lecture three hours long. I don't know how it is, but I think we all used to work harder in those days than the young men do now." And then these eulogists of past days went back to the memories of their youths, declaring how in the old glorious years, now gone, no congress such as this would have had a chance of success. Men had men's work to do then, and were not wont to play the fool, first at one provincial town and then at another, but stuck to their oars and made their fortunes. "It seems to me, Mr. Furnival," said Mr. Round, "that this is all child's play, and to tell the truth I am half ashamed of myself for being here."

"And you'll look into that matter yourself, Mr. Round?"

"Yes, I will, certainly."

"I shall take it as a great favor. Of course you will advise your client in accordance with any new facts which may be brought before you; but as I feel certain that no case against young Mason can have any merits, I do hope that you will be able to suggest to Mr. Mason of Groby that the matter should be allowed to rest." And then Mr. Furnival took his leave, still thinking how far it might be possible that the enemy's side of the question might be supported by real merits. Mr. Round was a good-natured old fellow, and if the case could be inveigled out of his son's hands and into his own, it might be possible that even real merits should avail nothing.

THE GERMAN VON BAUHR.

"I confess I am getting rather tired of it," said Felix Graham that evening to his friend young Staveley, as he stood outside his bedroom door at the top of a narrow flight of stairs in the back part of a large hotel at Birmingham.

"Tired of it! I should think you are too."

"But nevertheless I am as sure as ever that good will come from it. I am inclined to think that the same kind of thing must be endured before any improvement is made in any thing."

"That all reformers have to undergo Von Bauhr?"

"Yes, all of them that do any good. Von Bauhr's words were very dry, no doubt."

"You don't mean to say that you understood them?"

"Not many of them. A few here and there, for the first half hour, came trembling home to my dull comprehension, and then—"

"You went to sleep."

"The sounds became too difficult for my ears; but dry and dull and hard at they were, they will not absolutely fall to the ground. He had a meaning in them, and that meaning will reproduce itself in some shape."

"Heaven forbid that it should ever do so in my presence! All the iniquities of which the English bar may be guilty can not be so intolerable to humanity as Von Bauhr."

"Well, good-night, old fellow; your governor is to give us his ideas to-morrow, and perhaps he will be as bad to the Germans as your Von Bauhr was to us."

"Then I can only say that my governor will be very cruel to the Germans." And so they two went to their dreams.

In the mean time Von Bauhr was sitting alone looking back on the past hours with ideas and views very different from those of the many English lawyers who were at that time discussing his demerits. To him the day had been one long triumph, for his voice had sounded sweet in his own ears as, period after period, he had poured forth in full flowing language the gathered wisdom and experience of his life. Public men in England have so much to do that they can not give time to the preparation of speeches for such meetings as these, but Von Bauhr had been at work on his pamphlet for months. Nay, taking it in the whole, had he not been at work on it for years? And now a kind Providence had given him the opportunity of pouring it forth before the assembled pundits gathered from all the nations of the civilized world.

As he sat there, solitary in his bedroom, his hands dropped down by his side, his pipe hung from his mouth on to his breast, and his eyes, turned up to the ceiling, were lighted almost with inspiration. Men there at the congress, Mr. Chaffanbrass, young Staveley, Felix Graham, and others, had regarded him as an impersonation of dullness; but through his mind and brain, as he sat there wrapped in his old dressing-gown, there ran thoughts which seemed to lift him lightly from the earth into an elysium of justice and mercy. And at the end of this elysium, which was not wild in its beauty, but trim and orderly in its gracefulness—as might be a beer-garden at Munich—there stood among flowers and vases a pedestal, grand above all other pedestals in that garden; and on this there was a bust with an inscription: "To Von Bauhr, who reformed the laws of nations."

It was a grand thought; and though there was in it much of human conceit, there was in it also much of human philanthropy. If a reign of justice could be restored through his efforts—through those efforts in which on this hallowed day he had been enabled to make so great a progress—how beautiful would it be! And then as he sat there, while the smoke still curled from his unconscious nostrils, he felt that he loved all Germans, all Englishmen, even all Frenchmen, in his very heart of hearts, and especially those who had traveled wearily to this English town that they might listen to the results of his wisdom. He said to himself, and said truly, that he loved the world, and that he would willingly spend himself in these great endeavors for the amelioration of its laws and the perfection of its judicial proceedings. And then he betook himself to bed in a frame of mind that was not unenviable.

I am inclined, myself, to agree with Felix Graham that such efforts are seldom absolutely wasted. A man who strives honestly to do good will generally do good, though seldom perhaps as much as he has himself anticipated. Let Von Bauhr have his pedestal among the flowers, even though it be small and humble.

CHAPTER XVIII.

THE ENGLISH VON BAUHR.

ON the following morning, before breakfast, Felix Graham and Augustus Staveley prepared themselves for the labors of the coming day by a walk into the country; for even at Birmingham, by perseverance, a walk into the country may be attained—and very pretty country it is when reached. These congress meetings did not begin before eleven, so that for those who were active time for matutinal exercise was allowed.

Augustus Staveley was the only son of the judge who on that day was to defend the laws of England from such attacks as might be made on them by a very fat advocate from Florence. Of Judge Staveley himself much need not be said now, except that he lived at Noningsby near Alston, distant from The Cleeve about nine miles, and that at his house Sophia Furnival had been invited to pass the coming Christmas. His son was a handsome, clever fellow, who had nearly succeeded in getting the Newdegate, and was now a member of the Middle Temple. He was destined to follow the steps of his father, and become a light at the Common Law bar; but hitherto he had not made much essential progress. The world had been too pleasant to him to allow of his giving many of his hours to work. His father was one of the best men in the world, revered on the bench, and loved by all men; but he had not sufficient parental sternness to admit of his driving his son well into harness. He himself had begun the world with little or nothing, and had therefore succeeded; but his son was already possessed of almost every thing that he could want, and therefore his success seemed doubtful. His chambers were luxuriously furnished, he had his horse in Piccadilly, his father's house at Noningsby was always open to him, and the society of London spread out for him all its allurements. Under such circumstances how could it be expected that he should work? Nevertheless he did talk of working, and had some idea in his head of the manner in which he would do so. To a certain extent he had worked, and he could talk fluently of the little that he knew. The idea of a far niente life would have been intolerable to him; but there were many among his friends who began to think that such a life would nevertheless be his ultimate destiny. Nor did it much matter, they said, for the judge was known to have made money.

But his friend Felix Graham was rowing in a very different boat; and of him also many prophesied that he would hardly be able to push his craft up against the strength of the stream. Not that he was an idle man, but that he would not work at his oars in the only approved method of making progress for his boat. He also had been at Oxford; but he had done little there except talk at a debating society, and make himself notorious by certain ideas on religious subjects which were not popular at the University. He had left without taking a degree, in consequence, as it was believed, of some such notions, and had now been called to the bar with a fixed resolve to open that oyster with such weapons, offensive and defensive, as nature had given to him. But here, as at Oxford, he would not labor on the same terms with other men, or make himself subject to the same conventional rules; and therefore it seemed only too probable that he might win no prize. He had ideas of his own that men should pursue their labors without special conventional regulations, but should be guided in their work by the general great rules of the world—such for instance as those given in the commandments: Thou shalt not bear false witness; Thou shalt not steal; and others. His notions no doubt were great, and perhaps were good; but hitherto they had not led him to much pecuniary success in his profession. A sort of a name he had obtained, but it was not a name sweet in the ears of practicing attorneys.

And yet it behooved Felix Graham to make money, for none was coming to him ready made from any father. Father or mother he had none, nor uncles and aunts likely to be of service to him. He had begun the world with some small sum, which had grown smaller and smaller, till now there was left to him hardly enough to create an infinitesimal dividend. But he was not a man to become downhearted on that account. A living of some kind he could pick up, and did now procure for himself, from the press of the day. He wrote poetry for the periodicals, and politics for the penny papers with considerable success and sufficient pecuniary results. He would sooner do this, he often boasted, than abandon his great ideas or descend into the arena with other weapons than those which he regarded as fitting for an honest man's hand.

Augustus Staveley, who could be very prudent for his friend, declared that marriage would set him right. If Felix would marry he would quietly slip his neck into the collar and work along with the team, as useful a horse as ever was put at the wheel of a coach. But Felix did not seem inclined to marry. He had notions about that also, and was believed by one or two who knew him intimately to cherish an insane affection for some unknown damsel, whose parentage, education, and future were not likely to assist his views in the outer world. Some said that he was educating this damsel for his wife—moulding her; so that she might be made fit to suit his taste; but Augustus, though he knew the secret of all this, was of opinion that it would come right at last. "He'll meet some girl in the world with a hatful of money, a pretty face, and a sharp tongue; then he'll bestow his moulded bride on a neighboring baker with two hundred pounds for her fortune; and every body will be happy."

Felix Graham was by no means a handsome man. He was tall and thin, and his face had been slightly marked with the small-pox. He stooped in his gait as he walked, and was often awkward with his hands and legs. But he was full of enthusiasm, indomitable, as far as pluck would make him so, in contests of all kinds, and when he talked on subjects which were near his heart there was a radiance about him which certainly might win the love of the pretty girl with the sharp tongue and the hatful of money. Staveley, who really loved him, had already selected the prize, and she was no other than our friend, Sophia Furnival. The sharp tongue and the pretty face and the hatful of money would all be there; but then Sophia Furnival was a girl who might perhaps expect in return for these things more than an ugly face which could occasionally become radiant with enthusiasm.

The two men had got away from the thickness of the Birmingham smoke, and were seated on the top rung of a gate leading into a stubble field. So far they had gone with mutual consent, but further than this Staveley refused to go. He was seated with a cigar in his mouth. Graham also was smoking, but he was accommodated with a short pipe.

"A walk before breakfast is all very well," said Staveley, "but I am not going on a pilgrimage. We are four miles from the inn this minute."

"And for your energies that is a good deal. Only think that you should have been doing any thing for two hours before you begin to feed."

"I wonder why matutinal labor should always be considered as so meritorious. Merely, I take it, because it is disagreeable."

"It proves that the man can make an effort."

"Every prig who wishes to have it believed that he does more than his neighbors either burns the midnight lamp or gets up at four in the morning. Good wholesome work between breakfast and dinner never seems to count for any thing."

"Have you ever tried?"

THE ENGLISH VON BAHR.

"Yes; I am trying now, here at Birmingham."

"Not you."

"That's so like you, Graham. You don't believe that any body is attending to what is going on except yourself. I mean to-day to take in the whole theory of Italian jurisprudence."

"I have no doubt that you may do so with advantage. I do not suppose that it is very good, but it must at any rate be better than our own. Come, let us go back to the town; my pipe is finished."

"Fill another, there's a good fellow. I can't afford to throw away my cigar, and I hate walking and smoking. You mean to assert that our whole system is bad, and rotten, and unjust?"

"I mean to say that I think so."

"And yet we consider ourselves the greatest people in the world—or at any rate the honestest."

"I think we are; but laws and their management have nothing to do with making people honest. Good laws won't make people honest, nor bad laws dishonest."

"But a people who are dishonest in one trade will probably be dishonest in others. Now, you go so far as to say that all English lawyers are rogues."

"I have never said so. I believe your father to be as honest a man as ever breathed."

"Thank you, Sir," and Staveley lifted his hat.

"And I would fain hope that I am an honest man myself."

"Ah, but you don't make money by it."

"What I do mean is this, that from our love of precedent and ceremony and old usages, we have retained a system which contains many of the barbarities of the feudal times, and also many of its lies. We try our culprit as we did in the old days of the ordeal. If luck will carry him through the hot plowshares, we let him escape though we know him to be guilty. We give him the advantage of every technicality, and teach him to lie in his own defense, if nature has not sufficiently so taught him already."

"You mean as to his plea of not guilty."

"No, I don't; that is little or nothing. We ask him whether or no he confesses his guilt in a foolish way, tending to induce him to deny it; but that is not much. Guilt seldom will confess at long as a chance remains. But we teach him to lie, or rather we lie for him during the whole ceremony of his trial. We think it merciful to give him chances of escape, and hunt him as we do a fox, in obedience to certain laws framed for his protection."

"And should he have no protection?"

"None certainly, as a guilty man; none which may tend toward the concealing of his guilt. Till that be ascertained, proclaimed, and made apparent every man's hand should be against him."

"But if he is innocent?"

"Therefore let him be tried with every possible care. I know you understand what I mean, though you look as though you did not. For the protection of his innocence let astute and good men work their best, but for the concealing of his guilt let no astute or good man work at all."

"And you would leave the poor victim in the dock without defense."

"By no means. Let the poor victim, as you call him—who in ninety-nine cases out of a hundred is a rat who has been preying in our granaries—let him, I say, have his defender—the defender of his possible innocence, not the protector of his probable guilt. It all resolves itself into this. Let every lawyer go into court with a mind resolved to make conspicuous to the light of day that which seems to him to be the truth. A lawyer who does not do that, who does the reverse of that, has in my mind undertaken work which is unfit for a gentleman and impossible for an honest man."

"What a pity it is that you should not have an opportunity of rivaling Von Bauhr at the congress!"

"I have no doubt that Von Bauhr said a great deal of the same nature; and what Von Bauhr said will not wholly be wasted, though it may not yet have reached our sublime understandings."

"Perhaps he will vouchsafe to us a translation."

"It would be useless at present, seeing that we can not bring ourselves to believe it possible that a foreigner should in any respect be wiser than ourselves. If any such point out to us our follies, we at once claim those follies as the special evidences of our wisdom. We are so self-satisfied with our own customs, that we hold up our hands with surprise at the fatuity of men who presume to point out to us their defects. Those practices in which we most widely depart from the broad and recognized morality of all civilized ages and countries are to us the Palladiums of our jurisprudence. Modes of proceeding which, if now first proposed to us, would be thought to come direct from the devil, have been made so sacred by time that they have lost all the horror of their falseness in the holiness of their age. We can not understand that other nations look upon such doings as we regard the human sacrifices of the Brahmins; but the fact is that we drive a Juggernaut's car through every assize town in the country, three times a year, and allow it to be dragged ruthlessly through the streets of the metropolis at all times and seasons. Now come back to breakfast, for I won't wait here any longer." Seeing that these were the ideas of Felix Graham, it is hardly a matter of wonder that such men as Mr. Furnival and Mr. Round should have regarded his success at the bar as doubtful.

"Uncommon bad mutton-chops these are!" said Staveley, as they sat at their meal in the coffee-room of the Imperial Hotel.

"Are they?" said Graham. "They seem to me much the same as other mutton-chops."

"They are uneatable. And look at this for coffee! Waiter, take this away, and have some made fresh."

"Yes, Sir," said the waiter, striving to escape without further comment.

"And waiter—"

"Yes, Sir;" and the poor overdriven functionary returned.

"Ask them from me whether they know how to make coffee. It does not consist of an unlimited supply of lukewarm water poured over an infinitesimal proportion of chiccory. That process, time-honored in the hotel line, will not produce the beverage called coffee. Will you have the goodness to explain that in the bar as coming from me?"

"Yes, Sir," said the waiter; and then he was allowed to disappear.

"How can you give yourself so much trouble with no possible hope of an advantageous result?" said Felix Graham.

"That's what you weak men always say. Perseverance in such a course will produce results. It is because we put up with bad things that hotel-keepers continue to give them to us. Three or four Frenchmen were dining with my father yesterday at the King's Head, and I had to sit at the bottom of the table. I declare to you that I literally blushed for my country; I did indeed. It was useless to say any thing then, but it was quite clear that there was nothing that one of them could eat. At any hotel in France you'll get a good dinner; but we're so proud that we are ashamed to take lessons." And thus Augustus Staveley was quite as loud against his own country, and as laudatory with regard to others, as Felix Graham had been before breakfast.

And so the congress went on at Birmingham. The fat Italian from Tuscany read his paper; but as he, though judge in his own country and reformer here in England, was somewhat given to comedy, this morning was not so dull as that which had been devoted to Von Bauhr. After him Judge Staveley made a very elegant, and some said, a very eloquent speech; and so that day was done. Many other days also wore themselves away in this process; numerous addresses were read, and answers made to them, and the newspapers for the time were full of law. The defense of our own system, which was supposed to be the most remarkable for its pertinacity, if not for its justice, came from Mr. Furnival, who roused himself to a divine wrath for the occasion. And then the famous congress at Birmingham was brought to a close, and all the foreigners returned to their own countries.

CHAPTER XIX.

THE STAVELEY FAMILY.

THE next two months passed by without any events which deserve our special notice, unless it be that Mr. Joseph Mason and Mr. Dockwrath had a meeting in the room of Mr. Matthew Round, in Bedford Row. Mr. Dockwrath struggled hard to effect this without the presence of the London attorney; but he struggled in vain. Mr. Round was not the man to allow any stranger to tamper with his client, and Mr. Dockwrath was forced to lower his flag before him. The result was that the document or documents which had been discovered at Hamworth were brought up to Bedford Row; and Dockwrath at last made up his mind that as he could not supplant Matthew Round, he would consent to fight under him as his lieutenant—or even as his sergeant or corporal, if no higher position might be allowed to him.

"There is something in it, certainly, Mr. Mason," said young Round; "but I can not undertake to say as yet that we are in a position to prove the point."

"It will be proved," said Mr. Dockwrath.

"I confess it seems to me very clear," said Mr. Mason, who by this time had been made to understand the bearings of the question. "It is evident that she chose that day for her date because those two persons had then been called upon to act as witnesses to that other deed."

"That of course is our allegation. I only say that we may have some difficulty in proving it."

"The crafty, thieving swindler!" exclaimed Mr. Mason.

"She has been sharp enough if it is as we think," said Round, laughing; and then there was nothing more done in the matter for some time, to the great disgust both of Mr. Dockwrath and Mr. Mason. Old Mr. Round had kept his promise to Mr. Furnival; or, at least, had done something toward keeping it. He had not himself taken the matter into his own hands, but he had begged his son to be cautious. "It's not the sort of business that we care for, Mat," said he; "and as for that fellow down in Yorkshire, I never liked him." To this Mat had answered that neither did he like Mr. Mason; but as the case had about it some very remarkable points, it was necessary to look into it; and then the matter was allowed to stand over till after Christmas.

We will now change the scene to Noningsby, the judge's country seat, near Alston, at which a party was assembled for the Christmas holidays. The judge was there of course—without his wig, in which guise I am inclined to think that judges spend the more comfortable hours of their existence; and there also was Lady Staveley, her presence at home being altogether a matter of course, inasmuch as she had no other home than Noningsby. For many years past, ever since the happy day on which Noningsby had been acquired, she had repudiated London; and the poor judge, when called upon by his duties to reside there, was compelled to live like a bachelor, in lodgings. Lady Staveley was a good, motherly, warm-hearted woman, who thought a great deal about her flowers and fruit, believing that no one else had them so excellent—much also about her butter and eggs, which in other houses were, in her opinion, generally unfit to be eaten; she thought also a great deal about her children, who were all swans—though, as she often observed with a happy sigh, those of her neighbors were so uncommonly like geese. But she thought most of all of her husband, who in her eyes was the perfection of all manly virtues. She had made up her mind that the position of a puisne judge in England was the highest which could fall to the lot of any mere mortal. To become a Lord Chancellor, or a Lord Chief Justice, or a Chief Baron, a man must dabble with Parliament, politics, and dirt; but the bench-fellows of these politicians were selected for their wisdom, high conduct, knowledge, and discretion. Of all such selections, that made by the late king when he chose her husband, was the one which had done most honor to England, and had been in all its results most beneficial to Englishmen. Such was her creed with reference to domestic matters.

The Staveley young people at present were only two in number, Augustus, namely, and his sister Madeline. The eldest daughter was married, and therefore, though she spent these Christmas holidays at Noningsby, must not be regarded as one of the Noningsby family. Of Augustus we have said enough; but as I intend that Madeline Staveley shall, to many of my readers, be the most interesting personage in this story, I must pause to say something of her. I must say something of her; and as, with all women, the outward and visible signs of grace and beauty are those which are thought of the most, or at any rate spoken of the oftenest, I will begin with her exterior attributes. And that the muses may assist me in my endeavor, teaching my rough hands to draw with some accuracy the delicate lines of female beauty, I now make to them my humble but earnest prayer.

Madeline Staveley was at this time about nineteen years of age. That she was perfect in her beauty I can not ask the muses to say, but that she will some day become so, I think the goddesses may be requested to prophesy. At present she was very slight, and appeared to be almost too tall for her form. She was indeed above the average height of women, and from her brother encountered some ridicule on this head; but not the less were all her movements soft, graceful, and fawn-like as should be those of a young girl. She was still at this time a child in heart and spirit, and could have played as a child had not the instinct of a woman taught to her the expediency of a staid demeanor. There is nothing among the wonders of womanhood more wonderful than this, that the young mind and young heart—hearts and minds young as youth can make them, and in their natures as gay—can assume the gravity and discretion of threescore years and maintain it successfully before all comers. And this is done, not as a lesson that has been taught, but as the result of an instinct implanted from the birth. Let us remember the mirth of our sisters in our homes, and their altered demeanors when those homes were opened to strangers; and remember also that this change had come from the inward working of their own feminine natures!

But I am altogether departing from Madeline Staveley's external graces. It was a pity almost that she should ever have become grave, because with her it was her smile that was so lovely. She smiled with her whole face. There was at such moments a peculiar laughing light in her gray eyes, which inspired one with an earnest desire to be in her confidence; she smiled with her soft cheek, the light tints of which would become a shade more pink from the excitement, as they softly rippled into dimples; she smiled with her forehead which would catch the light from her eyes and arch itself in its glory; but above all she smiled with her mouth, just showing, but hardly showing, the beauty of the pearls within. I never saw the face of a woman whose mouth was equal in pure beauty, in beauty that was expressive of feeling, to that of Madeline Staveley. Many have I seen with a richer lip, with a more luxurious curve, much more tempting as baits to the villainy and rudeness of man; but never one that told so much by its own mute eloquence of a woman's happy heart and a woman's happy beauty. It was lovely as I have said in its mirth, but if possible it was still more lovely in its woe; for then the lips would separate, and the breath would come, and in the emotion of her suffering the life of her beauty would be unrestrained.

Her face was oval, and some might say that it was almost too thin; they might say so till they knew it well, but would never say so when they did so know it. Her complexion was not clear, though it would be wrong to call her a brunette. Her face and forehead were never brown, but yet she could not boast the pure pink and the pearly white which go to the formation of a clear complexion. For myself, I am not sure that I love a clear complexion. Pink and white alone will not give that hue which seems best to denote light and life, and to tell of a mind that thinks and of a heart that feels. I can name no color in describing the soft changing tints of Madeline Staveley's face, but I will make bold to say that no man ever found it insipid or inexpressive.

And now what remains for me to tell? Her nose was Grecian, but perhaps a little too wide at the nostril to be considered perfect in its chiseling. Her hair was soft and brown—that dark brown which by some lights is almost black; but she was not a girl whose loveliness depended much upon her hair. With some women it is their great charm—Næaras who love to sit half sleeping in the shade—but it is a charm that possesses no powerful eloquence. All beauty of a high order should speak, and Madeline's beauty was ever speaking. And now that I have said that, I believe that I have told all that may be necessary to place her outward form before the inward eyes of my readers.

In commencing this description I said that I would begin with her exterior; but it seems to me now that in speaking of these I have sufficiently noted also that which was within. Of her actual thoughts and deeds up to this period it is not necessary for our purposes that any thing should be told; but of that which she might probably think or might possibly do, a fair guess may, I hope, be made from that which has been already written.

Such was the Staveley family. Those of their guests whom it is necessary that I should now name, have been already introduced to us. Miss Furnival was there, as was also her father. He had not intended to make any prolonged stay at Noningsby—at least so he had said in his own drawing-room; but nevertheless he had now been there for a week, and it seemed probable that he might stay over Christmas-day. And Felix Graham was there. He had been asked with a special purpose by his friend Augustus, as we already have heard; in order, namely, that he might fall in love with Sophia Furnival, and by the aid of her supposed hatful of money avoid the evils which would otherwise so probably be the consequence of his highly impracticable turn of mind. The judge was not averse to Felix Graham; but as he himself was a man essentially practical in all his views, it often occurred that, in his mild, kindly way, he ridiculed the young barrister. And Sir Peregrine Orme was there, being absent from home as on a very rare occasion; and with him of course were Mrs. Orme and his grandson. Young Perry was making, or was prepared to make, somewhat of a prolonged stay at Noningsby. He had a horse there with him for the hunting, which was changed now and again; his groom going backward and forward between that place and The Cleeve. Sir Peregrine, however, intended to return before Christmas, and Mrs. Orme would go with him. He had come for four days, which for him had been a long absence from home, and at the end of the four days he would be gone.

They were all sitting in the dining-room round the luncheon-table on a hopelessly wet morning, listening to a lecture from the judge on the abomination of eating meat in the middle of the day, when a servant came behind young Orme's chair and told him that Mr. Mason was in the breakfast-parlor and wished to see him.

"Who wishes to see you?" said the baronet, in a tone of surprise. He had caught the name, and thought at the moment that it was the owner of Groby Park.

"Lucius Mason," said Peregrine, getting up. "I wonder what he can want me for?"

"Oh, Lucius Mason," said the grandfather. Since the discourse about agriculture he was not personally much attached even to Lucius; but for his mother's sake he could be forgiven.

"Pray ask him in to lunch," said Lady Staveley. Something had been said about Lady Mason since the Ormes had been at Noningsby, and the Staveley family were prepared to regard her with sympathy, and, if necessary, with the right hand of fellowship.

"He is the great agriculturist, is he not?" said Augustus. "Bring him in by all means; there is no knowing how much we may not learn before dinner on such a day as this."

"He is an ally of mine, and you must not laugh at him," said Miss Furnival, who was sitting next to Augustus.

But Lucius Mason did not come in. Young Orme remained with him for about a quarter of an hour, and then returned to the room, declaring, with rather a serious face, that he must ride to Hamworth and back before dinner.

"Are you going with young Mason?" asked his grandfather.

"Yes, Sir; he wishes me to do something for him at Hamworth, and I can not well refuse him."

"You are not going to fight a duel!" said Lady Staveley, holding up her hands in horror as the idea came across her brain.

"A duel!" screamed Mrs. Orme. "Oh, Peregrine!"

"There can be nothing of the sort," said the judge. "I should think that young Mason is not so foolish; and I am sure that Peregrine Orme is not."

"I have not heard of any thing of the kind," said Peregrine, laughing.

"Promise me, Peregrine," said his mother. "Say that you promise me."

"My dearest mother, I have no more thought of it than you have—indeed I may say not so much."

"You will be back to dinner?" said Lady Staveley.

"Oh yes, certainly."

"And tell Mr. Mason," said the judge, "that if he will return with you we shall be delighted to see him."

The errand which took Peregrine Orme off to Hamworth will be explained in the next chapter, but his going led to a discussion among the gentlemen after dinner as to the position in which Lady Mason was now placed. There was no longer any possibility of keeping the matter secret, seeing that Mr. Dockwrath had taken great care that every one in Hamworth should hear of it. He had openly declared that evidence would now be adduced to prove that Sir Joseph Mason's widow had herself forged the will, and had said to many people that Mr. Mason of Groby had determined to indict her for forgery. This had gone so far that Lucius had declared as openly that he would prosecute the attorney for a libel, and Dockwrath had sent him word that he was quite welcome to do so if he pleased.

"It is a scandalous state of things," said Sir Peregrine, speaking with much enthusiasm, and no little temper, on the subject. "Here is a question which was settled twenty years ago to the satisfaction of every one who knew any thing of the case, and now it is brought up again that two men may wreak their vengeance on a poor widow. They are not men; they are brutes."

"But why does she not bring an action against this attorney?" said young Staveley.

"Such actions do not easily lie," said his father. "It may be quite true that Dockwrath may have said all manner of evil things against this lady, and yet it may be very difficult to obtain evidence of a libel. It seems to me, from what I have heard, that the man himself wishes such an action to be brought."

"And think of the state of poor Lady Mason!" said Mr. Furnival. "Conceive the misery which it would occasion her if she were dragged forward to give evidence on such a matter!"

"I believe it would kill her," said Sir Peregrine.

"The best means of assisting her would be to give her some countenance," said the judge; "and from all that I can hear of her, she deserves it."

"She does deserve it," said Sir Peregrine, "and she shall have it. The people at Hamworth shall see, at any rate, that my daughter regards her as a fit associate. I am happy to say that she is coming to The Cleeve on my return home, and that she will remain there till after Christmas."

"It is a very singular case," said Felix Graham, who had been thinking over the position of the lady hitherto in silence.

"Indeed it is," said the judge; "and it shows how careful men should be in all matters relating to their wills. The will and the codicil, as it appears, are both in the handwriting of the widow, who acted as an amanuensis not only for her husband but for the attorney. That fact does not in my mind produce suspicion; but I do not doubt that it has produced all this suspicion in the mind of the claimant. The attorney who advised Sir Joseph should have known better."

"It is one of those cases," continued Graham, "in which the sufferer should be protected by the very fact of her own innocence. No lawyer should consent to take up the cudgels against her."

"I am afraid that she will not escape persecution from any such professional chivalry," said the judge.

"All that is moonshine," said Mr. Furnival.

"And moonshine is a very pretty thing if you were not too much afraid of the night air to go and look at it. If the matter be as you all say, I do think that any gentleman would disgrace himself by lending a hand against her."

"Upon my word, Sir, I fully agree with you," said Sir Peregrine, bowing to Felix Graham over his glass.

"I will take permission to think, Sir Peregrine," said Mr. Furnival, "that you would not agree with Mr. Graham if you had given to the matter much deep consideration."

"I have not had the advantage of a professional education," said Sir Peregrine, again bowing, and on this occasion addressing himself to the lawyer; "but I can not see how any amount of learning should alter my views on such a subject."

"Truth and honor can not be altered by any professional arrangements," said Graham; and then the conversation turned away from Lady Mason, and directed itself to those great corrections of legal reform which had been debated during the past autumn.

The Orley Farm Case, though in other forms and different language, was being discussed also in the drawing-room. "I have not seen much of her," said Sophia Furnival, who by some art had usurped the most prominent part in the conversation, "but what I did see I liked much. She was at The Cleeve when I was staying there, if you remember, Mrs. Orme." Mrs. Orme said that she did remember.

"And we went over to Orley Farm. Poor lady! I think every body ought to notice her under such circumstances. Papa, I know, would move heaven and earth for her if he could."

"I can not move the heaven or the earth either," said Lady Staveley; "but if I thought that my calling on her would be any satisfaction to her—"

"It would, Lady Staveley," said Mrs. Orme. "It would be a great satisfaction to her. I can not tell you how warmly I regard her, nor how perfectly Sir Peregrine esteems her."

"We will drive over there next week, Madeline."

"Do, mamma. Every body says that she is very nice."

"It will be so kind of you, Lady Staveley," said Sophia Furnival.

"Next week she will be staying with us," said Mrs. Orme. "And that would save you three miles, you know, and we should be so glad to see you."

Lady Staveley declared that she would do both. She would call at The Cleeve, and again at Orley Farm after Lady Mason's return home. She well understood, though she could not herself then say so, that the greater part of the advantage to be received from her kindness would be derived from its being known at Hamworth that the Staveley carriage had been driven up to Lady Mason's door.

"Her son is very clever, is he not?" said Madeline, addressing herself to Miss Furnival.

Sophia shrugged her shoulders and put her head on one side with a pretty grace. "Yes, I believe so. People say so. But who is to tell whether a young man be clever or no?"

"But some are so much more clever than others. Don't you think so?"

"Oh yes, as some girls are so much prettier than others. But if Mr. Mason were to talk Greek to you, you would not think him clever."

"I should not understand him, you know."

"Of course not; but you would understand that he was a blockhead to show off his learning in that way. You don't want him to be clever, you see; you only want him to be agreeable."

"I don't know that I want either the one or the other."

"Do you not? I know I do. I think that young men in society are bound to be agreeable, and that they should not be there if they do not know how to talk pleasantly, and to give something in return for all the trouble we take for them."

"I don't take any trouble for them," said Madeline, laughing.

"Surely you must, if you only think of it. All ladies do, and so they ought. But if in return for that a man merely talks Greek to me, I, for my part, do not think that the bargain is fairly carried out."

"I declare you will make me quite afraid of Mr. Mason."

"Oh, he never talks Greek—at least, he never has to me. I rather like him. But what I mean is this, that I do not think a man a bit more likely to be agreeable because he has the reputation of being very clever. For my part I rather think that I like stupid young men."

"Oh, do you? Then now I shall know what you think of Augustus. We think he is very clever; but I do not know any man who makes himself more popular with young ladies."

"Ah, then he is a gay deceiver."

"He is gay enough, but I am sure he is no deceiver. A man may make himself nice to young ladies without deceiving any of them; may he not?"

"You must not take me 'au pied de la lettre,' Miss Staveley, or I shall be lost. Of course he may. But when young gentlemen are so very nice, young ladies are so apt to—"

"To what?"

"Not to fall in love with them exactly, but to be ready to be fallen in love with; and then if a man does do it he is a deceiver. I declare it seems to me that we don't allow them a chance of going right."

"I think that Augustus manages to steer through such difficulties very cleverly."

"He sails about in the open sea, touching at all the most lovely capes and promontories, and is never driven on shore by stress of weather! What a happy sailor he must be!"

"I think he is happy, and that he makes others so."

"He ought to be made an admiral at once. But we shall hear some day of his coming to a terrible shipwreck."

"Oh, I hope not!"

"He will return home in desperate plight, with only two planks left together, with all his glory and beauty broken and crumpled to pieces against some rock that he has despised in his pride."

"Why do you prophesy such terrible things for him?"

"I mean that he will get married."

"Get married! Of course he will. That's just what we all want. You don't call that a shipwreck; do you?"

"It's the sort of shipwreck that these very gallant barks have to encounter."

"You don't mean that he'll marry a disagreeable wife!"

"Oh no; not in the least. I only mean to say that, like other sons of Adam, he will have to strike his colors. I dare say, if the truth were known, he has done so already."

"I am sure he has not."

"I don't at all ask to know his secrets, and I should look upon you as a very bad sister if you told them."

"But I am sure he has not got any—of that kind."

"Would he tell you if he had?"

"Oh, I hope so; any serious secret. I am sure he ought, for I am always thinking about him."

"And would you tell him your secrets?"

"I have none."

"But when you have, will you do so?"

"Will I? Well, yes; I think so. But a girl has no such secret," she continued to say, after pausing for a moment. "None, generally, at least, which she tells, even to herself, till the time comes in which she tells it to all whom she really loves." And then there was another pause for a moment.

"I am not quite so sure of that," said Miss Furnival. After which the gentlemen came into the drawing-room.

Augustus Staveley had gone to work in a manner which he conceived to be quite systematic, having before him the praiseworthy object of making a match between Felix Graham and Sophia Furnival. "By George, Graham," he had said, "the finest girl in London is coming down to Noningsby; upon my word I think she is."

"And brought there expressly for your delectation, I suppose."

"Oh no, not at all; indeed, she is not exactly in my style; she is too—too—too—in point of fact, too much of a girl for me. She has lots of money, and is very clever, and all that kind of thing."

"I never knew you so humble before."

"I am not joking at all. She is a daughter of old Furnival's, whom, by-the-by, I hate as I do poison. Why my governor has him down at Noningsby I can't guess. But I tell you what, old fellow, he can give his daughter five-and-twenty thousand pounds. Think of that, Master Brook." But Felix Graham was a man who could not bring himself to think much of such things on the spur of the moment, and when he was introduced to Sophia, he did not seem to be taken with her in any wonderful way.

Augustus had asked his mother to help him, but she had laughed at him. "It would be a splendid arrangement," he had said, with energy. "Nonsense, Gus," she had answered. "You should always let those things take their chance. All I will ask of you is that you don't fall in love with her yourself; I don't think her family would be nice enough for you."

But Felix Graham certainly was ungrateful for the friendship spent upon him, and so his friend felt it. Augustus had contrived to whisper into the lady's ear that Mr. Graham was the cleverest young man now rising at the bar, and as far as she was concerned, some amount of intimacy might at any rate have been produced; but he, Graham himself, would not put himself forward. "I will pique him into it," said Augustus to himself, and therefore, when on this occasion they came into the drawing-room, Staveley immediately took a vacant seat beside Miss Furnival, with the very friendly object which he had proposed to himself.

There was great danger in this, for Miss Furnival was certainly handsome, and Augustus Staveley was very susceptible. But what will not a man go through for his friend? "I hope we are to have the honor of your company as far as Monkton Grange the day we meet there," he said. The hounds were to meet at Monkton Grange, some seven miles from Noningsby, and all the sportsmen from the house were to be there.

"I shall be delighted," said Sophia; "that is to say if a seat in the carriage can be spared for me."

"But we'll mount you. I know that you are a horsewoman." In answer to which Miss Furnival confessed that she was a horsewoman, and owned also to having brought a habit and hat with her.

"That will be delightful. Madeline will ride also, and you will meet the Miss Tristrams. They are the famous horsewomen of this part of the country."

"You don't mean that they go after the dogs across the hedges."

"Indeed they do."

"And does Miss Staveley do that?"

"Oh no; Madeline is not good at a five-barred gate, and would make but a very bad hand at a double ditch. If you are inclined to remain among the tame people, she will be true to your side."

"I shall certainly be one of the tame people, Mr. Staveley."

"I rather think I shall be with you myself; I have only one horse that will jump well, and Graham will ride him. By-the-by, Miss Furnival, what do you think of my friend Graham?"

"Think of him! Am I bound to have thought any thing about him by this time?"

"Of course you are, or at any rate of course you have. I have no doubt that you have composed in your own mind an essay on the character of every body here. People who think at all always do."

"Do they? My essay upon him then is a very short one."

"But perhaps not the less correct on that account. You must allow me to read it."

"Like all my other essays of that kind, Mr. Staveley, it has been composed solely for my own use, and will be kept quite private."

"I am so sorry for that, for I intended to propose a bargain to you. If you would have shown me some of your essays, I would have been equally liberal with some of mine." And in this way, before the evening was over, Augustus Staveley and Miss Furnival became very good friends.

"Upon my word she is a very clever girl," he said afterward, as young Orme and Graham were sitting with him in an outside room which had been fitted up for smoking.

"And uncommonly handsome," said Peregrine.

"And they say she'll have lots of money," said Graham. "After all, Staveley, perhaps you could not do better."

"She's not my style at all," said he. "But of course a man is obliged to be civil to girls in his own house." And then they all went to bed.

CHAPTER XX.

MR. DOCKWRATH IN HIS OWN OFFICE.

IN the conversation which had taken place after dinner at Noningsby with regard to the Masons, Peregrine Orme took no part, but his silence had not arisen from any want of interest on the subject. He had been over to Hamworth that day on a very special mission regarding it, and as he was not inclined to speak of what he had then seen and done, he held his tongue altogether.

"I want you to do me a great favor," Lucius had said to him, when the two were together in the breakfast-parlor of Noningsby; "but I am afraid it will give you some trouble."

"I sha'n't mind that," said Peregrine, "if that's all."

"You have heard of this row about Joseph Mason and my mother? It has been so talked of that I fear you must have heard it."

"About the lawsuit? Oh yes. It has certainly been spoken of at The Cleeve."

"Of course it has. All the world is talking of it. Now there is a man named Dockwrath in Hamworth—;" and then he went on to explain how it had reached him from various quarters that Mr. Dockwrath was accusing his mother of the crime of forgery; how he had endeavored to persuade his mother to indict the man for libel; how his mother had pleaded to him with tears in her eyes that she found it impossible to go through such an ordeal; and how he, therefore, had resolved to go himself to Mr. Dockwrath. "But," said he, "I must have some one with me, some gentleman whom I can trust, and therefore I have ridden over to ask you to accompany me as far as Hamworth."

"I suppose he is not a man that you can kick," said Peregrine.

"I am afraid not," said Lucius; "he's over forty years old, and has dozens of children."

"And then he is such a low beast," said Peregrine.

"I have no idea of kicking him, but I think it would be wrong to allow him to go on saying these frightful things of my mother without showing him that we are not afraid of him." Upon this the two young men got on horseback, and, riding into Hamworth, put their horses up at the inn.

"And now I suppose we might as well go at once," said Peregrine, with a very serious face.

"Yes," said the other; "there's nothing to delay us. I can not tell you how much obliged I am to you for coming with me."

"Oh, don't say any thing about that; of course I'm only too happy." But all the same he felt that his heart was beating, and that he was a little nervous. Had he been called upon to go in and thrash somebody, he would have been quite at home; but he did not feel at his ease in making an inimical visit to an attorney's office.

It would have been wise, perhaps, if in this matter Lucius had submitted himself to Lady

Mason's wishes. On the previous evening they had talked the matter over with much serious energy. Lucius had been told in the streets of Hamworth by an intermeddling little busybody of an apothecary that it behooved him to do something, as Mr. Dockwrath was making grievous accusations against his mother. Lucius had replied haughtily, that he and his mother would know how to protect themselves, and the apothecary had retreated, resolving to spread the report every where. Lucius on his return home had declared to the unfortunate lady that she had now no alternative left to her. She must bring an action against the man, or at any rate put the matter into the hands of a lawyer with a view of ascertaining whether she could do so with any chance of success. If she could not, she must then make known her reason for remaining quiet. In answer to this, Lady Mason had begun by praying her son to allow the matter to pass by.

"But it will not pass by," Lucius had said.

"Yes, dearest, if we leave it, it will—in a month or two. We can do nothing by interference. Remember the old saying, You can not touch pitch without being defiled."

But Lucius had replied, almost with anger, that the pitch had already touched him, and that he was defiled. "I can not consent to hold the property," he had said, "unless something be done." And then his mother had bowed her head as she sat, and had covered her face with her hands.

"I shall go to the man myself," Lucius had declared with energy.

"As your mother, Lucius, I implore you not to do so," she had said to him through her tears.

"I must either do that or leave the country. It is impossible that I should live here, hearing such things said of you, and doing nothing to clear your name." To this she had made no actual reply, and now he was standing at the attorney's door about to do that which he had threatened.

They found Mr. Dockwrath sitting at his desk, at the other side of which was seated his clerk. He had not yet promoted himself to the dignity of a private office, but generally used his parlor as such when he was desirous of seeing his clients without disturbance. On this occasion, however, when he saw young Mason enter, he made no offer to withdraw. His hat was on his head as he sat on his stool, and he did not even take it off as he returned the stiff salutation of his visitor. "Keep your hat on your head, Mr. Orme," he said, as Peregrine was about to take his off. "Well, gentlemen, what can I do for you?"

Lucius looked at the clerk, and felt that there would be great difficulty in talking about his mother before such a witness. "We wish to see you in private, Mr. Dockwrath, for a few minutes—if it be convenient."

"Is not this private enough?" said Dockwrath. "There is no one here but my confidential clerk."

"If you could make it convenient—" began Lucius.

"Well, then, Mr. Mason, I can not make it convenient, and there is the long and the short of it. You have brought Mr. Orme with you to hear what you've got to say, and I choose that my clerk shall remain by to hear it also. Seeing the position in which you stand there is no knowing what may come of such an interview as this."

"In what position do I stand, Sir?"

"If you don't know, Mr. Mason, I am not going to tell you. I feel for you, I do upon my word. I feel for you, and I pity you." Mr. Dockwrath as he thus expressed his commiseration was sitting with his high chair tilted back, with his knees against the edge of his desk, with his hat almost down upon his nose as he looked at his visitors from under it, and he amused himself by cutting up a quill pen into small pieces with his penknife. It was not pleasant to be pitted by such a man as that, and so Peregrine Orme conceived.

"Sir, that is nonsense," said Lucius. "I require no pity from you or from any man."

"I don't suppose there is one in all Hamworth that does not feel for you," said Dockwrath.

"He means to be impudent," said Peregrine.

"You had better come to the point with him at once."

"No, I don't mean to be impudent, young gentleman. A man may speak his own mind in his own house I suppose without any impudence. You wouldn't stand cap in hand to me if I were to go down to you at The Cleeve."

"I have come here to ask of you," said Lucius, "whether it be true that you are spreading these reports about the town with reference to Lady Mason? If you are a man you will tell me the truth."

"Well, I rather think I am a man."

"It is necessary that Lady Mason should be protected from such infamous falsehoods, and it may be necessary to bring the matter into a court of law—"

"You may be quite easy about that, Mr. Mason. It will be necessary."

"As it may be necessary, I wish to know whether you will acknowledge that these reports have come from you?"

"You want me to give evidence against myself. Well, for once in a way I don't mind if I do. The reports have come from me. Now, is that manly?" And Mr. Dockwrath, as he spoke, pushed his hat somewhat off his nose, and looked steadily across into the face of his opponent.

Lucius Mason was too young for the task which he had undertaken, and allowed himself to be disconcerted. He had expected that the lawyer would deny the charge, and was prepared for what he would say and do in such a case; but now he was not prepared.

"How on earth could you bring yourself to be guilty of such villainy?" said young Orme.

"Highly-tighty! What are you talking about, young man? The fact is, you do not know what you are talking about. But as I have a respect for your grandfather, and for your mother, I will give you and them a piece of advice, gratis.

Don't let them be too thick with Lady Mason till they see how this matter goes."

"Mr. Dockwrath," said Lucius, "you are a mean, low, vile scoundrel."

"Very well, Sir. Adams, just take a note of that. Don't mind what Mr. Orme said. I can easily excuse him. He'll know the truth before long, and then he'll beg my pardon."

"I'll take my oath I look upon you as the greatest miscreant that ever I met," said Peregrine, who was of course bound to support his friend.

"You'll change your mind, Mr. Orme, before long, and then you'll find that you have met a worse miscreant than I am. Did you put down those words, Adams?"

"Them as Mr. Mason spoke? Yes; I've got them down."

"Read them," said the master.

And the clerk read them, "Mr. Dockwrath, you are a mean, low, vile scoundrel."

"And now, young gentlemen, if you have got nothing else to observe, as I am rather busy, perhaps you will allow me to wish you good-morning."

"Very well, Mr. Dockwrath," said Mason; "you may be sure that you will hear further from me."

"We shall be sure to hear of each other. There is no doubt in the world about that," said the attorney. And then the two young men withdrew with an unexpressed feeling in the mind of each of them, that they had not so completely got the better of their antagonist as the justice of their case demanded.

They then remounted their horses, and Orme accompanied his friend as far as Orley Farm, from whence he got into the Alston road through The Cleeve grounds. "And what do you intend to do now?" said Peregrine, as soon as they were mounted.

"I shall employ a lawyer," said he, "on my own footing; not my mother's lawyer, but some one else. Then I suppose I shall be guided by his advice." Had he done this before he made his visit to Mr. Dockwrath, perhaps it might have been better. All this sat very heavily on poor Peregrine's mind; and therefore, as the company were talking about Lady Mason after dinner, he remained silent, listening, but not joining in the conversation.

The whole of that evening Lucius and his mother sat together, saying nothing. There was not absolutely any quarrel between them, but on this terrible subject there was an utter want of accordance, and almost of sympathy. It was not that Lucius had ever for a moment suspected his mother of aught that was wrong. Had he done so he might perhaps have been more gentle toward her in his thoughts and words. He not only fully trusted her, but he was quite fixed in his confidence that nothing could shake either her or him in their rights. But under these circumstances he could not understand how she could consent to endure without resistance the indignities which were put upon her. "She should combat them for my sake, if not for her own," he said to himself over and over again. And he had said so also to her, but his words had had no effect.

She, on the other hand, felt that he was cruel to her. She was weighed down almost to the ground by these sufferings which had fallen on her, and yet he would not be gentle and soft to her. She could have borne it all, she thought, if he would have borne with her. She still hoped that if she remained quiet no further trial would take place. At any rate this might be so. That it would be so she had the assurance of Mr. Furnival. And yet all this evil which she dreaded worse than death was to be precipitated on her by her son! So they sat through the long evening speechless; each seated with the pretense of reading, but neither of them capable of the attention which a book requires.

He did not tell her then that he had been with Mr. Dockwrath, but she knew by his manner that he had taken some terrible step. She waited patiently the whole evening, hoping that he would tell her, but when the hour came for her to go up to her room he had told her nothing. If he now were to turn against her, that would be worse than all! She went up to her room and sat herself down to think. All that passed through her brain on that night I may not now tell; but the grief which pressed on her at this moment with peculiar weight was the self-will and obstinacy of her boy. She said to herself that she would be willing now to die—to give back her life at once, if such might be God's pleasure; but that her son should bring down her hairs with shame and sorrow to the grave! In that thought there was a bitterness of agony which she knew not how to endure!

The next morning at breakfast he still remained silent, and his brow was still black. "Lucius," she said, "did you do any thing in that matter yesterday?"

"Yes, mother; I saw Mr. Dockwrath."

"Well?"

"I took Peregrine Orme with me that I might have a witness, and I then asked him whether he had spread these reports. He acknowledged that he had done so, and I told him that he was a villain."

Upon hearing this she uttered a long, low sigh, but she said nothing. What use could there now be in her saying aught? Her look of agony went to the young man's heart, but he still thought he had been right. "Mother," he continued to say, "I am very sorry to grieve you in this way—very sorry; but I could not hold up my head in Hamworth—I could not hold up my head any where, if I heard these things said of you and did not resent it."

"Ah, Lucius, if you knew the weakness of a woman!"

"And therefore you should let me bear it all. There is nothing I would not suffer; no cost I would not undergo rather than you should endure all this. If you would only say that you would leave it to me!"

"But it can not be left to you. I have gone to a lawyer, to Mr. Furnival. Why will you not permit that I should act in it as he thinks best? Can you not believe that that will be the best for both of us?"

"If you wish it, I will see Mr. Furnival?"

Lady Mason did not wish that, but she was obliged so far to yield as to say that he might do so if he would. Her wish was that he should bear it all and say nothing. It was not that she was indifferent to good repute among her neighbors, or that she was careless as to what the apothecaries and attorneys said of her; but it was easier for her to bear the evil than to combat it. The Ormes and the Furnivals would support her. They and such-like persons would acknowledge her weakness, and would know that from her would not be expected such loud outbursting indignation as might be expected from a man. She had calculated the strength of her own weakness, and thought that she might still be supported by that—if only her son would so permit.

It was two days after this that Lucius was allowed the honor of a conference by appointment with the great lawyer; and at the expiration of of an hour's delay he was shown into the room by Mr. Crabwitz. "And, Crabwitz," said the barrister, before he addressed himself to his young friend, "just run your eye over those papers, and let Mr. Bideawhile have them to-morrow morning; and, Crabwitz—"

"Yes, Sir."

"That opinion of Sir Richard's in the Ahatualpaca Mining Company—I have not seen it, have I?"

"It's all ready, Mr. Furnival."

"I will look at it in five minutes. And now, my young friend, what can I do for you?"

It was quite clear from Mr. Furnival's tone and manner that he did not mean to devote much time to Lucius Mason, and that he was not generally anxious to hold any conversation with him on the subject in question. Such, indeed, was the case. Mr. Furnival was determined to pull Lady Mason out of the sea of trouble into which she had fallen, let the effort cost him what it might, but he did not wish to do so by the instrumentality, or even with the aid, of her son.

"Mr. Furnival," began Mason, "I want to ask your advice about these dreadful reports which are being spread on every side in Hamworth about my mother."

"If you will allow me then to say so, I think that the course which you should pursue is very simple. Indeed there is, I think, only one course which you can pursue with proper deference to your mother's feelings."

"And what is that, Mr. Furnival?"

"Do nothing, and say nothing. I fear from what I have heard that you have already done and said much more than was prudent."

"But how am I to hear such things as these spoken of my own mother?"

"That depends on the people by whom the things are spoken. In this world, if we meet a chimney-sweep in the path we do not hustle with him for the right of way. Your mother is going next week to The Cleeve. It was only yesterday that I heard that the Noningsby people are going to call on her. You can hardly, I suppose, desire for your mother better friends than such as these. And can you not understand why such people gather to her at this moment? If you can understand it, you will not trouble yourself to interfere much more with Mr. Dockwrath."

There was a rebuke in this which Lucius Mason was forced to endure; but nevertheless, as he retreated disconcerted from the barrister's chambers, he could not bring himself to think it right that such calumny should be borne without resistance. He knew but little, as yet, of the ordinary life of gentlemen in England; but he did know—so at least he thought—that it was the duty of a son to shield his mother from insult and libel.

WINNIPISEOGEE.

WHAT is the fascination of water? And what the fascination of motion? And what the duplex joy of motion upon water? They seem—at least the first two—ultimate pleasurable sensations, as little analyzable as the pleasures of taste or smell or sight. As to many another question, so must we reply to these: we are so made that we enjoy them.

The most beautiful locomotions are two: of a swift boat over the sea, and of a swift horse over the land. They are indeed identical, both lines of progress being free, flowing, easy curves, horizontal in general direction, and of periodic flexure. And the sources of the derived enjoyment are identical. They are:

1. The passive reception of subtle delicate delight from the lithe sinuous freedom of the movement.

2. The proud consciousness of mastery, so sweet to men; the towering and predominating pleasure of control, felt in the strong, determinate wielding by the rider of the vast strength of the beast; in the sly, indirect domination of the sailor over the measureless forces of the elemental kings, the powers of the air and of the sea.

3. The emotion, unsubstantial and almost fantastic, stiller and more solemn, remoter and profounder in essence, imparting a loftier and grander exultation, which comes from the autocracy of the situation; the pride of knowing that although death, as beside Sintram, rides close beside you to snatch your life at the least default, nevertheless you can and do momentarily guard your life, and that by conscious skill and strength.

The water, however, chiefly the sea, has always been to me pre-eminently a delight—a charmed realm. Nor have I ever enjoyed days of more unmixed pleasure than those during which, alone, with tiller in one hand and main-sheet in the other, I have steered all day straight out to sea in a twelve-foot boat, or wandered hither and thither in the watery labyrinth of island and bay along the rugged and deeply-indented sea-coast of Connecticut. To perfect pleasure three things were requisite. I must be alone; the boat must be small; the wind must be high. Alone, I was the sole intelligence and power. The smaller the boat the quicker her answer to every voice of the wind, to every heave of the waves, to every touch of the helm; and therefore the more complete my cognizance of the wild dancing vagaries and stormy assaults of the forces with which I contended, and of the decisions and movements by which I ruled them. The smaller the boat and the higher the wind, also, the greater the sense of daring and of victory with which I held her wet and foamy bows straight and steadily against the steep ascent of the roaring white-crested seas, or watched the little cataract foam along the lee gunwale, as she bowed far and farther over, down to her bearings, before some heavier squall, or leaped down the long slope into the deep black valley between the billows.

It was my glory to sail straight out into the face of great white fogs that came trooping up from the far open ocean; driving out to windward in my crank boat under all sail, until the clumsy sloops and schooners that tumbled along up and down the coast were single-reefed or double-reefed. Then—for I did not like the implication of submission involved in laying to and reefing down—to go about, not as unable to remain longer at sea, but assuming that it comported with my convenience, irrespective of atmospheric phenomena, to return home precisely then; the boat tearing back dead before the wind, leaping with eager thrills and tremblings in the peculiar swaying curves of such a course; the long boom lifting and lifting with the roll, even to the imminent risk of “jibing,” and of certain consequent capsizes; a great white furrow-slice of roaring foam whirling backward on either hand from the sharp prow, and limiting the widening track of boiling water astern.

Yet one of the most imminent of my perils by water was incurred far inland, within the girdle of mountains that look down upon Winnipiseogee.

Under the shadow of the Red Mountain, at Senter Harbor at the head of the lake, Harry and I found a whale-boat, an old ocean rover, well experienced in the perils of Arctic and Antarctic seas; now come inland as if to abide through its declining years amidst the lovely scenery and mild fresh-water dangers of Winnipiseogee. This ancient mariner we caused to be launched, cleansed, and refitted; and in this we determined to set forth down the lake for Cow Island, there and thereabouts to fish, taking sailing directions from our well-booted landlord, Mr. Coe. Well booted, I mean, as the Greeks were—εὐκνήμιδες Ἀχαιοί—not as the rascals were; of which condition our certificate was patent in the garments themselves, which he wore long and large, and eke on the outside of his pantaloons: which is the custom of the Muscovites, and was the custom of Senator Nathaniel Macon, of North Carolina, “on the principle,” says Senator Benton of him, “that leather is stronger than cloth.”

The boat was equipped after a most farmerly and unseamanlike fashion, with a little snub mast raking forward, like that of a Mediterranean felucca, and stepped right amidships; a queer fore-and-aft mainsail, whose boom was cocked up at an impertinent angle twenty degrees greater than that of the gaff; a great staysail running to the boat's stem, and a jib hoisting outside of that to a stumpy bowsprit. This, however, or none; so we entered with good courage and no provision, the route being straight and clear, and the northwest breeze fair and strong. We could not fail, said tall Mr. Coe, to reach our destination by noon or a little later.

Our equipment, however, had occupied some time; and the sun was already high when we slid gently forward from the shore over water mirror-smooth except for little ripples that here and there roughened the surface; for houses and trees kept off the wind which yet sang softly to us in the lofty boughs. Quietly we glided down the widening bay, and the fantastic wind-chant in the tree-tops grew louder and louder, and came down and sang in our scanty rigging too. We passed by an opening in the woods. Out of it a squall flew at us instead of a song, and snapped our brittle boom. We bore up, and making fast to a log, amputated a tough segment from a hickory “staddle” (i. e., a tree-let; as much of a tree as a lad is of a man) with a sheath-knife; “fished” the fractured spar, and once more set sail.

Between two wooded promontories we passed forth upon the main waters of the lake, blue and clear, all studded with islands, and now darkened by the innumerable ripples that rose beneath the northwest breeze. We could hear no longer the wailing voices in the distant tree-tops, but the song among our cordage was louder, and a light organ-bass answered, bubbling and rustling from beneath the sharp prow. The water-spirits were joining in the song, and taking their part in charge of us.

“Hallo, the boat!”

Across the wind the shout came faintly, like an air-voice. It was from a live Yankee, however, who stood at the edge of an islet to the eastward, to our left—technically a little abaft our larboard beam—and brandished his fins at us. What need for haste? We had the day before us. Moreover, he might be in distress, or desirous to share with us a treasure-trove. So we turned aside and ran over to him.

“Well?”

“Goin’ to Meredith Bridge?”

“No. Why?”

“Wa’al, there was a boat was to call and take me down, and they ha’n’t come, and I didn’t know but you was them.”

“Suppose,” I said to Harry, “we take him part way?”

He nodded. I offered to set the stranger over to the western shore, whence he might walk the rest of the way, since our engagements would not permit us to convoy him to his destination. He thankfully stepped aboard, and heading westward we digressed upon our benevolent errand. In the country strangers talk; Yankees talk every where; we talked. How came our passenger upon the island? He lived there; his own boat it was which he had lent, and which some chance was delaying. Do many people live on the islands? Quite a number; one or two "solid men of Boston" have summer palaces upon them; some farmers live upon them; one, Mr. Weare, quite rich. He goes to Wolfboro' or Moultonboro' in planting time and other busy times, enlists "a crew of work-folks," to use our friend's words, and encamping upon Cow Island they do what is to be done and depart. Where is Cow Island? The Yankee pointed toward it, and we perceived its heights among the multitudinous island and mainland hills which made the high horizon in the east.

Thus we beguiled the way with friendly chat. The Yankee told us many marvels of the lake. Weird old Indian traditions of a horrible formless monster that abides within the unfathomable depths of "The Broads," as the largest open stretch of the lake in its southwestern corner is called, and in tempestuous nights comes forth and rides hither and thither upon the dark stormy water, destroying any chance voyager and uttering fearful and unearthly sounds of diabolic exultation. Other less fanciful stories he had of huge lake trout; sullen monsters, also resident within the deepest parts of the lake; cunning and proud, a species of fresh-water sea-kings, seldom to be caught, and desperately dangerous to the fisherman's slender armament. He spoke of Rattlesnake Island; a steep, rocky pile, far toward the south, rising sheer from the very deepest portion of the lake, and swarming with the deadly reptiles which give it a name, among whom aboriginal legends tell that "an enormous rattle-tailed snake"—to use the words of the enterprising proprietor of the Bunkumville Museum—called by the Indians The King of the Rattlesnakes, keeps his reptilian state, and wields many potent charms, being a great manitou or spirit-chieftain.

We reached the shore—with exchange of hearty good wishes, the Yankee stepped within the shadow of the summery woods, and strode away through the underbrush, and again we set off.

The wind was rising continually. Delighting ourselves with the speedy gliding of the sharp-prowed whale-boat, reveling in sunshine, in breeze and in water, in youth and health and wandering, we sped onward. To right and left the mountain forms changed and changed; and when we looked again for the island we scarcely found it; and it was further away than we had supposed. But what matter? We had neither "little amount to make up" before three o'clock, nor academic bell to obey at five; and with hearts glad within us we passed on, leaving on either hand islets as numerous and as lovely as King Robert's galley is said to have passed, in the racing elastic rhythm of the "Lord of the Isles;" and from it Harry recited:

"Merrily, merrily, bounds the bark,
She bounds before the gale,
The mountain breeze from Ben-na-darch
Is joyous in her sail.
With fluttering sound, like laughter hoarse,
The cords and canvas strain,
The waves, divided by her force,
In rippling eddies chased her course,
As if they laughed again."

It was afternoon by this time. Still we sped past one islet after another, looking ever for the marks which the Yankee had named to us as of that we sought. The gentle breeze had risen into a strong gale, fitful with the desperate and sudden blasts of overland winds. My boatmanship sufficed for a time, by watchful handling of tiller and of sheet, to save our flimsy rigging and keep right-side-up our crank and narrow craft. But not long. One wilder breath of the Wind-King, and slap went the misshapen sail down upon the water with an instantaneous wrench that spilled out us two luckless navigators, as one might toss pease out of a shovel, into the cold, dark-blue water. Swimmers both, we sank for a moment, but rising, laughed to each other a sputtering recognition, and unterrifiedly, with half a dozen strokes regained the boat, which had turned first half over and then quite over, and now showed a curved and striated back as of some great fish, above the little spiteful jumping waves.

It was over against the mouth of an island bay that our mischance happened. So each with a hand upon the gunwale, we swam strongly toward the haven, leading our capsized boat, like lacustrine Tritons convoying home an overturned sea-chariot of Amphitrite, within its grassy shores. There we found silent water; a small and sheltered harbor floored with pebbles of pure white intermingled with yellow, the jasper and alabaster floor of a water-nymph's bower; walled about and gracefully overhung with the close and waving leafage of birches and beeches, here and there pilastered with a dark columnar spruce; a nook recluse enough for the very bath and dressing-room of the more aristocratic and exclusive naiads. Neither wood-nymph nor naiad fled or spattered away at our appearing; and uncomfortably Tritonizing in soaked and clinging casimere and limp wet felt hats, we swam to the shallows, and with unstable foothold and awkward effort set our tub once more on its own bottom.

Our isle, enchanted, had, as it were, fled before us down the lake. Along the high and hilly eastern shore-line or island-line we could ascertain no locality answering to it. But not nautical enough to compute the distance we had come, and quite doubtful of our place, we at last hoisted sail once more, at a venture, and bore away.

The wind still rose, and scudding at a dangerous rate before it, we passed more islands, more wide expanses of water; and soon, it being now well past the middle of the afternoon, we drove out upon the great southeastern stretch of deep open water called The Broads. As we did so, convinced by this time that we had far overpassed our mark, and satisfied that the distant dusky peaks before us were the mountains around Alton Bay, the extreme southern end of the lake, I turned and looked behind me for one last attempt to distinguish Cow Island. I could not see it; but in the sky I saw something much more startling. Over the line of the western horizon had deployed, within the hour last past, while we were busy with things before us and close around us, a vast and heavy army of black and stormy clouds. Already their whiter and fleecier vanguard had mounted nearly to the zenith, and had obscured the sunlight with a threatening shadow. Great masses of the cloudy host rose out of the northwest and fell down to northward and to southward as if outflanking some hostile array. A sombre and darkening shadow fled swiftly and silently over us, and went curtaining on before over the great open lake. Over Winnipegosee, "The Smile of God," there lowered a fearful frown. A chill came out of the cloud with the darkness, and wind and cold and shadows swept down upon us together.

What I describe in many words I saw at the single glance which was all I could give; for I had perforce to look forward, and that most instantly, at the risk of death; since here the shore was too distant to reach by swimming if we should overset, and we began to be cold and tired, all wet and hungry as we were.

The blasts came leaping ever wilder and higher; the jumping waves, white-capped and foamy, exulted around us, and sang a louder and a louder song beneath the prow, as we tore onward into the bosom of the lake. I lacked little of fancying that chuckling water-spirits had clutched our cutwater, and were dragging us forth into their widest waste domain, where they might drown us at their leisure and dance a devilish death-dance over our wet burial. The whale-boat, built not for carrying sail, but narrow, sharp, and totty almost as a bark canoe, careened hither and thither with wild, quick motions, wallowing along dangerously, creaking and straining. The foolish old mainsail flapped and jerked; the boom lifted and wavered as if to jibe, then thrashed madly down upon the foam as if the lee gunwale dipped and a bucketful or two of clear water bubbled alertly inboard; I wonder the lubberly tackle lasted so long. Harry, inexperienced in boat-sailing, thought it all very fine, and from his place forward enjoyed the fantastic movement and the raging of the air and of the water. As for me, although I clenched tiller and sheet with grasp as yet unfailing, and was conscious of no special fear, and still met each shrieking blast and each heavier surge with such seamanship as the clumsy bark permitted, yet, with hunger, cold, and stiffness from the constrained position that I had kept so long,

I felt my hands and limbs benumbing. I knew, moreover, that my lips were blue and ghastly, and my face white and grim; for besides the cold, my thoughts were of drowning, and my seamanship little more than mechanical. I doubted that I looked upon the face of Death; and my consciousness was mostly of the effort to endure the tremendous sight, and hardily to meet his coming blow. A grisly visage it is to see! And whereas I doubted, a few minutes later I was altogether sure—when I saw quite suddenly the line of rugged rocks that ranged along the shore not half a mile before us, and the high breakers that rolled, and foamed, and leaped freakishly about among them. For before that wild gale the wretched boat could never manœuvre; and one touch upon those sharp and edgy rocks would grind us and our boat into indistinguishable fragments together.

Yet it was better to try something than to drive stupidly into the roaring mill of rock and water. So "Ready, about!" I sang out to Harry. I had taught him the few words of command and simple processes used in "tacking boat." Down went the helm at a desperate venture; and hauling aft the sheet as she came up, I would have brought her upon the wind on the larboard tack, heading due north. But I could not even get the jib aback; she missed stays, and rolled helplessly, broadside on, toward the iron-bound shore. There was nothing for it but to try again, and no alternative except to be smashed if we failed. So getting her before the wind again, I ran straight toward the shore until she gained some headway; once more hauled upon the wind. As she lost way, and was evidently about to miss stays again, I sprang amidships, seized an oar, with quick and desperate strokes brought her up into the wind, until first the jib filled on the other tack and then the mainsail. Then I resumed the tiller; and slowly and laboriously, trembling and cracking, she crawled off inch by inch, when already I was feeling the long swells of the great shore-seas, when the roaring crash of the fierce breakers made continuous thunder scarce fifty feet away, and the water was all thick and red around us with earth rasped up from the bottom by the undertow.

Slowly and perilously we gained some little offing; and as soon as there was room I tacked once more, and steered, as I was now able to do with the wind on my starboard quarter, southwest, to gain the shelter of the highlands skirting the western side of Alton Bay. This also I had to give up; for we could not bale, I being at the helm, and the weight of both of us necessary to windward to save capsizing; and half-full of water, she rolled ever deeper, and so heavily and with action, as it were, so sick, and discouraged, and lifeless, that perforce I put her almost before the wind again, and ran down the coast. Yet we did ultimately contrive to weather the point east of the mouth of the bay. The wind lulled as we drew within the shelter of the mountains, although we could hear it howl and wail far above us, and could look back into the tempest yet raging in the open lake. As we laid the boat against the quiet shore of a sheltered cove far within the depths of the bay, her gunwale was scarce three inches above the water; and stepping across from the stern, I stood over-knees in the midst of her, such a quantity had she received. But we had baffled the water-devils and the storm-king; and, in high spirits at our escape, we turned to and speedily freed her from the dangerous burden.

Evening approached. Leaving the whale-boat at her hidden mooring close beneath a great thicket of evergreens, we scrambled up a steep hill-side, found a road skirting the bay, and set off southward, seeking a supper up among the hills, with the sturdy resolve yet to reach the island for which we had started in the morning by a retrograde moonlight voyaging. The first house we found was a desolate, empty shell, window-shattered, brown, weather-stained, dreary, standing alone, without a tree or a shrub, the earth about it all bare and brown, without a well, or a barn, or a wood-shed—a very ghost of an old house. Within we found an old pair of shoes in a corner, and a rusty broadsword hung against a wall; nothing else—not even a tin pan or a footstool. At the next we found an old man, who said he was eighty-nine, deaf, blind, helpless. His daughter-in-law, the mistress of the dwelling, a skinny and ill-favored dame, could not furnish us a supper. Still we went on; and at the end of another mile we found a more hospitable roof. Here, in a jovial, cozy kitchen, where a great fire in a giantly fireplace tempered gratefully the raw evening air of the hills, by the ready consent of a comely young housewife and her broad-shouldered husband, we dried and warmed our weary bodies and wet clothes; did exceedingly rest and refresh ourselves with warmth and firelight, with meat and drink, and with pleasant conversation; and did set out upon our return, due payment made, quite other in body and in mind from the tired, bedraggled, forlorn wayfarers who had come in.

Reaching the whale-boat we pushed off, headed northward, took each an oar, and rowed softly down the bay over motionless water, in the silence due to the still bright moonlight, the sacred quiet of the flood and of the mountains that watched it. The sharp-edged oar-blades passed noiselessly into and from the water; their double-knock within the wooden row-locks sounded hollowly against the dark steep heights above us and echoed back again; the wild landscape, the spiritual power of the night, the dim, impenetrable glimmer of the moon, seemed all together to be passing into some dream.

"Hush!" I said to Harry. We both listened. I had not been mistaken. We could distinctly hear the rush of some large mass through the water, far north in the open lake. I should have said it was a steamboat; but there was none on the lake, although we had seen one building at Meredith's Bridge. We leaned over the edge of the boat and listened. Whatever the hollow, rolling, roaring sound might be, it came steadily toward us. There was a little haze in the air; the moonlight interpenetrated and infused it; and together they were a great glimmering veil hung from far above down to the dark water; wavering and gleaming, and hiding what it covered with a witch-light more impenetrable than darkness. From behind this gray gleaming curtain came the strange sound that perplexed us. It grew perceptibly louder; we could not see ten rods; whatever the thing should be, we might not be able to discern it in time to get out of its way. The weird, dreamy time and place made me fancy absurd visionary things: of the monstrous water-devil that our passenger had described to us, whom I pictured to myself making a second and definite foray through the night to apprehend the audacious mortals who had escaped his power in the day; of some inexplicable whirlpool, or water-spout, or blast of wind. In vain we said to each other, "What can it be?" I even abjectly proposed to flee to the western shore; and but for shame I verily believe we should have done it. Watching intently, ready to pull either way if any thing should appear suitable to be run away from, we waited, oars in hand, breathless, half-frightened. The roaring voice of the unseen monster, exaggerated by the night stillness, and reverberating heavily through the thick air and the narrow mountain cleft, came swelling out vaster and vaster, yet still behind its inscrutable glimmering veil, until to our startled minds it seemed to be booming up into the air close above our heads, and we made sure that the invisible existence was advancing straight and close upon us.

Suddenly, as if magic had conjured it up, a huge, shadowy, black mass was sweeping past us, up the middle of the bay, toward Alton. There were lights and human voices.

"Hallo the boat!" hailed some one, all at once.

"Hallo yourself! Where bound?" I replied.

"Alton," was the answer. It was the horse-boat from Wolfboro'. We extremely quietly resumed our oars.

In the silent moonlight we rowed northward for an hour. Then sleep began to weigh heavy upon us; for indeed we had had a fatiguing day. Beneath the relaxing pressure of its burden we easily gave up the hope of reaching our intended lodging-place. Looking upon the land to the eastward, we discerned a great, dim, square opening among the woods. Turning our prow thitherward, we slowly rowed ashore, made the boat fast to a tree, shouldered our knapsacks, and, stumbling with weariness, and sleep, and the obstructions of the untrodden way, at last we reached the farmstead. Cautiously, with knife in hand, for fear of big dogs, we approached, reconnoitered the premises, found an open barn-door, felt about for the hay-mow and the peg-ladder which usually gives access to its top, found it, ascended, burrowed deep within fragrant herds-grass hay, and slept a chilly, troubled, and unrefreshing sleep.

THE HAVELOCK.

ON Southern uplands I was born,
Kissed by the lips of the golden morn;
Strong, and tall, and straight was I,
And my white plumes danced as the wind went by,
Till the hills above and the vales below
Seemed drowned in a mist of drifting snow.

But by-and-by my plumes were stripped
By negroes lusty and dusky-lipped,
And they bore me off to a darksome mill,
With jaws and teeth that never were still;
And there I was mangled and whirled about,
Till it chewed me up and it spat me out.

Bagged and bound with canvas and rope,
I hung on the edge of a dizzy slope,
Till I saw the panting steamer glide
Close to the edge of the terrible slide,
When they pushed me over and let me go,
And swift as a bullet I plunged below.

So down the river they bore me then,
And passed me over to trading men,
And bartered me off, and shipped me to sea,
From the crowded wharf of the long levée;
And so we sailed for many a day,
Till the mud of the Mersey around us lay.

Through dingy factories then I past,
Where flickered the shuttle flashing fast;
And British fingers all wan and thin
With labor, and hunger, and drink, and sin,
Twisted my threads in the fetid gloom,
And wove them close on the whirring loom.

So back to my country I came again,
Fit for the uses of busy men;
And the time went by, till one summer's day
In a beautiful maiden's lap I lay,
While with scissors, and thimble, and needle, and thread
She fashioned me thus for a soldier's head.

For the light of battle was in the sky,
And the armed thousands were hurrying by,
And the brawny farmer and slender clerk
Were side by side in the holy work;
For a wondrous fire through the people ran—
Through maid, and woman, and child, and man.

Ah! 'twas a tender and sorrowful day,
When the soldier lover went marching away;
For that self-same morn he had called her bride,
As they stood at the altar side by side;
Then with one long kiss and a hushed good-by
He went with his comrades to do or die!

To-day I am on the self-same earth
That nourished my parents and gave me birth;
But the waving snow is no longer there,
And muskets flash in the sunlit air,
And the hill-side shakes with the heavy tramp
Of the hostile armies from camp to camp.

And the head that I cover is thinking now
Of the fair hands that placed me upon his brow,
And wonders whether, in the coming fight
That will redden these Southern slopes to-night,
I will safely ride through the stormy fray,
Or ownerless lie in the crimson clay.

And Northward far, at the self same time
That he dreaming stands in that sunny clime,
The hands that made me are raised in prayer,
And her voice ascends through the silent air;
And if pureness and goodness have power to charm,
The head that I cover is safe from harm.

THE YANKEE CAPTAIN.

A VERY PROBABLE STORY, FROM DICKENS'S "ALL THE YEAR ROUND."

"I WISH I could paint like that!" said a voice high pitched and with a nasal drawl in it, as I sat sketching among the Highlands of the Hudson.

"You take an interest in art?" said I, dabbing away at my landscape, for I saw that the man meant civilly.

"Art and nater!" answered the tall Yankee; "art and nater! You're making a pretty view of it, and so you had oughter, for 'tis an all-fired location this; yes, 'tis. I guess you're an artist?"

"Yes."

"A Britisher born?"

"Yes."

"I knowd it. Them blues and whites air neat, and like the real thing; the clouds is not bad; but the water's the thing that shows gump-tion."

"You should be a judge of your own element," I answered, laughing; for I had already settled my friend's calling, on a second glance at his cornelian waistcoat buttons and his coral breast-pin. "You have sailed over a good deal of blue water in your time."

"Scalp me, stranger," said he, "but you're right. We must be better acquainted, we must. I haven't a card, stranger, but my name's Daniel Coffin, of Providence, Massachusetts, first mate of the Bird of Freedom, clipper-ship, lying down at New York." And he held out his strong, sun-burned hand for me to shake.

Some more conversation followed. I found my new friend, like most of his countrymen, very inquisitive, though the questions he asked were propounded with an apparent simplicity that made them by no means offensive. It was not enough for him to know my name and profession. He was curious about my antecedents, my travels, my habits, my prospects, and the friends I had in America. "Tell you what, Sir," said he at last, "you kiender took me in, first I spied you out. Something of the soger officer about that individual, says I to myself; something square about the carrying of the shoulders and head, that a man who's knocked about the world as I have can't mistake. Mebbe, thinks I, 'tis an engineer officer from West Point, making tactical sketches. Have you done a little in that line, Sir, afore you took to the brush?"

I owned that I had worn the Queen's colors, and had sold out, after some years in Sydney and Auckland, to escape the weariness of colonial quarters and the tardiness of promotion.

The first mate of the Bird of Freedom asked no more questions. He began extolling beyond measure the good qualities of his skipper, Captain Malachi Hodgson. The "cap'en" was a scholar; the "cap'en" was a gentleman fit to pick mutton-chops at Windsor; the "cap'en" could speak all languages, and had been over the Italian picture-galleries and museums, and was an antiquary, and a collector, and what not. Nothing came amiss to this extraordinary captain; he had autographs of all the great or notorious of the earth, gems, coins, medals, statuettes. Then the personal accomplishments of the commander were equal to his possessions: he could sing and play, and sketch, and model in wax and clay, and take photographs, and lecture on chemistry. Now would I come and see the Bird of Freedom when I came back to New York?

I faithfully promised that when I returned to the city I would call on Daniel Coffin. And we parted excellently well pleased with each other.

Three weeks passed before, quitting the old Dutch farm-house where I had boarded, I went back to the Empire City. There, as I was one day skimming the Herald in a café, my eye fell on the following advertisement: "CALIFORNIA DIRECT. The splendid clipper-ship Bird of Freedom. To sail on the 17th. For freight or passage apply," etc. The advertisement recalled my enthusiastic friend, Mr. Coffin, and the Admirable Crichton of a skipper whose praises he had so loyally sounded; and I resolved to be as good as my word, and to pay him a call. I found that the ship had dropped down, and was lying off Long Island. Hiring a pleasure pin-nace, I made the short voyage to her anchoring ground, and found reason to admit that the mate's eulogy had not been much overstrained.

The Bird of Freedom was a magnificent vessel, nearly new, and of immense tonnage. She was one of those long, sharp-bowed, lofty-masted craft of which Americans are so proud, and appeared, as indeed she was, admirably designed for speed. I could not help fancying, however, that her build was better adapted for summer seas and the trade-winds, for quick runs, in fact, under favorable circumstances, than for buffeting to and fro in rough, variable weather. "A raal darlint, your honor," cried my tough old Irish boatman, who had not in twenty years dropped a note of his brogue; "she lies on the say like a duck, and is as nate as if she'd a glass shade over her." By this time we were alongside, and a rough head, crowned by a Spanish straw-hat, was popped over the bulwarks, while a harsh voice swore at us, and asked what we wanted, that we scraped our boat's snout against their keelson? I answered from the stern-sheets, taking off my hat, "We were nterely admiring your fine vessel; but may I ask whether you have on board a gentleman who invited me to pay you a visit—I mean Mr. Daniel Coffin?"

The second mate, who was our questioner, acknowledged my salute by sulkily lifting his own Panama, and replied, "Yes, I kalkilate he air. Did you wish to come on board? You'll find a clean side rope at the starboard gang. The larboard one's tarry, and would spile them gloves o' yourn."

The boat was directly at the foot of the starboard side-ladder, and I jumped on board, just in time to meet honest Daniel Coffin, who came bustling aft to welcome me.

And, sure enough, Daniel Coffin did appear glad to see me. His mahogany face was as radiant as such a face could be, and the grip he gave my hand was like the pressure of a vice. He did the honors of the ship, at least of all above decks, making me duly admire the tapering of the masts, the squareness of the yards, the trim neatness which regulated every thing. There was no visible morsel of metal, whether ring-bolt, pin, rail, or brass gun, that was not scoured as brightly as the kettles in a Dutch kitchen. There was an unusual quantity of rackwork and windlass tackle about, as well as pulleys, patent blocks, and other mechanism for economizing labor. As for the crew, I saw three or four fine-looking seamen on the fore-castle, busy with serving mallets, spun-yarn, rattlins, and inch and a half rope, preparing something or other for the ship's top hamper, and a couple of wobegone persons were wringing swabs near them, which latter alone took some notice of us. One of these men touched his hat, not to the mate, but to me, and seemed disposed to speak; but Mr. Coffin swore at him, and bade him "keep his distance," and he shuffled off in a broken-spirited fashion.

"Those are not sailors!" said I, with a jerk of my thumb to point out the object of my query.

"No; they air not. They're what they call 'waisters' in the navy; but here we jest call 'em landlubbers," answered Mr. Coffin. "Never mind 'em. I wish I could show you the cabins, but cap'en's busy writing. They're splendid, and that air a fact. Ah! here is cap'en himself."

And, sure enough, up the cabin stair came the commander, and the mate bustling to introduce me, we exchanged bows and compliments. The skipper was a little man, not puny, but a giant cut down, with broad shoulders and "double joints." He had a massive jaw, full of great white teeth, bright chestnut hair, blue eyes, and a very red and white complexion. Altogether he was as little like an American as any man I ever saw in any country. But he was very well-bred and polished, quite a gentleman in manner, and I soon found that I was talking to one who was at least my equal in education, and a man of talent to boot. He showed me the cabins, gave me a peep at two or three cabinets of medallions, cameos, rare shells, and so forth, as well as at some valuable pictures and curious arms, and only regretted that he was too much occupied on that day to submit to my inspection all his treasures. Would I come and dine with him before he sailed? Meanwhile I must have some lunch, and he tinkled a little silver hand-bell, which brought in the colored steward and a tray. During lunch we chatted on indifferent subjects; the captain pleasing me greatly by the frank shrewdness of his talk. Presently feats of strength were mentioned. There were some very heavy round shot in the steerage, the captain said he could hardly lift them, and he wondered whether I could make a better job of it than he. So, after lunch, we went into the steerage, and there, by a great effort, I contrived to heave up one of the shot to the level of my head, to the great amusement and satisfaction of my entertainer.

"Well, Sir," said he, "you have done what only six of us here aboard can manage. Myself—that is—Dan Coffin, who is strong, for all that he looks so loosely put together, and four of our primest fore-castle salts. I wish you were one of us. But the next best thing will be to get the advantage of your company while we can; so excuse a sailor's rough invitation, and come and dine with me aboard on Thursday, the 16th. We are advertised to sail on Friday, and the passengers come on board early on that day; but on Thursday we can have a cozy evening, and you shall look over my hoards of old rubbish. May I expect you?"

I said "Yes, I would be sure to come," and thanked him for his hospitality. We shook hands. I stepped into my boat, and went off, and the last things I saw on the deck of the clipper were the heads of Captain Hodgson and his mate Coffin, as they waved their hands in a parting salute.

No obstacle having intervened, on Thursday afternoon I found myself a guest at the captain's hospitable board, in his pretty cabin, with its trophies of weapons and its choice little Flemish pictures hanging on the walls. There was rather an ostentatious display of plate and glass, and fruit and flowers, considering that covers were laid for only four, Captain Malachi Hodgson, his first officer, Mr. Dan. Coffin, Dr. Ellerman, the ship's surgeon, and myself. The dinner proved a capital one; the Champagne, the royal Madeira, were worthy of the dinner, and the conversation pleasant, for both the captain and the doctor were well-informed rattles. Captain Hodgson was very gay and amusing. As for the surgeon, he was a dry, caustic talker, with a good deal of ironical humor, and a talent for quotation. In person he was a large, bony man, with inscrutable eyes like those of an elephant. We did not spare the wine, but were all perfectly sober when we rose from table, and proceeded to sip our coffee and smoke our cigars, when I soon afterward proposed to take my leave. The skipper would not hear of it. Indeed, as he reminded me, I had no shore boat in attendance, having been pulled from the quay in the ship's yawl, which, with Nathan the second mate in it, had been fortunately lying off the jetty just as I came down to the water. I must trust to my entertainer's good offices for the means of departure, and the captain promised me his gig at eleven o'clock. "Not a minute before," said he gayly, "for till then you are my prisoner." Then I remember that the captain played a tune on the piano, very nicely indeed, and the doctor sang a sentimental Spanish air to the guitar, with an absurd gravity that set us all laughing. Then we played cards for low stakes, and I won a few dollars. Next, a bowl of punch was proposed, and the doctor was enjoined to brew it. "A famous punch-maker the doctor is," said the captain. The black steward brought in the materials, and the surgeon began his task in an elaborate manner. Then the captain jumped up, and proposed to show me his coins and other treasures while the punch-making went on. As I lifted my eyes from a tray of very curious Etruscan relics I happened to glance at the mirror opposite, and there, to my wonder, methought I saw the doctor shaking a white powder into his brew from a paper he held in his hand. The captain's eyes followed mine, and saw the reflection in the glass as well. He saw, too, my slight start. "Powdered sugar, hey, doctor?" said he. "Yes, to be sure," answered the man of healing. "I always use lump, myself," remarked the captain; "but that may be an old-fashioned prejudice. The result is undeniable, any how. Have you seen these seals, Sir? I bought them in Athens." Powdered sugar! to be sure it was powdered sugar, and I was an ass to be suspecting Borgian sleights of hand in the nineteenth century. But now we were asked to taste of the punch. It was hot, fragrant, and very tempting. The doctor flourished the ladle. We all sat down, and held out our glasses, which were filled. "Now, gentlemen, a toast," cried the doctor; "The fatherland of our accomplished visitor, Old England, and good luck to her!" We all lifted our glasses. I as a good patriot drained mine; and almost as I did so, noticed that the others held full glasses to their lips, but only made a feint of sipping. I caught the captain's eyes fixed on me with a peculiar glance of triumph and mockery. The doctor's face, too, had a sneer on it, and the mate was chuckling audibly. Meanwhile I reeled in my chair, the glass quivered in my hand, there was a humming in my brain as if of a million bees, and the room was revolving like a top. I was giddy, sick, blind, and a laugh rang in my ears as I became insensible.

A dreadful roaring made me dream that I was in a den of lions, next, that I was in the midst of an earthquake, and, lastly, to awake to a dull sense that steam was being blown off somewhere, but where or how, even when awake, I could not conjecture. I had afterward no doubt that the steam-tug was then alongside. There were all sorts of dull, confused noises, but none that I understood. There were foul smells, too. Something crawled over my face. Another something, also with legs and antennæ, was rustling at my ear; that was a cockroach, and I swept it aside with disgust, but the drug still overcame me, and I fell asleep again. From this second slumber I was rudely awakened by a shower of merciless kicks in the ribs, against which not even morphia could make a sleeper proof. My eyes opened with a jerk, and in the dim light I could faintly discern the ill-looking face of Nathan, second mate of the clipper, who was swearing as hard as he kicked.

"Get up, ye skunk, and show your carcass on deck."

"On deck!" said I, in a bewildered way. "Why should I? where am I? Leave off, I say; you hurt me."

"I'll jest break your bones, ef ye don't obey orders," answered Nathan, tartly. "Cap'en says hands are to be mustered to sign articles afore sailing, and I've been told to rouse up the skulkers; so up with you."

Indignation was but a tenth part of what I felt. I made a lurching effort to rise, and tried to catch Nathan by the throat, but was too weak, and only got a grasp of the monkey-jacket, for which he had now changed his shore-going coat. Nathan laughed grimly as he caught me by the arm.

"We'll larn ye," he said, "to respect an officer, afore you've seen your last of blue water. But I must git ye to quarters. Halloa! Jonadab and Titus, ketch hold of the British skulker here, and help him to tumble up."

Two brawny natives of Cape Cod came jumping down a ladder, and before I could remonstrate I was hustled up some steps, through a hatchway, and finally found myself at the foot of the mainmast, in broad day, and surrounded by a crowd of men in all varieties of shabby dress. The Bird of Freedom was in open water, standing out to sea. There was "a sea on," and the vessel was rolling and pitching quite enough to account for the absence of any passengers from deck, and enough, too, to make it difficult for those recruits who had not their sea-legs to keep their feet.

Presently I saw advancing from the after-deck the treacherous skipper, Captain Malachi Hodgson, accompanied by his three mates, his supercargo, the surgeon, the carpenter, the cooper, and a gruff man who officiated as boatswain, the large crew requiring such an official. Captain Hodgson was in his sea-going clothes, a shabby old suit that had already borne the souse of much salt-water. He had a broad belt round his waist, in which was stuck a six-shot Colt's revolver, while a brass-hilted hanger swung at his left side. Each of the mates, too, as well as the boatswain, cooper, carpenter, etc., had a revolver and cutlass ostentatiously displayed. The captain's eye ranged along our ranks, calculating and keen. I had thought that he would wince when our glances met, and I dare say I looked stern enough in my just indignation, but I mistook him. His eye met mine quite coldly and unconcernedly, and all he deigned to say was,

"The forecastle hands will be picked from the strongest, of course, Mr. Coffin. Put that man along with them."

And as his forefinger pointed me out, Jonadab and Titus whisked me a little on one side, where several quiet large-limbed mariners were standing and chewing their quids. "That man!" It was thus he designated one who but yesterday had been his flattered guest. I choked with wrath, and when I did find my tongue, my voice was so peremptory and loud that Jonadab and Titus let go my arms in sheer surprise.

"Before Heaven, Sir, you shall repent this outrage, if there be law in America. You shall—"

"Hold your tongue, Sir!" bawled the captain. "Do you think, under my own flag, on my own deck, I'll submit to the impertinence of a whelp like you? I'll teach you your duty, unless you prefer Old Nick for a schoolmaster."

And then followed a volley of oaths.

"If we fall in with a cruiser, British or American, I give you my word—" I began, but I was cut short.

"Gag the hound, Mr. Coffin," said the skipper; "stop that tongue of his, or cut it out at once."

Gagged I was, accordingly, in spite of my feeble resistance, but even had not my brain been humming with the effects of the drug, I could not have shaken off the united strength of my three or four brawny tormentors with the biblical names. Thus roughly reduced to silence, I was lashed to a shroud and left to be a passive spectator of the scene. The captain then ran his eye over the shrinking mass of landsmen, and I could see that his violence had produced its effect, and that they were cowed into servility. "Bring forward those articles," and the writing-desk was the next order. "Now, men," said the skipper—but his oaths I leave un-repeated—"you have shipped, as you are aware, for California direct, on board this screamer of the seas, Bird of Freedom. Hush! no interruptions allowed; I don't ask you how you all came on board, and I don't care. I make no distinction. Here you are, and here you stop. I don't ask you to ship for the return voyage, because I know for certain that I couldn't keep a scamp out of the lot, once we drop anchor at San Francisco. But for the voyage out, I've got you, and I'll keep you. Mutiny shall be punished. Skulkers and shamblers shall get their deserts. Provisions you'll find good, the biscuit won't hurt your teeth, nor the salt meat neither; there's lemon juice, there's a doctor, there's no stint of cocoa and tea, and Uncle Sam's full allowance of grog" (here there was a feeble cheer, set up by some sycophants in ragged garments). "As for wages, we won't quarrel. Twelve dollars for A.B.'s, eight for landsmen, four for boys. Supercargo and steward will find you in Jerseys, frocks, and shirts, if your kits are not in order. Now, each man will step forward, answer to his name, and sign the register."

Daniel Coffin unfolded the paper, as his superior's oration closed, and called the first man's name, "Kit Marsh!" "Here!" replied a brisk little English sailor, whose red eyes and sallow face told tales of the debauch at a tavern ashore, which had thrown him, helpless as a sack, into the hands of the crimps and the captain. But Kit cared little. It was only that he had spent his money like a fool, and must now go to sea months earlier than he intended. The kidnapping appeared to him in no very dreadful light, and he was always at home in a forecastle. So Kit Marsh signed articles with his shaky hand, remarking that he was but ten days back from China, and had not a cent left. The others followed suit, and name after name was appended to the register. Some of the men tried to remonstrate; one went down on his knees to beg to be put ashore; he was an emigrant house-painter, a Swiss, and had a wife and child in New York, who must starve in his absence. But the oak planks he knelt on were not harder than the heart of Captain Hodgson, and the suppliant was bidden to "leave off sniveling, and go forward." Of course I do not for a moment mean that every one there was an unwilling recruit. Far from it. There were several New Englanders, hard of head and hand, who had a small venture in the ship, and were treated considerably by the skipper and mates. There were also certain seamen, English, Scottish, or Dutch, who had been coaxed into shipping when intoxicated, and who had merely been wheedled out of their liberty. But hardly one of the landsmen was there of his own free-will. They had been beguiled on all sorts of pretexts; had been drugged, cajoled, and intimidated; in fact, had been enlisted very much as French recruits were in the days of Louis the Fifteenth, and before France had a conscription. For seamen were terribly scarce in New York, and were chiefly manned by crimped foreigners; the natives being unwilling to ship, except in whalers or coasters, where they could have a share in the venture.

The poor house-painter had been victimized in a cruel way. He had been tempted on board to do some job in the way of his trade, but scarcely had he fallen to work before he was unceremoniously forced into the hold, and there detained under hatches till the ship sailed. He told me this story with many tears—tears of no selfish sorrow, for his heart, poor fellow, was with the helpless creatures he had left in a garret at New York, and he was in a most distressing agony of mind when he recalled the privations and sufferings which in all likelihood awaited them.

When all but myself had signed, a pen was placed between my fingers, Nathan held my wrist, Mr. Coffin guided my hand, and between them they managed to affix a spluttering signature to the important document. Then we were all sent forward; libations of grog were served out, petty officers appointed, and the mates came up to teach us our duty. "You air in my watch," said Mr. Dan Coffin, as he very deftly removed the gag, and undid the cord that confined my wrists; "you air in my watch, and kinder under my care. Keep your mouth shut, now, ef you don't want to bite oakum again. I am speaking out of pure kindness, and for your good; for I don't mind saying I have taken a sort of fancy to you, mister, and we're old acquaintances. Don't bear malice, stranger, for I mean no harm, and I wish you no worse than jest to go quietly through the voyage, and keep a whole skin and sound bones. For that, mister, you must keep a civil tongue, and be less bumptious to cap'en. He's terrible, cap'en is, once he takes a spite, and already you've roused his grit. I see by your eye you're riled, but jest you consider this; it's better to go ashore at San Francisco alive, than mebbe to be food for the fishes atween this and the Gulf. I'm hard, myself, but not like cap'en. I'm hickory, but he's flint."

For all my righteous rage, for all my natural repugnance to submit to so unjustifiable an outrage, I felt that Dan Coffin gave good advice. I also felt sure that he spoke the truth; he had taken a "sort of fancy" to me, although he had been the original decoy-duck concerned in my capture. I had heard queer stories and read strange paragraphs, respecting the doings on board American vessels, even while in British waters. What, then, was to bridle the imperious will of Captain Hodgson, on the long voyage that was just begun—a voyage round the great western continent, from lax New York to lawless San Francisco? Entrapped as I had been, it was still necessary that I should obey and toil, until a chance of escape should present itself. I consented to work as a foremast man. The actual labor was the least part of what I had to undergo, for I was vigorous enough to get through my "duty" with comparative ease.

The voyages I had previously made had seasoned me against sea-sickness, and I could tread the deck with tolerable firmness; whereas many of the kidnapped men were in agonies of nausea, and slipped and tumbled as they went about their work. But the cockroaches and vermin in the fore-castle, the foul air, the noise, the broken slumbers, the grease, dirt, and squalor, and the many disgusts of such a life! Nor was it agreeable to be the only educated man among companions who often jeered at me for not drinking rum and chewing tobacco like the rest—for being so "mealy-mouthed" when oaths were in question—and the like. But here, too, my robust constitution stood me in good stead, for nobody ventured on practical jokes or personal rudeness, whereas a more slightly made man would probably have had to endure a good deal of annoyance. Of my enforced messmates the majority were rather well-disposed fellows, although ignorant and fond of drink, and as impressionable as school-boys. Half a dozen of them were sad ruffians, quarrelsome evil-eyed scamps, who were the bullies of the fore-castle, and whose ordinary talk was full of blasphemy and threats. Among these, I have heard proposals for a mutiny broached twenty times, but nothing ever came of them. When once the ship's officers came hectoring in among the crew, to distribute the daily dole of cuffs and curses, the ruffians were always utterly cowed, and would bear any amount of beating.

But while it was needful to keep a tight hand on this portion of the ship's company nothing could excuse the capricious severity of those in authority. Captain, mates, and boatswain were never without revolvers, and seldom without a cutlass or hanger—which latter they would fetch and buckle on at the slightest murmur or remonstrance from the sailors. The boatswain always carried a thick ratan, and was unsparing in its use; the mates had knotted ropes-ends, or "colts," in their pockets, and mercilessly applied them to every laggard. But what the crew most feared was the free use of the "brass knuckles," or "knuckle-dusters," which our taskmasters wore six times out of seven. These are brass finger-guards, not unlike what the Roman gladiators called the cestus; they constitute a regular portion of the equipment of an officer of the American mercantile marine, and they convert the fist into a metal mace for cutting and gashing the face which it strikes. The punishment was unsparing and continual. The crew was an incongruous one, with its incapables, its skulkers, and its sick men—real and feigned. Picked up as it had been, it was certainly a very indifferent ship's company, and would have tried the patience of even a good-humored commander. But in our case pity and patience were put out of court at once. Sick or well, lazy or willing, stupid or shrewd, every man must work, and every man must obey any order, smartly and well, or bear the penalty. And the weather was exactly that least suited to a display of the clipper's qualities. Baffling winds, rough seas, and adverse currents, made the Bird of Freedom beat about in a most unsatisfactory style, and soured the temper of skipper and subalterns. If there came a fine sunny day, with favoring wind and moderate sea, the passengers would appear on the poop, basking like butterflies; but soon the cloudy sky and increasing sea sent them all out of sight again. It was curious on these occasions for me to look from my post forward at the gay groups in silk and broadcloth, and the fluttering muslins, with spy-glasses and parasols and books, to hear the silvery peals of ladies' laughter, and the voices of educated men, from whose society I was shut out. And it was curious to see the captain a prime favorite among them, amusing, courteous, and kind, and then to see how the same captain came among us, swearing, black-browed, and cruel as Nero.

Four men died before we were off Cape Hatteras, every one of whom might have lived but for the brutal usage and neglect on board. The surgeon only attended to the passengers. He declared the sick seamen were shamming; they were driven to quarters, and buffeted while they could stand. They died like dogs, and had dogs' burial. A worn-out hammock, a round shot sewn up in it, a grating tilted over the gangway, and a sullen plunge in the sea, without prayer or blessing—and they were gone. By this time many others had received severe injuries, few or none were without cuts and bruises, for the mates thought nothing of felling a seaman with their brass knuckle-dusters, every blow of which broke the skin. As little did they think of a knock-down blow with a marline-spike or belaying-pin, and the canes and knotted colts were always in full play. I can not say that the more deadly weapons were much used. I have certainly seen the captain give a flesh wound with his hanger to a sluggish sailor, and two of the men were pistoled by the first-mate for disobedience, but the wounds were slight, and the shots had been designedly aimed at the calf of the leg. But I could have no doubt that, on very slender provocation, the shooting and hacking would have been resorted to freely. Yet many of the men were content and cheerful. The provisions were excellent and liberally furnished, check shirts and sea frocks were supplied freely against wages: and the grog was good. It was only when fresh from punishment that the more thoughtless were out of spirits.

But there were those to whom the discipline was unbearable, and the captain as much an object of dread as if he had been really a demon. The mates were harsh enough, but the captain was a worse tyrant still. He bore heavily on the weak, and most of all on the poor young Swiss, the kidnapped house-painter. He was a well-disposed fellow, rather puny and timid, and never quite free from the qualms of sea-sickness. He had been an excellent workman ashore, but never would have made a sailor. I protected him from the fore-castle bullies, and spoke in his favor to Dan Coffin; but Nathan and the captain were very severe with him. Poor wretch! what he went through will hardly bear detailing—the oppression, the injustice, the sickening brutality. I shall never forget how he crept to my side one night as we kept watch on deck, and whispered to me that he had seen his wife and child in a dream, nights before, dead of want; and that in another dream he had seen them free from pain and trouble, happy in heaven, beckoning and smiling to him to join them. "I shall be with them soon," he said, wildly; "I can no longer bear the life on board this ship—this hell upon the waters!" I looked down at his white face in the moonlight, scarred with ill-usage as it was, and saw a new resolve there. I tried to comfort him, to put hope into him, and enable him to struggle on. He pressed my hand and thanked me, and glided off like a ghost. That night he drowned himself, springing over the side during the bustle of relieving the watch. "The thief! He has cheated me, has he?" was all the captain said about it.

We were in the tropics then, and the winds were light, and the clipper went like a wraith over the waters. She was a wonderful sailer. The men were now less maltreated than in rough weather. Nevertheless, seven had died before we crossed the line.

We were not much south of the line when an accident occurred. The great iron tank, a patent one, proved defective, and the water ran out, floating the cargo and mixing itself with the bilge-water of the hold. Only the casks remained. We sailors were restricted to a quart a day, then to a pint, and that in the tropics. But the torture of thirst conquered even fear; we spoke out loudly, in spite of steel and pistols, and we got our way. The captain was obliged to put into the harbor of Rio Janeiro to obtain a fresh supply. He was very unwilling. He would let no one go ashore except the American seamen, whom he trusted, lest he should lose his white slaves. Those Americans I speak of were not ill-treated; they were on a different footing from that of the crimped men.

With great trouble I succeeded in writing a letter, and bribing, with the few dollars I had about me, a black canoeman who sold fruit and yams, to carry it secretly ashore. This letter I addressed to the British Consul, my school-fellow in former days, and on whom I felt I could depend. Nor was I disappointed. Before the water was all shipped, the Bird of Freedom was boarded by the gentleman in question, who had wisely procured the attendance of a lieutenant and boat's crew from the United States frigate in harbor. The consul civilly but firmly claimed me as a British subject, under illegal restraint, and the American officer backed the claim.

I never shall forget the face of our "old man," as the sailors called Captain Hodgson, as he stood biting his lips, and looking from the consul to me. The whole thing had been managed so suddenly, that he was for once outwitted. "Take your Britisher!" he said, at last; and as I passed over the side to the consul's boat he eyed me with the malignity of a fiend. But over me, at least, his power no longer extended, though my heart ached for the poor fellows I had left, as I next day saw the Bird of Freedom unfold her white wings and glide away out of the port, and out of my life, over the blue sea.

PETS.

I AM not about to write any thing in defense of this word of four letters, which stands as a finger-post to show the way I travel when I wish agreeable company. I simply intimate, that, if you will go on with me, I flatter myself you will not regret it.

There never was a people so devoid of love for pets as we Americans. The besoin d'aimer is a weakness we spurn and hasten to get rid of, considering it insanely extravagant or sentimentally ridiculous, to use the mildest terms. In spite of these prejudices I am weak enough to confess my tastes are not eclectic. I have a very particular interest in every thing that runs, or flies, or swims, or walks, or creeps; and if it was possible I would open my door to an elephant, trunk and all, and share willingly with him my crust and cup of tea. Nay, more—I would not refuse reciprocity with that ghoul, the hyena, for from it I know I should extract something good, and discover something beautiful, besides those peculiar charms all its own, the susceptibility it shows to affection when treated kindly, and its strict fidelity to its trusts. Travelers tell us that in Africa and Asia they are trained to supply the place of watch-dogs, and are divested of the superstitious garb which more civilized nations hang around even their name. I am sorry to admit, however, my tolerating taste in this respect has never been put to the test.

This confession being made, do not turn away with contempt or disgust, but generously consider me, if we differ, to be simply mistaken. But in defense, I will relate a few of my experiences.

I shall not rehearse the many troubles, pains, disappointments, and anxieties this above-named weakness—that of being deeply interested in, if not fond of every thing—has given me during my sojourn on this earth, so full of beauty, sublimity, and love. Ay, love; rather an old-fashioned, almost obsolete word, is it not? If it has become a myth with men and women, it still exists in all its influence in the electric chain of life. The continuity of affinities is still triumphant throughout creation, whether acknowledged by man in his studies of physiological phenomena or not; and the contemplation of individual life is beautiful and complete, in every example, from the earth-worm to the troglodyte, who builds a house for his best beloved.

Life being thus exhibited manifests most interesting relations; and I watch with the deepest adoration, awe, and admiration the remarkable changes, the wonderful transformations, the most extraordinary and the simplest metamorphoses, constituting progressive development throughout every department of the animal kingdom.

I like to place myself en rapport with every thing; consequently I have had strange companions, have received marvelous confidences, and have witnessed strange acts of instinct and attachment from the brute beast, whose affectionate rationality has made it more enjoyable to me than many a human being endowed with reason, but lacking perhaps all things besides.

I am not going to shelter myself behind a list of great names: not Mohammed's cat, who gained the skirt of a prophet's gown for a bed; nor Byron's dog, who sleeps so calmly beneath his beautiful tomb and exquisite epitaph; nor yet Lord Erskine's goose, who trotted after him in his walks, learning law if not wisdom from the great man's lips; nor yet the leeches, to whom the celebrated surgeons Home and Cline stood godfathers, and which being exhibited to friends caused them to marvel at the vivacity, the tones, the details, and the gestures which "his lordship exhibited in this singular scene;" nor a host of others, male and female, with whom I share this weakness. None of them shall exonerate me, or extenuate aught of this necessitating fondness on my part for these "intolerable nuisances." If

"The worth of any thing Is just as much as it will bring,"

then do I enjoy a mine of wealth no one can rob me of—a pleasure unfading, ever increasing—lessons full of beauty and silent wisdom, and an expenditure of time rich with suggestions and demonstrations of the Divine creator of man and beast.

That there is an electric chain, an affinity existing in every thing enjoying life, the key-note of which is Love, no man of observation will deny. Almost all the old divines have translated St. Paul's First Epistle to the Corinthians, that famous chapter commencing, "Though I spake with the tongues of men and angels, and yet had no love, I am even as soundynge brasse and as a tynklynge cymball."* Charity is an after-thought—an innovation. Love was the word; it is so full, so comprehensive, so grand in all its requirements, and so easily understood—so instantly reciprocated; and it is measured back to you so largely, so freely, by those whose actions can alone demonstrate its purity, where the tongue is bound and held in abeyance to Nature's inexorable laws. Why, it is only a few weeks ago I ventured on an exhibition of this same feeling. For a dog my love has no bounds.

I had been taking a walk; had been to see a friend's hot-house; had been to take a long breath of flower sweets; and my eyes saw them still in all their beauty as I turned to look toward hills covered with snow, trees leafless, with branches divided into lines of light and darkness, and streets a conglomeration of mud and ice. I went on, watching the last beams of the setting sun gilding a distant spire, and dancing in streams of rosy beauty from window-panes, the topmost branches of trees, and the roof-tops of houses, in a valley not far away. At last I paused to watch a dark pigeon which was flying directly across the rays of light, which caused every feather to shimmer and scintillate—for a second a bird of gorgeous plumage—a fabled bird of the far Orient, whose brightness was as evanescent as it was beautiful. As I turned from this glowing vision I saw just before me, at the corner of two streets, standing as if quite determined to dispute the way, a most hideous, outrageously-ugly dog—a butcher's dog—a cross upon an American cross of a bull-dog with a counter cross of a blood-hound. The distinctive lines of dog pedigree are as difficult to be got at with us as those of family genealogy. "The genuine article," as a dog-trainer in New York once told me, "must be himported afore it would fetch an hidee of what a real dog was." This I believe. But before me now stood a warrior—one who had been in a hundred fights. Two legs—one front, the other behind—showed they had been broken and badly set; slices of skin were denuded of hair, exhibiting where old wounds had been. On both sides his ears were fluted with seams and scallops, like Corinthian columns. His upper lip had been cleft in two, and had healed according to its own inherent adhesiveness. His tail was about four inches long, and he was nearly as large as a sheep. He had a most peculiar curl of the upper lip, which gave a sinister and disdainful expression to his broad visage, as he looked steadily at me out of those ferocious eyes, grinning defiance with a set of teeth that only the Wolf in "Little Red Riding-Hood" ever exhibited to trembling human flesh before. I felt cowardly, rather nervous, this evening. I do not believe "conscience makes cowards of us all;" but I know—ah! too well, from sad experience—the stomach can, and it deals harder with us than men are willing to allow.

* William Tyndale, etc.

I stood aghast within two or three yards of this formidable beast. I would not turn—that was out of the question. I had not courage to pass in front, and to attempt to go behind was inviting a positive assault. I involuntarily raised my muff to my throat, and fixing my eyes full into his, I confronted him for a second or more. At last I spoke, in a kind and gentle voice:

"Good-evening! how do you do, my excellent friend? I hope every thing is prosperous with you?"

No answer, only that ferocious stare; as if he was astonished at so much civility. I went on talking:

"A pleasant evening! I suppose you are waiting for your master? You are a true and faithful companion to those you love, I know. You are a fine dog, a nice dog—[only I wish you were a mile away: Aside]—a nice, yes, a handsome, brave dog. I see you have fought your way bravely through life, as every scar on your huge body tells!"

I shall not say how anxiously I looked up one street and down the next, in hopes of seeing a passenger of any size—one eye on the dog, the other peering round—mechanically repeating, "Nice dog, good dog, brave dog!" At last the stump of a tail began to wag, and then I knew he understood me.

He moved round suddenly and allowed me to pass; paused a moment, and then complacently trotted after me; and finally condescended to rub that horrible upper-lip against my elbow. I turned and patted him on that formidable head, and our friendship was cemented for life. I was nearly a mile from home, but he would not leave me, and we jogged along—I conversing, and he answering with that bit of a tail; and at last we became such excellent friends that he insisted upon carrying the small basket which hung on my arm, containing a few precious flowers. I put the handle into his awful mouth, and who now so proud and happy as he?

I do not wonder now, since I know the history of the dog, that passers-by, as we came down into the town, stopped and stared with amazement at such companionship. He is the terror of man and beast, is kept confined constantly in the butcher's slaughter-yard, and would have been killed for his ferocity long ago if it was not for the "obstreperous way in which he can pull a bull down by his muzzle." Fortunately, I was not aware of all his accomplishments this particular evening, or I should perhaps have shown some fear, which he would have understood as well as myself; but my confidence in him, gentle words, and kind voice, quite won his forbearance if not his affection.

We reached the door of my domicile with our friendship in its first glow, and taking the basket from his mouth, I patted him, and shook his big paw for "Good-night," answered by an affectionate bark which startled the street, it was so loud and clear; the remnant of the poor tail must have been exhausted with its ecstatic movements: and so we parted. I looked through the fan-light at him. He was under the gas-lamp, as if wondering at himself or at me, I can not divine which; but at last coming to the conclusion that I would not come forth again that night, he trotted off up the street back to the place, I suppose, where he had joined me, and where he is accustomed to wait for his master in his cart, who goes out usually at this time to prepare for next day's market. We have met frequently since, and always with a renewal of our friendship cemented by a biscuit or a delicate bone. I seldom go out without taking "something nice" for my four-footed friend, who is almost certain to bob out from some back alley or yard before I have gone far. People never interfere with his going in or coming out: he has it all his own way, I assure you.

Oh! the reminiscences I have of my canine and feline companions—their sagacity, their instinct, affection, and amusing qualities would fill volumes if all were written.

I recall with the tenderest feelings my lost favorite Kitto—the blackest of black cats, not a white hair on his entire body, not even his whiskers; and born, too, on a Good Friday. Those large eyes of burnished gold—how they would wink and blink with delight during our long social conversations! He would dispose himself in the corner of the sofa after breakfast, and doze until the clock rung out ten ; then rising, he would rub his soft face against mine to remind me of his saucer of milk. At one, again, punctual to the minute, he would announce that it was time for his dinner. But after five o'clock in the afternoon he would come to the conclusion that it was time to give up work. He would spring upon the table, walk over my desk, arch his broad, high back, and flourish his wonderful tail across my face. If I took no notice of these salutations slowly he would sink down on all fours, and watch with those bright eyes of his the pen as it traveled over the paper, and, quick as a flash, the paw would dart under it, causing a long stroke to extend from one side of the page to the other. It was only a day or two ago I was pondering over some old manuscripts crossed and recrossed with these strange hieroglyphics. It was like reading a letter from some loved but long departed friend ; they made me very sad.

Sometimes he would annoy me with his mischief. I would give him a gentle tap with a ruler or pencil ; but this was only a signal for a more determined attack. He would roll over papers, books, inkstand, wild with anticipated fun ; until in self-defense, to save time in replacing papers the next day, I would yield to his solicitations, and prepare for our evening recreations. No nine-year-old youngster could play "hide and go seek" and "catcher" with more human delight than this four-footed companion. The ecstatic "spit" of recognition with which he would announce that he discovered me behind a door or a window curtain must have been seen to be really appreciated. He was so heavy and stout that he had to rest several times during our romp ; but I always got weary the first, and then we would enjoy the twilight stretched on the sofa, with his fore paws round my neck, soothing me with his soft purring, and a lick of the harsh tongue ever and anon across my hands.

And so we dwelt in love and confidence nearly two years ; and then the Fates became jealous of our happiness. I had to move. I was fearful of hardship for my pet in my new quarters ; and a friend offering to share every comfort with my inimitable Kitto, I removed cup, saucer, basket, and knitted blanket to her comfortable and pleasant hearth and bade him a temporary good-by.

It was a very severe winter, storms of snow and sleet alternated with wind and rain, and I was kept within doors nearly two weeks after our separation. One night in January, the snow falling "by wagon loads," I was seated at my desk with a hard task before me. It was in a corner of the room around which the wind wailed in most sad and melancholy cadence. It was very still in this back room save the wind and the sighing of the wet wood in the stove ; these were all the sounds disturbing the silence around me. There were two windows in this room which opened upon the shed of the piazza below. My shoulder almost touched the last of these when I leaned back from my desk. This evening I was weary, and the wind always brings to me sad tales. Thoughts of other days crept up ; of other friends long gone over that unseen, that dreaded boundary ; others far away in the flesh ; and others again farther away in love or appreciation. That Bluebeard chamber which every one possesses, the key of which we are always seeking yet dreading to find, had been involuntarily opened, and ghosts stalked out and scene after scene passed in panoramic review, until I trembled at the unreal. I felt around me. From this trance I was suddenly startled by a fierce scratch against the pane of glass close beside me, and turning round, there I beheld the strangest object imaginable—a black face and glaring eyes peering at me from a winding-sheet of snow. My poor, sad, forsaken Kitto had traced me nearly a mile. I have often wondered since if during all this stormy period he had been wandering from house-roof to house-roof, peering in at every window to seek his lost companion. He could not unravel the mystery ; but he could tell me of his most complete, unfeigned delight at having once more found me. How he purred and sung his monotone of happiness ; how he enjoyed his supper of cold mutton and a saucer of milk ! He had lost all his flesh, his once glossy coat was rusty and neglected, and his eyes had lost all their strange fascination. He looked wild and troubled, as if he had been hunted and frightened during his peregrinations ; but now he had once more reached his paradise, he thought, as he curled himself up to sleep in my lap, after I had wiped him dry and warmed him by the stove. Early next morning, after a nice breakfast, I let him out of the window. Where he hid during the day I never discovered ; he seemed to understand his visits must be clandestine. Now and then he would appear for a few minutes at my friend's house "to see if his property remained undisturbed," she said, but no sooner was I seated at my desk in the evening than the familiar mew and scratch announced his arrival. Thus this Leander visited his Hero over snow-drifts, ice, and rain-sloughs for many weeks. It was hard to tell to which these clandestine visits revealed the most enjoyment, but they were to end, and all too soon and too tragically for both of us.

One unlucky morning he was discovered descending from the trellis-work of the piazza. The whoop was sung out, the chase began, the boys of the family sprang like Indians to the work. A white cat may stand a chance to escape sometimes ; but for a black cat there is no compassion, no pity. It is supposed to belong to "the Gentleman in Black," and although beloved, courted, and followed by half the world, people are ever ready to deny him the use of every subordinate supposed to prejudice themselves. As soon as I heard what constituted the game on this occasion I hastened to the rescue, dreading in my heart that my poor Kitto was being roughly handled, and arrived only in time to receive his last sigh. They had stoned my loving, sagacious, faithful companion to death. What a lecture on humanity to dumb animals I gave those boys! how I rated them for their cruelty! But the grown-up people of the house thought they had done "the very thing, rid the world of one more black cat; they never failed to bring all kinds of trouble to a house where they should come." I was most thoroughly disgusted, so up stakes, struck my tent, moving away before another week had passed.

Odd enough, the day week they killed my pet sickness broke out among the boys; it penetrated to the nursery, and the whole year was a scene of trouble and anxiety. Other misfortunes have followed since, and these silly people maintain "they were all brought by the black cat," and superstitiously believe the black cat and I were emissaries of the Evil One.

This silver cord of love can be touched, and made to tell its wondrous tale even in the anatomy of that "slow coach," the tortoise. A specimen of the emydes, or fresh-water tortoise, was kidnapped by a little five-year-old thing during her rambles on the banks of one of our rivers, and taken home for a pet. It was daily fed, tended, and washed, even having its nails cleaned every day with the nail-brush. Its carapace became very brilliant and rich in the coloring of its scales, and it ultimately attained a great size for its species.

The little one fell sick, and "Turtly" was consigned to the watering-pot in the conservatory. Two days had passed, when, on the third morning, "Turtly" could stand it no longer; so up the stairs, holding on by the carpet, it began to clamber. It was the labor of hours, but was at last accomplished. The nurse was amazed to hear the "lumping sound" at the door, and still more when, on opening it, it rumbled "Turtly" up to the bed, its neck elongated, and eyes almost bursting from their sockets, and commenced clambering up with the aid of its long nails crushed into the quilt. The little one smiled amidst her sufferings, and welcomed her uncouth playmate with a faded joy; and so "Turtly" came faithfully every morning to the nursery door until the little one was able to renew her romps and walks in the fields and garden, where they became inseparable.

If my space allowed, what a number of unfamiliar tales I could tell you of frogs and toads! How "Tony," the large and brilliantly colored frog, luxuriated in the tin bottom of a bird-cage enveloped in fresh grass every day; how he refused to be fed by any one but myself, having undergone two weeks' starvation during a temporary visit I made to the city; with what apparent delight he popped up his head, with those brilliant eyes, out of the bed of grass under which he had hidden so disconsolately, and gave his usual sign of hunger by hopping near to the wires and protruding his head partly through them. On this occasion he devoured twenty earth-worms, and then was not satisfied. Every one might call, talk, and coax; but he was deaf to every persuasion until I spoke, when round he would bounce to the side from which my voice had come. Out would come that long tongue swifter than lightning speed; the manner and the dexterity with which those front claws would crush the larger worms into his mouth was marvelous to behold.

He would repose fine moonlight nights in his wire home, and answer the croaking of friends away over the river and on the hill-side as if he was telling them of his comforts and domestic delights. The door of his cage was not always shut; he went in and out whenever he pleased; but, from over-indulgence, he was so fat that he became uncomfortable if he was out of the water any time, and his skin became dry. So, after two or three leaps, I would hear him plunge back into the water.

Then again there was "Black Peg," the toad, on the window-sill, her head hid away in the dark behind the blinds all day, and whirring out that strange song all night long. I confess she was very tiresome; she would not eat unless the insect was running before her; it must be "alive and kicking" if she condescended to touch it.

There was no care or feeding could alter her looks, or "make a lady of her." The granules on her skin never changed, shed it as often as she did—a toad she remained to the last. It was amusing to see her when, driven by the absorption of the atmosphere, she hopped into the water where "Tony" was squatted; how he would dash at her, splashing it over her. She would soon emerge, content. She had had one dip. Still there was beauty even in this toad. I never saw eyes express more patient and mild endurance, mingled with a sad, dreamy glance, than was exhibited by those in this ugly head. Neither of them hibernated while with me; they were stupid, dull, and indifferent to eating. Still, a stray fly or a slug was acceptable any time during the severest weather. To keep them comfortable it was necessary to have them always wet. I allowed them once to undergo desiccation four weeks; they dwindled to mere anatomies, and were nearly dead. Placing them in lukewarm water, they soon regained their usual proportions. Being thus unable to stand the want of moisture, and being reduced therefrom into such a small compass, I think has given rise to the belief of their being able to exist in the body of "solid trees and stone walls," having been often discovered in rocks and wood. After being thus reduced, they can force the entire body through an aperture into which they could not push one of their legs when the skin and stomach are filled with water. Making their way when thus attenuated through openings the discoverer would pass unnoticed, they might astonish any one by making their appearance in such darksome holes. But for the statement of toads and frogs being able to exist in sealed boxes, etc., I have no faith, for I know it to be untenable from experience.

Then, again, the venom said to exist in the skin of the toad I consider fabulous. In the face of the experiments made by the French philosophers, Messrs. Gratiolet and S. Cloeg, I confess I am incredulous, at least as relates to the toads and salamanders of this country. They assert having inoculated various animals with the poison from the skin pustules of these amphibia, and have demonstrated their poisonous quality on other animals. I have not space to relate my experiments; but I have been handling varieties of the Bufoidæ, the Kanides, and other divisions of the Amphibians almost every year of my life, in every stage of transition, and never could trace the slightest approximation to poison in their skins.

Before me, at this moment of writing, mon bien aimé "Peter" is scrambling, in his lazy fashion, over my hand. You ask, "Who is Peter?" He is a salamander (Salamandra vulgaris of American herpetologists). He has been my companion nearly two years. He lives in a flower-pot half full of clay, covered with moss kept ever beautifully green by moistening.

Years ago, "way down South," a ball of earth, gravel, and clay was sent me, saying, "it was alive—it moved." And so it did; but on opening this ball one of these pretty salamanders looked out with astonishment upon a world so new to him. We enjoyed ourselves very much for a month or more; but alas! one unlucky morning, while holding him in the palm of my hand, the other engaged with a magnifier watching the oozing from the pores of his skin the moisture which the heat of my hand caused to evaporate over his body, another pet—a large white crane of the South, called familiarly "Poor Job"—crept up near me, and, with a dash of his long neck, my little pet was gobbled up, and disappeared from mortal ken.

Nearly two years ago a kind friend, remembering the hobby I ride, brought me another ball. This last was found here (in Connecticut), nearly eight feet below the surface. A fine tree had been blown down by a storm, and men were engaged in throwing up the earth to see whether it could not be drawn back into position, and take root again, consequently saved; and with a spadeful of earth "Peter," in his ball, rolled forth. He had reposed in a perfect mould—every crease, wrinkle, and toe were distinctly traced in the soft clay. He was stiff, almost lifeless; but on being exposed to the warm air of the room he slowly revived, but did not become lively or active until spring was far advanced. Of course I had nothing to feed him on. Slugs had disappeared, and flies had gone into winter-quarters, so for months he lived and thrived upon cold water; he is now lively and brisk under the same régime, having enjoyed four flies in as many months.

He has grown considerably since his resurrection. This summer he has averaged twenty flies a day, but as fall approached he was satisfied with fewer; even in November, when they were still plentiful, he would take but three a day—but how languid and thin he becomes if by chance you neglect to soak the moss or to bathe him! He is little more than four inches long, beautifully mottled with pearly white and black, in lozenges, triangles, and crescents over his back. These spots were very faint, almost unseen, when he first emerged; but having been nicely nursed and looked after, he does credit to the company he keeps, and is exceedingly pretty. He knows his name; go ever so softly to the jar and whisper "Peter," and up pops from the moss the little square head. But the oddity of the answering action is that he does not see you. This cold weather he keeps the lids down over his eyes; but his power of hearing is very acute. This is the only mark of hibernating he has ever exhibited, except once, when absent about two weeks and no fire being made in the room, he found it necessary for comfort to descend into the clay; but he left about half an inch of his tail above the surface, by way of thermometer I conclude, for the fire had not been made a quarter of an hour before he was aware of it, and backed out to his usual position under the moss.

The query I have often asked myself is, how they can manage to get into these balls of earth? The only conclusion I can arrive at is that they roll themselves to and fro, as I have often seen him do, until the skin becomes incrustated with clay in layers over it to keep in the moisture. In a state of nature, these never being disturbed, the earth adheres more and more, they meanwhile obtaining their moisture from the absence of light and the porous nature of the clay. They could exist ages in such a domicile unchanged—the earth ball increasing by the adhesiveness of its own natural laws.

"Peter" and I are not in every respect such good friends as we were formerly. I was engaged, late in the autumn, lulling with chloroform into everlasting sleep a fine moth. A plump, gay fly came buzzing along, which I soon entrapped, and hastened to the jar, inviting "Peter" to the repast; but, most unfortunately, I offered it with the finger and thumb which had just been experimenting in chloroform. He came eagerly forth at my call, but had no sooner approached his head toward the fly than he drew back under the moss. Since then, if he has been starving for weeks, he will not accept any thing in the eating line from me, but another member of the family has only to announce her presence, when his head pops up to see what he can devour; before this contretemps no one could get him to accept any thing but myself.

I can not conceive how the fabulous accounts among the ancients concerning this division of Amphibia could have originated—their fancied resistance to fire, their ability to suffer any amount of heat, their poisonous stinging, dangerous qualities, etc. I might as well add—which are still existent among the moderns. The truth is, as my own experience demonstrates—and I have seen almost all the varieties we have in this country—they can not stand heat at all.

The longest time I dare hold "Peter" on my hand, without seeing him ready to expire with anguish from the oppression caused from its natural warmth, is less than two minutes. The sweat literally (pardon this vulgar term, but it is the only word to express the state he will be in) bursts in globules, and runs down on to my hand; his sides and throat pant, his eyes distend, his jaws relax and open, his legs lose their strength; and if not thrown instantly into water I know he would expire. He loses all his good looks if the moss becomes dry or the room is over-warm, becoming stupefied and dull; and as for light, he can not suffer it any more than he "whose deeds are evil." Put him down any where, and away he will scamper under a book, up your sleeve, into a drawer—any where, so he gets his head, like the ostrich, hidden; then he imagines himself safe. By candle, or lamp-light, or moonlight, or sunlight, it is all the same; but a dark night, when you can barely distinguish any thing by the light of the stars, he is happy, and enjoys a ramble over the moss or other jars of plants amazingly. They are strictly nocturnal animals, and were not made for the garish light of day; they exist only in wet and dark places, rambling abroad for food, which consists, in a state of nature, of slugs, worms, and insects of the diptera order. Again, it is said when frightened they will emit an acrid, milky fluid, which oozes from tubercles on the sides of the body, and that this is poisonous to small animals. It may be so with those in Europe, but with all my watchfulness I have never observed a semblance even of this white fluid; and furthermore, the pores which throw out the moisture, and which evidently absorb it, range only along the head, back, and tail, at a line just above where the

legs intersect the body. While "Peter" is apparently perspiring at every pore, drop chalk or any white powder over his body, instantly it becomes absorbed by the moisture above this line, but can be easily brushed off with a camel's-hair pencil below it.

And a beautiful provision of Nature this is; for if the clay for the purpose of retaining moisture adhered to the entire body, it would be impossible for the little animal to move abroad after food; his legs would become so incrustated and his body so weighty that, unless the food came to it, it must starve—which is a sequence Mother Nature would never recognize.

In the mating season the male exudes a fluid, as it passes along, which leaves behind him a powerful odor, closely resembling the fashionable perfume "patchoulie," and which, probably, may have been mistaken for the moisture of a milky nature said to flow from the body.

But I shall weary you: permit me only to add, I have selected here a chapter of truths for your amusement, may I hope for your instruction. But yet there is a moral to all this which blesses the giver as much as the recipient. It is to become familiar, to cultivate the society of every living thing that crosses your path. You will find so much to amuse, to amaze, to admire, and to love, you will never be weary with too much variety; there is so much to learn—a new and divine Thought in every creeping, leaping, walking, flying creature—that Life will become to you of double significance.

THE ADVENTURES OF PHILIP.

BY W. M. THACKERAY.

CHAPTER XVII.

BREVIS ESSE LABORO.

NEVER, General Baynes afterward declared, did fever come and go so pleasantly as that attack to which we have seen the Mrs. General advert in her letter to her sister, Mrs. Major MacWhirter. The cold fit was merely a lively, pleasant chatter and rattle of the teeth; the hot fit an agreeable warmth; and though the ensuing sleep, with which I believe such aguish attacks are usually concluded, was enlivened by several dreams of death, demons, and torture, how felicitous it was to wake and find that dreadful thought of ruin removed which had always, for the last few months, ever since Dr. Firmin's flight and the knowledge of his own imprudence, pursued the good-natured gentleman! What! this boy might go to college, and that get his commission; and their meals need be imbittered by no more dreadful thoughts of the morrow, and their walks no longer were dogged by imaginary bailiffs, and presented a jail in the vista! It was too much bliss; and again and again the old soldier said his thankful prayers, and blessed his benefactor.

Philip thought no more of his act of kindness, except to be very grateful, and very happy that he had rendered other people so. He could no more have taken the old man's all, and plunged that innocent family into poverty, than he could have stolen the forks off my table. But other folks were disposed to rate his virtue much more highly; and among these was my wife, who chose positively to worship this young gentleman, and

I believe would have let him smoke in her drawing-room if he had been so minded, and though her genteel acquaintances were in the room. Goodness knows what a noise and what piteous looks are produced if ever the master of the house chooses to indulge in a cigar after dinner; but then, you understand, I have never declined to claim mine and my children's right because an old gentleman would be inconvenienced: and this is what I tell Mrs. Pen. If I order a coat from my tailor must I refuse to pay him because a rogue steals it, and ought I to expect to be let off? Women won't see matters of fact in a matter-of-fact point of view; and justice, unless it is tinged with a little romance, gets no respect from them.

So, forsooth, because Philip has performed this certainly most generous, most dashing, most reckless piece of extravagance, he is to be held up as a perfect preux chevalier. The most riotous dinners are ordered for him. We are to wait until he comes to breakfast, and he is pretty nearly always late. The children are to be sent round to kiss uncle Philip, as he is now called. The children? I wonder the mother did not jump up and kiss him too. Elle en était capable. As for the osculations which took place between Mrs. Pendennis and her new-found young friend, Miss Charlotte Baynes, they were perfectly ridiculous; two school-children could not have behaved more absurdly; and I don't know which seemed to be the youngest of these two. There were colloquies, assignations, meetings on the ramparts, on the pier, where know I?—and the servants and little children of the two establishments were perpetually trotting to and fro with letters from dearest Laura to dearest Charlotte, and dearest Charlotte to her dearest Mrs. Pendennis. Why, my wife absolutely went the length of saying that dearest Charlotte's mother, Mrs. Baynes, was a worthy, clever woman, and a good mother—a woman whose tongue never ceased clacking about the regiment, and all the officers, and all the officers' wives; of whom, by-the-way, she had very little good to tell.

"A worthy mother, is she, my dear?" I say. "But, oh, mercy! Mrs. Baynes would be an awful mother-in-law!"

I shuddered at the thought of having such a commonplace, hard, ill-bred woman in a state of quasi authority over me.

On this Mrs. Laura must break out in quite a petulant tone—"Oh, how stale this kind of thing is, Arthur, from a man qui veut passer pour un homme d'esprit! You are always attacking mothers-in-law!"

"Witness Mrs. Mackenzie, my love—Clive Newcome's mother-in-law. That's a nice creature! not selfish, not wicked, not—"

"Not nonsense, Arthur!"

"Mrs. Baynes knew Mrs. Mackenzie in the West Indies, as she knew all the female army. She considers Mrs. Mackenzie was a most elegant, handsome, dashing woman—only a little too fond of the admiration of our sex. There was, I own, a fascination about Captain Goby.

Do you remember, my love, that man with the stays and dyed hair, who—"

"Oh, Arthur! When our girls marry, I suppose you will teach their husbands to abuse, and scorn, and mistrust their mother-in-law. Will he, my darlings? will he, my blessings?" (This apart to the children, if you please.) "Go! I have no patience with such talk!"

"Well, my love, Mrs. Baynes is a most agreeable woman; and when I have heard that story about the Highlanders at the Cape of Good Hope a few times more" (I do not tell it here, for it has nothing to do with the present history), "I dare say I shall begin to be amused by it."

"Ah! here comes Charlotte, I'm glad to say. How pretty she is! What a color! What a dear creature!"

To all which of course I could not say a contradictory word, for a prettier, fresher lass than Miss Baynes, with a sweeter voice, face, laughter, it was difficult to see.

"Why does mamma like Charlotte better than she likes us?" says our dear and justly indignant eldest girl.

"I could not love her better if I were her mother-in-law," says Laura, running to her young friend, casting a glance at me over her shoulder; and that kissing nonsense begins between the two ladies. To be sure the girl looks uncommonly bright and pretty with her pink cheeks, her bright eyes, her slim form, and that charming white India shawl which her father brought home for her.

To this osculatory party enters presently Mr. Philip Firmin, who has been dawdling about the ramparts ever since breakfast. He says he has been reading law there. He has found a jolly quiet place to read. Law, has he? And much good may it do him! Why has he not gone back to his law, and his reviewing?

"You must—you must stay on a little longer. You have only been here five days. Do, Charlotte, ask Philip to stay a little."

All the children sing in a chorus, "Oh, do, uncle Philip, stay a little longer!" Miss Baynes says, "I hope you will stay, Mr. Firmin," and looks at him.

"Five days has he been here? Five years. Five lives. Five hundred years. What do you mean? In that little time of—let me see, a hundred and twenty hours, and at least a half of them for sleep and dinner (for Philip's appetite was very fine)—do you mean that in that little time his heart, cruelly stabbed by a previous monster in female shape, has healed, got quite well, and actually begun to be wounded again? Have two walks on the pier, as many visits to the Tintalleries (where he hears the story of the Highlanders at the Cape of Good Hope with respectful interest), a word or two about the weather, a look or two, a squeeze, perhaps, of a little handykin—I say, do you mean that this absurd young idiot, and that little round-faced girl, pretty, certainly, but only just out of the school-room—do you mean to say that they have— Upon my word, Laura, this is too is the only word to express the state he will be in) bursts in globules, and runs down on to my hand; his sides and throat pant, his eyes distend, his jaws relax and open, his legs lose their strength; and if not thrown instantly into water I know he would expire. He loses all his good looks if the moss becomes dry or the room is over-warm, becoming stupefied and dull; and as for light, he can not suffer it any more than he "whose deeds are evil." Put him down any where, and away he will scamper under a book, up your sleeve, into a drawer—any where, so he gets his head, like the ostrich, hidden; then he imagines himself safe. By candle, or lamp-light, or moonlight, or sunlight, it is all the same; but a dark night, when you can barely distinguish any thing by the light of the stars, he is happy, and enjoys a ramble over the moss or other jars of plants amazingly. They are strictly nocturnal animals, and were not made for the garish light of day; they exist only in wet and dark places, rambling abroad for food, which consists, in a state of nature, of slugs, worms, and insects of the diptera order. Again, it is said when frightened they will emit an acrid, milky fluid, which oozes from tubercles on the sides of the body, and that this is poisonous to small animals. It may be so with those in Europe, but with all my watchfulness I have never observed a semblance even of this white fluid; and furthermore, the pores which throw out the moisture, and which evidently absorb it, range only along the head, back, and tail, at a line just above where the

legs intersect the body. While "Peter" is apparently perspiring at every pore, drop chalk or any white powder over his body, instantly it becomes absorbed by the moisture above this line, but can be easily brushed off with a camel's-hair pencil below it.

And a beautiful provision of Nature this is; for if the clay for the purpose of retaining moisture adhered to the entire body, it would be impossible for the little animal to move abroad after food; his legs would become so incrustated and his body so weighty that, unless the food came to it, it must starve—which is a sequence Mother Nature would never recognize.

In the mating season the male exudes a fluid, as it passes along, which leaves behind him a powerful odor, closely resembling the fashionable perfume "patchoulie," and which, probably, may have been mistaken for the moisture of a milky nature said to flow from the body.

But I shall weary you: permit me only to add, I have selected here a chapter of truths for your amusement, may I hope for your instruction. But yet there is a moral to all this which blesses the giver as much as the recipient. It is to become familiar, to cultivate the society of every living thing that crosses your path. You will find so much to amuse, to amaze, to admire, and to love, you will never be weary with too much variety; there is so much to learn—a new and divine Thought in every creeping, leaping, walking, flying creature—that Life will become to you of double significance.

THE ADVENTURES OF PHILIP.

BY W. M. THACKERAY.

CHAPTER XVII.

BREVIS ESSE LABORO.

NEVER, General Baynes afterward declared, did fever come and go so pleasantly as that attack to which we have seen the Mrs. General advert in her letter to her sister, Mrs. Major MacWhirter. The cold fit was merely a lively, pleasant chatter and rattle of the teeth; the hot fit an agreeable warmth; and though the ensuing sleep, with which I believe such aguish attacks are usually concluded, was enlivened by several dreams of death, demons, and torture, how felicitous it was to wake and find that dreadful thought of ruin removed which had always, for the last few months, ever since Dr. Firmin's flight and the knowledge of his own imprudence, pursued the good-natured gentleman! What! this boy might go to college, and that get his commission; and their meals need be imbittered by no more dreadful thoughts of the morrow, and their walks no longer were dogged by imaginary bailiffs, and presented a jail in the vista! It was too much bliss; and again and again the old soldier said his thankful prayers, and blessed his benefactor.

Philip thought no more of his act of kindness, except to be very grateful, and very happy that he had rendered other people so. He could no more have taken the old man's all, and plunged that innocent family into poverty, than he could have stolen the forks off my table. But other folks were disposed to rate his virtue much more highly; and among these was my wife, who chose positively to worship this young gentleman, and

I believe would have let him smoke in her drawing-room if he had been so minded, and though her genteel acquaintances were in the room. Goodness knows what a noise and what piteous looks are produced if ever the master of the house chooses to indulge in a cigar after dinner; but then, you understand, I have never declined to claim mine and my children's right because an old gentleman would be inconvenienced: and this is what I tell Mrs. Pen. If I order a coat from my tailor must I refuse to pay him because a rogue steals it, and ought I to expect to be let off? Women won't see matters of fact in a matter-of-fact point of view; and justice, unless it is tinged with a little romance, gets no respect from them.

So, forsooth, because Philip has performed this certainly most generous, most dashing, most reckless piece of extravagance, he is to be held up as a perfect preux chevalier. The most riotous dinners are ordered for him. We are to wait until he comes to breakfast, and he is pretty nearly always late. The children are to be sent round to kiss uncle Philip, as he is now called. The children? I wonder the mother did not jump up and kiss him too. Elle en était capable. As for the osculations which took place between Mrs. Pendennis and her new-found young friend, Miss Charlotte Baynes, they were perfectly ridiculous; two school-children could not have behaved more absurdly; and I don't know which seemed to be the youngest of these two. There were colloquies, assignations, meetings on the ramparts, on the pier, where know I?—and the servants and little children of the two establishments were perpetually trotting to and fro with letters from dearest Laura to dearest Charlotte, and dearest Charlotte to her dearest Mrs. Pendennis. Why, my wife absolutely went the length of saying that dearest Charlotte's mother, Mrs. Baynes, was a worthy, clever woman, and a good mother—a woman whose tongue never ceased clacking about the regiment, and all the officers, and all the officers' wives; of whom, by-the-way, she had very little good to tell.

"A worthy mother, is she, my dear?" I say. "But, oh, mercy! Mrs. Baynes would be an awful mother-in-law!"

I shuddered at the thought of having such a commonplace, hard, ill-bred woman in a state of quasi authority over me.

On this Mrs. Laura must break out in quite a petulant tone—"Oh, how stale this kind of thing is, Arthur, from a man qui veut passer pour un homme d'esprit! You are always attacking mothers-in-law!"

"Witness Mrs. Mackenzie, my love—Clive Newcome's mother-in-law. That's a nice creature! not selfish, not wicked, not—"

"Not nonsense, Arthur!"

"Mrs. Baynes knew Mrs. Mackenzie in the West Indies, as she knew all the female army. She considers Mrs. Mackenzie was a most elegant, handsome, dashing woman—only a little too fond of the admiration of our sex. There was, I own, a fascination about Captain Goby.

Do you remember, my love, that man with the stays and dyed hair, who—"

"Oh, Arthur! When our girls marry, I suppose you will teach their husbands to abuse, and scorn, and mistrust their mother-in-law. Will he, my darlings? will he, my blessings?" (This apart to the children, if you please.) "Go! I have no patience with such talk!"

"Well, my love, Mrs. Baynes is a most agreeable woman; and when I have heard that story about the Highlanders at the Cape of Good Hope a few times more" (I do not tell it here, for it has nothing to do with the present history), "I dare say I shall begin to be amused by it."

"Ah! here comes Charlotte, I'm glad to say. How pretty she is! What a color! What a dear creature!"

To all which of course I could not say a contradictory word, for a prettier, fresher lass than Miss Baynes, with a sweeter voice, face, laughter, it was difficult to see.

"Why does mamma like Charlotte better than she likes us?" says our dear and justly indignant eldest girl.

"I could not love her better if I were her mother-in-law," says Laura, running to her young friend, casting a glance at me over her shoulder; and that kissing nonsense begins between the two ladies. To be sure the girl looks uncommonly bright and pretty with her pink cheeks, her bright eyes, her slim form, and that charming white India shawl which her father brought home for her.

To this osculatory party enters presently Mr. Philip Firmin, who has been dawdling about the ramparts ever since breakfast. He says he has been reading law there. He has found a jolly quiet place to read. Law, has he? And much good may it do him! Why has he not gone back to his law, and his reviewing?

"You must—you must stay on a little longer. You have only been here five days. Do, Charlotte, ask Philip to stay a little."

All the children sing in a chorus, "Oh, do, uncle Philip, stay a little longer!" Miss Baynes says, "I hope you will stay, Mr. Firmin," and looks at him.

"Five days has he been here? Five years. Five lives. Five hundred years. What do you mean? In that little time of—let me see, a hundred and twenty hours, and at least a half of them for sleep and dinner (for Philip's appetite was very fine)—do you mean that in that little time his heart, cruelly stabbed by a previous monster in female shape, has healed, got quite well, and actually begun to be wounded again? Have two walks on the pier, as many visits to the Tintalleries (where he hears the story of the Highlanders at the Cape of Good Hope with respectful interest), a word or two about the weather, a look or two, a squeeze, perhaps, of a little handykin—I say, do you mean that this absurd young idiot, and that little round-faced girl, pretty, certainly, but only just out of the school-room—do you mean to say that they have— Upon my word, Laura, this is too bad. Why, Philip has not a penny piece in the world."

"Yes, he has a hundred pounds, and expects to sell his mare for ninety at least. He has excellent talents. He can easily write three articles a week in the Pall Mall Gazette. I am sure no one writes so well, and it is much better done and more amusing than it used to be. That is three hundred a year. Lord Ringwood must be applied to, and must and shall get him something. Don't you know that Captain Baynes stood by Colonel Ringwood's side at Busaco, and that they were the closest friends? And pray, how did we get on, I should like to know? How did we get on, baby?"

"How did we det on?" says the baby.

"Oh, woman! woman!" yells the father of the family. "Why, Philip Firmin has all the habits of a rich man with the pay of a mechanic. Do you suppose he ever sate in a second-class carriage in his life, or denied himself any pleasure to which he had a mind? He gave five francs to a beggar girl yesterday."

"He had always a noble heart," says my wife.

"He gave a fortune to a whole family a week ago; and" (out comes the pocket-handkerchief—oh, of course, the pocket-handkerchief)—"and—'God loves a cheerful giver!'"

"He is careless; he is extravagant; he is lazy; I don't know that he is remarkably clever—"

"Oh, yes! he is your friend, of course. Now, abuse him—do, Arthur!"

"And, pray, when did you become acquainted with this astounding piece of news?" I inquire.

"When? From the very first moment when I saw Charlotte looking at him, to be sure. The poor child said to me only yesterday, 'Oh, Laura! he is our preserver!' And their preserver he has been, under Heaven."

"Yes. But he has not got a five-pound note!" I cry.

"Arthur, I am surprised at you. Oh, men, men are awfully worldly! Do you suppose Heaven will not send him help at its good time, and be kind to him who has rescued so many from ruin? Do you suppose the prayers, the blessings of that father, of those little ones, of that dear child, will not avail him? Suppose he has to wait a year, ten years, have they not time, and will not the good day come?"

Yes. This was actually the talk of a woman of sense and discernment when her prejudices and romance were not in the way, and she looked forward to the marriage of these folks, some ten years hence, as confidently as if they were both rich, and going to St. George's to-morrow.

As for making a romantic story of it, or spinning out love conversations between Jenny and Jessamy, or describing moonlight raptures and passionate outpourings of two young hearts and so forth—excuse me, s'il vous plait. I am a man of the world, and of a certain age. Let the young people fill in this outline, and color it as they please. Let the old folks who read lay down the book a minute and remember. It is well remembered, isn't it, that time? Yes, good John Anderson and Mrs. John. Yes, good Darby and Joan. The lips won't tell now what they did once. To-day is for the happy, and to-morrow for the young, and yesterday, is not that dear and here too?

I was in the company of an elderly gentleman not very long since, who was perfectly sober, who is not particularly handsome, or healthy, or wealthy, or witty; and who, speaking of his past life, volunteered to declare that he would gladly live every minute of it over again. Is a man who can say that a hardened sinner, not aware how miserable he ought to be by rights, and therefore really in a most desperate and deplorable condition; or is he fortunatus nimium, and ought his statue to be put up in the most splendid and crowded thoroughfare of the town? Would you who are reading this, for example, like to live your life over again? What has been its chief joy? What are to-day's pleasures? Are they so exquisite that you would prolong them forever? Would you like to have the roast beef on which you have dined brought back again to table, and have more beef, and more, and more? Would you like to hear yesterday's sermon over and over again—eternally voluble? Would you like to get on the Edinburgh mail and travel outside for fifty hours, as you did in your youth? You might as well say you would like to go into the flogging-room and take a turn under the rods: you would like to be thrashed over again by your bully at school: you would like to go to the dentist's, where your dear parents were in the habit of taking you: you would like to be taking hot Epsom salts, with a piece of dry bread to take away the taste: you would like to be jilted by your first love: you would like to be going in to your father to tell him you had contracted debts to the amount of $x + y + z$, while you were at the University. As I consider the passionate griefs of childhood, the weariness and sameness of shaving, the agony of corns, and the thousand other ills to which flesh is heir, I cheerfully say for one, I am not anxious to wear it forever. No. I do not want to go to school again. I do not want to hear Trotman's sermon over again. Take me out and finish me. Give me the cup of hemlock at once. Here's a health to you, my lads. Don't weep, my Simmias. Be cheerful, my Phædon. Ha! I feel the co-o-old stealing, stealing upward. Now it is in my ankles—no more gout in my foot: now my knees are numb. What, is—is that poor executioner crying too? Good-by. Sacrifice a cock to Æscu—to Æscula—... Have you ever read the chapter in Grote's History? Ah! When the Sacred Ship returns from Delos, and is telegraphed as entering into port, may we be at peace and ready!

What is this funeral chant, when the pipes should be playing gayly as Love, and Youth, and Spring, and Joy are dancing under the windows. Look you. Men not so wise as Socrates have their demons, who will be heard and whisper in the queerest times and places. Perhaps I shall have to tell of a funeral presently, and shall be outrageously cheerful; or of an execution, and shall split my sides with laughing. Arrived at my time of life, when I see a penniless young friend falling in love, and thinking, of course, of committing matrimony, what can I do but be melancholy? How is a man to marry who has not enough to keep ever so miniature a brougham—ever so small a house—not enough to keep himself, let alone a wife and family? Gracious powers! is it not blasphemy to marry without fifteen hundred a year? Poverty, debt, protested bills, duns, crime, fall assuredly on the wretch who has not fifteen—say at once two thousand a year; for you can't live decently in London for less. And a wife whom you have met a score of times at balls or breakfasts, and with her best dresses and behavior at a country house—how do you know how she will turn out; what her temper is; what her relations are likely to be? Suppose she has poor relations, or loud coarse brothers who are always dropping in to dinner? What is her mother like? and can you bear to have that woman meddling and domineering over your establishment? Old General Baynes was very well—a weak, quiet, and presentable old man; but Mrs. General Baynes, and that awful Mrs. Major MacWhirter—and those hobbledchoys of boys in creaking shoes, hectoring about the premises? As a man of the world I saw all these dreadful liabilities impending over the husband of Miss Charlotte Baynes, and could not view them without horror. Gracefully and slightly, but wittily and in my sarcastic way, I thought it my duty to show up the oddities of the Baynes family to Philip. I mimicked the boys, and their clumping Blucher-boots. I touched off the dreadful military ladies, very smartly and cleverly as I thought, and as if I never supposed that Philip had any idea of Miss Baynes. To do him justice, he laughed once or twice; then he grew very red. His sense of humor is very limited; that even Laura allows. Then he came out with strong expression, and said it was a confounded shame, and strode off with his cigar. And when I remarked to my wife how susceptible he was in some things, and how little in the matter of joking, she shrugged her shoulders, and said, “Philip not only understood perfectly well what I said, but would tell it all to Mrs. General and Mrs. Major on the first opportunity.” And this was the fact, as Mrs. Baynes took care to tell me afterward. She was aware who was her enemy. She was aware who spoke ill of her and her blessed darling behind our backs. And “do you think it was to see you or any one belonging to your stuck-up house, Sir, that we came to you so often, which we certainly did, day and night, breakfast and supper, and no thanks to you? No, Sir! ha, ha!” I can see her flaunting out of my sitting-room as she speaks with a strident laugh, and snapping her dingily-gloved fingers at the door. Oh, Philip, Philip! To think that you were such a coward as to go and tell her! But I pardon him; from my heart I pity and pardon him.

For the step which he is meditating, you may be sure that the young man himself does not feel the smallest need of pardon or pity. He is in a state of happiness so crazy that it is useless to reason with him. Not being at all of a poetical turn originally, the wretch is actually perpetrating verse in secret, and my servants found fragments of his manuscript on the dressing-table in his bedroom. Heart and art, sever and forever, and so on; what stale rhymes are these? I do not feel at liberty to give in entire the poem which our maid found in Mr. Philip's room, and brought sniggering to my wife, who only said “Poor thing!” The fact is, it was too pitiable. Such maundering rubbish! Such stale rhymes, and such old thoughts! But then, says Laura, “I dare say all people's love-making is not amusing to their neighbors; and I know who wrote not very wise love-verses when he was young.” No, I won't publish Philip's verses, until some day he shall mortally offend me. I can recall some of my own written under similar circumstances with twinges of shame, and shall drop a veil of decent friendship over my friend's folly.

Under that veil, meanwhile, the young man is perfectly contented, nay, uproariously happy. All earth and nature smiles round about him. “When Jove meets his Juno, in Homer, Sir,” says Philip, in his hectoring way, “don't immortal flowers of beauty spring up around them, and rainbows of celestial hues bend over their heads? Love, Sir, flings a halo round the loved one. Where she moves rise roses, hyacinths, and ambrosial odors. Don't talk to me about poverty, Sir! He either fears his fate too much or his desert is small, who dares not put it to the touch and win or lose it all! Haven't I endured poverty? Am I not as poor now as a man can be—and what is there in it? Do I want for any thing? Haven't I got a guinea in my pocket? Do I owe any man any thing? Isn't there manna in the wilderness for those who have faith to walk in it? That's where you fail, Pen. By all that is sacred, you have no faith; your heart is cowardly, Sir; and if you are to escape, as perhaps you may, I suspect it is by your wife that you will be saved. Laura has a trust in Heaven, but Arthur's morals are a genteel atheism. Just reach me that claret—the wine's not bad. I say your morals are a genteel atheism, and I shudder when I think of your condition. Talk to me about a brougham being necessary for the comfort of a woman! A broomstick to ride to the moon! And I don't say that a brougham is not a comfort, mind you; but that, when it is a necessity, mark you, Heaven will provide it! Why, Sir, hang it, look at me! Ain't I suffering in the most abject poverty? I ask you is there a man in London so poor as I am? And since my father's ruin do I want for any thing? I want for shelter for a day or two. Good. There's my dear Little Sister ready to give it me. I want for money. Does not that sainted widow's cruse pour its oil out for me? Heaven bless and reward her. Boo!" (Here, for reasons which need not be named, the orator squeezes his fists into his eyes.) "I want shelter; ain't I in good quarters? I want work; haven't I got work, and did you not get it for me? You should just see, Sir, how I polished off that book of travels this morning. I read some of the article to Char——, to Miss ——, to some friends, in fact. I don't mean to say that they are very intellectual people, but your common humdrum average audience is the public to try. Recollect Molière and his housekeeper, you know."

"By the housekeeper do you mean Mrs. Baynes?" I ask, in my amontillado manner. (By-the-way, who ever heard of amontillado in the early days of which I write?) "In manner she would do, and I dare say in accomplishments; but I doubt about her temper."

"You're almost as worldly as the Twysdens, by George, you are! Unless persons are of a certain monde, you don't value them. A little adversity would do you good, Pen; and I heartily wish you might get it, except for the dear wife and children. You measure your morality by May-fair standards; and if an angel unawares came to you in pattens and a cotton umbrella, you would turn away from her. You would never have found out the Little Sister. A duchess—God bless her! A creature of an imperial generosity, and delicacy, and intrepidity, and the finest sense of humor, but she drops her h's often, and how could you pardon such a crime? Sir, you are my better in wit and a dexterous application of your powers; but I think, Sir," says Phil, curling the flaming mustaches, "I am your superior in a certain magnanimity; though, by Jove, old fellow, man and boy, you have always been one of the best fellows in the world to P. F.; one of the best fellows, and the most generous, and the most cordial—that you have: only you do rile me when you sing in that confounded May-fair twang."

Here one of the children summoned us to tea—and "Papa was laughing, and uncle Philip was flinging his hands about and pulling his beard off," said the little messenger.

"I shall keep a fine lock of it for you, Nelly, my dear," says uncle Philip. On which the child said, "Oh no! I know whom you'll give it to, don't I, mamma?" and she goes up to her mamma, and whispers.

Miss Nelly knows? At what age do those little match-makers begin to know, and how soon do they practice the use of their young eyes, their little smiles, wiles, and ogles? This young woman, I believe, coquetted while she was yet a baby in arms, over her nurse's shoulder. Before she could speak she could be proud of her new vermilion shoes, and would point out the charms of her blue sash. She was jealous in the nursery, and her little heart had beat for years and years before she left off pinafores.

For whom will Philip keep a lock of that red, red gold which curls round his face? Can you guess? Of what color is the hair in that little locket which the gentleman himself occultly wears? A few months ago, I believe, a pale straw-colored wisp of hair occupied that place of honor; now it is a chestnut-brown, as far as I can see, of precisely the same color as that which waves round Charlotte Baynes's pretty face, and tumbles in clusters on her neck, very nearly the color of Mrs. Paynter's this last season. So, you see, we chop and we change: straw gives place to chestnut, and chestnut is succeeded by ebony; and for our own parts, we defy time; and if you want a lock of my hair, Belinda, take this pair of scissors, and look in that cupboard, in the band-box marked No. 3, and cut off a thick glossy piece, darling, and wear it, dear, and my blessings go with thee! What is this? Am I sneering because Corydon and Phillis are wooing and happy? You see I pledged myself not to have any sentimental nonsense. To describe love-making is immoral and immodest; you know it is. To describe it as it really is, or would appear to you and me as lookers-on, would be to describe the most dreary farce, to chronicle the most tautological twaddle. To take a note of sighs, hand-squeezes, looks at the moon, and so forth—does this business become our dignity as historians? Come away from those foolish young people—they don't want us; and dreary as their farce is, and tautological as their twaddle, you may be sure it amuses them, and that they are happy enough without us. Happy? Is there any happiness like it, pray? Was it not rapture to watch the messenger, to seize the note, and fee the bearer?—to retire out of sight of all prying eyes and read: "Dearest! Mamma's cold is better this morning. The Joneses came to tea, and Julia sang. I did not enjoy it, as my dear was at his horrid dinner, where I hope he amused himself. Send me a word by Buttles, who brings this, if only to say you are your Louisa's own, own," etc., etc., etc. That used to be the kind of thing. In such coy lines artless Innocence used to whisper its little vows. So she used to smile; so she used to warble; so she used to prattle. Young people, at present engaged in the pretty sport, be assured your middle-aged parents have played the game, and remember the rules of it. Yes, under papa's bow-window of a waistcoat is a heart which took very violent exercise when that waist was slim. Now he sits tranquilly in his tent, and watches the lads going in for their innings. Why, look at grandmamma in her spectacles reading that sermon. In her old heart there is a corner as romantic still as when she used to read the "Wild Irish Girl" or the "Scottish Chiefs" in the days of her misshood. And as for your grandfather, my dears, to see him now you would little suppose that that calm, polished, dear old gentleman was once as wild—as wild as Orson.....Under my windows, as I write, there passes an itinerant flower-merchant. He has his roses and geraniums on a cart drawn by a quadruped—a little long-eared quadruped, which lifts up its voice, and sings after its manner. When I was young, donkeys used to bray precisely in the same way; and others will heehaw so when we are silent and our ears hear no more.

CHAPTER XVIII.

DRUM IST'S SO WOHL MIR IN DER WELT.

OUR new friends lived for a while contentedly enough at Boulogne, where they found comrades and acquaintances gathered together from those many regions which they had visited in the course of their military career. Mrs. Baynes, out of the field, was the commanding officer over the general. She ordered his clothes for him, tied his neckcloth into a neat bow, and, on tea-party evenings, pinned his brooch into his shirt-frill. She gave him to understand when he had had enough to eat or drink at dinner, and explained, with great frankness, how this or that dish did not agree with him. If he was disposed to exceed, she would call out, in a loud voice, "Remember, general, what you took this morning!" Knowing his constitution, as she said, she knew the remedies which were necessary for her husband, and administered them to him with great liberality. Resistance was impossible, as the veteran officer acknowledged. "The boys have fought about the medicine since we came home," he confessed, "but she has me under her thumb, by George. She really is a magnificent physician now. She has got some invaluable prescriptions, and in India she used to doctor the whole station." She would have taken the present writer's little household under her care, and proposed several remedies for my children, until their alarmed mother was obliged to keep them out of her sight. I am not saying this was an agreeable woman. Her voice was loud and harsh. The anecdotes which she was forever narrating related to military personages in foreign countries with whom I was unacquainted, and whose history failed to interest me. She took her wine with much spirit while engaged in this prattle. I have heard talk not less foolish in much finer company, and known people delighted to listen to anecdotes of the duchess and the marchioness who would yawn over the history of Captain Jones's quarrels with his lady, or Mrs. Major Wolfe's monstrous flirtations with young Ensign Kyd. My wife, with the mischievousness of her sex, would mimic the Baynes's conversation very drolly, but always insisted that she was not more really vulgar than many much greater persons.

For all this, Mrs. General Baynes did not hesitate to declare that we were "stuck-up" people; and from the very first setting eyes on us she declared that she viewed us with a constant darkling suspicion. Mrs. P. was a harmless, washed-out creature with nothing in her. As for that high and mighty Mr. P. and his airs, she would be glad to know whether the wife of a British general officer who had seen service in every part of the globe, and met the most distinguished governors, generals, and their ladies, several of whom were noblemen—she would be glad to know whether such people were not good enough for, etc., etc. Who has not met with these difficulties in life, and who can escape them? "Hang it, Sir," Phil would say, twirling the red mustaches, "I like to be hated by some fellows;" and it must be owned that Mr. Philip got what he liked. I suppose Mr. Philip's friend and biographer had something of the same feeling. At any rate, in regard of this lady the hypocrisy of politeness was very hard to keep up; wanting us for reasons of her own, she covered the dagger with which she would have stabbed us: but we knew it was there clenched in her skinny hand in her meagre pocket. She would pay us the most fulsome compliments with anger raging out of her eyes—a little hate-bearing woman, envious, malicious, but loving her cubs, and nursing them, and clutching them in her lean arms with a jealous strain. It was "Good-by, darling! I shall leave you here with your friends. Oh, how kind you are to her, Mrs. Pendennis! How can I ever thank you, and Mr. P. I am sure;" and she looked as if she could poison both of us, as she went away, courtesying and darting dreary parting smiles.

The lady had an intimate friend and companion in arms, Mrs. Colonel Bunch, in fact, of the—the Bengal cavalry, who was now in Europe with Bunch and their children, who were residing at Paris for the young folks' education. At first, as we have heard, Mrs. Baynes's predilections had been all for Tours, where her sister was living, and where lodgings were cheap and food reasonable in proportion. But Bunch happening to pass through Boulogne on his way to his wife at Paris, and meeting his old comrade, gave General Baynes such an account of the cheapness and pleasures of the French capital, as to induce the general to think of bending his steps thither. Mrs. Baynes would not hear of such a plan. She was all for her dear sister and Tours; but when, in the course of conversation, Colonel Bunch described a ball at the Tuileries, where he and Mrs. B. had been received with the most flattering politeness by the royal family; it was remarked that Mrs. Baynes's mind underwent a change. When Bunch went on to aver that the balls at Government House at Calcutta were nothing compared to those at the Tuileries or the Prefecture of the Seine; that the English were invited and respected every where; that the ambassador was most hospitable; that the clergymen were admirable; and that at their boarding-house, kept by Madame la Générale Baronne de Smolensk, at the Petit Château d'Espagne, Avenue de Valmy, Champs Elysées, they had balls twice a month, the most comfortable apartments, the most choice society, and every comfort and luxury at so many francs per month, with an allowance for children—I say, Mrs. Baynes was very greatly moved. “It is not,” she said, “in consequence of the balls at the ambassador’s or the Tuileries, for I am an old woman; and in spite of what you say, colonel, I can’t fancy, after Government House, any thing more magnificent in any French palace. It is not for me, goodness knows, I speak: but the children should have education, and my Charlotte an entrée into the world; and what you say of the invaluable clergyman, Mr. X——, I have been thinking of it all night; but above all, above all, of the chances of education for my darlings. Nothing should give way to that—nothing!” On this a long and delightful conversation and calculation took place. Bunch produced his bills at the Baroness de Smolensk’s. The two gentlemen jotted up accounts, and made calculations all through the evening. It was hard even for Mrs. Baynes to force the figures into such a shape as to make them accord with the general’s income; but, driven away by one calculation after another, she returned again and again to the charge, until she overcame the stubborn arithmetical difficulties, and the pounds, shillings, and pence lay prostrate before her. They could save upon this point; they could screw upon that; they must make a sacrifice to educate the children. “Sarah Bunch and her girls go to Court, indeed! Why shouldn’t mine go?” she asked. On which her general said, “By George, Eliza, that’s the point you are thinking of.” On which Eliza said, “No,” and repeated “No” a score of times, growing more angry as she uttered each denial. And she declared before Heaven she did not want to go to any Court. Had she not refused to be presented at home, though Mrs. Colonel Flack went, because she did not choose to go to the wicked expense of a train? And it was base of the general, base and mean of him to say so. And there was a fine scene, as I am given to understand; not that I was present at this family fight: but my informant was Mr. Firmin; and Mr. Firmin had his information from a little person who, about this time, had got to prattle out all the secrets of her young heart to him; who would have jumped off the pier-head with her hand in his if he had said “Come,” without his hand if he had said “Go:” a little person whose whole life had been changed—changed for a month past—changed in one minute, that minute when she saw Philip’s fiery whiskers and heard his great big voice saluting her father among the commissioners on the quai before the custom-house.

Tours was, at any rate, a hundred and fifty miles further off than Paris from—from a city where a young gentleman lived in whom Miss Charlotte Baynes felt an interest; hence, I suppose, arose her delight that her parents had determined upon taking up their residence in the larger and nearer city. Besides, she owned, in the course of her artless confidences to my wife, that, when together, mamma and aunt MacWhirter quarreled unceasingly; and had once caused the old boys, the major and the general, to call each other out. She preferred, then, to live away from aunt Mac. She had never had such a friend as Laura, never. She had never been so happy as at Boulogne, never. She should always love every body in our house, that she should, forever and ever—and so forth, and so forth. The ladies meet; cling together; osculations are carried round the whole family circle, from our wondering eldest boy, who cries, “I say, hullo! what are you kissing me so about?” to darling baby, crowing and sputtering unconscious in the rapturous young girl’s embraces. I tell you, these two women were making fools of themselves, and they were burning with enthusiasm for the “preserver” of the Baynes family, as they called that big fellow yonder, whose biographer I have aspired to be. The lazy rogue lay basking in the glorious warmth and sunshine of early love. He would stretch his big limbs out in our garden; pour out his feelings with endless volubility; call upon hominum divinumque voluptas, alma Venus; vow that he had never lived or been happy until now; declare that he laughed poverty to scorn and all her ills; and fume against his masters of the Pall Mall Gazette, because they declined to insert certain love verses which Mr. Philip now composed almost every day. Poor little Charlotte! And didst thou receive those treasures of song; and wonder over them, not perhaps comprehending them altogether; and lock them up in thy heart’s inmost casket as well as in thy little desk; and take them out in quiet hours, and kiss them, and bless Heaven for giving thee such jewels? I dare say. I can fancy all this without seeing it. I can read the little letters in the little desk without picking lock or breaking seal. Poor little letters! Sometimes they are not spelled right, quite; but I don’t know that the style is worse for that. Poor little letters! You are flung to the winds sometimes and forgotten with all your sweet secrets and loving, artless confessions; but not always—no, not always. As for Philip, who was the most careless creature alive, and left all his clothes and haberdashery sprawling on his bedroom floor, he had at this time a breast-pocket stuffed out with papers which crackled in the most ridiculous way. He was always looking down at this precious pocket, and putting one of his great hands over it as though he would guard it. The pocket did not contain bank-notes, you may be sure of that. It contained documents stating that mamma's cold is better; the Joneses came to tea, and Julia sang, etc. Ah, friend, however old you are now, however cold you are now, however tough, I hope you, too, remember how Julia sang, and the Joneses came to tea.

Mr. Philip staid on week after week, declaring to my wife that she was a perfect angel for keeping him so long. Bunch wrote from his boarding-house more and more enthusiastic reports about the comforts of the establishment. For his sake, Madame la Baronne de Smolensk would make unheard-of sacrifices, in order to accommodate the general and his distinguished party. The balls were going to be perfectly splendid that winter. There were several old Indians living near; in fact, they could form a regular little club. It was agreed that Baynes should go and reconnoitre the ground. He did go. Madame de Smolensk, a most elegant woman, had a magnificent dinner for him—quite splendid, I give you my word, but only what they have every day. Soup, of course, my love; fish, capital wine, and, I should say, some five or six and thirty made dishes. The general was quite enraptured. Bunch had put his boys to a famous school, where they might “whop” the French boys, and learn all the modern languages. The little ones would dine early; the baroness would take the whole family at an astonishingly cheap rate. In a word, the Baynes's column got the route for Paris shortly before our family-party was crossing the seas to return to London fogs and duty.

You have, no doubt, remarked how, under certain tender circumstances, women will help one another. They help where they ought not to help. When Mr. Darby ought to be separated from Miss Joan, and the best thing that could happen for both would be a lettre de cachet to whip off Mons. Darby to the Bastile for five years, and an order from her parents to lock up Mademoiselle Jeanne in a convent, some aunt, some relative, some pitying female friend is sure to be found, who will give the pair a chance of meeting, and turn her head away while those unhappy lovers are warbling endless good-bys close up to each other's ears. My wife, I have said, chose to feel this absurd sympathy for the young people about whom we have been just talking. As the day for Charlotte's departure drew near this wretched, misguiding matron would take the girl out walking into I know not what unfrequented by-lanes, quiet streets, rampart-nooks, and the like; and la! by the most singular coincidence, Mr. Philip's hulking boots would assuredly come tramping after the women's little feet. What will you say, when I tell you that I myself, the father of the family, the renter of the old-fashioned house, Rue Roucoule, Haute Ville, Boulogne-sur-Mer—as I am going into my own study—am met at the threshold by Helen, my eldest daughter, who puts her little arms before the glass-door at which I was about to enter, and says, “You must not go in there, papa! Mamma says we none of us are to go in there.”

“And why, pray?” I ask.

“Because uncle Philip and Charlotte are talking secrets there; and nobody is to disturb them—nobody!”

Upon my word, wasn't this too monstrous? Am I Sir Pandarus of Troy become? Am I going to allow a penniless young man to steal away the heart of a young girl who has not twopence half-penny to her fortune? Shall I, I say, lend myself to this most unjustifiable intrigue?

“Sir,” says my wife (we happened to have been bred up from childhood together, and I own to have had one or two foolish initiatory flirtations before I settled down to matrimonial fidelity)—“Sir,” says she, “when you were so wild—so spoony, I think is your elegant word—about Blanche, and used to put letters into a hollow tree for her at home, I used to see the letters, and I never disturbed them. These two people have much warmer hearts, and are a great deal fonder of each other than you and Blanche used to be. I should not like to separate Charlotte from Philip now. It is too late, Sir. She can never like any body else as she likes him. If she lives to be a hundred, she will never forget him. Why should not the poor thing be happy a little, while she may?”

An old house, with a green old court-yard and an ancient mossy wall, through breaks of which I can see the roofs and gables of the quaint old town, the city below, the shining sea, and the white English cliffs beyond; a green old court-yard, and a tall old stone house rising up in it, grown over with many a creeper on which the sun casts flickering shadows; and under the shadows, and through the glass of a tall gray window, I can just peep into a brown twilight parlor, and there I see two hazy figures by a table. One slim figure has brown hair, and one has flame-colored whiskers. Look! a ray of sunshine has just peered into the room, and is lighting the whiskers up!

“Poor little thing,” whispers my wife, very gently. “They are going away to-morrow. Let them have their talk out. She is crying her little eyes out, I am sure. Poor little Charlotte!”

While my wife was pitying Miss Charlotte in this pathetic way, and was going, I dare say, to have recourse to her own pocket-handkerchief, as I live there came a burst of laughter from the darkling chamber where the two lovers were billing and cooing. First came Mr. Philip's great boom (such a roar—such a haw-haw, or hee-haw, I never heard any other two-legged animal perform). Then follows Miss Charlotte's tinkling peal; and presently that young person comes out into the garden, with her round face not bedewed with tears at all, but perfectly rosy, fresh, dimpled, and good-humored. Charlotte gives me a little courtesy, and my wife a hand and a kind glance. They retreat through the open casement, twining round each other as the vine does round the window; though which is the vine and which is the window in this simile I pretend not to say—I can't see through either of them, that is the truth. They pass through the parlor, and into the street beyond, doubtless: and as for Mr. Philip, I presently see his head popped out of his window in the upper floor with his great pipe in his mouth. He can't "work" without his pipe, he says; and my wife believes him. Work indeed!

CHARLOTTE'S CONVOY.

Miss Charlotte paid us another little visit that evening, when we happened to be alone. The children were gone to bed. The darlings! Charlotte must go up and kiss them. Mr. Philip Firmin was out. She did not seem to miss him in the least, nor did she make a single inquiry for him. We had been so good to her—so kind. How should she ever forget our great kindness? She had been so happy—oh! so happy! She had never been so happy before. She would write often and often, and Laura would write constantly—wouldn't she? "Yes, dear child!" says my wife. And now a little more kissing, and it is time to go home to the Tintelleries. What a lovely night! Indeed the moon was blazing in full round in the purple heavens, and the stars were twinkling by myriads.

"Good-by, dear Charlotte; happiness go with you!" I seize her hand. I feel a paternal desire to kiss her fair, round face. Her sweetness, her happiness, her artless good-humor, and gentleness has endeared her to us all. As for me, I love her with a fatherly affection. "Stay, my dear!" I cry, with a happy gallantry. "I'll go home with you to the Tintelleries."

You should have seen the fair round face then! Such a piteous expression came over it! She looked at my wife; and as for that Mrs. Laura she pulled the tail of my coat.

"What do you mean, my dear?" I ask.

"Don't go out on such a dreadful night. You'll catch cold!" says Laura.

"Cold, my love!" I say. "Why, it's as fine a night as ever—"

"Oh! you—you stupid!" says Laura, and begins to laugh. And there goes Miss Charlotte tripping away from us without a word more!

Philip came in about half an hour afterward. And do you know I very strongly suspect that he had been waiting round the corner. Few things escape me, you see, when I have a mind to be observant. And, certainly, if I had thought of that possibility, and that I might be spoiling sport, I should not have proposed to Miss Charlotte to walk home with her.

At a very early hour on the next morning my wife arose, and spent, in my opinion, a great deal of unprofitable time, bread, butter, cold beef, mustard and salt, in compiling a heap of sandwiches, which were tied up in a copy of the Pall Mall Gazette. That persistence in making sandwiches, in providing cakes and other refreshments for a journey, is a strange infatuation in women; as if there was not always enough to eat to be had at road inns and railway stations! What a good dinner we used to have at Montrenil in the old days, before railways were, and when the diligence spent four or six and twenty cheerful hours on its way to Paris! I think the finest dishes are not to be compared to that well-remembered fricandeau of youth, nor do wines of the most dainty vintage surpass the rough, honest, blue ordinaire which was served at the plenteous inn-table. I took our bale of sandwiches down to the office of the Messageries, whence our friends were to start. We saw six of the Baynes family packed into the interior of the diligence; and the boys climb cheerily into the rotonde. Charlotte's pretty lips and hands wafted kisses to us from her corner. Mrs. General Baynes commanded the column, pushed the little ones into their places in the ark, ordered the general and young ones hither and thither with her parasol, declined to give the grumbling porters any but the smallest gratuity, and talked a shrieking jargon of French and Hindustanee to the people assembled round the carriage. My wife has that command over me that she actually made me demean myself so far as to deliver the sandwich parcel to one of the Baynes boys. I said, "Take this," and the poor wretch held out his hand eagerly, evidently expecting that I was about to tip him with a five-franc piece or some such coin. Fouette, cocher! The horses squeal. The huge machine jingles over the road, and rattles down the street. Farewell, pretty Charlotte, with your sweet face and sweet voice and kind eyes! But why, pray, is Mr. Philip Firmin not here to say farewell too?

Before the diligence got under way, the Baynes boys had fought and quarreled, and wanted to mount on the imperial or cabriolet of the carriage, where there was only one passenger as yet. But the conductor called the lads off, saying that the remaining place was engaged by a gentleman, whom they were to take up on the road. And who should this turn out to be? Just outside the town a man springs up to the imperial; his light luggage, it appears, was on the coach already, and that luggage belonged to Philip Firmin. Ah, monsieur! and that was the reason, was it, why they were so merry yesterday—the parting day? Because they were not going to part just then. Because, when the time of execution drew near, they had managed to smuggle a little reprieve! Upon my conscience, I never heard of such imprudence in the whole course of my life! Why, it is starvation—certainly misery to one and the other. "I don't like to meddle in other people's affairs," I say to my wife; "but I have no patience with such folly, or with myself for not speaking to General Baynes on the subject. I shall write to the general."

"My dear, the general knows all about it," says Charlotte's, Philip's (in my opinion) most injudicious friend. "We have talked about it, and, like a man of sense, the general makes light of it. 'Young folks will be young folks,' he says; 'and, by George! ma'am, when I married—I should say, when Mrs. B. ordered me to marry her—she had nothing, and I but my captain's pay. People get on, somehow. Better for a young man to marry, and keep out of idleness and mischief; and, I promise you, the chap who marries my girl gets a treasure. I like the boy for the sake of my old friend Phil Ringwood. I don't see that the fellows with the rich wives are much the happier, or that men should wait to marry until they are gouty old rakes.' And, it appears, the general instanced several officers of his own acquaintance; some of whom had married when they were young and poor; some who had married when they were old and sulky; some who had never married at all. And he mentioned his comrade, my own uncle, the late Major Pendenis, whom he called a selfish old creature, and hinted that the major had jilted some lady in early life, whom he would have done much better to marry."

And so Philip is actually gone after his charmer, and is pursuing her summâ diligentia? The Baynes family has allowed this penniless young law student to make love to their daughter, to accompany them to Paris, to appear as the almost recognized son of the house. "Other people, when they were young, wanted to make imprudent marriages," says my wife (as if that wretched tu quoque were any answer to my remark!). "This penniless law student might have a good sum of money if he chose to press the Baynes family to pay him what, after all, they owe him." And so poor little Charlotte was to be her father's ransom! To be sure, little Charlotte did not object to offer herself up in payment of her papa's debt! And though I objected as a moral man, and a prudent man, and a father of a family, I could not be very seriously angry. I am secretly of the disposition of the time-honored père de famille in the comedies, the irascible old gentleman in the crop wig and George-the-Second coat, who is always menacing "Tom the young dog" with his cane. When the deed is done, and Miranda (the little sly-boots!) falls before my square-toes and shoe-buckles, and Tom the young dog kneels before me in his white ducks, and they cry out in a pretty chorus, "Forgive us, grandpapa!" I say, "Well, you rogue, boys will be boys. Take her, sirrah! Be happy with her; and, hark ye! in this pocket-book you will find ten thousand," etc., etc. You all know the story: I can not help liking it, however old it may be. In love, somehow, one is pleased that young people should dare a little. Was not Bessy Eldon famous as an economist, and Lord Eldon celebrated for wisdom and caution? and did not John Scott marry Elizabeth Surtees when they had scarcely two-pence a year between them? "Of course, my dear," I say to the partner of my existence, "now this madcap fellow is utterly ruined, now is the very time he ought to marry. The accepted doctrine is, that a man should spend his own fortune, then his wife's fortune, and then he may begin to get on at the bar. Philip has a hundred pounds, let us say; Charlotte has nothing; so that in about six weeks we may look to hear of Philip being in successful practice—"

"Successful nonsense!" cries the lady. "Don't go on like a cold-blooded calculating machine! You don't believe a word of what you say, and a more imprudent person never lived than you yourself were as a young man." This was departing from the question, which women will do. "Nonsense!" again says my romantic being of a partner-of-existence. "Don't tell me, Sir. They WILL be provided for! Are we to be forever taking care of the morrow, and not trusting that we shall be cared for? You may call your way of thinking prudence. I call it sinful worldliness, Sir." When my life-partner speaks in a certain strain, I know that remonstrance is useless and argument unavailing, and I generally resort to cowardly subterfuges, and sneak out of the conversation by a pun, a side joke, or some other flippancy. Besides, in this case, though I argue against my wife, my sympathy is on her side. I know Mr. Philip is imprudent and headstrong, but I should like him to succeed and be happy. I own he is a scapegrace, but I wish him well.

So, just as the diligence of Laffitte and Cailard is clearing out of Boulogne town, the conductor causes the carriage to stop, and a young fellow has mounted up on the roof in a twinkling; and the postillion says, "Hi!" to his horses, and away those squealing grays go clattering. And a young lady, happening to look out of one of the windows of the intérieur, has perfectly recognized the young gentleman who leaped up to the roof so nimbly; and the two boys who were in the rotonde would have recognized the gentleman, but that they were already eating the sandwiches which my wife had provided. And so the diligence goes on until it reaches that hill where the girls used to come and offer to sell you apples; and some of the passengers descend and walk, and the tall young man on the roof jumps down, and approaches the party in the interior, and a young lady cries out, "La!" and her mamma looks impenetrably grave, and not in the least surprised; and her father gives a wink of one eye, and says, "It's him, is it, by George!" and the two boys coming out of the rotonde, their mouths full of sandwich, cry out, "Hullo! It's Mr. Firmin."

"How do you do, ladies?" he says, blushing as red as an apple, and his heart thumping—but that may be from walking up hill. And he puts a hand toward the carriage-window, and a little hand comes out and lights on his. And Mrs. General Baynes, who is reading a religious work, looks up and says, "Oh! how do you do, Mr. Firmin?" And this is the remarkable dialogue that takes place. It is not very witty; but Philip's tones sends a rapture into one young heart; and when he is absent, and has climbed up to his place in the cabriolet, the kick of his boots on the roof gives the said young heart inexpressible comfort and consolation. Shine stars and moon. Shriek gray horses through the calm night. Snore sweetly, papa and mamma, in your corners, with your pocket-handkerchiefs tied round your old fronts! I suppose, under all the stars of heaven, there is nobody more happy than that child in that carriage—that wakeful girl, in sweet maiden meditation—who has given her heart to the keeping of the champion who is so near her. Has he not been always their champion and preserver? Don't they owe to his generosity every thing in life? One of the little sisters wakes wildly, and cries in the night, and Charlotte takes the child into her arms and soothes her. "Hush, dear! He's there—he's there," she whispers, as she bends over the child. Nothing wrong can happen with him there, she feels. If the robbers were to spring out from yonder dark pines, why, he would jump down, and they would all fly before him! The carriage rolls on through sleeping villages, and as the old team retires all in a halo of smoke, and the fresh horses come clattering up to their pole, Charlotte sees a well-known white face in the gleam of the carriage lanterns. Through the long avenues, the great vehicle rolls on its course. The dawn peers over the poplars: the stars quiver out of sight: the sun is up in the sky, and the heaven is all in a flame. The night is over—the night of nights. In all the round world, whether lighted by stars or sunshine, there were not two people more happy than these had been.

A very short time afterward, at the end of October, our own little sea-side sojourn came to an end. That astounding bill for broken glass, chairs, crockery, was paid. The London steamer takes us all on board on a beautiful, sunny autumn evening, and lands us at the Custom-house Quay in the midst of a deep, dun fog, through which our cabs have to work their way over greasy pavements, and bearing two loads of silent and terrified children. Ah, that return, if but after a fortnight's absence and holiday! Oh, that heap of letters lying in a ghastly pile, and yet so clearly visible in the dim twilight of master's study! We cheerfully breakfast by candle-light for the first two days after my arrival at home, and I have the pleasure of cutting a part of my chin off because it is too dark to shave at nine o'clock in the morning.

My wife can't be so unfeeling as to laugh and be merry because I have met with an accident which temporarily disfigures me? If the dun fog makes her jocular, she has a very queer sense of humor. She has a letter before her, over which she is perfectly radiant. When she is especially pleased I can see by her face and a particular animation and affectionateness toward the rest of the family. On this present morning her face beams out of the fog-clouds. The room is illuminated by it, and perhaps by the two candles which are placed one on either side of the urn. The fire crackles, and flames, and spits most cheerfully; and the sky without, which is of the hue of brown paper, seems to set off the brightness of the little interior scene.

"A letter from Charlotte, papa!" cries one little girl, with an air of consequence. "And a letter from uncle Philip, papa!" cries another; "and they like Paris so much," continues the little reporter.

"And there, Sir, didn't I tell you?" cries the lady, handing me over a letter.

"Mamma always told you so," echoes the child, with an important nod of the head; "and I shouldn't be surprised if he were to be very rich, should you, mamma?" continues this arithmetician.

I would not put Miss Charlotte's letter into print if I could, for do you know that little person's grammar was frequently incorrect; there were three or four words spelled wrongly; and the letter was so scored and marked with dashes under every other word, that it is clear to me her education had been neglected; and as I am very fond of her, I do not wish to make fun of her. And I can't print Mr. Philip's letter, for I haven't kept it. Of what use keeping letters? I say, Burn, burn, burn. No heart-pangs. No reproaches. No yesterday. Was it happy, or miserable? To think of it is always melancholy. Go to! I dare say it is the thought of that fog which is making this sentence so dismal. Meanwhile there is Madam Laura's face smiling out of the darkness, as pleased as may be; and no wonder, she is always happy when her friends are so.

Charlotte's letter contained a full account of the settlement of the Baynes family at Madame Smolensk's boarding-house, where they appear to have been really comfortable, and to have lived at a very cheap rate. As for Mr. Philip, he made his way to a crib, to which his artist friends had recommended him, on the Faubourg St. Germain side of the water—the Hotel Pousin, in the street of that name, which lies, you know, between the Mazarin Library and the Musée des Beaux Arts. In former days my gentleman had lived in state and bounty in the English hotels and quarter. Now he found himself very handsomely lodged for thirty francs per month, and with five or six pounds, he has repeatedly said since, he could carry through the month very comfortably. I don't say, my young traveler, that you can be so lucky nowadays. Are we not telling a story of twenty years ago? Ay marry. Ere steam-coaches had begun to scream on French rails; and when Louis Philippe was king.

As soon as Mr. Philip Firmin is ruined he must needs fall in love. In order to be near the beloved object, he must needs follow her to Paris, and give up his promised studies for the bar at home; where, to do him justice, I believe the fellow would never have done any good. And he has not been in Paris a fortnight when that fantastic jade Fortune, who had seemed to fly away from him, gives him a smiling look of recognition, as if to say, "Young gentleman, I have not quite done with you."

The good fortune was not much. Do not suppose that Philip suddenly drew a twenty-thousand pound prize in a lottery. But, being in much want of money, he suddenly found himself enabled to earn some in a way pretty easy to himself.

In the first place, Philip found his friends Mr. and Mrs. Mugford in a bewildered state in the midst of Paris, in which city Mugford would never consent to have a laquais de place, being firmly convinced to the day of his death that he knew the French language quite sufficiently for all purposes of conversation. Philip, who had often visited Paris before, came to the aid of his friends in a two-franc dining-house, which he frequented for economy's sake; and they, because they thought the banquet there provided not only cheap but most magnificent and satisfactory. He interpreted for them, and rescued them from their perplexity, whatever it was. He treated them handsomely to caddy on the bullyvard, as Mugford said on returning home and in recounting the adventure to me. "He can't forget that he has been a swell; and he does do things like a gentleman, that Firmin does. He came back with us to our hotel—Meurice's," said Mr. Mugford, "and who should drive into the yard and step out of his carriage but Lord Ringwood—you know Lord Ringwood; every body knows him. As he gets out of his carriage—'What! is that you, Philip?' says his lordship, giving the young fellow his hand. 'Come and breakfast with me to-morrow morning.' And away he goes most friendly."

How came it to pass that Lord Ringwood, whose instinct of self-preservation was strong—who, I fear, was rather a selfish nobleman—and who, of late, as we have heard, had given orders to refuse Mr. Philip entrance at his door—should all of a sudden turn round and greet the young man with cordiality? In the first place, Philip had never troubled his lordship's knocker at all; and second, as luck would have it, on this very day of their meeting his lordship had been to dine with that well-known Parisian resident and bon vivant, my Lord Viscount Trim, who had been governor of the Sago Islands when Colonel Baynes was there with his regiment, the gallant 100th. And the general and his old West India governor meeting at church, my Lord Trim straightway asked General Baynes to dinner, where Lord Ringwood was present, along with other distinguished company, whom at present we need not particularize. Now it has been said that Philip Ringwood, my lord's brother, and Captain Baynes, in early youth, had been close friends, and that the colonel had died in the captain's arms. Lord Ringwood, who had an excellent memory when he chose to use it, was pleased on this occasion to remember General Baynes and his intimacy with his brother in old days. And of those old times they talked; the general waxing more eloquent, I suppose, than his wont over Lord Trim's excellent wine. And in the course of conversation Philip was named, and the general, warm with drink, poured out a most enthusiastic eulogium on his young friend, and mentioned how noble and self-denying Philip's conduct had been in his own case. And perhaps Lord Ringwood was pleased at hearing these praises of his brother's grandson; and perhaps he thought of old times, when he had a heart, and he and his brother loved each other. And though he might think Philip Firmin an absurd young blockhead for giving up any claims which he might have on General Baynes, at any rate I have no doubt his lordship thought, "This boy is not likely to come begging money from me!" Hence, when he drove back to his hotel on the very night after this dinner, and in the court-yard saw that Philip Firmin, his brother's grandson, the heart of the old nobleman was smitten with a kindly sentiment, and he bade Philip to come and see him.

I have described some of Philip's oddities, and among these was a very remarkable change in his appearance, which ensued very speedily after his ruin. I know that the greater number of story readers are young, and those who are ever so old remember that their own young days occurred but a very, very short while ago. Don't you remember, most potent, grave, and reverend senior, when you were a junior, and actually rather pleased with new clothes? Does a new coat or a waistcoat cause you any pleasure now? To a well-constituted middle-aged gentleman, I rather trust a smart new suit causes a sensation of uneasiness—not from the tightness of the fit, which may be a reason—but from the gloss and splendor. When my late kind friend, Mrs. —, gave me the emerald tabinet waistcoat, with the gold shamrocks, I wore it once to go to Richmond to dine with her; but I buttoned myself so closely in an upper coat that I am sure nobody in the omnibus saw what a painted vest I had on. Gold sprigs and emerald tabinet, what a gorgeous raiment! It has formed for ten years the chief ornament of my wardrobe; and though I have never dared to wear it since, I always think with a secret pleasure of possessing that treasure. Do women, when they are sixty, like handsome and fashionable attire, and a youthful appearance? Look at Lady Jezebel's blushing cheek, her raven hair, her splendid garments! But this disquisition may be carried to too great a length. I want to note a fact which has occurred not seldom in my experience—that men who have been great dandies will often and suddenly give up their long-accustomed splendor of dress, and walk about, most happy and contented, with the shabbiest of coats and hats. No. The majority of men are not vain about their dress. For instance, within a very few years men used to have pretty feet. See in what a resolute way they have kicked their pretty boots off almost to a man, and wear great, thick, formless, comfortable walking boots, of shape scarcely more graceful than a tub!

When Philip Firmin first came on the town there were dandies still; there were dazzling waistcoats of velvet and brocade, and tall stocks with cataracts of satin; there were pins, studs, neck-chains, I know not what fantastic splendors of youth. His varnished boots grew upon forests of trees. He had a most resplendent silver-gilt dressing-case presented to him by his father (for which, it is true, the doctor neglected to pay, leaving that duty to his son). "It is a mere ceremony," said the worthy doctor, "a cumbrous thing you may fancy at first; but take it about with you. It looks well on a man's dressing-table at a country house. It poses a man, you understand. I have known women come in and peep at it. A trifle you may say, my boy; but what is the use of flinging any chance in life away?" Now, when misfortune came, young Philip flung away all these magnificent follies. He wrapped himself virtute sua;

and I am bound to say a more queer-looking fellow than friend Philip seldom walked the pavement of London or Paris. He could not wear the nap off all his coats, or rub his elbows into rags in six months; but, as he would say of himself with much simplicity, "I do think I run to seed more quickly than any fellow I ever knew. All my socks in holes, Mrs. Pendennis; all my shirt-buttons gone, I give you my word. I don't know how the things hold together, and why they don't tumble to pieces. I suspect I must have a bad laundress." Suspect! My children used to laugh and crow as they sewed buttons on to him. As for the Little Sister, she broke into his apartments in his absence, and said that it turned her hair gray to see the state of his poor wardrobe. I believe that Mrs. Brandon put in surreptitious linen into his drawers. He did not know. He wore the shirts in a contented spirit. The glossy boots began to crack and then to burst, and Philip wore them with perfect equanimity. Where were the beautiful lavender and lemon gloves of last year? His great naked hands (with which he gesticulates so grandly) were as brown as an Indian's now. We had liked him heartily in his days of splendor; we loved him now in his threadbare suit.

I can fancy the young man striding into the room where his lordship's guests were assembled. In the presence of great or small, Philip has always been entirely unconcerned, and he is one of the half-dozen men I have seen in my life upon whom rank made no impression. It appears that, on occasion of this breakfast, there were one or two dandies present who were aghast at Philip's freedom of behavior. He engaged in conversation with a famous French statesman; contradicted him with much energy in his own language; and when the statesman asked whether monsieur was membre du Parlement? Philip burst into one of his roars of laughter, which almost breaks the glasses on a table, and said, "Je suis journaliste, monsieur, à vos ordres!" Young Timbury of the embassy was aghast at Philip's insolence; and Dr. Botts, his lordship's traveling physician, looked at him with a terrified face. A bottle of claret was brought, which almost all the gentlemen present began to swallow, until Philip, tasting his glass, called out, "Faugh. It's corked!" "So it is, and very badly corked," growls my lord, with one of his usual oaths. "Why didn't some of you fellows speak? Do you like corked wine?" There were gallant fellows round that table who would have drunk corked black dose, had his lordship professed to like senna. The old host was tickled and amused. "Your mother was a quiet soul, and your father used to bow like a dancing-master. You ain't much like him. I dine at home most days. Leave word in the morning with my people, and come when you like, Philip," he growled. A part of this news Philip narrated to us in his letter, and other part was given verbally by Mr. and Mrs. Mugford on their return to London. "I tell you, Sir," says Mugford, "he has been taken by the hand by some of the tip-top people, and I have booked him at three guineas a week for a letter to the Pall Mall Gazette."

And this was the cause of my wife's exultation and triumphant "Didn't I tell you?" Philip's foot was on the ladder; and who so capable of mounting to the top? When happiness and a fond and lovely girl were waiting for him there, would he lose heart, spare exertion, or be afraid to climb? He had no truer well-wisher than myself, and no friend who liked him better, though, I dare say, many admired him much more than I did. But these were women for the most part; and women become so absurdly unjust and partial to persons whom they love, when these latter are in misfortune, that I am surprised Mr. Philip did not quite lose his head in his poverty, with such fond flatterers and sycophants round him. Would you grudge him the consolation to be had from these sweet uses of adversity? Many a heart would be hardened but for the memory of past griefs; when eyes, now averted, perhaps, were full of sympathy, and hands, now cold, were eager to soothe and succor.

RICHARD PORSON.

"PORSON, Sir, is the first Greek scholar in England: we all yield to him. Burney is the third. Who the second is, I leave you to guess."—Such was the oracular response of old Sam Parr, the sage of Hatton, so famous in his day for ponderous learning, tobacco-smoking, Whiggery, and shaggy eyebrows. Porson's claim to the chief place in this classical triad is conceded by all. Of Burney, however, and his "metrical conundrums," as Butler, of Shrewsbury, used to style them, and whom Lachmann, in his work on choral measures, called, not very politely, "Summum litteratæ Britannicæ dedecus," we must be allowed to entertain very serious doubts. As to the second niche in this temple of fame, which old "Dr. Bellenden" (so Porson nicknamed him) evidently reserved for himself, there is no great danger of its ever being filled by any bust of his. Posterity will judge him by his own Pindaric motto, and "the days that are left to come will prove," in his case at least, "the wisest witnesses."

And so Porson has at last found a regular biographer.* More fortunate in this respect than Bentley, he has had to wait only fifty-three years, while the latter remained unhonored by any regular and connected account of his labors for very nearly a century. Our cousins across the water, with their splendidly-endowed universities, and all the other appliances of scholarship, appear to us rather slow in writing the biographies of some of their eminent linguists, and even when these are at length written, we somehow or other think that their authors might have shown a little more ability. Monk's "Life of Bentley," for instance, is certainly rather prosy; and Mr. Watson would have appeared to much more advantage in his old vocation of making versions for Bohn's "blue-book series," than in coming forth as the biographer of Porson. Still, however, we are under obligations to him for giving us a very readable work, and one that can not fail to prove interesting to the rising generation of scholars, if we have any such non-descripts in this utilitarian and bank-note land of ours.

* The Life of Richard Porson, M.A., etc. By the Rev. JOHN SELBY WATSON, M.A., etc. London, 1861. 8vo.

Richard Bentley and Richard Porson, the two Classical Richards of England, though of high emprise in deeds of scholarship, were both of lowly origin, mere proletarians, as the learned would say. The former was the son either of a tanner or a blacksmith (how fiercely old Cumberland used to kick at this, and insist that "grandfather Bentley" sprang from a family of rank and consideration!); the other was the son of a weaver, who was also clerk of the parish. Both, however, had remarkable mothers. Bentley's mother was a woman of excellent understanding, and taught him his Latin Accidence. Porson's, though of limited education, was familiar with the plays of Shakspeare, and fond of repeating the more popular and striking passages.—"Aha!" some advocate of "Woman's Rights" will here exclaim, "Physiology! Doric mothers! Transmission of intellectual qualities!" Very true. But then, these same estimable females, Mrs. Bentley and Mrs. Porson, also cooked their husbands' dinners, kept their rooms clean, and carefully observed the other minor morals of housekeeping, which is a good deal more than most of our present "Doric mothers" do.

Porson's father, however, must also come in for his own share of praise. Though he had never read Æschylus, he still believed Memory to be "the mother of the Muses," and at a very early period set about cultivating in his son that peculiar faculty for which the latter became so conspicuous in after-years. Here we have young Master Dick, hatless, shoeless, slateless, and of course pencilless, figuring out sums in his own head, under the watchful ken of the old weaver, until, before he had completed his ninth year, the little fellow could work, by the unaided operations of his own brain, a question in the cube root. No wonder that the boy, when first sent to school, soon floored his teacher in arithmetic, and was pointed out as "the fellow who had beat the master!" No wonder, too, that the habit of mental concentration thus early acquired led the way to that astonishing development of the powers of memory for which he became so famous in after-days. With the doctrine of "bumps" we do not here intend to meddle (thorough heretics though we are on this point), not wishing to arouse the ire of Professor Fowler; but certainly, if that quality of the mind which we term memory can not be actually created, yet it may be improved to an extent of which Porson was a most felicitous instance. Talking of Porson's running about in early life without a hat, it may be as well to remark, that the popular belief, which at one time prevailed, that Porson's skull, owing probably to this ex-posure when he was young, was found, on examination after death, to be of uncommon thickness, rests on no foundation whatever, but, much to the satisfaction, we may suppose, of the followers of Helvetius, was very like the skulls of other men.

The village prodigy soon excited the attention of the higher classes in the neighborhood, and arrangements were speedily made to give the boy a more regular education. He was at first placed under a private classical instructor, and, a fund having been raised for that purpose, was afterward, at the age of fifteen, transferred to Eton. Of his progress at this famous seat of learning we have only a meagre account. His instructors there, fettered by their "longs and shorts," and viewing every thing through the medium of "verse-making optics," appear to have rated him at rather a low figure. According to Porson's own statement, however, in after-years, he added but little to his acquirements at Eton, having read, before he went thither, almost all that was required from him in the school, and his chief delight here was hunting rats in the Long Hall! Only to think of those "distant spires," and "antique towers," and (horrid profanation) of "grateful science" adorning "her Henry's holy shade," and of young Porson, the future successor of Bentley, hunting rats in the holes and corners of that venerated edifice! One feels tempted to introduce a new reading into Gray's celebrated Ode:

"What idle progeny succeed
To chase the rat with folie speed,
Throughout yon ancient hall?"

From Eton next to the University of Cambridge, from the rat-abounding Long Hall to the proud portals of Trinity. Here again but little is known of the youth, except that the hunting for rats was succeeded by the hunting for roots, and that the talents which had remained undiscovered at Eton, gained for him the "Craven University Scholarship," without difficulty, in December, 1781. The epitaph "On the young Alexis," translated into Greek Iambics, which formed part of the examination for this prize, and which Porson is said to have completed in less than an hour, with the help only of Morell's Thesaurus, is given by Watson, Maltby, Kidd, and others. As these learned pundits, however, differ from one another in the fourth line, will some one of our college friends have the goodness to tell us what the true reading is?

Bachelor in 1782, and third senior optime among eighteen wranglers, soon afterward first chancellor's medallist, and, in the same year still, elected fellow of Trinity, an exception having been made in his case on account of his eminent abilities; such was Porson's early record, unstained as yet by the excesses of the wine-cup, and marked by habits of rigorous and persevering application. But now the scene changes. In proportion as he becomes distinguished his society is sought after, convivial habits are either formed or confirmed, and Porson, the first scholar of England, the Greek Professor of Cambridge, the great critic, the demolisher of Travis, the castigator of Hermann, the far-famed editor of Euripides, passes regularly through the gradations of boon companion, tippler, and sot, and dies the death of a drunkard!

Those of our readers who wish to obtain a more intimate acquaintance with the details of Porson's life, we must refer to the work of Mr. Watson, which, imperfect though it be, will still be found to supply a great desideratum. Our present object is merely to give a popular account of the man, and we think that this object will be best accomplished by grouping together some of the more remarkable points of view under which his character is presented to us.

I.—PORSON AS A CRITIC.

Porson's preface to Toup's Emendations of Suidas will best show the nature of his own criticism. "I have never," he observes, "admired the practice of those critics, who exclaim pulchre, bene, recte, 'excellent, just, incontrovertible,' at every second or third word. Had I not, indeed, had the highest regard for Toup's abilities and learning, I should never have offered these observations, such as they are, on his writings. But I consider it to be the part of an editor or commentator to correct the errors and supply the deficiencies of his author. I have hardly ever, therefore, expressed mere assent to Toup's remarks, except when it seemed possible to support them by new arguments, or when they seemed to have been unreasonably assailed by other critics."

II.—PORSON AS AN EDITOR.

"There is one quality of the mind," says Bishop Turton, "in which it may be confidently affirmed that Porson had no superior; I mean the most pure and inflexible love of truth. Under the influence of this principle, he was cautious, and patient, and persevering in his researches; and scrupulously accurate in stating facts as he found them. All who were intimately acquainted with him bear witness to this noble part of his character, and his works confirm the testimony of his friends." Whenever, therefore, Porson cites an authority, you may be sure of his accuracy, and may rely implicitly on what he says. Imagination, indeed, he had none; but this only makes him the better editor, by confining his thoughts to the subject before him. His emendations show calm judgment. He is slow to alter, but when he makes an alteration, he makes it, almost always, with unquestionable success. The corrections of Bentley, as Watson remarks, do not make, in general, the same impression on the reader with those of Porson. The latter appears to alter the text because alteration was evidently necessary; Bentley, because he himself thought that it was necessary. Porson, as a corrector, offers good wine that needs no bush; Bentley is a host that must often use argument to recommend his fare. As Porson's touches remind us of Johnson's remark about a just restoration, Bentley's recall his saying about doubtful alterations; for we can not help suspecting that the reading is right which requires many words to prove it wrong, and that the emendation is wrong, which can not without so much labor appear to be right. Bentley was often presumptuous and rash; Porson was to all critics an example of caution. Before he operated upon a passage, he took care to ascertain what others had done. He consulted not only commentaries, but translations, and, as we are assured on good authority, never wrote a note on any passage of an ancient author without carefully looking how it had been rendered by the different translators.

In the style of his notes Porson is entitled to high praise. His Latinity is clear and neat; occasionally somewhat dry and stiff, it is true, yet never disfigured by trite or affected phraseology. Here, however, our praises must end. He should have thrown far more of general information into his notes, and should have given us far more translations of difficult passages. It is well known that he scarcely ever condescends to explain a single passage in the whole of his lengthy notes to the four plays. His followers, the Porsonian school of critics, follow his example, and though conspicuous for varied learning and ingenuity, give us notes, as has justly been remarked, useless to the mere beginner, often tiresome even to the advanced student, and fitted only for professed critics. In the conflict that is now being waged between dull utilitarianism and classical learning, we must always bear in mind that the true mode of proving the pre-eminent claims of the Greek and Latin languages to cultivate at once the taste, the judgment, and the intellect, is to popularize their study, and render it more interesting, as well as more practically and generally useful. Give the student good notes, and plenty of them, and thus awaken in him the desire of becoming more intimately acquainted with all that is striking and beautiful in Classical Literature.

III.—PORSON AS A SCHOLAR.

Parr, on one occasion, when alluding to Porson, called him, in his usual pompous way, "a giant in literature; a prodigy in intellect; a critic, whose mighty achievements left imitation panting at a distance behind him," etc. In all this overwrought eulogy, however, there was little sincerity, and a great deal of exaggeration. Porson was undoubtedly the first Greek Attic scholar of his day, and in an acquaintance with the niceties of Greek metre, so far as the drama was concerned, was far ahead of all his contemporaries. In these respects he ranked far above Hermann, his old antagonist, against whom he always cherished the bitterest enmity. In point, however, of general knowledge, in compass of mind, in extent of Greek reading, and in philosophical investigation, we candidly think that Hermann was far in advance of him. This assertion, of course, will appear rank heresy to some, who have not forgotten the doggerel imitation of the old saw of Phocylides, about "the Germans in Greek" being "sadly to seek;" but still it is the truth, and ought not to be kept back. At the present day, indeed, the classical scholarship of Britain bears no comparison with that of Germany, and even Oxford has had to call in German aid in editing her classics.

IV.—PORSON'S POWER OF MEMORY.

Of Porson's wonderful memory so many stories have been told, that only a few need here be mentioned. What was most remarkable, however, in regard to it, was not so much its retentiveness, as its power of producing at all times, and in all circumstances, the stores which it contained; and, singularly enough, whenever he fell into excess, his mind was less clouded, and his recollection more perfect than any other man's in the same condition. Nothing, it is said, came amiss to his memory. He would set a child right in his two-penny fable-book, repeat the whole of the moral tale of the Dean of Badajos, or a page of Athenæus on cups, or of Eustathius on Homer. Dr. Danney, of Aberdeen, told Mr. Maltby that, during a visit to London, he heard Porson declare that he could repeat Smollet's "Roderick Random" from beginning to end: and Mr. Richard Heber assured Maltby that soon after the appearance of the "Essay on Irish Bulls," Porson used, when somewhat tipsy, to recite whole pages of it verbatim, with great delight. He said that he would undertake to learn by heart a copy of the Morning Chronicle in a week. Basil Montague related that Porson, in his presence and that of some other persons, read a page or two of a book, and then repeated what he had read from memory. "That is very well," said one of the company, "but could the Professor repeat it backward?" Porson immediately began to repeat it backward, and failed only in two words. It may be remarked here that Porson often used to say that he would engage to remember any thing after having read it thrice. Priestley, the bookseller, used to relate that Porson was once in his shop, when a gentleman came in, and asked for a particular edition of Demosthenes, of which Priestley was not in possession. The gentleman being somewhat disappointed, Porson, whose attention was directed toward him, asked him whether he wished to consult any passage in Demosthenes. The gentleman replied in the affirmative, and specified the passage. Porson then asked Priestley for a copy of the Aldine edition, and, having received it, and turned over a few leaves, put his finger on the passage, showing not only his knowledge of the author, but his familiarity with the position of the passage in that particular edition. A similar anecdote used to be told of him by Mr. Cogan. One day Porson called on a friend who happened to be reading Thucydides, and who asked leave to consult him on the meaning of a word. Porson, on hearing the word, did not look at the book, but at once repeated the passage. His friend asked how he knew that it was that passage. "Because," replied Porson, "the word occurs only twice in Thucydides, once on the right hand page, in the edition which you are using, and once on the left. I observed on which side you looked, and accordingly knew to which passage you referred."

On one occasion, when Porson, Reed, and some other of the literati, with John Kemble, were assembled at Dr. Burney's at Hammer-smith, and were examining some old newspapers in which the execution of Charles I. was detailed, they observed some particulars stated in them which they doubted whether Hume or Rapin had mentioned. Reed, who, being versed in old literature, was consulted as the oracle on the point, could not recollect; but Porson repeated a long passage from Rapin, in which the circumstances were fully noted. Archdeacon Burney, from whom Mr. Watson received this anecdote, assured the latter, at the same time, that he had often, when a boy, taken down Humphry Clinker, or Foote's plays, from his father's shelves, and heard Porson repeat whole pages of them walking about the room. One more instance. Mr. Gordon, in his "Personal Memoirs," says that Porson, having been invited to dine with him, and having come, by mistake, on Thursday instead of Friday, was kept to dinner on the Thursday, and, testifying no desire to go to bed when his host retired, was left with two bottles of wine before him, and an Italian novel, which he sat up all night reading, and of which, at a dinner-party the following day, he gave a translation from memory, and, though there were forty names mentioned in the story, he had forgotten only one of them. This slight failure in his recollection, however, annoyed him so much, that he started up, and paced round the room for about ten minutes, when, stopping suddenly, he exclaimed, "Eureka! The count's name was Don Francisco Averrani."

V.—PORSON'S CALLIGRAPHY.

One mode, in which Porson wasted much time, was in the practice of mere penmanship. He excelled, as all men know, in writing with neatness and beauty. He wrote notes on the margins of books with such studied accuracy that they rivaled print. He used to say, that Dr. Young had the advantage in "command of hand," but that he preferred the shape of his own letters to that of Young's. It is well known that the Porsonian Greek type of Cambridge was cut in imitation of his handwriting. That he was rather vain of this acquirement would appear from the story told by one of Parr's old pupils, of Porson's taking a small book out of his pocket, on one occasion after dinner, containing some of his writing, and allowing it to be handed round the table for the guests to look at. His rage for calligraphy was such, says Mr. Maltby, that he once offered to letter the backs of some of Mr. Richard Heber's vellum-bound classics. "No," said Heber, "I won't let you do that; but I shall be most thankful if you will write in an Athenæus some of those excellent emendations, which I have heard from you in conversation." Porson consented, Heber sent him an interleaved copy of Casaubon's edition, which had belonged to Brunck, and in which Porson inserted the notes that were afterward published in the Adversaria. He often spent much time also in producing extremely small writing. A specimen is extant, comprising, in a circle of an inch and a half in diameter, the Greek verses on music from the Medea of Euripides, with Johnson's translation of them for Burney's History of Music, in all more than 220 words, with a considerable space left blank in the centre. It is written on vellum, a portion of a leaf which fell from the Photius which he copied.

VI.—PORSON'S INTEMPERATE HABITS.

We are told, in the Menagiana, that, on one occasion, certain spots having appeared on the disc of the sun, and having given rise to much conversation and alarm at Paris, a gentleman, on his being asked by a lady of the court what was the latest news, replied, "there are evil reports, Madam, respecting the sun." Just so with poor Porson. His eminent abilities only made his obliquities the more notorious. The record is a melancholy one, but yet calculated to prove useful. Partial friends have supposed that he may have found wine or spirits a relief to the asthma with which he was afflicted during much of his life, and that, in this way, habits of intemperance were gradually formed. Mr. Watson remarks, however, with more truth, that we must remember, that to drink to excess was one of the vices of the day in which Porson lived; when a capacity for three bottles was thought a necessary qualification for society; when noblemen and gentlemen fell senseless under the dinner-table, and were carried to bed by their servants; and when Pitt and Dundas, on whom Porson made his epigrams, rose reeling from a carouse to join the Senate. Something, too, perhaps should be said for the habit of sleeplessness from which Porson suffered, and which led him frequently to protract his sittings. Still it must be admitted that Porson's drinking was enormous.

Lord Byron says, that he remembers to have seen Porson at Cambridge, though not frequently; that in the hall, where he himself dined at the vice-master's table, and Porson at the Dean's, he always appeared sober in his demeanor, nor was he ever guilty, as far as his lordship knew, of any excess or outrage in public; but that in an evening, with a party of undergraduates, his behavior would often be of a very different character, as he would, in fits of intoxication, get into violent disputes with the young men, and revile them for not knowing what he thought they might be expected to know. Lord Byron had seen him, he says, take up a poker to one of them, using language corresponding in violence to the action, and once saw him go away in a rage because none of them knew the name of the "Cobbler of Messina," insulting their ignorance with the strongest terms of reprobation. In this condition his lordship used to see him at Bankes's rooms, where he would pour forth whole pages of various languages, and distinguish himself especially by copious floods of Greek.

Of liquors his favorite was brandy, the drink of heroes. Mrs. Parr said that more brandy was drunk during three weeks that Porson spent at Hatton than during all the time that she had kept house before. He also indulged greatly in port, which he preferred to every other wine, as well at dinner as after it. This gave him a redness of nose to which he himself alludes in one of his letters, tracing a resemblance between it and "honest Bardolph's," or that of Sheridan, and it was often seen covered with bits of brown paper, as a kind of cooling and healing process. For tea and coffee he had no liking. At breakfast his favorite beverage was porter. One Sunday morning, when he was on a visit at Eton, he met Dr. Goodall, the Provost, going to church, and asked him where Mrs. Goodall was? "At breakfast," replied the Doctor. "Very well, then," rejoined Porson, "I'll go and breakfast with her." He accordingly presented himself at Mrs. Goodall's table, and, being asked what he chose to take, answered "Porter." Porter was in consequence sent for, pot after pot, and the sixth pot was just being carried into the house when Dr. Goodall returned from church.

Of his capacities of drinking and of sitting up at nights, extraordinary stories are told. The first evening which he spent with Horne Tooke, he never thought of retiring till the harbinger of day gave warning to depart. On another occasion, Tooke contrived to find out the opportunity of requesting his company when he knew that he had been sitting up the whole of the night before. This, however, made no difference; Porson sat up the second night also until sunrise. Tooke, on a third occasion, invited Porson to dine with him; and as he knew that Porson had not been in bed for the three preceding nights, he expected to get rid of him at an early hour. Porson, however, kept Tooke up the whole night; and in the morning the latter, in perfect despair, said, "Mr. Porson, I am engaged to meet a friend at breakfast at a coffee-house in Leicester Square." "Oh," replied Porson, "I will go with you;" and he accordingly did so. Soon after they had reached the coffee-house Tooke contrived to slip out, and, running home, ordered his servant not to let Mr. Porson in, even if he should attempt to batter down the door. "A man," observed Tooke, "who could sit up four nights successively, could sit up forty."

He would not scruple, according to Rogers, to return to the dining-room after the company had left it, pour into a tumbler the drops remaining in the wine-glasses, and drink off the omnium-gatherum. Indeed, he would drink liquids of all kinds. Tooke used to say, that he would drink ink rather than not drink at all. He was once sitting with a gentleman after dinner, in the chambers of a mutual friend, a Templar, who was then ill and confined to bed. A servant came into the room, sent thither by his master, for a bottle of embrocation which was on the chimney-piece. "I drank it an hour ago," said Porson.

When Hoppner, the painter, was residing in a cottage a few miles from London, Porson one afternoon unexpectedly arrived there. Hoppner said that he could not offer him dinner, as Mrs. Hoppner had gone to town, and had carried with her the key of the closet which contained the wine. Porson, however, declared that he would be content with a mutton-chop, and beer from the next ale-house; and accordingly staid to dine. During the evening Porson said, "I am quite certain that Mrs. Hoppner keeps some nice bottle for her private drinking, in her own bedroom; so, pray, try if you can lay your hands on it." His host assured him that Mrs. Hoppner had no such secret stores; but Porson insisting that a search should be made, a bottle was at last discovered in the lady's apartment, to the surprise of Hoppner, and the joy of Porson, who soon finished its contents, pronouncing it to be the best gin he had tasted for a long time. Next day, Hoppner, somewhat out of temper, informed his wife that Porson had drunk every drop of her concealed dram. "Drunk every drop of it!" cried she. "My God, it was spirits of wine for the lamp!"

VII.—MISCELLANEOUS ANECDOTES.

"Porson," said Parr, "with all your learning, I do not think you well versed in metaphysics." "I presume you mean your metaphysics," was the reply.—On another occasion, the same personage asked the Professor what he thought of the origin of evil: "I see no good in it," answered the latter.—When the "Letters to Travis" first appeared, Rennell said, "It is just such a book as the devil would write, if he could hold a pen."—One day after dinner, a certain Captain Ash, who was always ready to warble, burst out, as usual, with a song. Porson hated singing after dinner, and, while Ash was in the middle of his song, an ass happening to bray in the street, Porson interrupted the Captain with, "Sir, you have a rival!"—A gentleman, who had heard that Bentley was born in the north, said to Porson, "Wasn't he a Scotchman?" "No, Sir," replied Porson, "Bentley was a Greek scholar."—To a gentleman, who, at the close of a fierce dispute with Porson, exclaimed "My opinion of you is most contemptible, Sir," he retorted, "I never knew an opinion of yours that was not contemptible."—Porson, on one occasion, said that he would make, some say a rhyme, others a pun, on any thing. One of the company said, that he had better try one on the Latin gerunds. He immediately replied,

"When Dido found Æneas would not come,
She mourned in silence, and was Di-do-dum."

The following playful epitaph has been attributed to him:

"Here lies a Doctor of Divinity;
He was a Fellow, too, of Trinity:
He knew as much about Divinity,
As other Fellows do of Trinity."

Porson's friends all thought that he would never marry, since he appeared to be a confirmed convivial bachelor. One night, however, while he was smoking his pipe with George Gordon, at the Cider Cellar, his favorite place of resort, he suddenly said, "Friend George, do you not think that the Widow Lunan is an agreeable sort of personage as times go?" Gordon said something in the affirmative. "In that case," continued Porson, "you must meet me to-morrow morning at St. Martin's-in-the-Fields at eight o'clock," and, without saying more, paid his reckoning and retired. Gordon was somewhat astonished, but, knowing that Porson was likely to mean what he said, determined to comply with the invitation, and repaired to the church at the hour specified, where he found Porson with Mrs. Lunan and a female friend, and the parson waiting to begin the ceremony. When service was ended, the parties separated, the bride and her friend retiring by one door, and Porson and Gordon by another. How long the Professor sat after the wedding dinner we are not told, but he afterward adjourned to the Cider Cellar, and staid there until eight the next morning. This is a good deal worse than Budæus, who is said to have studied eight hours on his wedding day.—Porson, on one of his visits to the Cider Cellar, met with a stranger who discoursed most learnedly on the οἶνος κριθινος of the ancients, suggesting that it might have been whisky, and who surprised Porson by the accuracy, variety, and extent of his information. He was never found out, notwithstanding all Porson's inquiries. A fortnight afterward Porson was asked about the existence of the devil: "Sir," said he, "I doubted his existence till I saw him seated in that chair a fortnight ago." It may be important, in connection with this affair of Porson's, to remark, that the devil has very rarely showed himself to classical scholars. He appeared on one occasion, indeed, to Salmasius, and excited the wonder of the latter by his splendid Latinity. He was floored, however, in Greek, when evoked by old Hermolaus Barbarus, and could not tell what the Aristotelian ἐντελέχεια meant. At another time he showed himself to the younger Scaliger, as we are told in the Scaligerana Secunda, under the form of a dark-complexioned man mounted on a black horse (the prototype probably of the black cavalry of Virginia), and the scholar came very near being soused by him into a marsh. Some of the company, it seems, had been swearing a great deal, and no doubt our friend Scaliger among the number. The elder Scaliger, however, had a supreme contempt for the devil, and maintained that he never made his appearance except to blockheads.

Here are some of Porson's charades, with which we will close our account of him:

I.

My first of unity's a sign,
My second ere we knew to plant,
We used upon my third to dine
If all be true the poets chant.

II.

My first is expressive of no disrespect
Yet I never shall call you it while you are by,
If my second you still are resolved to reject,
As dead as my third I shall speedily lie.

III.

If nature and fortune had placed me with you
On my first, we my second might hope to obtain;
I might marry you, were I my third, it is true,
But the marriage would only imbitter my pain.

IV.

My first is the lot, that is destined by fate
For my second to meet with in every state;
My third is by many philosophers reckoned
To bring very often my first to my second.

V.

My first, from the thief though your house it defends,
Like a slave, or a cheat, you abuse or despise;
My second, though brief, yet alas! comprehends
All the good, all the great, all the learned, all the wise;
Of my third I have little or nothing to say,
Except that it marks the departure of day.

VI.

My first, 'tis said, in ghosts abounds,
And wheresoe'er she walks her rounds,
My second never fails to go,
Yet oft attends her mortal foe.
If with my third you quench your thirst,
You sink forever in my first.

Monthly Record of Current Events.

UNITED STATES.

CONGRESS adjourned on the 6th of August. In the Senate Messrs. Wiley and Carlisle, appointed from Virginia, in place of Messrs. Hunter and Mason, were admitted to seats. The House resolved, at the opening of the Session, that it would only consider bills and resolutions relating to military and naval appropriations, and that all other bills should be referred without debate to the appropriate Committees, to be considered at the next regular Session. This resolution was subsequently modified, but nearly all the business of the Session related directly to war measures. The bills were mostly passed by very decided majorities, the votes against them in either House rarely exceeding half a dozen. The principal exceptions to this were the Tariff Act, which, as finally amended, was passed in the House by a vote of 89 to 39, and the Confiscation bill by 60 to 48. There were very few formal speeches made; the most noticeable of these were in the Senate, upon Mr. Wilson's bill indorsing the acts of the President. This was opposed at length by Messrs. Breckinridge and Powell of Kentucky, Polk of Missouri, and Bayard of Delaware. No direct vote was taken upon this bill. In the House the principal opponents of the war measures were Messrs. Wood of New York, Vallandigham of Ohio, and Burnet of Kentucky. Mr. Crittenden of Kentucky offered a resolution, which was passed almost unanimously, to the effect that the present war has been forced upon the country by the Southern disunionists; that the only object of the Government in prosecuting it is to maintain its integrity and the unity of the entire country, and that when these objects shall have been accomplished the war shall terminate. A similar resolution offered in the Senate, by Mr. Johnson of Tennessee, was passed by a vote of 30 to 5.—The following list comprises a synopsis of the most important public acts passed during the Session:

Authorizing a National Loan of $250,000,000. The Secretary of the Treasury may borrow this amount within twelve months, for which he is to issue bonds or Treasury notes. The bonds to bear interest not exceeding 7 per cent., redeemable at the pleasure of the United States after twenty years; the treasury notes, of not less than $50 each, payable after three years, with interest at the rate of 7 3-10 per cent. He may also issue Treasury notes of $10 and upward, payable on demand without interest, or notes of similar denomination, payable in one year with interest 3 65-100 per cent.; but the issue of notes without interest shall not exceed $50,000,000. The Secretary may open books of subscription to the loan; in case a larger amount is subscribed than is required, smaller subscriptions to have the preference. He may also issue proposals for the sale of the bonds, and may accept such as he thinks proper, but no offer at less than par may be accepted. He may also negotiate the sale of not more than $100,000,000 of this loan in foreign countries. The faith of the United States is pledged for the payment of the principal and interest of this loan. A supplementary Act authorizes the issue of Treasury notes of five dollars, instead of ten, as limited by the original Act.

Levying direct taxes, and increasing the tariff. A direct tax of $20,000,000 per annum is imposed, the amount apportioned among the States in proportion to their representative population. The following is the sum assigned to each State and Territory:

Maine	$420,826	Indiana	$904,875
New Hampshire ..	218,496	Illinois	1,146,551
Vermont	211,063	Missouri	761,127
Massachusetts ..	824,581	Kansas	71,743
Rhode Island	116,963	Arkansas	261,836
Connecticut	303,214	Michigan	501,763
New York	2,603,918	Florida	77,522
New Jersey	450,134	Texas	255,106
Pennsylvania ...	1,946,719	Iowa	452,083
Delaware	74,681	Wisconsin	519,683
Maryland	436,823	California	254,533
Virginia	937,550	Minnesota	108,524
North Carolina ..	576,194	Oregon	35,140
South Carolina ..	363,570	New Mexico	62,640
Georgia	584,367	Utah	26,982
Alabama	523,313	Washington	7,755
Mississippi	413,084	Nebraska	19,321
Louisiana	385,886	Nevada	4,532
Ohio	1,567,089	Colorado	22,905
Kentucky	713,695	Dakota	3,241
Tennessee	669,498	Dist. Columbia ..	49,437

To collect this tax the Secretary of the Treasury may divide the country into suitable districts, appointing collectors and assessors, and making all needful regulations. The tax is assessed upon the value of lands, lots of ground, with their improvements and dwelling-houses, which are to be valued at what they are worth in money on the 1st of April, 1862. Property specially exempted from taxation by State laws, and property to the amount of five hundred dollars belonging to any person who resides upon the same, to be exempt from taxation. The act makes full provisions for the cases of fraudulent returns, and absentee property owners, and defaults in payment. In addition to this direct tax, an income tax is levied. Incomes less than $800 per annum are not taxed; those above this amount, derived from salaries, profits, dividends, interests, or any source not included in the foregoing "direct tax," pay three per cent. upon the excess of income over $800; persons residing abroad, deriving income from property in this country, pay 5 per cent. Any State may assume the collection and payment of the foregoing direct and income taxes; the State is then to be entitled to an abatement of 15 per cent. upon all amounts paid to the treasury of the United States before the last day of June, or 10 per cent. upon all paid in before the last day of September in the year to which the payment relates—the year commencing with the 1st of April. The collectors receive for their services, four per cent. upon the first hundred thousand dollars paid over by them, one per cent. upon the second hundred thousand, and one-half per cent. upon all further sums; but no one shall receive more than 8000 dollars. These taxes are due on the 13th of June, 1862; if not paid at that time six per cent. interest is to be added until paid; if not paid within 30 days after due notice, the collector shall levy upon property, and in default of property, the delinquent is to be imprisoned until taxes and costs are paid; but he may be released from imprisonment in the manner provided for release from custody for the non-payment of State taxes, or by order of the Secretary of the Treasury. In case the taxes can not be collected in any State, by reason of insurrection, they are to be collected, with interest, when the authority of the United States is re-established.

To provide for increased revenue from imposts. The most important additions made by this tariff are that tea pays 15 cents per pound and coffee 4 cents; these were formerly free. Raw sugar pays 2 cents, and white sugar 2½, instead of ¼ cents, refined and loaf sugars 4 cents, instead of 2. The duty on silks is increased 10 per cent.; on wines 10 per cent.; on brandy it is raised from $1 to $1 25; on distilled spirits from 40 to 50 cents; and on molasses from 2 to 5 cents per gallon. This bill forms a part of tax-bill, as finally passed.

Providing for the collection of duties in disaffected States. The President may order these to be collected at a port of delivery, or upon shipboard, or where they can not be so collected in any district he may by proclamation close the ports of that district; any vessel from abroad attempting to enter these ports to be forfeited. When any part of a State is in insurrection against the United States, the President may by proclamation forbid all commercial intercourse with the remainder of the States, all goods, proceeding to or from these portions, with the vessels or vehicles conveying them, to be forfeited. But he may license commercial intercourse in such articles, and to such extent, as he deems advisable. Vessels belonging wholly or in part to citizens of the insurrectionary States, found at sea or in any port of the loyal States fifteen days after the issue of the proclamation, to be forfeited. But the forfeitures under this act may be remitted or mitigated by the Secretary of the Treasury.

Authorizing the employment of volunteers to aid in enforcing the laws and protecting public property. Authorizes the President to accept the services of volunteers, not exceeding 500,000 in number, cavalry, artillery, or infantry; they are to be enlisted for the war, and are to be subject to the rules of the articles of war, and to be in all respects on the same footing as similar corps in the United States army. The President, with the advice and consent of the Senate, is to appoint such major-generals and brigadier-generals as are, in his judgment, required for the organization of the volunteers.

Increasing the pay of volunteers. Non-commissioned officers and privates shall receive two dollars a month in addition to their former pay, making 13 dollars a month for privates; in lieu of clothing they shall be paid three dollars and fifty cents a month additional; they shall receive rations computed at nine dollars a month; if wounded in battle, they will be awarded the same pension as is given a disabled soldier of the regular army; and if death ensues from wounds received, the widow, or, if there be none, the legal heirs, shall receive, in addition to all arrearages of pay and allowances, the sum of one hundred dollars. Bounties are to be paid to troops who re-enlist for the war. If they enlist individually, they receive 30 dollars; if by companies of not less than 64 men, 50 dollars each; if a whole regiment re-enlists, each man receives 75 dollars.

Increasing the present military establishment of the United States. In addition to the present regular army there are to be enlisted nine regiments of infantry, one of cavalry, and one of artillery; this increase is to be for service during the present insurrection; and within one year after constitutional authority shall be restored, the number of the army may be reduced to 25,000 men, unless otherwise ordered by Congress.

Providing for the suppression of rebellion. This act authorizes the President to call out by proclamation the militia and employ the land and naval force to execute the laws, when necessary. The militia so called out to receive the same pay and allowances as the regular army. Any officer or private failing to obey the proclamation to forfeit a sum not less than one month's or more than one year's pay.

Making appropriations for the support of the army for the year ending June 30, 1862, and for arrearages for the preceding year. This act makes appropriations to the amount of about $180,000,000. The following are some of the principal items; we give the sums in millions of dollars: For pay of the army, 4 millions; for pay of three months' volunteers, 3¼ millions; for pay of two and three years' volunteers, 55 millions; for subsistence of regular troops, 2¼ millions; for subsistence of two and three years' volunteers, 23 millions; for regular supplies in quarter-master's department, 14 millions; for incidental expenses of quarter-master's department, 7¼ millions; for purchase of dragoon and artillery horses, 10¼ millions; for transportation of the army, 16½ millions; for gun-boats on Western waters, 1 million; for hire of quarters, etc., 1¼ millions; for clothing and camp equipage, 13¼ millions; for ordnance and supplies, 2 millions; for the manufacture of arms, 2¼ millions; for amount to refund to the States expenses incurred in sending out volunteers, 10 millions.

Making appropriations for the naval service for the year ending June 30, 1862, and for arrearages for the preceding year. This bill makes appropriations to the amount of about $30,000,000. The following are the principal items, also given in millions of dollars: For pay of officers and seamen, 7 millions; for repair and equipment of vessels, 8¼ millions; for fuel, 1 million; for ordnance and stores, 3¼ millions; for the completion of seven screw sloops, 1¼ millions; for provisions, 2 millions; for contingent expenses, 1 million; for arrearages due on purchase, charter, and fitting out of vessels, 4 millions.

Providing for the temporary increase of the navy, appropriating $3,000,000 for the hire and purchase of vessels, and for the payment of officers and men.

Appropriating two millions of dollars to defray the cost of transporting and delivering arms and munitions of war to the loyal citizens of States now in insurrection against the United States, and for defraying the expenses of organizing these citizens for protection against rebellion or invasion.

Appropriating $10,000,000 for the purchase of arms and equipments for the volunteers and regular troops.

Directing the Secretary of the Treasury to remit duties paid by any State upon arms imported for the use of troops engaged in suppressing insurrection.

Appropriating $10,000,000 for the purchase and manufacture of arms, ordnance, and ordnance stores.

Authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to each State the costs incurred in fitting out and sending its troops to aid in suppressing the present insurrection.

Directing all letters sent prepaid to soldiers, directed to any place where they have been stationed, to be forwarded to the places where they have been removed, without extra charge.

Defining and punishing conspiracies. If two or more persons in any State or Territory combine together to overthrow the Government of the United States, seize its property, or obstruct the execution of its laws, they are to be punished by fine or imprisonment, or both: fines to be not less than five hundred or more than five thousand dollars; imprisonments to be not less than six months or more than six years.

Confiscating property used for insurrectionary purposes. —This act provides that, in the present or any future insurrection, any property given to aid such insurrection, or used for that purpose with the knowledge and consent of the owner, shall be subject to seizure and confiscation: any person claiming service or labor from any other person, under the laws of any State, who shall employ such person in aiding or abetting the insurrection, forfeits all right to this service or labor, any law to the contrary notwithstanding.

The military operations of the month have been of decided importance. In Western Virginia the Federal troops, under command of General McClellan, have met with brilliant success in several engagements. On the 11th of July an action took place at Rich Mountain, where a body of Confederates, commanded by Colonel Pegram, were attacked and defeated by the Ohio and Indiana troops, commanded by General Rosencranz, with a loss of 60 killed; they also lost all their guns and camp equipage. Colonel Pegram, and the remnant of his command, amounting to 600 men, surrendered themselves prisoners of war. Two days after General Garnett, the commander of the Confederate army in this section, while retreating from Laurel Hill, where he had been posted, was overtaken by the Federal troops under General Morris, at Carrick's Ford. They made a stand, but were defeated with a loss stated at some hundreds; among the killed was General Garnett. Several other minor actions of less consequence took place in this region, the result of all being in favor of the Federal troops. General McClellan, in an order to his army, dated July 19, thus sums up the results of the campaign to that day: "Soldiers of the Army of the West: You have annihilated two armies, commanded by educated and experienced soldiers, intrenched in mountain fastnesses, and fortified at their leisure. You have taken five guns, twelve colors, fifteen hundred stand of arms, one thousand prisoners, including more than forty officers. One of the second commanders of the rebels is a prisoner, the other lost his life on the field of battle. You have killed more than two hundred and fifty of the enemy, who has lost all his baggage and camp equipage. All this has been accomplished with the loss of twenty brave men killed, and sixty wounded on your part."—General M'Clellan having been called to Washington, after the disaster at Bull Run, the command in Western Virginia devolved upon General Rosenzanz, who, on the 7th of August, announced to the Government that the enemy had been driven from the valley of the Kanawha, and asking for the resumption of the United States mail service.

General Patterson's division, which crossed the Potomac above Harper's Ferry on the 2d of July, was expected to follow the Confederate troops under General Johnston, who had abandoned Harper's Ferry, and at all events prevent them from uniting with the main body at Manassas Junction. Johnston fell back as far as Winchester; but Patterson did not advance beyond Martinsburg; and as the event showed did nothing to prevent the junction of the Confederate forces. He reports that the enemy were reinforced so as to outnumber his own, and that his forces were composed in a great measure of volunteers whose term was about to expire. The advance of this column accomplished nothing, and to its failure may be attributed the disaster at Bull Run. General Patterson, a few days before the close of his time of service, was superseded by General Banks, and this division of the army returned across the Potomac to Maryland.

The main column of the army, commanded by General M'Dowell, commenced the passage of the Potomac opposite Washington on the 7th of July; but it was more than a week before the division was collected, and then many of the regiments advanced without ever having been collected into a brigade. But on the 16th General M'Dowell left Arlington, though poorly prepared to advance; but the period of the service of many of his troops was about to expire; in a few days he would have lost 10,000 of his best men from this cause. The design was to reach Centreville, some seven miles from Manassas, on the 17th, and bring on a battle on the 19th. But the obstructions of the road, and the condition of the men, who were unaccustomed to marching, caused a delay of two full days, giving the enemy time to concentrate their forces. On the evening of the 20th M'Dowell's command was mainly at Centreville, while the enemy was at or near Manassas. The accompanying diagram will illustrate the account of the battle of the following day, condensed from M'Dowell's official report: Midway between Centreville and Manassas is a small stream called Bull Run. A reconnoissance made on the 18th, resulting in a partial engagement under General Tyler, had shown that Blackburn's Ford, one passage over the Run, was strongly fortified; so also was the Stone Bridge on the Warrenton turnpike, the direct road from Centreville to Manassas. Three miles west of the bridge is a ford at Sudley's Spring, which was supposed to be undefended, between which and the bridge was a defended ford. It was therefore resolved to cross at this upper ford, and having guarded the lower ford and bridge, to send a detachment to destroy a portion of the Manassas Railroad, and thus break up the communication between the forces at Manassas and those supposed to be held in check at Winchester by General Patterson. The divisions were ordered to march at half past two o'clock on the morning of the 21st, rations for three days having been given out on the previous evening. A strong force was to hold the road from Blackburn's Ford, to prevent our left from being turned by the enemy; General Tyler was to move on the Warrenton road, and cannonade the enemy's batteries near the bridge, while Colonel Hunter's division, following after, was to turn northward to the upper ford, and having crossed this, to turn south, and thus gain the rear of the enemy's batteries; and in the mean while, Colonel Heintzelman's division was to follow Hunter's for a distance, and then turn to the lower ford, where he was to cross, after the enemy had been driven off by Hunter. These movements are clearly shown on the map. Tyler commenced fire at half past six A. M., but was not answered from the enemy's batteries, which led to the suspicion that the Confederate forces were not in force in front, but intended themselves to attack our left by way of Blackburn's Ford. Hunter's division found the road to the upper ford longer than had been anticipated. The crossing was effected, and Hunter's division, reinforced by Heintzelman's, advanced southward toward the Warrenton turnpike, while Tyler fired upon the bodies of the enemy who were advancing in front of him upon the troops who had just crossed. The main battle-field was thus on the west side of Bull Run, between Sudley's Spring and the Warrenton turnpike. The Confederate troops were, after severe fighting, pressed back for a mile and a half beyond the Warrenton road, when reinforcements arrived for the Confederates. These consisted of the residue of General Johnston's army, which had just arrived from Winchester, a part having been on the ground previously. The Federal troops were exhausted. It was now three o'clock in the afternoon; they had been up since two in the morning, and after a weary march had been fighting for five hours; many of them had eaten nothing, having thrown away the rations with which they had been supplied the previous night. The fresh troops of the Confederates threw themselves into the woods on our right, and drove our forces back; the retreat then became a rout, soon degenerating into a panic. The enemy followed only a short distance, but at the crossing of the ford, where the road was blocked up by the flying masses, occasioned much loss. By sundown the greater portion of our men had got beyond Centreville; but so utterly demoralized were our forces that no attempt was made at a stand; and the fragments of the army rushed back to Arlington, and occupied the positions which they had left but five days before. During the action they fought with unquestioned bravery, and almost secured a victory, against large odds, both in numbers and position; but the arrival of Johnston's reinforcements turned the scale, and the result was a defeat, which might have been fatal had the enemy followed up his advantage. The most disgraceful part of the affair, as reported by General M'Dowell, is the conduct of the Fourth Pennsylvania regiment of volunteers and the battery of the volunteer artillery of the New York Eighth Militia. Their term had expired on the eve of the battle. They insisted on being discharged, refusing to remain even for a few days longer. They marched off the next morning, moving to the rear to the sound of the enemy's cannon, while their former comrades were advancing to battle. The Federal troops who crossed Bull Run numbered 18,000. Their loss is officially stated as follows:

	Killed.	Wounded.
Officers	19	64
Privates	462	947
Total	481	1011

Many of the wounded received but slight hurts. The total number disabled will probably be less than 1000. The number returned as missing is 1216; how many of these are prisoners it is impossible to say; but the number is undoubtedly large. The loss of arms and munitions was about 17 rifled cannon, 8 smooth bores, 2500 muskets, 150 boxes of small-arm ammunition, 80 boxes cannon ammunition, 13 wagons of provisions, 8000 knapsacks and blankets. The whole number of cannon taken into the action was 49 pieces, of which 28 were rifled.

Directly after the battle of Bull Run General M'Clellan was summoned from Western Virginia, and placed at the head of the division of the army near Washington.—General Frémont has reached his field of command, making St. Louis his headquarters. General Banks commands the division of the Upper Potomac, having superseded General Patterson.—General Butler, apprehending an attack upon his post at Hampton, withdrew his forces; the town was abandoned by the greater portion of the population. On the 2d of August General Magruder advanced from Yorktown with a large body of Confederates, and on the night of the 7th set fire to Hampton, giving the remaining inhabitants only a few minutes to escape; the village was almost entirely consumed.

General Butler, in command at Fortress Monroe, has asked the direction of the Government as to the disposition to be made of the slaves who seek refuge at the fortress, of whom there were nearly a thousand.—Secretary Cameron replied that it was the desire of the President that all existing rights in the States be maintained; and hence no question could arise as to fugitives from service in loyal States and Territories; but in States wholly or in part under insurrectionary control, the rights dependent upon the execution of the laws must temporarily fail; and in States within which military operations are conducted, the rights dependent upon the laws of the States must of necessity be subordinated to the exigencies created by the insurrection, if not wholly forfeited by the treasonable conduct of parties claiming them. By a recent Act of Congress if persons held to service are employed in hostility to the United States, the right to such services is forfeited; hence no claim can be recognized by the military authority of the Union for the services of such persons, when fugitives. In respect to persons escaping from the service of loyal masters in these States, the Secretary concludes that the rights of the masters will be best subserved by receiving the fugitives into the service of the United States, and employing them as circumstances may require, keeping a record of all the facts and circumstances, so that upon the return of tranquillity Congress may be able to provide for their return, and for just compensation to the masters. In the mean while General Butler is directed not to permit any interference by his troops with the servants of peaceful citizens in the house or field, nor to encourage them to leave their masters; nor, except in cases where the public good may seem to require it, to prevent the voluntary return of any fugitive to the service from which he may have escaped.

The blockade of the Southern ports is far from efficient. A large number of privateers have succeeded in evading the blockading vessels, and putting out to sea. They are mostly vessels of light draft, capable of running into inlets where ships of war can not follow them. They have made many prizes; at least fifty merchant vessels are known to have been captured. The most successful of these privateers have been the steamer Sumter and the brig Jeff Davis. The Sumter, formerly the Marquis de la Habana, belonging to General Miramon, was captured by the United States, and taken to New Orleans, where she was seized by the Confederates. She is commanded by Raphael Semmes, formerly a lieutenant in the United States Navy. She succeeded in running the blockade of the mouth of the Mississippi, and is known to have captured eight vessels off the coast of Cuba; one of these was burned at sea, the others were taken to the port of Cienfuegos, in Cuba; these were given up by the Spanish Government to the United States. Three of these prizes have reached New York, having been convoyed for a part of the way by the United States steamer Cru-sader, which had been sent to look out for the Sumter.—The Jeff Davis, supposed to be the former slaver Echo, is known to have taken three prizes. The most valuable of these was the schooner S. J. Waring, captured within 200 miles of New York. The privateer took away the captain, mates, and two seamen, putting in their place five men as prize crew, and leaving on board William Tillman, the colored steward, two seamen, and Bryce Mackinnon, a passenger. The vessel was then steered toward Charleston. The steward imagined that he had discovered a design to sell him as a slave, and determined to retake the vessel. One of the crew agreed to join him, the other, named M'Leod, refused. On the 16th of July, the vessel being not far from Charleston, Tillman, taking an opportunity when the prize captain and mates were asleep, killed them successively with a hatchet, and, assisted by his comrade, threw the bodies overboard, and then assuming the command of the vessel, brought her to New York, with the two surviving members of the prize crew.—Another Confederate privateer, the Petrel, was taken off the coast of South Carolina by the frigate St. Lawrence, on the 1st of August. The privateer, formerly the United States revenue cutter Aiken, mistook the frigate for a merchantman, and fired upon her; the St. Lawrence answered with a broadside which cut her completely in two, and she sunk almost on the instant. Of her crew 5 were lost, the remainder, 36 in number, being picked up by boats from the St. Lawrence, and taken to Philadelphia.—President Davis sent a flag of truce to the President of the United States, threatening that the same treatment and the same fate would be given to the prisoners held by the Confederates as shall be experienced by those persons captured on the Savannah.

In Missouri affairs are assuming a critical position. As noted last month, Governor Jackson, abandoning the capital, proceeded southwest toward Arkansas, where troops were gathering, under the command of Major M'Culloch, the Texan Ranger, joined by bodies of the Missouri "State Guard." General Lyon, with United States troops and bodies of the "Home Guard," proceeded in the same direction. Several skirmishes have taken place in different parts of the State, mostly in the southwest. One of the most important of these occurred at Carthage, on the 5th of July, the Federal troops being commanded by Colonel (now General) Siegel, and the Confederates by General Rains, in which the former had a decided advantage, although, being greatly outnumbered, he retreated to Springfield, toward which place General Lyon was advancing. On the 1st of August General Lyon, learning of the approach of M'Culloch, advanced to meet him; on the following day a skirmish occurred at Dug Spring, nineteen miles from Springfield, in which a gallant charge was made by a small body of cavalry upon a superior force of the enemy, who retired. General Lyon, having but four days' rations, did not pursue, but returned to Springfield on the 4th. At the latest dates, the enemy were concentrating in large numbers in this quarter, and a decisive engagement was hourly expected.—In the mean while the State Convention re-assembled at Jefferson City, and on the 30th of July, by a vote of 56 to 25, passed an ordinance vacating the offices of Governor, Lieutenant-Governor, Secretary of State, and members of Assembly, and appointing a new election for these offices, to be held on the first Monday of November. Hamilton R. Gamble was appointed by the Convention as temporary Governor. He issued a proclamation enjoining all citizens to enroll themselves in military organizations for the defense of the State; announcing that the late law of the Assembly, called the "Military Law," was abrogated by the Convention, and ordering all troops enlisted under it to disband. He promises full security to all who have taken up arms at the call of the late Government, if they return to their homes. The officers and troops of the Confederate States who have invaded Missouri are informed that their presence is against the will of the people of the State, and they are notified to depart at once. The choice which has been made for temporary Governor, he says, "will satisfy all that no countenance will be afforded to any scheme or to any conduct calculated in any degree to interfere with the institution of Slavery existing in the State; but that institution will be protected to the very utmost extent of the executive power."

The Confederate Congress is in session at Richmond. The sessions being close, little definite information of its proceedings is given in the Southern papers. It is understood, however, that large additions to the army are to be called for. Mr. Toombs, having accepted an appointment as General in the army, has resigned his post of Secretary of State, Hon. R. M. T. Hunter of Virginia succeeding him.—The Rev. Leonidas Polk, Episcopal Bishop of Louisiana, has been appointed Major-General in the Confederate Army, to have chief command on the Mississippi.

The election has been held in Kentucky for members of the Legislature and for several State officers. A very large majority of the members chosen to the Legislature are in favor of the Union. The aggregate Union majority is estimated at about 60,000 in the State.

Literary Notices.

Explorations and Adventures in Equatorial Africa, by PAUL B. DU CHAILLU. (Published by Harper and Brothers.) Some months since we gave, in advance of its publication, a full analysis of this remarkable book. It has since been republished in England, where it has been subjected to the ordeal of the most searching criticism. Some obscurity in dates, arising from a desire to present the different journeys in a geographical connection rather than in strict chronological order, was made the pretext for throwing doubt upon the credibility of Mr. Du Chaillu's narrative. It was fortunate for the author that the collections of animals and implements which he brought with him furnished substantive proofs of the most incredible of his statements. One might have doubted his account of the gorilla were it not for the skins and skeletons contained in his collection. His account of the strange kind of semi-civilization existing among the interior tribes, who have never seen a white man, is corroborated by the numerous implements and manufactures which are wholly unlike any thing ever before brought before the civilized world. Professor Owen, the most eminent zoologist of the day, says that Mr. Du Chaillu has furnished "the amplest, rarest, and most interesting illustrations of the lower creatures that have ever reached Europe." His geographical theory of the existence of a chain of lofty mountains stretching across the continent from east to west, almost on the line of the equator, put forth against the express opinion of Barth, and the implied doubts of Livingstone, is confirmed by every traveler who has penetrated at all into that unknown belt of Africa. Captain Burton, whose explorations come nearer to those of Du Chaillu than those of any other traveler, gives assurance of his full belief in the accuracy of Mr. Du Chaillu's accounts of the country and its inhabitants. The many hundreds of persons who became personally acquainted with him during the many months of his residence in this country while preparing his book, will need no guarantee for its truthfulness. They were sure, from the first, that it must be received as by far the most interesting as well as the most valuable of recent books of travel and adventure. It throws light upon a hitherto unknown part of that great continent which every thing goes to show will soon come to take a prominent place in the regard of the civilized world.

Framley Parsonage; a Novel, by ANTHONY TROLLOPE. Mr. Trollope has within a few years, by a rapid succession of clever novels, won a place among the foremost of the younger writers of fiction. As a simple story-teller he fairly rivals Wilkie Collins. His characters are hearty flesh-and-blood beings, such as one is quite sure are to be found in every town in England; they live, move, and talk in accordance with their nature. They go through no adventures which might not reasonably be expected would happen to them. "Framley Parsonage," which for many months formed the main attraction of the Cornhill Magazine, fairly eclipsing Mr. Thackeray's "Lovel the Widower," which appeared simultaneously with it, loses nothing by its publication in a collected form. The readers of "Doctor Thorne," the best of Mr. Trollope's previous novels, will be pleased to meet with some of their old acquaintances. We have glimpses of Frank Gresham and Mary, of the Duke of Omnium, Lady Scatterd, and of good Doctor Thorne himself; and a full view of queer, downright, sharp-sighted, clever Miss Dunstable, the millionaire proprietress of the Balm of Lebanon—one of the most thoroughly original characters of modern fiction. Taken altogether, "Framley Parsonage" is one of the very best of the novels of a period which has produced "The Woman in White," "Adam Bede," "Silas Marner," and "Great Expectations." (Published by Harper and Brothers.)

Military Dictionary. By Colonel H. L. SCOTT, Inspector-General U. S. A. (Published by D. Van Nostrand.) This is an Encyclopædia rather than a Dictionary of Military Science; for while mere technical terms are defined as briefly as possible, all leading topics relating to the raising and maintenance of troops, materials and munitions of war, military law and administration, are treated in elaborate and exhaustive articles. Thus, from ten to twenty pages each are devoted to "Small-arms," "Artillery," "Booby," "Bridges," "Cooking," "Execution of the Laws" by military officers, "Injuries" inflicted by them, and the mode of redress. The article on "Rifled Ordnance" is especially valuable, containing illustrated descriptions of the Lancaster, Whitworth, and Armstrong guns, Columbiads, James's projectiles. The description of the United States rifled musket is illustrated with more than one hundred diagrams, representing in detail every part of the gun and its appendages, with minute directions for cleaning, repairing, and keeping it in order. The article on "Cooking" embodies specific directions for preparing every article of food adapted for the army. The various articles on military law and its relations to the civil power are of the highest value both to soldiers and civilians. While the plan of the work embraces every topic pertaining to military science, the position and acquirements of the author furnish abundant guarantees for its accuracy and reliability. The work has not been hastily compiled to meet a temporary emergency; but has been the labor of years. It should be made a text-book for the study of every volunteer officer. Any one of competent natural capacity who, in addition to the ordinary drill duties has mastered the contents of this work, ought to be able to take command of a company in camp or field.

Primary Object Lessons: a Manual for Teachers and Parents, by N. A. CALKINS. The fundamental idea of this work is that primary education should aim to develop the observing powers, rather than, as is the usual plan, to exercise the memory. For this purpose a series of interesting exercises has been framed to develop the ideas of form, color, number, size, weight, sound, and place. The idea of the work is an admirable one; and no parent or teacher who will master its plan can fail to appreciate the advantages which it offers. (Harper and Brothers.)

The Fifth Reader of the School and Family Series, by MARCIUS WILLSON, develops still further the admirable idea upon which the series is based—that of combining useful knowledge with instruction in reading. This volume contains carefully prepared introductions to the study of Botany, Chemistry, several departments of Zoology, Human Physiology, Architecture, Natural Philosophy, Physical Geography, and Geology. Each of these departments of knowledge possesses a literature of its own, some of the choicest specimens of which are given as illustrations in connection with more formal lessons.

Thus Holmes's "Living Temple" appears in the section on Physiology; Mrs. Sigourney's "Coral Insect" and Bryant's "Prairies" in Physical Geography; Longfellow's "Sea-Weed" in Botany. This arrangement can not fail to impress upon the mind of the learner the cardinal principle that in the department of imaginative literature, as every where else, truth to nature and fact is an essential element of beauty. Mr. Willson modestly calls his scientific sections "Introductions." They are more than this: they are so far complete treatises that the more advanced pupil, who has repeatedly gone over them merely as ordinary exercises in reading, will have almost insensibly acquired an amount of information greater than that possessed by most well-educated people. The illustrations to this volume are excellent. Those in the different departments of Zoology are equal to any thing to be found in the best foreign scientific works; and those in each division being drawn to a uniform scale, the pupil sees at a glance not only the form, but the relative size of the animals represented. In respect to excellence of plan, completeness of execution, and beauty of appearance, this series of Readers is far in advance of any thing which has ever before been attempted in this department of school books. (Published by Harper and Brothers.)

Vetromile Wewessi Ubibian: elit'bi'klang'sa K'tchi-ulameuhanganal—"Of Vetromile's Noble Bible: Such as happened Great-Truths". This volume, published by Rennie, Shea, and Lindsay, at Manhattan Udenek ("New York Village"), is prepared by "EUGENE VETROMILE, Indian Patriarch, Corresponding Member of the Maine Historical Society, etc." (Alnambay Patlias, Maine Hannekanadzemuhangan Ketchi-awikhighè), for the benefit of the Penobscot, Micmac, and other tribes of the Abenaki Indians. It contains a summary of Biblical History and Catholic doctrine in the Penobscot and Micmac dialects, with a literal English translation. In a few years this book will be a curiosity in literature, as a memorial of a language no longer spoken or understood. We give the Lord's Prayer in both dialects. In Penobscot it reads: "Tani edutchi aiamihàn, k'ditâmen. K'mitankusena, Spomkik eyane, weweselmogwodetch eli wizyane, ketepêltemwangan petzussewitch; keteleltamwangan uli kiktangwadetch tali kik tahanlaho te Spomkik. Manmiline nikwamb' bemghiskak etaskiskwè n'tapan'mena; te anehêltamiwinè nepalalokkewangannawal, tanhanlawi nyona eli anehêltamahukt ewanpalellokedjik; te ekkwi elossaline unemihotwangane, wetchi kighehièku tannil mematchikkil. Nialetch." In the Micmac it reads: "Elajudmayogwel n'didohep, Nuschinen wajok ebin, tchiptook delwigin meguidèdemek, wajok n'telidânen tchiptook ignemwièk, ula nemûlek uledèchinen; natel wajok deli chkedulk, tchiptook deli chkedulek makamiguek eimek. Delamûkubeniguel echemièguel, apch neguèch kichkook delamuktech penegunnemwin nilûnen; deli abikchiktachik wegaiwinametnik, elpkil deli abikchiktwin elwèultiek; melkenin mech winnehudil mu k'tygalinen, keginukamkel winnehigwel twaktwin. N'delietch." The literal English rendering is as follows: "When you pray, say, Our Father, who are seated in heaven; that your name be respected; grant to us to see you in heaven; as they obey you in heaven, so may we obey you upon the earth, where we are. In the same manner that you have given it to us, so also at present give to us our nourishment; as we forgive them who have offended us, in the same manner you forgive us our faults.

Hold us strongly by the hand, that we may not fall; remove from us sufferings, evils. May it be so."

Harper and Brothers have recently added to their collection of Greek and Latin Texts Cæsar, Cicero de Senectute, and Lucretius, put forth with the same accuracy and neatness which characterize the former volumes of the series.—FARRADAY'S Chemical History of a Candle, a series of lectures delivered before a juvenile auditory, is a perfect model of what a popular lecture on a scientific subject should be. The phenomena presented in the manufacture and combustion of a candle are presented in such a form as to be comprehensible by any intelligent youth; yet there is not a law under which any part of the physical universe is governed which does not come fairly into play, and may not be illustrated in a lecture on a candle—provided that the lecturer is Farraday.—The History of Margaret of Anjou is another of the admirable series of biographies produced by JACOB ABBOTT. The lives of few historical women present so many remarkable personal and political vicissitudes as that of the Queen of the feeble Henry VI. of England, whose career is well worthy of narration in a separate form.

Great Expectations, by CHARLES DICKENS. In this novel Mr. Dickens has put forth his full strength. The conduct of the story is indeed something wonderful. Written to be read in parts issued from week to week, it was essential that the reader should not be able to anticipate the course of the story, while it was equally essential that when subsequently reviewed it should appear consistent. These two conditions have been perfectly attained. Each part of the story involves a surprise; yet the reader feels that he ought not to have been surprised. He sees that every leading incident was clearly foreshadowed long before. Thus, when it is finally revealed who Pip's benefactor really was, we wonder that we should ever have been mistaken in the person. "Great Expectations" adds some absolutely new characters to our literature. Joe Gargery, a rough blacksmith, with the chivalric soul of Sir Philip Sidney; Pumblechook, whose name, like that of Pecksniff, has already given us an adjective descriptive of a special phase of meanness; Jaggers, the great criminal lawyer, and Wemmick his clerk, officially as hard and unsympathetic as the ice which girdles a continent, privately as gentle as the waves which ripple over a pebbly beach; and, above all, Abel Magwitch, criminal by birth, outlaw by training, desperado by circumstances, yet having within him such untold capacities of love and devotion: this one character is worth all the "Prisoners' relief" reports ever published. "Great Expectations" will take place if not as absolutely the best, yet certainly as one of the three best, of the long series of works with which Mr. Dickens has enriched the world. (T. B. Peterson and Brothers.)

Carthage and her Remains, by Dr. N. DAVIS, F.R.G.S. This elaborately illustrated work, the result of an exploration undertaken under the sanction of the British Government, embodies all that can now be known of the site of the ancient rival of Rome. Its value is not inferior to Mr. Layard's works upon Nineveh and Babylon, while the incidental pictures of life and manners among the people who now occupy the region once inhabited by the countrymen of Hannibal are graphic and lively. The work fills a place heretofore wholly unoccupied, and presents many points of special interest to the student of history. (Harper and Brothers, Publishers.)

Editor's Table.

THE PEN AND THE SWORD.—We are all taught to hold the pen, and the man who can not write his name is hardly ranked among civilized persons. Yet the time was when it was thought of far more importance to know how to wield the sword; and many a renowned soldier upon whom high-born dames smiled and haughty princes waited, could not, to save his life, sign his name to the treaty which his valor had won. We wonder and laugh at such ignorance or stupidity, and boast that the age of the pen has put to flight the age of the sword, and the empire of ideas has succeeded the dominion of blows.

If any people have occasion for boasting what the pen can do, it is we, the people of these United States, this universally reading and writing nation, in this age of unstinted paper and print. The pen is mighty among us pre-eminently—not because we make better books than other nations, but because we make so many, and for so many eyes. Perhaps the very highest style of composition, whether in prose or verse, can not be claimed for our authors; and certainly no American in his senses will claim that our books are altogether better than the French or the English. Yet we do say that more power is wielded here by the pen than any where else. In the first place, it is undeniable that more of our people are readers than of any people on the globe, and that we have no class or caste of free inhabitants who do not read and write. In the second place, nowhere in the world does such universal and intense interest attach to what is written as with us; for here we are all voters, and called constantly to investigate the political questions and candidates presented to our judgment through the press. In the third place, the range of interests subjected to our decision is greater than any where else; and while a portion of other constitutional nations vote upon certain measures and men, all national and local affairs are laid before the people here, and the farmer or mechanic is obliged to have something like an intelligent opinion upon the merits of all candidates, whether for President or for tax-collector, and upon all questions, from the tariff to street-cleaning.

It is our press—especially our newspaper press—that enthrones the pen in America, and clothes it with such favor and such fear. The newspaper is every where; for every considerable village has its little sheet for local news and business, while the great journals of the cities, either in their weekly or their daily issues, circulate through the length and breadth of the land. The newspaper transacts our commercial, political, and no small portion of our religious business. The humblest reader is sure to find notice of the persons and enterprises of a public nature that are most interesting to him, while all men of any note are well aware that if the press has not made their reputation, it has done much to extend it, and may do much to destroy it. In fact, no class of men have by their position so much influence as editors; and as our poor human nature is never slow to discover its own consequence, it is not strange that the lords of the quill have found out their importance, and sometimes pervert it by ill-nature and dishonesty and exaggerate it in conceit. Perhaps, however, the abuse is in the inverse ratio of the actual power: for as far as our observation goes, we have never seen so much spite and recklessness in the great metropolitan organs as in the petty village oracles; and probably the reason is that the great newspapers have fair game enough constantly before their eyes, while the village pen is obliged to make game of some unoffending person or party to keep its ink flowing and its readers awake. Every where, however, our press has full enough license, and woe to the man of sensitive nerves who falls under its displeasure. In some cases it is a fearful tyranny, and some of our leading journals show a spirit of dictation and denunciation that would be appalling were it not so much qualified by rival sheets that often defend the victim of obloquy, not so much to secure his rights as to wreak their own vengeance and fight their own battles.

The pen, in great emergencies, assumes the office of dictator to the people and the Government, and we have had lately grave and sad reason to fear that the press has forced our army into hasty and rash movements, and the pen insists upon being master of the sword. We are waiting somewhat anxiously the issue of the claim, convinced that we are near great events, and that evil days must come unless we have wise and strong men for our rulers, who can do their work and hold their tongues without asking leave of the knights of the quill what orders they shall issue or what blows they shall strike. The men who have done great things with the sword have not generally been great talkers, and we are soon to know whether our soldiers are to be ruled by men of deeds or of words. The war would be a small affair if the Government would only be as wise as the dauntless editor who never wielded a stouter weapon than his steel pen, and who plans the campaign with all the more certainty because not hampered by any knowledge of the subject, and therefore able to project movements into the enemy's territory as easily as he moves his impatient pen over the unresisting paper. What a great nation we might have been if our generals were only as wise and heroic as our journalists!

Convinced as we are that the insolence of our men of words is to be mightily and wholesomely checked by the solid logic of deeds, and that public opinion is already beginning to pass very sober judgment upon the conceited writers and talkers who have been so much more successful in getting us into difficulty than in extricating us, we are moved to consider with some seriousness the relation between the pen and the sword in this country, and especially the need of bringing a powerful class of practical men to bear upon our current declaimers, and give us the solid generalship of the camp instead of the dashing generalities of the newspaper.

We must not indeed forget that the pen has already one important check upon its license which is not wholly evil: we mean the business interest, or what may properly be called the purse. Money is not our God, yet we can not call it the devil; and we have no scruples to keep us from saying that the prosperity of business is often a very wholesome restraint upon the rashness of demagogues and the vagaries of theorists. Sometimes, indeed, we must be ready to sacrifice wealth to principle; but it is no proof of the excellence of a scheme that it is likely to ruin the people; and it is well that our newspapers are kept from playing into the hands of destructives by the power of our substantial business interests. The money article is generally pretty judiciously written, and although not always free from fancy, it is never allowed wholly to part company with common sense. An independent editor may indeed make war upon some chartered monopoly, and read severe lectures to the proud lords of the exchange; but he can never assail the industry of the people, or strike at the foundations of capital, which is so closely the friend of labor, without finding speedy rebuke in the wrath of public opinion and the cutting off of his own supplies. The pen must be fed, and he who writes must have readers who will pay for the writing. We believe that the close connection of journalism with the business of the country has tended to give it good sense; and if some editors bow the knee too devoutly to Mammon, we do not think that our press, on the whole, can be justly accused of servility to the moneyed class. The pen need not play the libertine to prove its freedom; and we certainly look upon the press with far more respect from its being so much in the interest of popular industry, and being obliged to test every opinion and policy by its direct bearing upon the wealth of the nation.

Money to a certain extent, indeed, may be made by writing to the passions and vices of the baser sort of readers, yet it is found that what is decidedly evil does not pay; and although the law of the purse is not the best kind of censorship, it is a censorship, and the lowest class of journals die out quite as much by starvation as by prosecution. Whenever a thing does not pay, it is sure to die; and while some things do not pay because they are above the heads or hearts of the majority, most of the books and journals that die for want of support owe their demise more to the folly or dullness of the writers than to the prejudice or blindness of readers. The pen generally pleads its own case against the purse, and tells a doleful story of selfish publishers and the capricious public, who bear the purse; but the purse, in the grave silence of its closed mouth, carries a weighty meaning, and could evidently speak for itself most emphatically, if it only had motive enough to open its lips. Genius, indeed, will force open its lips; and any writer who can charm the public by his pathos or humor, or command them by his wisdom or eloquence, is sure of a golden harvest; but such genius is very rare, and it must be confessed that the greater number of writers feel somewhat bitterly the restrictions of the purse, and great as may be the number of books that are proscribed because offensive to the ruling powers, the number is far greater of those that never see the light because of not sufficient interest to find a publisher.

We have been somewhat accustomed to this strain of thought, and it has been one of the standing complaints of writers with us, as every where, that they are poorly paid, and sadly compelled to wait upon the humors of patrons. But in our day and country the pen has not yet been seriously called to measure its strength with the sword, and the present crisis is important as opening the lists for the encounter. We have been led for years by politicians and editors, and the nation has looked to newspaper articles and reports of speeches for political knowledge and training. Thus parties have been formed, candidates chosen, and elections held. Indeed it seems to be supposed by many persons that the talking and writing faculty is the sovereign power; and the glib speaker or writer, if he contrives not to run his head against the solid business interests of the country, is sure to carry the day against all opponents. We read, indeed, of a censorship of the press in the Old World; but mourn and marvel at the cowardice of the people that allows its journals to be overawed by the police, and rejoice that America has no Louis

Napoleon to silence the whole host of editors by his word. We do not look for any such dictatorship here, but we are convinced that public opinion with us is soon to undergo a great revolution in its estimate of its usual organs and leaders. We are to revise our free-and-easy methods of talking and writing, and see as never before the difference between doing things on paper and doing them in solid fact, or between the heroism that brandishes the pen and that which wields the sword.

We believe that we have made and are making very serious mistakes in our estimate of the human faculties, from the predominance of the talking and writing gifts and habits over active courage and energy. We have estimated ourselves more by our opinions and fancies than by our powers and deeds. We have had great success in business, and the population and wealth of the nation have been marvelously increased, and given us roseate visions of the future. We are tempted to write and speak as if we had done these great things by our self-sacrifice and daring; and often the very men who have floated upon the tide of prosperity are led to believe that they control its stream, and to talk of things to come as in like manner subject to their word. The mistake, enormous as it often is, may be readily accounted for, and comes from the very nature of the human faculties. We are apt to confound literary ability with practical force, by overlooking the difference between the taste and intellect that criticise affairs and men, and the courage and force that actually command them. We forget that the mind, like the body, has two sets of nerves—the one sensitive, the other muscular—and sometimes the sensitive and perceptive intellect may be highly cultivated while the muscular will is neglected. This distinction may be obviously illustrated by comparing the very looks and habits of a sedentary author with an active worker; or, if you please, compare the writer with the soldier. Certainly no muscular force is needed to hold the pen, and he is the readiest writer who is most susceptible to impressions, and best able, by his quick perception, to give most readily his views of what he sees and hears. His temperament and constitution, like his pages, are apt to smell of the lamp, and the pale cast of thought is likely to be upon mind and body alike. He becomes sometimes little more than a susceptible medium through which impressions and ideas flow, with about as little modification from his personal will as the ink undergoes in flowing from his pen to the paper. Now, take such a man and put him through the drill with sword or musket, and straightway what a new set of faculties come into play as he grasps the solid weapon with his earnest hand, and drops the pen from his tremulous fingers! He finds out now not only that he has muscles as well as nerves, but that he has a kind of mental muscle that he before knew little of; and that, with the flow of animal spirits toward the hand, there goes forth also a force of will, an energy of mind, very different from the sensitive delicacy that had before seemed to him the most desirable quality and the truest mark of culture. He looks upon the complexions and studies the habits of his new companions of the camp, and he is sure to find some most wholesome points of superiority in the men of the sword over the usual type of the men of the pen. He sees that they are not only more robust, but more elastic and energetic; and that, while he may be more marked by nervous delicacy, they abound more in nervous force—or, in other words, that if life centres most within him in the organs of sensation and perception, it centres in them most in the nerves of volition and activity. With him the tide mainly sets in from nature to the brain, while with them it sets in rather from the brain to nature; and the hand not so much is trained to record impressions as to make them, by bringing the stout will directly to bear upon the solid world.

There is indeed a courage of the pen as well as of the sword, and some men there are, like Luther, whose words are battles; but such men have had more than a merely literary schooling, and have learned heroism amidst the storms of revolution and the perils of the camp and the court. It may be said of writers as a class that they are lacking in active force and commanding will, and that their ideas are likely to be partial or erroneous from being busied more with the speculative than the actual side of life, and from recording rather the impressions which they have received from life by their quick perception than the impressions which they have made by their strong hand. We have suffered much from being under such imperfect counselors, and the whole country, so often and so greatly deceived by fluent and presuming paragraphists, is crying out for a more reliable class of guides. The men who are now answering the call are not those who have been most frequently heard of at our caucuses and in our newspapers. We are sick of talking oracles, and we want practical oracles who shall tell us what to do and help us to do it, instead of showing us how to think and feel and dream. We have certainly been sadly deceived by the most conspicuous pens of the country; and they who are too honest to vent falsehoods have not been so wise as to see actual dangers and point out the solemn truth. We confess to a feeling of disappointment at the whole body of popular talkers and writers; and what we want more than any thing now is not men of words but of deeds. It has been hard to keep the talking mania from intruding itself into the field where deeper thunder ought to be heard; and we own to having some feelings not wholly of chagrin on learning that a check had been put upon newspaper gossip, and the telegraph was not to be permitted to blab the secrets or supposed secrets of the war to the curious world of readers.

It is evident that a certain style of mind belongs to the sword which is needed to check the sensitiveness and speculativeness of the pen. Our writers need to have their ideas turn more on the practical point which the soldier is bound to see, and upon the practical energy which he is trained to seek. The military mind is thus a necessary balance and finish to the literary mind; and the true virtue is lacking to us until we learn to dare and do as well as to criticise and scheme. True indeed that the sword is not the only implement of force, and men may be brave with the axe and plow and helm. It is none the less true, however, that all great strifes must be tested at last by war, and nothing so brings out courage and energy as the battle-field and its discipline. Its force has, indeed, been called material and without spiritual ideas and inspiration, and it has been a standing argument for the pen against the sword that the former deals with things spiritual, the latter with things material. Channing has virtually taken this view in his famous article on Napoleon; but we do not think his position wholly sound, however justifiable in his strictures upon the great Corsican. The sword, like the pen, carries with it whatever is in the man who wields it; and a battle, like a book, has most of its character from the spirit of the man who makes it. Napoleon himself wrote out the ideas of his time with the point of his sword, and the new age for France was spoken out more mightily at Marengo and Austerlitz than in the Parliaments of France or Institutes of Paris. To say nothing of the opinions which move great generals to their career, and are defended by their arms, we must remember that there is one kind of inspiration in which the great soldier abounds, and which is generally left out of sight by our superficial metaphysicians. The will has its afflatus as well as the intellect, and brave battle is as much an inspiration as is a true poem. Holy writ is full of illustrations of this fact, and the valor of David and his brother champions of the faith and empire was as impassioned and inspired as his Psalms. Even the great muscular hero, Samson, was inwardly moved, and was comparatively feeble when the afflatus was not upon him. But we need not recur to ancient precedent or sacred records to prove what we all ought to know, that courage is as much under inspiration as intellect or imagination, and a brave soldier is as mysteriously moved from within as a great poet. Our modes of education will be wiser when we learn this truth, and give the active will something of the same life and fire which we now claim for the reason and the fancy. What is this but saying that we want more spirit in our deeds, and that we suffer much because we have allowed our spirit to strike to the brain and nerves in mere talk or meditation, and have not trained it to flow forth in earnest action? We are all feeling this difference now; and, weary of the vain excitement in which we have been so long kept by the fevered press of the country, we are asking for a more wholesome stimulus, and looking for more practical and strengthening leaders.

It may, indeed, be said that, as the highest power is in the mind, and the world is ruled by thought, we are to look to the literary class for the governing force, and that an editor or orator may show the highest active qualities by his pen or voice. We allow that there is a virtue of the pen and the voice, and that the best eloquence has a heroic quality in its fire. But it is such mainly when it is militant in its tone, and thus borrows the very function of the sword, and not dwelling merely with ideas or sentiments, deals directly with man and nature, and strikes blows as in actual battle. In fact, the great orator is half a soldier, and needs only physical hardihood to enable him to marshal men as he marshals principles, characters, and arguments into the field; and it is not a casual coincidence that a Julius Caesar was as strong in the field as in the Senate, and that Napoleon could write sentences that were as heroic as his sword. The training of the practical orator, as distinguished from that of the mere rhetorician, brings him into direct contact with reality, and saves him from the mere intellectualism and sentimentality too common with the writing and talking class. He fights not as one that beateth the air, but who knows how to hit the mark.

Here the second great distinction between the sword and the pen opens upon us. We have seen that writing is apt to quicken the taste and intellect without adding much of the force to the active powers of the will and the hand, such as the sword most calls out. We now remark that writing bears more directly upon the opinions than upon the conduct of men, and thus differs from warfare in its object, as we have heretofore seen it to differ in its spirit. The author is sometimes said, indeed, to deal with mind and the soldier with matter; but this is not a fair distinction, since the whole material world is the constant theme of the scientific and poetical and economical pen; and, moreover, the valor of the soldier marvelously inspires poetry and eloquence, and moves popular enthusiasm. The truth is, that the author deals with the mind mainly in its ideas and tastes, while the soldier deals more with its purposes and acts. A battle is called by eminence an action; and there is nothing which probably concentrates so much force of will within the same time, or more controls the conduct and institutions of men. Nor does the effect end with the deed, for valor in the field carries its force and its glory into social and international life, and a brave people have a commanding power over their age and give great force to their ideas and usages. We, of course, can not say that the sword can make converts to religion, for the true religion is not of this world; yet no missionary can be successful without possessing qualities essentially militant, such as would have power in any camp; and nothing is clearer than that the nations who have been converted by such heroes, when they have opportunity to show their pluck in the field, prove by their conduct that the sword of the spirit does not enfeeble the more carnal weapon, and Christians are never cowards.

We, as a nation, are learning now as never before the difference between opinions and actions, as we put to the practical test the large amount of political speculation and paper warfare that has been set before us by the press. Our editors have led us to suppose that the issue of the contest was wholly in the field of opinion, and the important point to be considered was what is to be thought upon a certain controverted question. The substantial and undisputed foundations of government were left unnoticed, and the whole emphasis was given to a matter of opinion as to the future of our territories, or the controverted relations of sections. They comparatively ignored the question that a military man asks at once, What is to be done; and what are the qualities most likely to do it? The lords of the pen—who had been shedding so much ink for years, and forgotten that there is a more costly liquid than their wordy strifes may cause to be shed—seem to have supposed that there was no sterner implement than that which they pass so glibly over the willing paper; and if they thought at all of stirring hot blood, they comforted themselves with assurance of their ability to change their ground at pleasure, and say or unsay what they please. A military training compels a man to begin with the other side of the matter, and think, not of ideas and schemes, but of actual men and things. If he is asked what is the course to be pursued with a new territory or with an enslaved people, he will consider what can be done, well aware that after the opinion or abstraction goes forth the land or the race stands just as it was before, unless some actual measures can be taken to change it for the better.

If we are dealing with a class of men, whether masters or servants, who are not habitual readers of our newspapers, but subject to instincts and circumstances more potent, the point to be decided is what these people actually are, what will they do, and what can be done with them? As the pen has made a great mistake in its estimate, it must now look to the sword for rectification; and we are studying anew the temper and prospects of our nation in the school of stern reality, under the schooling of the sword. We are finding much that is discouraging and much that is cheering. We are seeing that we have been sadly deceived by hordes of politicians, who have been seeking to feather their nests in the name of universal philanthropy, and cliques of theorists who have passed off upon us their empty speculations for solid wisdom. We have learned that mighty as is talk, it is not almighty; and great as is the pen, it can not save us from the sword—and, in fact, now appeals to the sword to save its schemes from contempt and its liberties from destruction. We have learned that whatever men may think about the nation, thinking is not acting; and stubborn facts look us sternly in the face, in spite of all our attempts to theorize them away.

We are learning the superficiality of much that has passed under the name of education, and seeing to our shame that mere learning is not of itself vital power, and that the memory may be crammed while the judgment is impoverished, and the tongue may be swift while the will is languid and the hand and foot are feeble. Comparing our power with that of our sturdy fathers, who fought and labored before this age of print and talk had begun, we find ourselves not wholly flattered by the parallel; and we must confess that our energy does not keep pace with our knowledge, and we do not do as well and as much as we know. We evidently need to consider, in a more practical way, not only the matter but the manner of our duty—not only what is to be done, but how we are to do it; and in both respects the new generation may learn much from the discipline of the camp and the logic of the sword. We have not only mistaken the loose leaves of changing opinion for the substance of truth, and failed to test every declaration by practice, but we have too often taken it for granted that every man is not only to think for himself in the most conceited individualism, but we have carried individualism into action, and set up self-will in the place of civil and social and religious allegiance. The idea of authority has been made light of, and it is undoubtedly true that thousands of our restless young men have lately learned, for the first time in their lives, from the discipline of the camp, that some orders are to be obeyed other than those which each man issues by right of the autocrat within his own soul. It may be that Providence, in pity on us for the decline of the spirit of rightful obedience, is teaching it to us in the mightiest, certainly in the most imperious of schools; and the hosts who have had their conceit so fearfully pampered by being treated as dictators on all subjects by the dashing journalists and declaimers of the day, find the nonsense taken out of them, in a wonderful way, by a few days' drill and a few weeks of genuine campaigning under officers who must be obeyed.

We are taking useful lessons in the philosophy of organization, and learning that it is not the height of wisdom or of power for every man to do what is pleasing in his own eyes. The authority of the camp is not only putting a wholesome check to the license of the press, but curbing the restive temper of a people who have been too ready to believe that each man is an independent sovereignty, and may secede at will from the body politic and social. So we are to study anew the science and the art of society, and the order of the sword is interpreting to us as never before the wisdom and the power of due organization. The pen, indeed, has its own power, gathering its staff of editors about the editor-in-chief, and relying upon the support of a corps of readers, numbering, sometimes, hundreds of thousands. But the nation and the world would fare ill if there were no stronger organizations, and all associate activity were to rest upon a basis as vague and vacillating as items and articles, and a companionship as loose and shifting as that of the readers of newspapers and sensation novels. We are probably to suffer some bitter disappointments from our want of organic discipline, and we must expect the magnificence of our egotistic musings and schemings to be pretty roughly rebuked when we call the powers of combination into play, urge a central authority which we have never truly acknowledged, and are called to an obedience that we have never cherished. Ideas, aspirations, impulses, we may abound in, and we are surely not wanting, as a people, in the stuff that heroes are made of; but how shall these materials be worked into shape and brought to bear together upon the true point? This is the great question that concerns the future of the nation. We have, indeed, a certain kind of organization in business, and every great business establishment is a kingdom or an army in miniature; but the authority and the obedience rest mainly upon the purse, and is binding during mutual profit or pleasure, and does not rest upon the allegiance that the country claims from its citizens, and which the sword urges with a logic quite its own. Moreover, we must remember that with us the greater portion of the organizing practical mind of our people has been withdrawn from the public service by hope of private gain, and that our strongest men do not crowd into politics, or into the army and navy. Our ready talkers and writers have had things very much their own way, and from lack of leaders who feel and impress upon others the sense of loyalty, and carry with them the force of personal authority, we have suffered much, and perhaps may take wholesome lessons in these respects from neighbors who are otherwise our inferiors. Certainly our public personages have not mastered the great art of governing men by dignity of character and obedience to constitutional authority; and statesmanship needs among us some of the ruling qualities that the camp tends to foster, especially the quality that commands well because it serves faithfully, and serves faithfully that it may command well.

We confess that we anticipate much good to our people from the rise of a superior class of military men, who shall give our people something of the spirit that shall strengthen our thinking by manly energy, and make the conduct more than opinion the object of interest. Common as it is to dread military despotism, we are more afraid of the despotism of the pen and the stump, quite sure that a true soldier who knows what men are, and who understands the difficulty of governing well, will not be likely to mistake words for things, and to venture upon mad schemes that time and experience will be sure to bring to naught and the schemers too. We do not say that our rulers should be soldiers, although we believe that the best sovereigns, even of the late ages, have been military men; and the two presidents whose administration has left the strongest mark upon our country learned strength and order in the camp and field, and by a brave will knew how to deal with the talkers and scribblers who are always insisting that they ought to hold the reins of the Government. We are not afraid of what a great soldier will do to our people, but we do fear much from what the prating demagogues will do by using the prestige of some available soldier of fortune to cloak their schemes and to favor their intrigues; and it may be that such men will be again placed at the head of affairs, and again saved from failure by being killed by squadrons of office-seekers more formidable than armed brigades. But the soldiers we need to invigorate the nation, to teach our writers how to add valor to intelligence and give reality to speculation. The pen does enough to honor the sword to claim some substantial return, and we advise the authors, lecturers, editors, and even the preachers of the land to study carefully the ways of the camp and the field, and take home with them to their inkstand the lessons that they learn. If they do this, we have no fear that the pen will be destroyed or supplanted by the sword, but are sure that it will have a finer point, a freer flow, a more luminous perception and positive power.

Editor's Easy Chair.

IT is a pity when an author is too sensitive to criticism, or rather to the remarks which are publicly made upon his character and talents, because in this day of entire freedom and facility of talk by types, every body can find the opportunity of saying just what he likes of every body else.

There are, indeed—and every man who is likely to be mentioned in print, ought to bear it in mind—two kinds of criticism. One is criticism, and the other is not. The painful, puerile, and pitiful personal gossip about famous people which is circulated in newspapers is one of the penalties of reputation. And it is of several kinds. It may, for instance, be the kind of talk in which Mr. Somebody indulged about Thackeray, two or three years ago, in Town Talk; or it may be the tone of the Saturday Review toward the same gentleman; or it may be the comment upon Mr. Dickens's private history; or, still again, the assaults upon personal character which greeted Mr. Buckle's "History of Civilization."

The London Saturday Review, for instance, is perpetually lecturing Mr. Thackeray upon not being a gentleman. It sneers and girds and gibes at him. It makes faces, so to say, at a charming and beneficent and sagacious satirist. But the spectacle is so old, of anonymous mediocrity carping at genius, that the talk provokes no feeling of any kind, and would naturally run along the gutter and disappear with the other slops of the week, except that the object of it gives it importance by considering it and by being evidently wounded by it. In his pleasant Roundabout Papers the author can not help an occasional "pish," at the Superfine Review, as he calls it.

But he ought to remember that when he consented to go into print he agreed to go into the pillory of personal remark. As a man of the world, it is a pity that he could not bear it with equanimity. For the only rule of comfort is to hold your tongue. Don't defend yourself. Let them lay on as they will. But do you take good care never to cry hold, enough. What savages want is an expression of pain. They may crucify you and tear your heart out piecemeal, but if you can only contrive to smile through it all, they are balked and disappointed.

It is advice easy to give and hard to follow, Don't defend yourself; but it is the part of wisdom. If you are a general, and newspaper critics call you to account, aspersing your motives, your character, your sagacity, don't defend yourself. Leave that to the great advocate, Time.

If you are a statesman, and obliged, as great men have sometimes felt themselves to be, to appear to be a traitor to the great cause in order more effectually to serve it, don't defend yourself, nor explain, nor exculpate. Whoever works for the welfare of mankind must consent to be misunderstood, derided, and crucified. Honesty and wisdom justify themselves at last; but if you contemplate them suspiciously at any particular moment they may seem to be far enough from honest or wise.

So if you are an author, understand that you must be slandered and pecked at, like all the rest; but, above all things, don't defend yourself. Don't be an author unless you can hold your tongue and smile, whatever is said about you and your works and ways. Dickens defended "Little Dorrit" most successfully in the Household Words, but it was a great mistake. Somebody said that he had no plot in the story, that he wrote at hap-hazard, and took his striking points out of the newspapers—citing in illustration the spontaneous combustion in "Bleak House," and the fall of Mrs. Clennam's old house in "Little Dorrit." Dickens wrote a capital reply. It bristled with sharp wit. It stung the accuser through and through; and left him not only utterly discomfited but utterly ridiculous.

Still it had been better not to do it. Every body knew that the assailant was only one person. He roared through the loud-resounding speaking-trumpet of a review, but it was only one small voice; and what that voice said was, of course, assumed; for it was not stated as knowledge. Now the assumption was based upon the story itself; and therefore it was the story that would finally settle the question. If that evidently justified the assumption, the word of the author could not possibly withstand that impression. If it did not justify it, the criticism was of no importance, and would presently show itself to be so by the blank oblivion into which it fell. But the flash of the author's blade as he strikes a man of straw to the heart reveals forever that there was a man of straw to strike.

Besides, the very defense suggests a sense of injury upon the author's part, which carries with it an unpleasant feeling of weakness and nervousness. We do not want to feel that a man like Dickens can be so seriously hurt by such feeble blows, or by unfriendly blows of any kind. We want him to feel so secure in the love and sympathy of readers that he shall only smile at the thrusts of critics. It makes us jealous that he does not confide in us if he defends himself. What man wants his brother to prove to him that he did not tell a lie?

And if you begin to defend yourself there is no end. What is to prevent Mr. Anonymous from wagging his wise head in a newspaper or magazine, and declaring that there really seems to be no evidence that Mr. Du Chaillu has traveled in Africa? He has certainly written a very agreeable book; but then, and then, and then, and so forth.

Now shall Mr. Du Chaillu defend himself? Shall he indignantly, or sorrowfully, or brilliantly, or sarcastically show that he has been in Africa? When Mr. Kinglake published "Eöthen," it was quite a popular theory that he had made up the work from travels that he had performed in his London library, not in the East. Was it for Mr. Kinglake to prove that he had actually been to "historic Belgrade?"

Or, to take another class of writers like John Stuart Mill, Buckle, and the authors of the Essays and Reviews—they do not escape the same general kind of treatment, but why should they undertake to defend themselves? They are men who, in the fear of God and the love of man, have sought to understand the method of Nature—in other words, the way in which God governs the world—and they frequently explain that method differently from the current interpretation. And how they catch it! Splash comes that infinitely stagnant twaddle about infidelity and atheism which has been immemorably squirted upon every individual honest thought which differs from the general honest thought, or, more truly speaking, unquestioning assent and want of thought.

Shall these men, more than the others, betake themselves to self-defense? Clearly not; for the appeal of every man who writes is not to the next newspaper, whether it calls itself a sacred or a secular paper. It is to the collective conscience and common sense of mankind. That tribunal judges him, and he can not escape its verdict. Whether he defends or explains, or is smart or is bitter, that terrible tribunal finally determines his case without appeal. If Mr. Thackeray is no gentleman, if Mr. Dickens can not construct a plot, if Du Chaillu never went to Africa, if Dr. Temple is a corrupter of the human mind, they can not escape the final publication of those facts, any more than worthy old Samuel Richardson can set aside the verdict of bore, or Mrs. Aphra Behn of foul.

FOURTEEN years ago this Easy Chair was sitting one day in his cool room in Florence—cool, although it was Italy and summer. A knock at the door was followed by the brisk entrance of one of the few men in Europe that Mr. Easy Chair then cared to see—Robert Browning. How delightful the hour that followed was, those at once know who know Robert Browning. It ended with a promise of meeting at Browning's tea-table that evening.

In the evening the same alert, robust, thoroughly English-looking man presented to his wife one of the thousand young Americans who had read with eager enthusiasm her then recently-published volumes, which had a more general and hearty welcome in the United States than any English poet since the time of Byron and Company, who were the poets of our fathers.

The visitor saw, seated at the tea-table in the great room of the palace in which they were living, a very small, very slight woman, with very long curls drooping forward, almost across the eyes, hanging to the bosom, and quite concealing the pale, small face, from which the piercing, inquiring eyes looked out sensitively at the stranger. Rising from her chair she put out cordially the thin, white hand of an invalid, and in a few moments they were pleasantly chatting, while the husband strode up and down the room, joining in the conversation with a vigor, humor, eagerness, and affluence of curious lore which, with his trenchant thought and subtle sympathy, make him one of the most charming and inspiring of companions.

A few days after the same party, with one or two more, went to Vallombrosa, where they passed two days. Mrs. Browning was still too much of an invalid to walk, but we sat under the great trees upon the lawn-like hill-sides near the convent, or in the seats in the dusky convent-chapel, while Robert Browning at the organ chased a fugue of Master Hugues, of Saxe-Gotha, or dreamed out upon twilight keys a faint-throbbing toccata of Galuppi's.

In all her conversation, so mild and tender and womanly, so true and intense and rich with rare learning, there was a girl-like simplicity and sensitiveness and a womanly earnestness that took the heart captive. She was deeply and most intelligently interested in America and Americans, and felt a kind of enthusiastic gratitude to them for their generous fondness of her poetry.

She had then been married not a year, and since then she has lived almost exclusively in Italy. Few Italians, and certainly no foreigner, are so saturated with the very spirit of Italy as her husband; and few Italians and no foreigner have been more enthusiastically devoted than she to the political regeneration of that country. Her poems within a few years have been almost exclusively inspired by her Italian political sympathies, and have insensibly been much moulded in their expression by the style of her husband.

Without question or delay Elizabeth Barrett Browning must be counted among the chief English poets of this century, and unquestionably the first English poet of her sex. And her memorable excellence will be that she was not only a singer but a hearty, active worker in her way, understanding her time, and trying, as she could, to help it. It is a curious juxtaposition, that of "Don Juan" and "Aurora Leigh," and yet they are related in this that they are the two great poems of modern English social life as felt by a man of the world and a religious woman, who were both poets. On the other hand, the literature of love has had few additions since the Vita Nuova, the sonnets of Shakespeare, and of Petrarch (if you like him), so true and sweet and subtle as Mrs. Browning's "Sonnets from the Portuguese." And were they not repaid by the "One word more," the last poem in Browning's last volume?

Her public fame will make her widely mentioned. Literature mourns a loss. But the private grief to the many who loved her is a deeper pang. Her death changes Italy and Europe to how many! If you would know what she was, read Browning's "One word more." He made no secret of it; why should another?

"This I say of me, but think of you, Love!
This to you, yourself my moon of poets!
Ah! but that's the world's side—there's the wonder—
Thus they see you, praise you, think they know you,
There, in turn, I stand with them and praise you,
Out of my own self I dare to phrase it.
But the best is when I glide from out them,
Cross a step or two of dubious twilight,
Come out on the other side, the novel
Silent silver lights and darks undreamed of,
Where I hush and bless myself with silence."

In the midst of the great war the great city has very much its usual aspect. Although it is mid-summer the streets are thronged, buildings are going up in Broadway and elsewhere, the theatres are open, the cafés are crowded, and there is an unusual sobriety and peace.

Yet hearts enough are strained Southward to the seat of war. Newspapers, never so little profitable, were never in so great demand. The street corners, at which their offices usually are, are surrounded by eager people, and a few brief words at noon or night are the kernel of the abundant fullness of news which the morning papers bring.

It is a good thing that we have been brought face to face with war. From some of us it has snatched dear and noble friends; in some sad homes it has planted the rue of bitter memory, but those are the people and the homes which have earned the right to say that it is well we have been confronted with war.

For it has taught us our willingness to make the last sacrifices for principles which we really value. It has shown us our readiness to give fortune and life to preserve the system upon which alone, as we believe, fortune and life can be made secure. Had our prosperity so weakened us that we should succumb to violence? That was the painful doubt that rankled in thoughtful breasts. It is solved now. War has taught us the answer. War is itself the answer.

Peace is beloved of God and desired by good men. But every man should remember that quiet is not peace. Peace is an active, positive condition, not a negative surrender or endurance. It is life, not death. The child healthfully sleeping is the image of peace, not the dead child in his coffin. And to secure that peace of health what sharp treatment, what bitter anguish, may not be necessary!

Which was the peace-maker, Cicero or Catiline? How much we forgive to Cicero—his vanity, his inconstancy, his cold sarcasm, his selfishness—for the sake of the incisive clearness with which he pierced the sophistry of those who sought to be tyrants of the people under the pretense of serving them! When P. Servilius Rullius proposed to supply the poorer citizens in Italy with land, by naming a commission of ten persons who should have power to sell the national property in all parts of the empire and with the proceeds buy lands in Italy and settle them upon Roman citizens, he did something which might be supposed so pleasing to the populace of Rome that nobody would dare to resist it. But the details of the law were such as to make the ten commissioners virtually masters of the empire, and Cicero so plainly proved it to the people that they willingly relinquished the largess to preserve their liberty.

So throughout the whole conspiracy of Catiline, was Cicero opposed to peace because he most pertinaciously pursued and finally exposed the plans of the traitors? He knew that rich people and noble people were implicated. He knew that Antony, his colleague in the consulate, and Julius Cæsar, one of the great senators, were probably not unfavorable to the conspiracy—ought he to have preserved the peace by blinking the danger and smoothing things over? He pushed on, and driving Catiline from Rome to take up arms, he secured the execution of the chief conspirators in the city. Did he inaugurate civil war?

Had he done less, or otherwise, could he have been justly hailed, as he was by the tearful, ardent acclamation of Rome, Father of his Country?

—It is mid-summer, and the voice of Commencements is heard in the land. We may therefore not untimely indulge these classical reminiscences, and turn the studies that we have all more or less pursued to some practical account. "Cicero, the peace-maker," might have been a good theme for some young orator of the season:

"O'er whose slight figure lightly floated down
In graceful folds the academic gown."

But, young orator, shadowed with early bays, do not forget that history did not end with Rome, nor human nature with Cicero and Catiline.

In the warm summer days there are plenty of cool and tranquil nooks to be found in the streets of the city as well as out of it in the woods and by the streams. One in particular I have in mind. You will not hear the exquisite gurgle of the wood-thrush, but you may hear George Herbert; nor the sumptuous nightingale, but you may listen to Milton;

nor the heaven-soaring lark, but you may hearken Dan Chaucer; nor will you hear the multitudinous murmur of all the birds near and far, but you may catch the song of all the poets of all times.

And if, in that calm nook, in meditative meads you may not stray, you may muse upon the broad expanse of my Lord of Verulam; the fair and copious reaches of James Harrington's Oceana; the soberer shades of Algernon Sydney; or in the trim paddocks of Clarendon and Burnet. Or in that still retreat from the fierce sun and news of fiercer war, Fielding shall jest with you, and John Boccaccio wile the languid hours, or John Bunyan shall frown the Italian John away.

And if, in the passionless seclusion of this nook, we might reason with the immortal tinker who wrote the Sunday Robinson Crusoe, might we not say for the Southern John, that his sweet simplicity and wit are greater than his license, and that even his indecency has the artlessness of Robin Goodfellow? Ah, saintly John of Bedford jail, the mind that finds no difference between Paul de Kock and Giovanni Boccaccio would see none between Charles Second's Duchess of Cleveland and the sea-born Venus.

Where is this nook? Well, it is not one but many. It is one of a system of placid coves, of sheltered bays, that open suddenly out of the stony and brick shore of the streets. It is a land-bound harbor along which the lotus grows. You drift in, and you dream the day away. There are other spectres there, but few and silent. They glimmer about with upraised eyes or heads bent over. Is it for stars they look, or pearls? Shakespeare or Vaughan?

Is it still a riddle?

Sailor of the street, it is a second-hand book-store.

REVEREND Bishops have a kindly habit of issuing pastoral letters, in which, doubtless—for Mr. Easy Chair has never read one—much spiritual assistance is bestowed upon those who do read them. The rescripts come, from time to time, probably pointing out the path of duty, and supplying scrip and staff, as it were, to walk therein.

It has occurred to Mr. Easy Chair that, in humble and distant imitation of so good and venerable a custom, he might occasionally issue a few words of advice and consolation for the benefit of those who not yet having entered the somewhat narrow and difficult way of magazine writing, would most gladly enter thereat, and do contemplate with wistful eyes those that gayly walk therein.

He is so constantly receiving private letters of inquiry, and is really, and without banter, made aware of so much honest desire and wishful talent, that it will not be thought impertinent if he makes a few suggestions.

In the first place, dearly beloved fellow-authors—for such you are, whether or not your works come to the press or the public—magazine writing, unlike kissing, does not go by favor. The editor is a person who has (ideally) a clear perception of what he likes as an individual, and also of what the public likes. When he has determined whether he edits his magazine for himself or the public, he has done his first duty. If for himself, he will please himself in every way he can. If for the public, he will try first of all to please them.

Now a reputable magazine is published by merchants who believe that they can help themselves by innocently gratifying the public. The view themselves-ward probably precedes the other. In other words, very few of the sinners who live upon this planet and are called men, by way of briefly expressing all sins in a monosyllable (see the pastoral letters aforesaid), publish magazines or transact any other kind of business for the benefit of other people exclusively. The condition, therefore, of the particular business of magazine-publishing is that the more the public is pleased the larger is the profit of the merchant.

But the public has nothing to do with the private affections of the purveyor of that mental food which, when properly served for consumption, constitutes the literary feast called a magazine. Consequently he does not serve this or that dish because his friend Tom or his cousin Matilda cooked it.

When the mighty chef de cuisine littéraire, who is known to us as editor, begins his great duty of composing the monthly menu, or bill of fare, he writes down the rarest, richest, choicest meats and morsels he has in his larder or can find in the market. If his dearest bosom friend, Thomas, brings him a tough drum-stick of turkey-buzzard which he has deviled, and a total stranger offers him the tenderest of delicate ortolans, do you think he hesitates between the two? Not at all, brethren, not at all. He says to his friend, "Tom, you know that I love you; but the public, for whom I have promised to provide a dinner, does not like deviled tough turkey-buzzard drum-sticks; while I know that it has a wonderful weakness for tender ortolans, with delicate bread-sauce—so you see that I have no choice." And the honest purveyor keeps faith with the public, and loves his friend just as dearly as he did before.

The thing to do, then, dear brethren, is evidently to offer your commodity, not yourself, to the cook. A magazine is a peculiar feast. You must bear that in mind always. You must consider the fitness to the purpose of the article you offer. Why be disappointed if your barbecued ox is not found appropriate for a déjeuner à la fourchette? If you chance to have a paté de foie gras about you—à la bonne heure! That is to say, all right. If you do have it, send it at once; and be perfectly sure that it will be accepted. But if it is not—if it is returned to you—look again. See if it really be a paté, or something else—possibly eel-pie, for instance.

And you may be very sure that every thing sent is fairly considered. Every hamper is carefully opened, whether the writing of the address be recognized or not. And for the very simple reason that experience has taught the chef that his choicest morsels are quite likely to arrive from entirely unexpected points. Then, too, if you were in the kitchen you would know that a great deal of game is sent in by famous shots which is laid aside as not quite up to the mark. A crow brought down by Berdan even, would not be preferred, by a chef fit for his place, to a pheasant snared by an unknown bungler unworthy to be the least in the rifle-corps.

Finally, then, brethren, do your best. Send the result confidently to the cook. If he thinks it succulent and seasonable, he will take it, pay you for it, and serve it up at his table. If he does not like it, he will not use it because he likes you, or because it is sent to him by one person rather than another. Would you, the most sensitive and honorable of persons, pay your friend the price of sound woollens for damaged blankets? Would you buy orange-trees of him when you wanted cauliflowers? You may wish to help him; and you may, indeed, take his blankets and orange-trees, and give him money.

But it is alms, and not a bargain. And when you have his merchandise you will not use it, because it would injure your own trade.

The word is, Try. Try, and send. Don't plead youth and inexperience. If they have spoiled your work trust the chef, the editor, to discover it. There must be a first time; there must be a first success. To begin with doubt is wise; but to begin with despair is deserved failure.

It is true, as you will say, that your works may be a hundred-fold better than those which succeed; that you are shod with beauty and grace to walk where the awkward squad is strolling, and yet where you can not reach. Well, it is not your fault; and if it be that of the gate-keeper, he will soon be seen to be unworthy his post. Do you believe much in the mute Miltons, brethren? Is not Milton Milton because he can sing, and will be heard? If he neither sings nor is heard, can he be Milton? Not to feel poetry, but to sing it, is Miltonic. If you are singing your song will be heard; and if Diogenes scorns your picture, Pericles will crown you for it.

THE Fourth of July this year was a very solemn and touching festival. The London Times said that it was very natural the Americans in England should hesitate about celebrating it, because it was like celebrating the wedding-day of a divorced couple. No, no; not so. It was like keeping the union day of

"Friends long parted Grown single-hearted."

It is, as Dr. McClinton said, the beginning of a heartier understanding than ever before.

For one great cause of our difficulties is ignorance. There has been in one part of the country the foulest and saddest misrepresentation of the other. Nothing has been too wild for assertion and belief. Take, for instance, the proclamation of General Beauregard. "Beauty and booty is the motto of the enemy!" he cried. And yet his wife was willingly within the lines of the enemy at the time. "No, my dear friend," wrote one lady in Massachusetts to another in South Carolina, "we have not become griffins in a day."

The inevitable result of the war must be to remove much of this misunderstanding. When it is over, certain things will have been demonstrated so forcibly that they will never again be questioned. It will be found that personal valor is not the peculiar praise of any section of the country; and that those who love peace so truly value it that they will gladly give all, and fight to the last, to secure the conditions upon which alone peace is possible. That once proved, and peace will be a hundred-fold surer. No people can long be at peace with another that despises it; and it is often only by war that the contempt can be extinguished.

The Fourth will then always shine hereafter upon a nation that understands itself more truly, and consequently respects itself more. Self-knowledge comes always through sharp discipline, but it is the best and surest knowledge of all. And it is true of nations as of individual men, that he is the wisest who sees how little is what he knows compared with what he can and should know. The freest and happiest nation, measured by the possible freedom and felicity of nations, is, as Newton said of himself, but a child idling upon the shore of the unexplored ocean.

Let our great festival, then, be hereafter a day of gratitude and resolution—a time of self-investigation and renewing. All history lies open to us to read.

Has it been written in vain? Is it only the record of an inexorable fate? Nations have risen, flourished, and fallen. Is the only lesson from that dismal truth the inevitable law that all nations must rise, flourish, and fall forever? Is death the only moral and result of life?

These are our national questions. And if we answer No, there remains the grand and final problem of human politics—how to secure the self-renewing life of a people. And if history does not help us to answer the question, history has been written in vain.

It is very difficult to allow that those who differ from us are as honest as we; but we shall be constantly deceived and defeated in life until we do.

The difficulty is, that we seem to suppose that if we grant a man's honesty we therefore justify his action.

But because Isabella of Spain was sincere, must we justify the Inquisition? It is very conceivable that a man should honestly think there ought to be a community of goods. Is he therefore to be allowed to take the money of other men?

Not at all. Men may honestly think and say what they will; but when they come to action, they necessarily touch other men who are equally honest. And that is the point at which common sense declares that when honest acts conflict they must be determined by the general welfare. You may, for instance, honestly think that you have a right to take my money. But I honestly think you have no right to take it. Why should my honest conviction yield to yours?

Besides, it is perfectly easy to add lying to theft, and for some one who does not honestly believe as you do to say that he does, and to act as if he did.

Society says, therefore, your private convictions, when they proceed to action, must be controlled by the general welfare. To suffer you to gratify your private and sincere persuasion that you have as good a right to Mr. Easy Chair's property as he has would lead to endless confusion; you shall, therefore, be restrained of that gratification.

If you persist notwithstanding all this, you will be properly resisted by society even to the end, and you ought to be. There can be no doubt that many of the old Tories in our Revolution sincerely thought that our war was parricidal, so that they took up arms to crush it. Should the honesty of their conviction prevent our soldiers from firing? Was our conviction any less honest?

We can never assume, in any case, that all the enemy are villains. But we are never to forget that they are the enemy.

THE present difficulty in our affairs has put the newspapers to the proof—not only of their pecuniary ability, but of their essential influence upon our public life and private opinion. The war is a terrible blow to the prosperity of the daily newspapers in common with all other business. The profit of a daily paper does not come from the sale, for the price of the copy scarcely covers the cost of the white paper; but it springs from the advertisements, which, in dull times, decline, and in time of war cease almost entirely.

But they are now quite as severely tested in their essential value. Do they control public opinion, or are they controlled by it? Do they lead or follow? In this country, at least, it is pretty well settled that they follow. The importance of a paper's opinion comes from the tremendous sonority and echo with which it is spoken. If with alarming peals of thunder the words should be roared out, "Twice two are five!" there would be a great many people ready to exclaim, "Good gracious! there must be some truth in what is said in such a tone as that."

But the American reader is generally very independent of his newspaper. He values his own opinion quite as much as that of the editor or anonymous writer in print. He makes his own plans of battle, and his own comments, and he is not convinced that the General, or the Captain, or any officer did right or wrong because his neighbor who writes in the paper thinks one way or the other.

Why then does any body care what the newspaper says? Because it talks so loud. Because it talks so positively. Because it so unwillingly retracts or corrects. Because it so freely asperses motives. Because it believes so easily what will make a sensation. Because it is such an inveterate and vituperative gossip. Because it talks to a hundred thousand people at once.

These are the things that make its immense responsibility, and this is the kind of importance it has.

Of course there is another side. The paper employs, often, by no means always, the best available talent. It secures the comments of sagacity and capacity upon important questions. There are men of genius, honor, and education engaged upon it. Their comments are what the men are. But they do not compose all the paper, and they are apt to become gladiators, or again knights who stand against all comers—not sagacious guides looking for the way.

It is a curious study to look at a newspaper any morning, and reflect how much of what is stated in it as fact will shrivel into fiction before sunset. With the fact goes the comment.

The recent months and their events will teach us all greater caution in believing what is written or reported as news. That it is printed in the newspaper is no longer the credential of a statement; and the more closely we scrutinize the fact, and the more deliberately judge the "improvement" of it, the less bitterness will there be in our minds, and, by necessary reaction, the greater truthfulness and candor in the newspaper.

Our Foreign Bureau.

WHEN, on some September month of a year gone by, we took our readers in company to that charming city which sits upon the shore of the loveliest lake of Switzerland (we mean Lake Lemán, and the city is Geneva), the mountains that we saw across the lake, frowning with shaggy firs or purpled by distance, were Savoyard mountains. And when we left the city to go eastward for only a half day's walk, it was requisite to have the countersign of some official of Sardinia. It seems strange to think that Savoyards and mountains have made sudden slip of their nationality, and are now no longer Sardinian but French; stranger still to find Chamouni itself presided over by the tri-color of France, and the little tobacconist near to the Hôtel du Londres selling snuff under permission of Napoleon the Third! The change has come like a cloud—not altogether a rosy cloud. There was an easy insouciance about the old Sardinian rule, in all that regarded Savoy, under which the far-away mountaineers of such nooks as Chamouni and Orsine managed their own affairs without hindrance, and throve under a Government which governed well, because it governed so little. The Sardinian customs-men and sentinels had the lounging gait of brother peasants, and entered into careless and easy participation in all the local interests of the smallest hamlet. They were not brusque and authoritative; a little royal livery of Savoy was all that marked them for respect. They seemed like lost retainers of a great old house that stood far to the southward, and one almost pitied them for their exile. But now it is different. The French soldier, wherever you meet him, carries with him a certain smack of "La Grande Armée." It is a sharp French bayonet he wears in his belt. His képi is marked into the seventies. He looks wonderingly at the mountains, which are grander than the Jura; he shrugs his shoulders at the bad French speech he hears. Then there is the tattoo of the drum, and the discipline, and system, which stretch uninterruptedly from the headquarters upon the Quai d'Orsay. The Empire asserts itself even in the valley of Chamouni. The villagers who drove their cattle for summer pasturage up the higher slopes of the mountain are now brought into business relations with his Majesty's Commissioners of Forests. The young fir-trees are taken under Imperial protection, and they must be spared though the cattle starve. The poor villagers must bow to the great Imperial system. Of course there are heart-burnings; and a member of the Legislative Assembly from the Department of the High Alps protests that certain mountain districts have been depopulated in consequence. The inhabitants of the Val d'Orsine threaten to migrate in a body.

The Imperial system may be, and doubtless is, one of large national economy; but it operates with blighting force upon the traditional privileges and the humble prosperity of the mountaineers of Savoy. Like the sheep culture inaugurated by the Duke of Sutherland in the Highlands, it may contribute to an increase of the national wealth, but it blasts the hopes and happiness of many a homestead.

The French occupation is making itself felt too over the lines of the Protestant Canton of Geneva. The cafés au billard are multiplying, there is an opera-house, and an almost French Sunday of open shops is grafted upon the City of Calvin.

APROPÓS of this pervading influence of the Imperial Government in the most obscure and secluded provinces, we may mention a recent work by M. Elias Regnault (Pagnerre), which sets forth strongly the demoralizing tendencies of French centralization. The fortifications of Paris, embracing and representing the central power, he makes the line of demarkation within which all is life, energy, plethora; and beyond which is stagnation and decay. The administrative function, bloated by centralization, is absorbing, with prodigious and greedy exhaustive power, all the vitality, whether of municipality or province. The book is earnest, fuller of argument than of facts, and contains eloquent advocacy of a theory of decentralization which, in the case of M. Regnault at least, is inspired by a real love of liberty.

No intelligent man can fail to notice that just at this time, when the Democracy illustrated by De Tocqueville is passing through its crucial trial—when the nationalities of Europe are inquiring their whereabouts, preparatory to some more homogeneous crystallization—theories of government are discussed in all quarters with a new vigor and reach. Upon one central truth—the right of each people to determine its own form and limitations of government—all such discussion, whether monarchic or republican in its animus, converge. There at length the nations (and the nations' monarchs, by degrees) stand fast. That other question—of what breadth, or number, or forces a people must be possessed to assert this autonomical power—still bides. Shall Sicily be bolstered up by liberal men in her occasional incoherent asseverations of a nationality and governing faculty of her own? Shall Hungary wrest it from whomsoever says nay? Shall Transylvania declare disparate aims from Hungary? Shall Poland stand alone? Shall the Dublin Parliament sit and decide for Ireland? Shall Bohemia (as seems likely enough) wake up some day a new kingdom, with its own language and liberty and laws? And if these integers of nations be not allowed, how much blood and money may it possibly be worth to reduce them to ciphers?

Europe is coming to have a host of such questions to settle with progress and the century.

THE Presse, of Paris, has latterly published a memorandum of recent Russian diplomacy, which has attracted a large share of attention, and which is specially worthy of consideration as explaining the coalescing tendencies of the French and Russian dynasties. The memorandum purports to be one drawn up by some of the most distinguished statisticians of Russia, and presented in their name to the Emperor Alexander upon the occasion of the royal interview at Warsaw.

Russia (the document avers) is about entering upon the epoch of her greatest progress; and to strengthen her in her aims, it is essential that she look wisely to the character of her alliances. Only three powers in Europe are worthy of consideration in this connection—Austria, England, and France.

But the power of Austria is only negative. It represents a régime that is old, effete; debts and dismemberment are baffling all its tardy energies. No great idea of nationality holds it together; it is helpless for opposition, or outside interference, and all its vigor is consumed in the desperate effort to conserve its own Government. England, however vigorous and full of strength, is on the eve of a transformation. The old aristocracy and the policy they urge are fast decaying in energy; and power is passing into the hands of another oligarchy which is reared upon a commercial basis, and is represented by the Manchester school. With this power Russia can deal in the future in a commercial spirit. In that time a stringent alliance may be needful and possible; now it is undesirable. England opposes all the special aims of Russia which must be secured, and which are,

“First, Absolute freedom in the Black Sea, on the Danube, and in the Dardanelles; the Carpathians for her southwestern frontiers.

“Second, The independence of her sister populations in race and religion, and the use of her legitimate influence over them.”

To all this France may consent, and France is therefore the natural ally of Russia. Russia can accept without serious cost the twin doctrines of Imperial France—universal suffrage and “the nationalities” (and this is shown by considerable ingenious and artful reasoning).

The summing up we give in the language of the document itself:

“What now would be the favorable consequences of such an alliance! The following: Venetia wrested from Austria, Hungary would soon follow, and the Austrian Empire, which but a short time since considered Italy but as a ‘geographical expression,’ would itself become but a ‘historical expression.’ In the place of Austria we naturally find the kingdom of Austria collecting around itself in a kind of federation the Danubian United States—all the provinces south of the river. Instead of an absolute and perfidious Power, Russia would have an upright and friendly nation for its neighbor, surrounded by free populations, over which national affinities have long secured her a great and legitimate influence. She (Russia) would receive Moldavia, or in any case that portion of Bessarabia which she was deprived of by the treaty of 1856—the absolute freedom of the Danube and the Black Sea and Galicia, which Hungary would hand over to her, would give her the Carpathians for her natural frontier. Lastly, the wishes of the national party in Hungary are already expressed in favor of bestowing the crown on a prince of the Russian family, his Highness the Grand Duke de Leuchtenberg.

“In Greece, also, the violation by the heir of King Otho of the conditions laid down by Russia in the succession question can not but accelerate his fall.

“There also the national choice has fallen on a Russian Prince, and Greece, by the solution of the Eastern question, would extend to the Balkan chain. The Russian empire, increased without conquest, by the addition of the territories necessary for its commerce, its defense, surrounded by three kingdoms of the same race or the same religion, and having free access to the Grecian, Adriatic, and Mediterranean seas, and by the Suez canal the Indian Ocean. Such are for Russia the consequences of an alliance with France.”

The document from which we have taken these particulars, and which professes to show the present leanings of the Court of Russia, is brought forward and indorsed by M. Elias Regnault, the same publicist to whom we have before alluded as deprecating the fatal results of French centralization.

It may be proper to add that the Russian journalists emphatically deny the authenticity and importance of this programme.

THE news from Turkey which has come since our last writing, and which may be reckoned both fatal and hopeful, is the story of the death of the Sultan. Young, for a monarch, amiable more than most monarchs; cultivated and appreciative of all the refinements of European civilization, he yet fell a victim to the barbaric lusts of the East. Upon a short reign he has squandered the riches of a kingdom; all which extravagance leaves no larger trace than the silks of his seraglio, and the diamonds on his sword hilt. Shrewd diplomats won him to a promise of reforms which he had never the energy to make good. The Mussulmans doubted him for his subserviency to the influences of Christian Europe; and the Christians scorned him for a weakness which could never point his good intentions with the earnestness of a royal resolve.

They say he died quietly; his brother Abdul Aziz, whom he loved tenderly and who succeeds him, coming to make final and tearful adieux. The mourning family (apart from the easy mourners of the seraglio) consists of the imperial mother (Valide-Sultane), a sister aged 31, who is wife of the Minister of Marine, and fifteen children. Of these last two are aged 21; two 19; one 18; two 17; one 14; one 13; one 12; two 10; two 6, and the youngest a year. The new Sultan has designated as presumptive heir the second son Hamid, aged 17.

A reform is promised; and so far as domestic affairs are concerned, is already entered upon. The seraglio is abandoned; the diamonds are to be sold. The head chamberlain has been disgraced; an officer of great energy educated in Paris has been appointed to his place. The allowance of the Sultana has been reduced by a clear four-fifths. The civil list has undergone similar reduction; and no less than four hundred horses have been sent from the imperial stables to serve in the artillery. The new Sultan promises, moreover, faithful fulfillment of all engagements with the Powers of the West; but, on the other hand, as a good Mussulman, he has determined to build up again the old Turkish honor and loyalty of the days of Mahmoud. We shall see presently what elements of life he can evoke from the failing faith of Islamism.

The Syrian trouble is for the time past; but the Christian provinces of Europe are in almost open revolt; the treasury is empty; the army is demoralized, and Russia is pressing more potently than ever upon her coveted command of the Euxine. The new Sultan has done honor to himself and to a good cause by promptly recognizing the new kingdom of Italy.

THE Baron Ricasoli has spoken brave words anent both Venice and Rome, which give courage to the troops of Italy and hope to all of liberal Europe. But the Baron, even among his supporters, finds here and there a man of a too salient patriotism for the coolness of his own diplomacy. The memory of Villafranca is revived, and an advance upon Rome is urged at once, whatever may be the perils of a lost alliance with France. M. Musolino, an effective orator, is one who entertains these instant purposes of aggression. We have conquered Italian unity—why not possess it? The Roman citizens accept the responsibilities of the new position—why shall they not greet our King at the capitol? Shall we yield the crowning glory of our conquest to the religious or ambitious whim of the Emperor? Is not the Head of the Catholic Church safe in the keeping of Italian freemen?

Yet the King and Ricasoli stave off decision, hoping always that the death of the Pope, or the voluntary withdrawal of the Emperor's troops, may disentangle the imbroglio.

By an overwhelming vote the Ricasoli Government has secured the passage of its loan bill for five hundred millions of francs; it is but the beginning, however, of a settlement of its war accounts. An active and numerous body of its troops is still maintained in the south, where insurrection has assumed the shape of a chronic brigandage. Naples, indeed, is quite secure, and is fulminant with a noisy patriotism that is a mixed worship of Victor Emanuel and of Garibaldi. But the environs of the city are represented as unsafe, while through the mountain districts of Calabria the emissaries of the Bourbon and of the Church are stirring the peasantry to a reactionary wrath that spends itself in bloody, marauding expeditions on the plain.

Florence and Milan both have had their passing flurries of insurrectionary madness—tempted by the loss of Cavour, or perhaps the suggestions of Mazzini; but they are now tranquil.

A RECENT Turin letter mentions the fact that the first formal diplomatic dinner given by the present premier of Italy, M. Ricasoli, was in honor of the new United States minister, Mr. Marsh. It was a happy coincidence; for certainly no representative of any foreign power will bring a more cordial and intelligent recognition of the aims and successes of the great Italian revolution than Mr. Marsh. And this, not so much by reason of his strong instinctive love of the liberties which that revolution represents, as by reason of his intimate knowledge of the drift of the cultivated minds of Italy for the ten years last past, and his cordial sympathy with them for a still longer period. Mr. Marsh is no courtier, in the ordinary sense of that term; but yet he is at home on Italian ground, while his eminent scholarship and large information would make him at home on any European ground; but to the Italian Court he brings such thorough sympathy with the Italian cause, and such intimate acquaintance with the long series of struggles which have at length made the cause triumphant, that we venture to say no foreign appointment of our Government has been more adroit, more prudent, and none so thoroughly agreeable to any European dynasty.

We can readily understand how the appointment should have aggrieved aspiring politicians at home, since Mr. Marsh has never been, in the popular sense, an active politician. But it will be learned sooner or later by our country that the schooling of the Caucus, or even of the Congress, does not best fit men to represent in European courts the dignity and the interests of the Government. It is one thing to be able to carry a given number of votes in our popular assemblages, and it is quite another to command respect and attention in the diplomatic circles of Europe. We may laugh as much as we choose at the accomplishments of European civilization; we may swear that our Western Brigadiers are the bravest and smartest people in the world; but we can not beat down the traditions of centuries with a sneer, or drown the formalities of court etiquette with tobacco-spittle.

It will be remembered that, some years since, a tart diplomatic correspondence between the French and English Governments grew out of the French practice of transporting African apprentices to the French West Indies. The affair of the Charles and George, to which we alluded in its time, brought the question to a crisis; and a Commission was appointed by the Emperor, with the Prince Napoleon at its head, to inquire into the alleged inhumanity, and mollify the prejudices of the British Government.

The subject has been driven out of notice by the more important aspect of Continental questions until now, when we learn, by an Imperial rescript, that the colonial recruiting service is abandoned by France on the coast of Africa, and is transferred to the coolie countries of East India, with the full consent and approval of the British authorities. The matter is important at this juncture, as added evidence of the friendly alliance between the two countries. In this connection American readers will hardly fail to have remarked the allusion which dropped from Lord John Russell in a recent speech upon Continental politics. The report is not at hand, but we quote its gist: "On these matters [relating to Swiss neutrality] it gives me pleasure to say that the ministers of the Emperor have acted thus far in perfect accord with the views of her Majesty's Government, as we trust and believe they may do in any concerted action which may be found necessary with reference to the unfortunate complication of affairs on the other side of the Atlantic."

THE affair Mirès, after long and piquant trial, which has found full report in the Belgian papers, has at length come to end. The eminent Jewish banker, who a year ago was the courtied friend of half the Ministry, and who dowered his daughter with millions on her marriage to a Prince, is condemned to five years of imprisonment. The scene in the court when judgment was declared was impressive. Not many were present; a few friends had clung to the accused from the beginning; and now, at the last, lent him such poor comfort as they could. M. Mirés stood up to hear the decision of the Judge—pale, worn, his head leaning forward upon his breast—and as some charge more grievous than the rest was affirmed in the ruling of the Court, he raised his head with a look of wild surprise; then his eyes fall; he seems stupefied. At the word escroquerie (swindling) he strikes his forehead madly; the reading goes on; no one stirs; every word has its force and fullness. Mirés is comparatively calm until the full weight of the sentence is declared—"Five years of prison." At this the banker tosses up his hands wildly, strikes them together, and sinks to his seat as if overcome with despair. A moment after, at a touch from an attendant, he rises calmly enough, and follows his guards, who are in tears, out of the audience-chamber, through the galleries—to prison.

For such crime as has been proven against Mirés an American financier would be punished only with a gibe or two in the journals, and possibly come to high political preferment.

Facere omnia sæve
Non impune licet, nisi dum facis—

And the nice-eyed dumb faces (nos tædet) challenge justice.

AN old gentleman has latterly dropped away in England to whom we must give a word of mention. We mean the Lord High Chancellor Campbell, whom fifteen years ago we remember to have seen in a jaunty, brass-buttoned dress coat (ill fitting) in the House of Lords, and to have heard him, in his strong, Scotch, matter-of-fact way, belabor some opponent of his measures.

Lord Campbell was an illustrative type of British successes and of British opportunities. The late Chancellor was no "lord" born; he was the son of a poor Scotch minister, who allowed him, while he was yet beardless, to go up from St. Andrews to London (near the close of the last century), and there to try his hand among what Lord Colchester called the "blackguard newswriters."

The late Lord Campbell was three nights and two days making his first journey to London; and when he arrived in that great city he was the happy but somewhat anxious possessor of just eighteen English pennies. A friend had engaged cheap lodgings for him; and though he had eaten nothing for more than thirty hours he sallied out, not for a supper, but to learn, first of all, if the Morning Chronicle, to which paper he had been accredited, would engage his services, and pay him reasonably well. This point being settled to his full satisfaction, it is related that the raw-boned Scotch lad strode off to the nearest chop-house, where he consumed at a sitting no less than three sixpenny plates of beef!

And this was the Lord High Chancellor of Great Britain.

Oddly enough, the first position of the Chancellor upon the paper in question was that of theatrical critic. Fancy the sturdy, matter-of-fact biographer of the Chief Justices of England writing pretty periods about scenic effects in the "Forty Thieves," or the ankles of Madame Vestris! But he wrote theatrical criticisms, and the presumption is that he wrote acceptable ones; for he continued on the staff of the London Chronicle, and was eventually the Parliamentary reporter for that paper. It is a noticeable fact that, in the course of his critical lucubrations, he once took occasion to speak of one of Shakspeare's plays (whose authorship he unfortunately did not recognize) as a "meritorious effort on the part of the author to revive the Elizabethan drama."

But meantime Campbell was looking with a narrower and closer eye to the law. He established himself as barrister; wrought hard, and wrought late, and finally achieved a success by his plodding industry, by his straight-forward honesty, by his immovable resolve, which, in his case as in many another, have filled the place and won the rewards of genius.

He had no eloquence; he had little taste; he had no subtlety; he never shone; but yet he constantly grew. He left nothing half-done; he was always true to his engagements; he never shirked labor; he had few sensibilities to be wounded; no rebuff dashed his hopes; no faint-heartedness overtook him; no enemy stopped his progress till the disease came that made an end of the stout Scotchman altogether.

He wrote the Lives of the Chancellors, and of the Chief Justices of England. They are interesting and valuable, because he gave industry and honesty to the work: but on the score of literary merit they are not equal to many a biographical notice in the daily papers. There is no insight of character, no illuminating passages of eloquence, rarely an allusion that kindles any warmth of thought, never any graces of expression that arrest attention—only patched-up stories of the Lives of the Chancellors. But he did yeoman's work, and Great Britain thanks him for it, and will write tributes to him that shall make posterity thank him by proxy.

In 1830 he first entered the House of Commons; in 1832 he became Solicitor-General; and in 1841 he entered the House of Peers. In 1850 he became Chief-Justice of the Queen's Bench, and in 1859 he took his seat upon the woolsack. In our year of 1861 he died, aged 80.

OF hale old gentlemen who do not outgrow the disposition or the capacity to work, Lord Palmerston is another distinguished type. The Moniteur has a recent letter stating that his Lordship, within a few weeks, upon a dirty morning of July, went on horseback ten miles to Harrow, where he laid the cornerstone of a new educational building in honor of Dr. Vaughan—made a proper speech for the occasion—galloped back through a heavy rain to London in the afternoon—was in his place in Parliament at five, and remained attending to business until two the next morning.

Can any of the American vegetarians do better than this?

ONE of the recent "sensations" of Paris has been the reception of the Siamese Embassadors. They bring courtesy and gifts to his Majesty, and have been entertained at Fontainebleau. Their dress reminds of the time of Louis Quatorze. Just now they are the lions of the Bois de Boulogne.

M. LEVERRIER, the distinguished and combative astronomer, has latterly made a very sensible communication to the Academy of Sciences in regard to popular fallacies on astronomical subjects. The new comet has suggested his observations, and he ridicules the idea very generally entertained that the astronomer, by turning his glass upon it, can tell us its history and probable date of return. The truth is, he says, we are almost as much in the dark in regard to these celestial strangers, after months of toilsome calculation, as the most ignorant peasant. The sun, the planets, and even the stars we may proximately measure, and determine their courses; but as for the comets, they track an unknown expanse. On a sudden they appear, startling now one age and now another; and he who predicts their return upon such a day or in such an age is making only vague prophecy. Those astronomers, M. Goldschmitt among them, who have asserted this to be the comet of Charles V., have judged rashly. "The comet of 1861," he says, boldly, "can by no possibility be the mysterious visitant which instigated the great monarch to abdicate a throne. It is wholly new, wholly strange; and when it may appear again God only knows."

M. VATTEMARE, who is well known for his mania in regard to international exchanges, has on one or two occasions recently called the attention of the Academy of Sciences to a new vegetable product of America, called in the Compte-Rendus fibrilia, which, it is urged, will supply the place of cotton fibre, and can be grown at a cheaper rate (possibly the flax-cotton of the Daily News). A report made by MM. Decaisnes and Payen upon the samples presented was not favorable; they recommend it only as a passable substitute for rags in the fabrication of paper. We observe, however, that M. Vattemare, with a laudable zeal, returns to the charge, and demands a new inquiry.

ELIZABETH BARRETT BROWNING is dead. To think of her death is to bring back, on a rich whirl of thought, the rich poems she has written; and to recall her poems is to measure the loss we feel.

Her chiefest poem, "Aurora Leigh," might be shorter, and be the weightier for the shortness; but, as it stands, it carries more than enough of swift, true reading of human passion and purpose to stamp it as one of the richest poems of our day. We talk about her photograph, and her marriage, and her life at Florence or Rome, and how pleasant the "réunions" at her house, and these things would give us the measure of many minds; but not of the mind that thought out Casa Guidi Windows. They do not touch its measurement. The fiery, poetic, yearning soul that seethed in her was as much beyond and outside the homely face of the Mrs. Browning you see in pictures, or the woman who was wife to Mr. Browning and mistress of a pleasant parlor in Florence, as her new "Æschylus" of the "Prometheus Bound" is beyond and outside the type that renders it in print.

There are some people you can know by looking on, by talking with, by being of kin to; but there are others whom you can not know this way, simply because their fiery reaches of thought are too scorching for talk, and must spend themselves in poems: Mrs. Browning was spent thus.

Our copy of the Browning poems being out of hand, we turn for something illustrative to Chambers's Cyclopædia, where we find a half page of her girlish and lamest verse, followed by two full pages of Mary Howitt! By which we infer that Mr. Chambers has about the same appreciation of true poetry which an African-eating Fan (see Du Chaillu) might have of the ambrosia of the Gods. This touch of Italy, which she so loved, we can give at least, to show what poet is dead:

"I could hear my own soul speak,
And had my friend—for Nature comes sometimes
And says, 'I am ambassador for God.'
I felt the wind soft from the land of souls;
The old miraculous mountains heaved in sight,
One straining past another along the shore,
The way of grand, dull Odyssean ghosts
Athirst to drink the cool blue wine of seas
And stare on voyagers. Peak pushing peak
They stood: I watched beyond that Tyrian belt
Of intense sea betwixt them and the ship,
Down all their sides the misty olive-woods
Dissolving in the weak, congenial moon,
And still disclosing some brown convent tower
That seems as if it grew from some brown rock—
On many a little lighted village, dropped
Like a fallen star, upon so high a point,
You wonder what can keep it in its place
From sliding headlong with the waterfalls
Which drop and powder all the myrtle groves
With spray of silver. Thus my Italy
Was stealing on us."

Editor's Drawer.

THE experience of the politician in the West is often amusing, and occasionally otherwise. Several years ago Governor Cowell and Hon. David Heinweather were canvassing, the one for State Governor, the other for Congress. Passing through Carroll they stopped for dinner one day at the house of a simple-hearted old lady. Seated around the "groaning board," the Governor chanced to remark, upon noticing the staple character of the food before them, that whenever he could get buttermilk and corn-bread he ate nothing else. The good woman, whose estimate of those dishes, it seems, was not so exalted, paused for a moment in surprise, looked steadily upon him, and exclaimed, "See here, stranger! ain't you a lyin'?" The half-subdued laughter of his companion, and the silent confusion of the speaker himself, revealed the "lower deep" to which the mercury of his pride had fallen.

THE following "compromise" must have attracted attention before such affairs became unpopular:

There was a certain Mr. Bond indicted for malicious mischief. The charge was of an aggravated character, and clearly made out against him. He was found guilty by a verdict of the jury. It was evident from his demeanor that this was his first appearance before a Court of Justice, and like many others he was of the opinion that all fines imposed and collected was so much clear gain to the Court and attorneys concerned in his cause.

The Court stated that, as he had been found guilty of the present charge, it was his duty to inflict some penalty. "The sentence of the law is," says the Judge, "that you pay a fine of forty dollars to the Commonwealth, the costs of prosecution, and be in custody of the Sheriff until the sentence is complied with." The poor man did not know what to do; the fine and costs were considerably more than he had, and the idea of going to jail was not at all agreeable. The thought struck him that he might induce the Court to take less than he had been sentenced to pay. Accordingly he stepped forward to the Bench, and being hard of hearing he placed his hand behind his ear, and in a loud tone exclaimed: "Won't you please take a little less for the cash!"

WE have published several anecdotes of Chancellor Bibb, of Kentucky, and add this to the number: In a conversation about St. Paul, raising himself up and standing before the person addressed, as was his habit when excited, he said: "St. Paul was a giant, Sir! It took a stroke of lightning to make him understand, but when he did understand he talked like thunder!"

THE following instance of spinning street-yarns is related by the heroine herself:

"When about thirteen years of age I was particularly fond of dress. Being invited out to tea one evening, I arrayed myself with unusual care, and thinking that I must do as most others did, took the everlasting knitting work. Our house stood on one of four corners, the streets being very wide. I had crossed the street, and while proceeding up the sidewalk, thinking I looked particularly well in my fine dress, I was thus accosted by one of the clerks standing in a door-way: 'Miss, haven't you lost something?' 'I think not,' I replied. But looking around, I saw to my dismay a long white line extending directly as far back as I could see. What induced me to begin to wind the yarn I can not tell; but in my confusion I did nothing but wind, wind, the perspiration starting, and the yarn endless. It seemed as if the eyes of the whole town were upon me. At last I reached our gate, and found my knitting in the latch. I had wound all the way. I went up stairs, had a hearty cry, and did not go out to tea that day."

A SCHOOL-TEACHER in Alabama had among her scholars one incorrigible little miss, upon whom "moral suasion" seemed to have no effect. One day, out of all patience with some misdemeanor on the part of the child, she called her up to the desk, expostulated with her on the impropriety of her conduct, setting forth the enormity of her offenses, etc. The little girl paid little attention at first, but at length she seemed to realize her guilt more fully, and, watching her teacher closely, seemed to drink in every word she said. The lady began to have hope; her instructions were evidently making an impression. At length she made a slight pause—for breath, I suppose—when up spoke the child, with eyes fixed upon her teacher, and with the utmost gravity: "Why, Miss Susan, your upper jaw don't move a bit!"

That was the end of that discourse.

A. G. B——r, having gone to California in the spring of 1850, settled in Trinity County, and met with the various ups and downs incident to all young men in that land of gold. Like many others, he was in the habit of taking a glass of "red-eye," merely for sociability; but upon one occasion he imbibed too freely, and became dead-drunk. The following day he was seized with a great disgust for all sublunary things, but more particularly for himself. He at once applied to several of his friends for the loan of a double-barreled brass pistol, averring that he would put an end to his worthless life. Among others he applied to Hon. J. C. B——, who replied that he was not the fortunate possessor of such a weapon, but that he would loan him a first-rate Derringer, which would probably answer his purpose better. To this B——r replied, "No, Sir, I am too mean to be killed by so good a weapon." He wished to be killed by an instrument partaking of the quality of himself and the whisky upon which he had got drunk. Upon being asked why he wanted a double-barreled one, his answer was, "To be as mean as I am, I must be an infernal coward;

I know I shall run at the first report of the pistol, and I want to shoot myself 'on the wing' with the other barrel!"

A BRITISH seaman, while three sheets in the wind, and enjoying mightily his first evening of a three-days' leave on shore, suddenly and rudely ran foul of the Admiral of the Fleet, and nearly upset him. Whereupon a subaltern officer seized Jack by the collar, and exclaimed, "How dare you insult an Admiral, a Knight, a Baron Knight, and Knight of the Garter?"

"I don't care," says Jack, very tipsy, "for to-night, to-morrow night, or the night after!"

"NEAR the light-house at Holmes's Hole is to be seen a pole, which stands bleak and bare upon the coast. It is not used as a flag-staff, and curiosity prompted me to inquire respecting it. This story was told me: Years since three fishermen went out to fish upon the coast in a small sloop. During the day a very heavy shower of thunder and lightning arose, the sloop was struck, and the three men killed. Upon the recovery of the bodies it was resolved to erect a cedar pole to mark the spot from which they sailed, also to carve upon a tablet a suitable epitaph. The intellect of all the inhabitants was called into requisition, and many epitaphs were collected. From the whole number the one below was selected as being most suitable and concise, embodying their character, mode of death, and memorial in few words:

"Here lie three friends who in their lives
Were never known to wrangle;
Holmes' Hole,
Cedar Pole,
Crinkle, crinkle, crankle!"

The last line is supposed to describe with peculiar effect the death by lightning. Until within a few years the tablet could be seen in the church-yard; but it has now fallen, and the letters are nearly obliterated."

MR. SPARROWGRASS says that he belongs to the Home Guard of Yonkers, and one of the rules of the company is that it shall not leave Yonkers, except in case of invasion. The Springfield Banner says that they marry and are given in marriage up in that town just as if no danger was to be apprehended of a flood coming up from the South to sweep them all away. The men at the drill present arms, the ladies fall in, double-quick, and all go for the Union.

AMONG the infantile records of the Drawer the following reminiscence may be thought worthy of preservation:

"Many years ago it was the good fortune of the writer to be on terms of intimacy with the family of that wonderful young poetess, Margaret Davidson. Doctor Davidson, her father, was living at Plattsburg, on Lake Champlain, where Margaret, as well as her equally gifted elder sister, were born. It was the family custom, during the warm summer evenings, to assemble on the piazza, where all joined in 'converse grave or gay.' On one of these occasions Maggie, then a child about seven years of age, sat by her mother's side listening attentively to some humorous recital. When it was finished she ventured to remark that something said or referred to was very witty. An elder, though perhaps not wiser brother, surprised at the use by the child of a word the meaning of which she could scarcely be expected to comprehend, spoke up—'Why, Sis! how do you know? I'll venture you can't tell me what wit means.' Attracted by the challenge, all eyes were instantly turned toward the blushing child. For a moment she appeared lost in thought, then hesitating in her utterance, as though she was mentally weighing the correctness of her answer, she said: 'Wit—wit—why wit—is—a—little good sense—mixed with a good deal of funness. Isn't it so, mother?'

"ONE day little Charlie came running to me, saying, 'Ma, I saw a large snake down here.'

"What kind of a snake was it, my dear?" said I.

"Oh!" said he, 'it was an elastic snake.'

"I did not understand, and asked what it meant. Being in the presence of some other ladies, he whispered, 'It was a garter snake, ma.'

"JOHNNY was watching his mother wreathing her hair with the lovely orange bloom of our Louisiana gardens. 'Oh, ma!' he said, 'how sweet that is! You just look as if pa was dead, and you were going to be married over again!'"

THE war has played the mischief with the telegraph, and the telegraph in revenge has played the mischief with the news. "What to believe" is harder to find out than what has happened. We have evening editions of the morning papers to contradict what was said in the morning, and three or four editions of the evening papers to straighten the stories of each other. Mr. Erskine, a citizen of St. Louis, who lost his wits by reading the telegraphic dispatches, deserves to have his melancholy fate recorded in the Drawer, that his sad experience may be a warning to readers and operators alike. On being brought before a magistrate, on a charge of drunkenness, the following dialogue took place:

JUDGE. "What is the charge against this individual?"

POLICEMAN. "Getting drunk: completely drunk, attempting to destroy private property, and collecting a crowd around him."

MR. ERSKINE (arising painfully). "That's a mistake, a calumny beyond description. I was not drunk, I am not drunk, I shall not and will not be drunk. I never drink any thing but water—ask Thompson. In order to prove to you that I have my senses perfectly, I will proceed to sing the Star-Spangled Banner without missing a note. Gotta-piano here?"

The JUDGE. "Poor lunatic!"

MR. ERSKINE. "Indeed, that's more'n likely. Reading the newspapers has brought me into this state. I like to know the war news. I read all the dispatches published on the subject. That's the way I lost my reason. The second edition contradicts the first; the third contradicts that again, and so on. You believe you know, and you don't know any thing. You learn all at once that what happened yesterday didn't happen yesterday, but is going to happen to-morrow. That's enough to shatter the best organized intellect. It produces the effect of mixing your liquor—you go on swallowing without knowing how much you take."

JUDGE. "So you have been mixing your liquor, then?"

MR. ERSKINE. "No! I've mixed my dispatches. Oh, Telegraph, Telegraph! you're my ruin!"

Notwithstanding this ingenious system of defense Mr. Erskine was sent to work off his whisky at the station-house. On his way thither he promised the police-officer not to read any more newspapers, and above all, no more dispatches from the seat of war.

EVEN the children find some consolation in the progress of secession. This is the first positive advantage that has been known to come of it:

"A little niece of mine, in Baltimore, was considerably perplexed by her early lessons in geography about the time of the first announcement of South Carolina's secession, and hearing that event talked of and deplored in the family, she took a somewhat different view of the matter, exclaiming, 'Well, I'm glad South Carolina has seceded! I sha'n't have to bound it any more!' Possibly there are wiser people who can not assign a better reason."

THE following comes to the Drawer from the Palmetto Empire:

"In the town of Beaufort, South Carolina, many years ago, there lived a little Frenchman by the name of Agemac, who was extremely irritable—nay, passionate—which was enough for the boys, who took great delight in teasing him. He was a sort of watch tinker; and after his daily work was over would saddle up a shaggy, short-tailed pony for a ride. Upon one occasion his steed pitched him over his head upon a stick of timber, where he lay until several persons came to his assistance, and after an examination one of the crowd remarked that the poor little Frenchman's leg was broken in two places, when Agemac cried out at the top of his voice,

"Run for two docteurs! my leg is broke in two place!"

"In the course of a year he was all right, although a little on the limp, and, as I thought, able to stand a little teasing; so I pitched in. He was very busy filing something by the light of a tin lamp. I approached stealthily, and with a long pole extinguished his light, when he sung out, 'Theif! rob-bere! ketch him!' etc. A crowd collected immediately, I among the rest. The moment he saw me he began, 'You tam raskil, you out my chandel!' etc. After trying for some time to convince him I had not, I remarked, 'I wish, when the horse threw you, instead of breaking your leg he had broken your neck.' He immediately drew himself up to full height—about five feet four—and with a sort of triumphant smile screeched out, two octaves higher than his usual key, 'Vat you say? eh! Vat you say?' I repeated what I had said; when, with even more triumph, he said,

"Shentlemens, beer de witnis. I shall make him give security, and prove dat!"

THEY make maple sugar in Vermont, and will make more as the price goes up:

"Judge Gould could appreciate good jokes, and was very fond of getting them off. He was once, however, sold by his neighbor, whose face wore always a very sober expression when he was telling any story. They were talking about maple sugar, of which the Judge knew considerable, when Mr. Johnson said, 'Judge, how many pounds of sugar do you think Brown made from those nineteen trees in the corner?' pointing to the maple orchard. 'They are not the best kind of trees, and are not in the best place in the world, but how many pounds of sugar do you think he made?' The Judge looked at the trees a while, and then figured out about what he thought they ought to yield, and gave the number of pounds to Johnson. 'Well, he didn't,' says Johnson; 'he didn't get a pound. He was too lazy to tap them!'

THE FLIRT.

BY J. W. COOK.

With a heart that was heavy and sad,
With a head that was aching quite bad,
Jones sat in his parlor at home,
Both tired, and weary, and mad.

"'Tis flirt—flirt—flirt!

With all the girls that you can;
And when you can't find any more,
Why flirt with them over again."

Then he leaned him back in his chair,
And in tones that I shall not assert
Were the pleasantest tones in the world,
He sang the "Song of the Flirt."

"A flirt I am and always shall be,
A flirt I shall always remain;
I should like to pop the question to some,
But I know they would think me insane.

"Flirt—flirt—flirt!

With Carrie, with Fan, and with Kate;
I leave Miss Carrie at nine o'clock,
At ten am with Fan at her gate.
This life is a life that I hate,
And a flirt all the girls despise;
When I tell to the girls that I love,
They know I am telling them lies.

"If I take them out for a walk

When the moon is high in the sky,
They laugh at each thing that I do,
And tell me to choke when I sigh.

"Tis flirt—flirt—flirt!

With Carrie, with Fan, and with Kate;
I leave Miss Carrie at nine o'clock,
At ten am with Fan at her gate.

"Flirt—flirt—flirt!

In the sunny days of spring;
Flirt—flirt—flirt!
When Christmas-bells do ring.

While many another heart
To a heart as true is wed;
While I live on alone—

I wish that I were dead!"

With a heart that was heavy and sad,
With a head that was aching as bad,
Jones still in his parlor at home,
Sat tired, and weary, and mad.

"'Tis flirt—flirt—flirt!

With all the girls that you can;
And when you can't find any more,
Why flirt with them over again."

THE Rev. Dr. N——, who was pastor for many years in a quiet little town in Pennsylvania, had returned home late one evening from an ordination, which he had attended in a neighboring county.

The roads were wretchedly deep and muddy, and the Doctor, much fatigued with his horseback ride of thirty miles, retired to rest. Next morning he discovered that his apartment had been entered by a burglar during the night, who had carried off nearly all his valuables, without, however, disturbing the worn-out sleeper.

Meeting his friend, Judge H——, on the street next day, he related to him the occurrence. The Judge sympathized with him in his misfortune; and wound up with remarking, with his usual dryness of manner, "You know, Doctor, Scripture informs us that the wicked will not cease from troubling even when the weary are at rest."

The Doctor smiled at this new reading of the well-known text; and went on his way, remarking that there was no such text in the Bible, as the Judge would find if he would read the best law-book in the world.

"SOME years ago I was foreman of the shop connected with the establishment of which I am still a part and parcel. We had for an office-boy a recent importation from Ould Ireland. After a few initiatory lessons—such as sweeping out the office and store, building fires, etc.—Mr. E——, then the head of the house, spoke to the boy rather sharply, telling him it was time the New York mail was in, and he must run to the office and get the letters from forty (the number of the office-box). Patrick, anxious to suit, says, 'Yes, Sir; which way, Sir?' 'Right through there,' says Mr. E——, pointing to the back-shop. The boy, little knowing what his errand was, started on the run, and arriving at the shop inquired for 'forty.' 'Forty? forty?' said I; 'oh yes, forty has just stepped out a moment;' and back goes the boy to Mr. E——, who asked him if there were no letters. 'And sure,' says Pat, 'Mis-ther Forty has gone down the street, and it's the minute he comes back I'll be afther axing him, Sir!' Mr. E—— wasn't long showing Pat the way to 'forty,' and the foreman had to quibble a little to keep his situation.

"WHAT'S the matter, Frank?" said his mother to our little three-year old, who was troubled with a pain the other day; "got the back-ache?"

"No, me no got back-ache; me got front-ache," replied Frank.

LITTLE Mary Jane was complaining to her mother that some part of her dress was broken. Her mother, who was doing something at the time, remarked, "No, child, I don't think it's broken;" when she instantly replied, "Why, ma, you can't feel my feel, can you?"

SOME good things have been furnished for the Drawer from Maine; but "there are a few more left of the same sort." At the bar of one of our counties a person never admitted to practice has, by a sort of common consent, been permitted to do business as an attorney. He rejoices in the sobriquet of Judge Bones. "Once on a time" Colonel H——, a splendid specimen of a man, and one of the best common law lawyers in the State, made a motion for the disposition of a case. But Bones resisted the motion. Colonel H——, knowing that the disposition he desired was in accordance with the wishes of the parties, pressed the motion, and finally demanded the written authority of Bones to appear in the case, and remarked that "it did not appear that he was an attorney of the Court."

"The presumption is, your Honor," replied Judge B., "that I am, till the contrary appears."

Colonel H—— turned away, tearing off with his teeth a huge piece of paper, and muttered, in a voice audible all over the court-room, "It's the greatest piece of presumption I ever heard of though!"

The joke was of course repeated, and it nettled Bones very much whenever he heard the word mentioned, and any thing said about "members of the bar" or "lawyers" he took in high dudgeon. Especially was this so when he was slightly "elevated" by practice at another bar. Soon after the occurrence above mentioned he was trying a case in a Justice Court with a lawyer named Wood.

The latter in his argument stated that he would risk his reputation as a lawyer upon the correctness of a certain proposition. Judge Bones, who had been half-snoozing, and was in a condition in which he heard double as well as saw double, caught the word "lawyer," and instantly fired up, taking it to be an invidious allusion to himself. With a look of intense scorn he commenced his reply, "May it please the Court, the gentleman says he states the law as a lawyer. He a lawyer—a lawyer! Fling a handful of hops into Moosehead Lake, and call it beer!"

ONE more: In the same county another man, one Coon, thought he would try his hand at the practice of law as a substitute for the observance of the law. He learned something about making Justice writs, and learned to join the issue usually tendered before Justices, which merely required him to write on his part, "And the plaintiff likewise." He brought a case before a Justice who was not a lawyer, and a lawyer, Jones, noted for the keenness of his mind and the eagle eye with which he detected every weak spot in his adversary's case, was engaged in the defense. On looking at the writ he perceived it was faulty; and, with a little malice perhaps, filed a demurrer to the declaration. Now Coon had never heard of such a thing, and unexpectedly to Jones, of course, was taken all aback. Then thus:

COON. "Are you ready to go on, Jones?"

JONES. "Yes, Sir, as soon as you join the demurrer."

COON. "No yer don't! You don't catch this child so! Mr. Justice, this is one of the gentleman's tricks! We know all about him. But he can't come that on me! He don't catch me joining any such critter as that!"

Jones reads from the statute: "Either party, in any stage of the pleadings, may demur, and the demurrer shall be joined."

JUSTICE. "Mr. Coon, that is rather peremptory. I don't see but that you must join it."

COON. "I tell you it is one of his traps, and I won't be caught in it. I don't join any such papers as that. Why, don't he say in this paper here that my writ ain't worth a fig, and if I say, 'And the plaintiff likewise,' don't I say 'tain't worth a fig, too?"

The argument was conclusive; and Jones was obliged to put in another plea, upon which he obtained judgment in his favor, but partly, as it is suspected, from the fear the Justice had of that demurrer.

"ONE of the peculiarities of the excellent but eccentric Squire Hooker," says a contributor, "was that he could never be convinced that the leathern fire-buckets which the law required every house to be provided with were meant to be hung as ornaments in the front entry. Consequently his buckets were in constant use. They were sent to the store for nails; his workmen's dinners were sent to the fields in them; in fact, the old gentleman was so often seen with a bucket on his arm, that at last he was christened 'The Old Fireman.'

"On one occasion a farmer had his hen-roost robbed, and Uncle Zene Hart, a tough customer of that locality, was brought before Squire H., charged with the theft, the principal evidence against him being that the farmer, hearing a noise at his roost, had ran to the window, and saw a man, about Uncle Zene's size, etc., leaving his yard with a basket in his hand; while a neighbor had met Uncle Z. near there with a basket, which he was trying to conceal under his coat. Uncle Zene, however, steadily maintained that he was only going to the store. At last Squire H. put the question, 'But, Zenas, if you was only going to the store, why did you hide your basket so carefully?' 'Why!' growled Uncle Zene, 'why, coz I hadn't got no fire-bucket to hide my rum jug in!' It is needless to say that Uncle Zene was fully acquitted of any complicity in the sudden departure of the chickens."

THE following incident of Western travel illustrates a defect often observed in the hotel arrangements of less distant regions:

"Sam H—— seldom let an opportunity for a good joke pass without taking advantage of it. When on a journey to Council Bluffs, the stage was detained about three days by high water. On retiring to rest the first night, in the loft or chamber of a rude station-tavern, and after the last head had disappeared beneath the sheets, Sam called loudly for the landlord to hasten up stairs with a light. Upon his appearance Sam raised himself up in bed, presented the side of his head to the landlord, and asked him, in piteous tones, if he had a pin, needle, knife, or tooth-pick, to pick that pillow out of his ear? All except the host saw where the laugh came in, and roared out lustily; but he was heard descending the stairs and muttering, 'Some folks think they are mighty smart, so they do!'"

APROPPOS of Independence Day, a correspondent in the great West says:

"In many things we are peculiar out West, but in one thing we are like the 'balance of mankind.' The regular Fourth of July never fails to come once a year, and with us it is always honored by an observance in 'due and ancient form.' At a preliminary meeting for the purpose of making arrangements to observe the coming Fourth, one of our oldest inhabitants, a devoted and very worthy disciple of Esculapius, was chosen marshal of the day. Among other demonstrations it was determined to have a torch-light procession and fire-works in the evening. The order of the day had been fully determined on and the programme made up, when, just as the meeting was about to adjourn, the new-made marshal arose, blushing with the honors of his position, and begged leave to inquire 'if the torch-light procession would come out before the oration, or immediately after dinner?'"

FOR the sake of the country we do not give the whereabouts of a correspondent who says that this is the first prescription of one of the young doctors in his neighborhood. We have the original paper, which runs as follows:

"Mistres Locratt

"Take one of The white Powders every hour to night till you sleep in hurbe Tea Take one of The yalow Powders as soon as you get Them in molasses and if you should wake at midnight take another of the yalow Powders

T GAIT"

SOME of our village readers will appreciate the state of family affairs that gave rise to the following little story:

"In the western part of Massachusetts lived a Congregational clergyman, whose son Robert, about seven years of age, used to do the family errands. Among others, was the duty of bringing the daily supply of milk from one of the deacons. At the time we speak of a railroad had just been completed through the place, and the shrill whistle of the locomotive was a new wonder to the younger portion of the inhabitants. Robby had a habit of imitating the whistle by a boisterous toot; and he had, by an arrangement with the deacon's wife, fixed it in such a manner that, when she heard his whistle as he approached the house, she prepared his milk for him, and he was not detained. The deacon himself also had an arrangement with his pastor whereby he had the reading of one of his religious papers for the Sabbath, and used to get them on Saturday, but sometimes failed to do so. One Sunday evening in summer, having no milk, Robby was dispatched for a supply, although contrary to their usual custom to do so on the Sabbath. As he drew near the house he gave his usual signal, and going in received his milk. The good deacon, who had been shocked at the boy's irreverence, said to him, in a voice of stern reproof, 'Robert, the cars do not run or whistle on the Sabbath.' Robby stood abashed; when the deacon again spoke, saying, 'Robert, did you bring up my paper?' Quick as thought he drew himself erect, and facing the deacon, replied, 'Deacon Jones, the cars do not carry the mail Sundays!' and, turning on his heel, left the house. Not bad for seven years old."

HERE is another legal anecdote from Missouri:

"Colonel Davis, in a late trial for slander, in one of the Courts of this State, was defending his client, who had charged the plaintiff with swindling. The opposing counsel had boasted in his opening speech that the plaintiff had acted entirely under his advice; and in the progress of the cause he introduced in evidence a letter of the plaintiff, in which the phrase was used, 'Othello's occupation's gone.' Colonel Davis, in commenting upon this letter to the jury, said, 'I deny the right of the plaintiff to compare himself with Othello, who was a noble, generous, warm-hearted man—his only fault that he "loved not wisely but too well." In all these respects the plaintiff is exactly the opposite—a mean-spirited, selfish, avaricious, and treacherous person. But there is, gentlemen, a striking resemblance between the plaintiff and Othello in this—they both had most villainous counsel.'

"It is almost unnecessary to say that Colonel Davis won his case."

It is very refreshing at this time to have something amusing from Virginia. A friend in that quiet region writes that,

"Some years since a youth who lived in this county became anxious to see life, and started in a sail-vessel to Baltimore. He had never seen a steam-boat, but had often seen a steam saw-mill, and watched it with wonder and admiration. It had been raining and blowing for several days, and as the bay was rough the youth concluded that there had been a great rise of water somewhere ahead; and this conclusion was fully confirmed when he saw a steamer come puffing down the bay. He said to the captain of the vessel, with great earnestness, 'Why, Cap'n, thar's bin a powerful freshet up the river, for thar comes a saw-mill washed away! She ain't hurt though, for she's steady a pluckering!'"

Who does not appreciate genuine Western eloquence? The following instance is reported so naïvely by our Arkansas correspondent, that we give it in his own words. "Killing a rowdy," seems to be the merest trifle to the mildest of men in that favored land of good-nature:

"We have a little, waspish, pompous, vain, ex-Judge, who was recently prosecuting a mild, good-natured, young man, who had been compelled to kill a rowdy. Arguing to the jury that the prisoner was heartless, he exclaimed, in his most lofty strain, 'Yes, gentlemen, his heart is as hard as an adamant rock! Yes, he sits before you as isolated as a snake on Greenland's icy mountains!'

"In the same case, in alluding to the fact that Cain was the first murderer, he exclaimed, 'Yes, gentlemen, Cain spilled the innocent blood of his brother, and for that act God put a mark upon him that lasted him till future generations! And I have no doubt, gentlemen, God would have put him in the penitentiary, if the Jews of that day had owned such an institution!'"

THE following specimen of Milesian arithmetic is sent from Yankee land:

"A neighbor of mine employed an Irishman, the 20th of the month, to assist him on his farm for a month. The 10th of the following month Mike came in to settle. On being inquired the cause of his dissatisfaction, he expressed none, but said his time was up.

"'How's that?' inquired his employer.

"'Didn't yees hire me the twintieeth?' rejoined Mike.

"'Yes.'

"'Ain't to-day the tinth?'

"'Yes.'

"'Ain't twinty and tin thirty?' triumphantly replied Mike.

"Mike's logic failed to convince his employer, and he was reluctantly obliged to serve another ten days."

A "DOWN-EASTER" sends the following anecdote, characteristic of the improvident:

"A friend of mine, who is an overseer in a cotton-factory, had a few years ago in his employ a rather shiftless fellow. He was taken sick, and his wife also. They were sick some time, and being very poor, became destitute of the most common necessities of life. This coming to the knowledge of his fellow-workmen, a subscription was started among themselves for his benefit. Some gave flour, meat, groceries, and such articles as they could best spare from their own houses; while those who were unmarried, and had none of these things, gave money. Enough was collected in all to make the man and his wife comfortable, and they rapidly regained their health and strength. As soon as they were both able to go out, they took their money and went over to town and had their daguerreotypes taken!"

"St. Louis" says, that being a partaker of the "good things of the Drawer," he can not refrain from sending the following:

"A few evenings since a man fell dead upon the sidewalk. A large crowd soon congregated, and various were the causes assigned for his death. A Teuton police-officer, taking him by the hand, seemed to be seeking for 'pulse.' After an examination of some minutes he exclaimed, with an ominous shake of the head, 'He is a Dutchman!'"

"MANY of the best families of East Tennessee," writes an Alabama correspondent, "emigrated from 'Old Virginny.' Among others was my father. He brought with him an elderly woman of the colored persuasion, whose memory went so far back that she could almost recollect when 'Jeems River' was a small brook. Aunt Becky prided herself on her age. She was older than any body she had ever heard of. Once, however, she was taken down in her conceit. She overheard her mistress speaking of a lady who had just moved into the settlement, as belonging to one of the 'first families' of Virginia. Aunt Becky pondered for a moment in doubt, then ejaculated, with an ominous shake of the head:

"'Belongs to one of de fust families of Virginny, does she? Well den, she must be mighty old!'"

THE worthy Dr. Johnson, of Indiana, had an inveterate habit of interspersing his conversations with "of course." The Probate Court, in one of its sittings, was canvassing the estate accounts of one of the Doctor's patients, and not clearly understanding the account presented by my friend, he was sent for to explain. Coming in hastily, he began at once to enlighten the Court. "If," said he, "the Court please to look over this bill, you will find that Mr. Jones was taken sick, and of course he sent for me to visit him professionally. I did visit him, Sir, as therein charged (pointing to the account). And, Sir, I found him bad, very bad, dangerously sick, Sir; and of course I made the prescription here named, and of course he died."

VOL. XXIII.—No. 136.—N R*

A WASHINGTON correspondent sends us the following personal reminiscence:

"In early youth I was in the beautiful valley of the Mohawk River, which at that period was, below the present city of Utica, almost exclusively inhabited by the Dutch, as primitive and unsophisticated a race of people as ever occupied any portion of this continent. They were habitually and strictly honest, and very naturally believed every body else to be so. An incident which occurred some four or five years previous strikingly, even if somewhat ludicrously, illustrates that fact.

"At that period a Yankee made his appearance in the goodly Dutch town of German Flats, professing to be a schoolmaster, and commenced preparations for opening an English school. The honest Dutchmen, delighted with the project, received him kindly, entertained him hospitably, and stood ready, as soon as the necessary preliminaries could be provided, to patronize his undertaking. Under these circumstances the Yankee purchased of one of them a very fine horse, giving his note at six months from date for the purchase-money.

"Shortly after this both the Yankee and the horse were missing; and a neighbor, meeting with the former owner of the horse, said to him,

"'So, Hans, you have lost dat fine horse of yours.'

"'How so?'"

"'Why, dat Yankee you sold him to has run away mit him.'

"'Val, vat do I care for dat; hain't I got his note?'"

"I regret being obliged to add that these honest Dutchmen were, some of them, not slow in learning and practicing Yankee tricks."

JOHN DAWKINS was a great drunkard in North Carolina. John was at the court-house one day, on his old horse, starting home, and, as usual when going home from town, was quite drunk. When in this state he never heard any thing that he did not wish to hear; and on this occasion seemed particularly deaf to the cries of an impatient creditor who was trying to call his attention. Seeing that old John would not hear, the creditor went up close to him and held up a piece of paper, shouting,

"John, I've got your account here, and want you to settle it!"

"What d'ye say?" cried John.

"I've got your account, and want you to settle it!" cried the creditor, in a louder tone.

"Oh yes," replied John; "I'll drink with you—always ready to drink with a friend."

"I've got your account, and want you to settle it!" shouted the excited creditor.

"Yes, yes," said John, dismounting; "just as soon drink with you as with any body else."

"I've got your account, and want you to settle it!" screamed the creditor at the top of his voice.

"Yes," answered John, perfectly unmoved, taking the creditor's arm, "just as lief drink at Hogart's as at Townsend's."

And John did actually march off with his creditor, and made him treat; and never could hear a word with reference to the account.

A VERMONTER took a horse to Boston and there offered him for sale to a merchant. The gentleman supposing that the fellow had procured the horse dishonestly, asked him if he knew Squire Johnson, of Windsor, Vermont. He said he did. "Well," said the merchant, "he is a great rascal." "And the Squire says the same of you," replied the jockey. "And which do you believe?" demanded the merchant. "Indeed I believe you both," said the Vermonter, and very soon sold his horse.

LOGAN, the comedian in the West, is still favorably remembered by a large circle of devoted friends. He had a happy way of talking of his early adventures: one of his favorite stories ran as follows: Having formed a theatrical company, and provided himself with portable scenery, he undertook a tour through Nova Scotia and New Brunswick. The result was a total failure. By shrewd management he saved one wagon, a pair of horses, and some drop curtains, and in company with three of his fellow-actors and one actress, in the dead of winter, he started for "the States," intending to make his way home through New England. Journeying along he came to the Aroostook, and most unexpectedly found himself in a large population engaged in cutting pine timber. Exhausted of all resources, the idea struck him that he would give "an exhibition," which was cordially seconded by the people. A large building, used at certain seasons of the year for drying fish, made with little labor a very good theatre, and according to arrangement the important evening arrived. Now out of four or five hundred persons, male and female, not one had ever seen a play; and they all came and took their seats with a solemnity of face and demeanor that would have done honor to any "Sunday meeting." The curtain rose, and the farce went on; but it was witnessed by grim faces that were lit up by no smiles, enlivened by no sign of intelligence. It was the hardest work, Logan says, he ever performed. Determined to break the icy exterior of his patrons, he got his domo to announce that the manager would volunteer to sing a comic song—which song was supposed by Logan, from its broad character, to be irresistible. The solitary fiddle struck up, and the comic song began; but it met with no response, and was finished amidst the dead silence of glazed eyes and apparently unfeeling bodies. How Logan finished what was set down in the bills he said he never could tell, intense fatigue and utter disgust at his unappreciated efforts alone absorbing his mind.

The following morning a tall, jangling-looking fellow, whom Logan had noticed throughout the entire performance shaking a walking-stick at the juveniles, came up to him, and, with considerable hesitation, asked, "I guess you're the man that played them funny things last night, ain't you?" Logan acknowledged himself to be the individual. "Wa'al," continued the interlocutor, "the fact is, that it was just as much as I could do to keep the whole meetin' from larfin' right eout." This piece of news, together with the liberal support he had received, restored Logan to excellent spirits; yet he acknowledged that, after thirty years' recollection of the circumstance, it still seemed to him that it would have added much to his happiness if those people had really "larfed right eout," and done with it.

MANY years ago, when Texas was first admitted into the Union, George Ford, a well-known hardware merchant in Boston, visited that State on business. He had occasion to travel in distant and thinly settled parts of the State on horseback, where sometimes he would not see a habitation for thirty or forty miles. He was told that on reaching the Brazos River, a quarter of a mile wide at a certain point in Washington County, he would find a bridge; but, on reaching the river, there were no signs of a bridge. He dismounted, undressed, and tying his clothes in his handkerchief, he fastened the bundle to the headstall of the horse, and drove him into the river, Ford swimming after him. Both arrived safely on the other side; and after dressing, he was very much perplexed to find three forks to the road or trail, and the question was now which one to take to reach his destination—a town some fifty miles distant. While pondering on the probabilities, he cast his eye back over the river, and saw a sign-board nailed to a tree. He resolved to swim back and read it. Undressing again, in he went, and reached the other side, and read these words: "Five dollars fine for crossing this bridge faster than a walk." It appeared the bridge had been carried away during a great freshet, some months previous, the only vestige remaining being the sign above on the tree. George says it was the only time he ever was "sold" in Texas.

AN Iowa correspondent writes:

"A few years since, the Bench of the — Judicial District was occupied by Judge M'Frien, who was more distinguished as a judge of the quality of corn whisky than as a legal expounder, and more noted for his passionate fondness for horse-racing, dog-fights, Irish rows, etc., than for his attachment to Coke, Blackstone, Kent, Chitty, et al. In person he was the beau-ideal of a lover of the prize-ring. His particular crony was a member of the Bar, Colonel Ford, better known through this State as 'Old Timber,' and sometimes 'Timber.' The Judge was once holding court at Jonesville, and on the night of the second day they all got on a spree, which, in fact, lasted through the whole of the next day. On the morning of the third day M'Frien was presiding in court with that maudlin dignity which only a drunken Iowa judge can assume, when Timber came into court, weaving his way through the crowd, and approached the seat of justice, keeping his hat on his head. Arrived there, he spoke as follows:

" 'May it (hic) please the Court, I've a mo (hic) mosun t'presnt in er case of (hic) Doe 'gainst—'

" 'At this point the Court burst forth with—' Timber, take off your hat and sit down.'

" 'Go to (hic) h—l!' returned Timber.

" 'The Judge, raising his brawny form from his seat, advanced a step toward the now penitent 'limb of the law,' shook his ponderous fist, and exclaimed,

" 'Squat, Timber, or I'll set (hic) the seal of the Court on you!'"

" 'OLD Mr. Sewell was one evening settling with a neighbor, and in footing up the items he came to a column (on his own side, of course) which amounted to 9. He commenced on the next column with, '1 to carry to—' 'Stop, stop!' said the other; 'it isn't customary to carry for any thing less than 10—is it, Mr. S.?' 'Oh, pshaw!' said Sewell; 'neighbor, you're too tight to be honest!'"

ATTACKING A DOG-MA.

THE courts of Illinois furnish the following incident:

"About two years ago a young man of very good character hired a horse from a livery-stable to ride out to a little town about twenty miles distant. Unfortunately, when about half way out the horse was taken sick and died. The livery man sued him for the value of the horse, representing that the horse had been killed by fast riding. The case came up before the court. One of the young man's witnesses (rather green, or supposed to be, and who had a peculiar way of talking very slow) was called to the stand, and questioned thus by the prosecution:

"Are you acquainted with the prisoner at the bar?"

"Y-a-a-s' [very slowly drawled out].

"How long have you known him?"

"About two years."

"Well, Sir, please state to the Court what kind of a reputation he bears as regards riding fast or slow on horseback?"

"Wa'al, I suppose if he was a riding with a company of persons who rode very fast, and he didn't want to be left behind, he would ride fast too. And if he was a riding with a company that rode very slow, and he didn't want to go ahead alone, I suppose he would ride slow too!"

"JUDGE [very much enraged]. 'You seem very much inclined to evade answering questions properly. Now, Sir, you have stated how the gentleman rides when he rides in fast company, and how he rides when he rides with slow company. Now, Sir, I wish you to state to the Court how the gentleman rides when he rides alone?'

"Wa'al, having never had the pleasure of riding with him when he rode alone, I don't think I can tell!"

GOOD GWACIOUS! WHAT A BO-AH!

"SOME time last summer Barney M'Coy and Michael Durraine, two half-Americanized sons of old Erin, were jogging home from a saw-mill, where for three years they had passed as first-class hands. Barney, by his expertness and ingenuity, in a little while got in as 'boss of the concern;' and Mike, by the aid of his chum, soon gloried in the title of 'head stocker of the gang.' Now what I was going to say was this: The pair hadn't gone far before says Barney to Mike, 'I say, Mike, we're agoin' to have a shower.' 'I believe yer,' replied Mike, turning his broad mug to the zenith, 'for't sprinkles a'ready.' Barney was right, for in less than ten minutes it came rattling down in good earnest. 'Now, see here,' said Mike, who always had a mortal aversion to getting wet, 'I'm blowed if I stand this any longer! now let's strike for that big spruce yonder, and wait till it's over.' Suiting action to word, he started off for the tree. He got within four or five rods when the tree was struck by lightning and blown to atoms, flooring Michael, as he said, for the first time since he came over. Thunder-struck as he was, Barney soon got him on his feet. 'Mike,' said he, trying to raise his spirits, 'just see what an illegant thing the lightnin' would be to run a steam-mill with!' 'Mebbe 'twould,' said Mike; 'but the devil might tend the engine!'"

In one of our military companies, the other day, an Irish Captain called out to his men: "Attention, Company! The Orderly Sergeant will now proceed to call the roll of the absint members, and see how many of them are prisint!"

A COUNTERPART to the "daily pie" anecdote, in the January Number, is the following:

"I have a little nephew, scarcely four years old. While being dressed for breakfast one morning his eye fell upon a plate of warm biscuit. The language of his morning petition evidently lingering in his memory, he asked his sister, two years his senior, 'Why don't they say, Give us this day our daily biscuit?' The answer was as prompt as it was conclusive: 'Why, biscuit is bread, Charlie; but bread isn't biscuit!'"

ENTERING THE TUNNEL.

IN THE TUNNEL.

THROUGH THE TUNNEL.

AN Arkansas correspondent writes:

"While coming down the Warrior River the other day, I witnessed a moving scene. The steamer had rounded up at M'Kowan's Bluff to take aboard several passengers. Among these was a great lout of a lad, some twenty years old, who, for some reason unknown to your correspondent, was being shipped to Arkansas. Father and mother, and Matty his sweet-heart, stood on the bank to bid him farewell. He had evidently considered the occasion one that demanded a 'bust,' and consequently was one half drunk, and the other half decidedly corned. He shook hands with his progenitors, bidding them good-by with tolerable composure; but broke down when it came to parting with Matty.

"'Oh Lordy, Matty!' he blubbered, 'boo-oo, dern your sweet soul, boo-oo! Farewell, vain world, boo-oo! I'm goin' to Arkansaw!'

"Perhaps we didn't laugh at this sorrowful parting; and then again, perhaps we did."

Fashions for September.

Furnished by Mr. G. BRODIE, 300 Canal Street, New York, and drawn by VOIGT from actual articles of Costume.

FIGURES 1 AND 2.—DINNER TOILET AND PROMENADE COSTUME.

FIGURE 3.—LACE FICHU.

THE DINNER TOILET is made of mauve taffeta. The Corsage is half-high, round waist, revers front, with a frill of Valenciennes lace. Madonna fichu, closed in front by small gold buttons. The Valenciennes is continued from the waist, waved down the front of the skirt; a passementerie of black rosettes is placed at each folding of the lace. The sleeves, which are laid in plaits, are banded in four divisions; with frills of lace, en suite, forming cuffs. As every lady of taste consults that style of coiffure which is individually most becoming to her countenance, we do not think it necessary to specify any special mode.

PROMENADE COSTUME.—The material is a gray foulard; plain close body, cut in one with skirt.

The cape and bottom of skirt are trimmed with a reversed plaiting. The dress has buttons down the entire front. The sleeves are made to fall open, handkerchief style, from a small puff at the top of each. The under-sleeves have two flounces.

LACE FICHU.—The lace is plaited, and then caught up in alternating points, which disposes it in lozenges; upon each spot thus marked there is placed a nœud of Garibaldi taffeta ribbon. A fall of lace, after circling the neck—forming thus a collar—is arranged in overlapping folds upon the front. This allows the neck-tie to be exposed only upon one side of the neck.

LACE UNDER-SLEEVES.—These are en suite with the above.

FIGURE 4.—LACE UNDER-SLEEVES.

HARPER'S NEW MONTHLY MAGAZINE.

No. CXXXVII.—OCTOBER, 1861.—VOL. XXIII.

FUGITIVES TO FORT PITT.

THE Peace of 1772, between France and England, left the latter in possession of the entire Northwest; and was supposed to be the end of all the difficulties with the Indians. Instead of this, however, it proved to be the prelude to one of the most devastating wars that ever swept our Western frontiers. The uprising among the various hostile tribes was so general, and their attack on our outposts so sudden and overwhelming, that, with two exceptions, the fighting was all on their side. The French, who had hitherto held them in subjection, had won over some tribes through the influence of the Catholic priests, and others by their kind, conciliatory conduct; so that the most friendly relations subsisted between them. Hence, when under the treaty they came to be handed over to the English, the Indians refused to consent to the transfer. The steady progress of the settlements of the former assured them that submission on their part would end in extermination; and if they ever hoped to prevent such a catastrophe then was the time to act, while the posts were weak and far apart, and the settlements thin and scattered.

Much has been written in detached fragments of this war, which is sometimes called the Pontiac War,* because this chieftain was its presiding genius—the great central figure around which every thing revolved. But he confined himself, in his personal efforts, chiefly to the region round Detroit and the lakes, while south of the Ohio hostile movements were carried on by other chieftains. The whole war, however—so far as it embraced any fighting on the part of the English and colonists—was confined entirely to forts Pitt and Detroit. All the frontier forts, except these two and Niagara, fell without an attempt at defense, except a slight one in a single instance. Niagara was too strong to be molested; so that the two former were the only ones that resisted the overwhelming flood of savage vengeance, which left every post west of them, and the settlements around them, heaps of smoking ruins. Their gallant garrisons, though shut up in the wilderness and cut off from all intercourse with the outer world, not only maintained their posts, but eventually carried the war into the heart of the enemy's country, and wrung from them an unwilling peace. Hence the sieges of those two forts, and the expeditions that afterward went out from them against the Indians, comprise the whole history of the war, so far as it relates to the military movements on our side.

All the frontier forts, which were scattered at that time through the vast wilderness that extended from Niagara and the Ohio to Michilimackinac and the Mississippi, were mere log inclosures, chiefly located on the line of water communication, but sometimes set down in the heart of the forest, and garrisoned only by a handful of men. Situated so far apart, they were mere dots in the interminable wilderness; and the flags floating above them seemed a burlesque on the claim of sovereignty. Their presence, however, irritated the proud chieftains, for they showed their own supremacy to be denied, and forewarned them of their coming fate. The Senecas, and Delawares, and Shawnees, and Miamis, and Wyandots, who held this immense territory, then traversed only by hunting and war paths, being moved by the same enmity and fear, banded together in a common cause. Rumors of this conspiracy from time to time reached the ears of the English general, Amherst, who, though he did not wholly disregard them, seemed to think half his duty performed when he declared such conduct on the part of the Indians to be unwarrantable, and that if they persisted in it they would, in his eyes, make a "contemptible figure"—yes, "a contemptible figure!"

The consequence was, that when the storm burst on the frontier forts and settlements it came like a tornado in the Tropics, which gives with the announcement of its presence the result of its power. The time selected by the Indians to execute their purpose showed their sagacity. They waited till the harvests were gathered in, so that men and provisions could be destroyed together—thus making a clean sweep for at least a whole year. The forts of La Bœuf, Venango, Presque Isle, on Lake Erie; La Bay, on Michigan; St. Joseph, Miami, Ouatanon, Sandusky, and Michilimackinac went down one after another, and, with one exception, without firing a shot. Some fell by stratagem, and the garrisons were massacred; others capitulated; and out of all only one garrison—that of La Bœuf—escaped. This attempted a defense; but the Indians succeeding in firing the block-houses, it took refuge in the woods, and eventually escaped.

Having thus struck down the British flag wherever it floated over their vast domains of mountain and prairie, extending from the Falls of Niagara to those of St. Mary—except at Detroit and Fort Pitt—they commenced clearing out all the settlements that had been under their protection. The scattered traders were murdered by scores, and their warm blood drank. The stout backwoodsman in the clearing, and the mother with her infant in the log-cabin, fell alike before the rifle and tomahawk. The echo of the frontiersman's axe and the morning and evening gun of the lonely distant fort were silenced together, and the smoke of civilization, that had begun to curl above the illimitable forest, was extinguished in blood. Those who escaped the scalping-knife left their rude homes to the torch of the savages and fled. More than five hundred families from Maryland and Virginia alone took refuge in Winchester. The woods were alive with fugitives, and deeds of cruelty and blood filled the settlements with terror and dread.

Amidst this scene of universal desolation forts Pitt and Detroit stood, like rocks amidst the surges, keeping their flags gallantly flying, the only emblems of English power and of civilization in a land now covered with cities and traversed by railroads. Detroit and Pontiac having been treated of in another article, this is devoted to Fort Pitt and Boquet—thus completing the history of the war.

* This Magazine for March, 1861, contained an article, written by me, entitled, "Pontiac; or, The Siege of Detroit." I prefixed to this article a note giving ample credit for the main incidents therein narrated to Mr. PARKMAN'S admirable "History of the Conspiracy of Pontiac, and the War of the North American Tribes against the English Colonies, after the Conquest of Canada." This note, to my regret, was separated from the copy, and omitted. I take the earliest opportunity to acknowledge my obligations to Mr. Parkman. So thoroughly, indeed, has he treated the subject, that it would be impossible to write upon it without following closely in his footsteps. His History of the Pontiac War is admirable not only for its exhaustive research, but for the clearness of its arrangement and the felicity of its style.

This fort, built on the present site of Pittsburgh, was garrisoned by only about three hundred and thirty men commanded by Captain Ecuyer. It had never been finished, and three of its sides having been partially washed away by the spring floods, it was totally unprepared to sustain any serious attack. Hence, as the murmurs of the rising storm that swept through the forest grew louder and more threatening, Ecuyer surveyed his almost defenseless condition with the deepest anxiety. Soon the terrible truth could be no longer doubted, that the whole Northwest was in a blaze, and the terrified fugitives, from far and near, came streaming into his dilapidated log structure for protection, till more than two hundred women and children were crowded into his contracted quarters.

Finding the storm close upon him he did not waste time in repairing the old fort, but threw up a rampart of logs all round it with palisades between. Though he had not a single engineer or artificer, he soon, by dint of energy and activity, surrounded himself by defenses, within which he declared he could bid defiance to all the savages that could be brought against him.

The summer was now in its glory—the green forest shook and swayed above the sparkling river, that, issuing from the green mass of foliage above, lost itself in the same green abyss below—wild flowers bloomed along its banks, and all was tranquil and beautiful, as it ever is, around the rivers and lakes of the wilderness. But the noontide splendors of the quiet scene, and its evening loveliness, were alike lost on the inmates of that little log inclosure. Their anxious eyes were constantly bent on the narrow clearing between them and the forest, or striving to pierce the green arcades beyond, from which they hourly expected to see issue hordes of savages, drunk with blood and mad with the thirst for vengeance.

They were not kept long in suspense; for on the 22d of July there suddenly burst into the clearing a host of painted demons, screeching and shouting their hideous war cries till the whole atmosphere seemed an element of discordant sound. At one moment it appeared as if they would roll in one fierce inundation over the rude ramparts; but the line of fire that girdled them swept the clearing with such deadly effect that they could not bear up against it, and fled to the cover of the forest for shelter. The next night, however, dusky forms were seen stealthily creeping round the works, evidently seeking to find some assailable point against which the next attack might be made. But the same high rampart of logs met them on every side, and they concluded to try the effect of a parley. So, shortly after midnight, they sent in a flag of truce, and a Delaware chief who accompanied it addressed Ecuyer in a studied speech. He informed him that all the Northwestern forts had fallen, adding that Ligonier, five miles in his rear, had probably by this time shared the same fate, as the Indians had surrounded it. He said, moreover, that the Indians at present around the fort were only a handful compared with those who were on the way and would soon be there; and, in conclusion, advised him to go home and save himself and garrison from certain destruction. Ecuyer, in reply, told him that large reinforcements were on their way to the fort, and warned him and his confederates to cease at once their hostilities, or they would meet a terrible punishment. Seven weeks now passed away in quietness, though not a message could be got across the wilderness to the settlements. In the mean time a second summons to surrender was received from the Indians, and declined like the first. After a long interval the Delawares and Shawnees sent a message to the fort demanding its surrender, and promising if it was given up without farther resistance that they would not molest the frontiers farther, but make that the limit of their encroachments. Ecuyer, in reply, told them he had soldiers, ammunition, and provisions enough to defend the fort for three years against all the Indians in the woods; and coolly advised them to go home and take care of their women and children.

This closed all negotiations; and the four tribes of the Delawares, Shawnees, Wyandots, and Mingoes, encompassed the fort on four sides at once, and attacked it with the most determined bravery. They advanced boldly into the clearing, and took without flinching the deadly fire of three hundred and thirty muskets, that mowed them down in scores at every discharge. Maddened by this scourging fire, they made desperate efforts to mount the ramparts; but met at every point by the steady volleys of the garrison, they first halted, then swayed and careered over the clearing like a herd of enraged wolves. Finding they could make no impression on the solid wall of logs, they fell back; but the most daring of them—scorning to take shelter again in the woods—dived under the banks, and digging holes in the loose clay crawled out of the reach of the fire of the fort. From these secure hiding-places they would creep cautiously forth, and the moment they caught, through the loopholes, glimpse of an arm, or leg, or a hand's-breadth of the body of one of the inmates, they would send a musket-ball or fire an arrow at it, and then duck back to their holes. The close and destructive volleys now gave way to scattering and single shots, and the conflict partook of the ludicrous almost as much as of the dramatic. An old hunter would watch the cautious protrusion of a scalp-lock from the bank with the same intense eagerness he would the motions of a deer in the forest, until he could see the glittering eyes, and then sent a bullet crashing through the skull. The feints, and dodges, and attempts to mislead, sometimes successful, and sometimes ending fatally to him who practiced them, excited continual jests and mirth, and gave to the contest the character of a keen hunt. The utmost watchfulness was required to defeat the endless stratagems of the wary savages, who, notwithstanding the disadvantage they labored under, seemed determined not to abandon their design of subduing the fort. This strange conflict was kept up, day after day, till the last of July. Very little injury, however, was done to the garrison. There was but one killed; a few were wounded, among whom was Ecuyer, the commander, who received an arrow in his leg. No tidings, in the mean time, reached them of any force coming to their rescue; but, at length, from the excited movements of the Indians and their rapidly decreasing numbers, Ecuyer suspected they had heard news that he was most anxious to receive. This was true; for Amherst had dispatched a force to relieve Fort Pitt, at the same time that he sent another to Detroit. Colonel Boquet was placed in command of the former, and with five hundred men ordered to Carlisle, where the inhabitants had been directed to assemble a convoy of provisions for his use. On his way through Cumberland County he found the country roads thronged with the fleeing, terrified inhabitants, who were in daily expectation of an onslaught by the Indians. Fear had paralyzed them so that they thought only of flight, and when Boquet arrived at Carlisle he found nothing had been done toward raising the convoy he expected to find waiting his arrival. He was, therefore, compelled to halt here eighteen days till he could collect one himself. At length, every thing being ready, he marshaled his little band, and turned his face toward the wilderness.

ATTACK ON THE FORT.

The force under him was composed of the débris of two regiments of Highlanders just arrived from the West Indies, where they had been wasted by sickness. Sixty of them were so feeble that they could not march, and were carried forward in wagons to reinforce the small posts on the line of communication. The inhabitants saw them depart with sad forebodings; for they knew them to be unused to the woods, and unacquainted with savage warfare. They shook their heads portentously, and said that the fate of Braddock's army would be theirs. This seemed likely enough; for if the former, with his splendid army of more than two thousand men, was destroyed before he could reach this same fort, it was not to be expected that this little band of less than five hundred could succeed. But Boquet was not a man to be daunted by evil prophecies ; and driving before him a hundred cattle and two hundred sheep, and followed by a long train of pack-horses and wagons, carrying ammunition and provisions, he pushed on toward Fort Bedford. On the way ruined mills, empty cabins, and deserted fields, waving with grain that none dared stay to reap, attested how complete and wide-spread was the terror. Reaching Bedford on the 25th of July, he learned that eighteen persons had been massacred in the immediate neighborhood of the fort. Stopping here for three days to rest, he again set out. He was now at the foot of the Alleghanies, over which a single narrow road wound its way. Up this, walled in by the magnificent forest, he slowly toiled, heralded by the bleating of sheep and lowing of cattle, and followed by a long train of wagons straining up the difficult ascent. On the 2d of August he reached Fort Ligonier, the last post that had kept up communication with the settlements. He had hoped at this place to get some tidings of the fate of Fort Pitt, but not a word had been heard for a month. Every messenger sent toward it had been murdered or driven back. The woods were full of Indians. Beyond this nothing was known, though it was evident the garrison still held out ; for had it fallen the victorious tribes ere this would have been swarming around that fort also.

Leaving here his wagons, which would only encumber his march and impede the movements of his little army in the struggle before it, he stowed what ammunition and provisions he thought he could get along with on three hundred and fifty pack-horses, and on the 9th of August started forward. This long straggling train, with the compact body of Highlanders at its head, wound like a huge serpent through the magnificent forest.

The second day the morning drum roused them up at the first streak of dawn ; and the whole force was pushed on at the top of its speed. Silently and swiftly, without a drum or fife to enliven its march, the column pressed forward, followed by the animals panting under the hot August sun, and by one o'clock had made seventeen miles. A halt was then ordered. They were now within half a mile of a defile called Turtle Creek, several miles long, and commanded all the way by craggy hills. Boquet, knowing that the Indians would not fail to waylay him in a spot so favorable to their mode of warfare, had resolved to pass this at night by a forced march, sweeping through it so unexpectedly and rapidly that the savages would not have time to mature any plan of attack. But he knew it would not do to attempt this at the close of a day of toil ; and so he had planned to have the day's march finished by noon, and the entire afternoon devoted to rest. The camp was therefore pitched; and the Highlanders, having finished their dinner, lay scattered around in their picturesque costumes among the trees, under which their glittering arms were stacked in various directions; while the huge drove of pack-horses, with their loads beside them, stood tethered to the branches, dreaming away the hot August noon. Sentinels were posted at different points, and an advance-guard sent forward to prevent a surprise from the pass, near the entrance of which they lay. Every thing being thus arranged to render the camp secure, the tired Highlanders abandoned themselves to that repose they so much needed before entering on the toil and struggle of the night. Some lay stretched in quiet sleep under the tall trees, others whiled away the hot hours in pleasant conversation, and every thing betokened a peaceful afternoon when a sudden volley of musketry in front made every man spring to his feet, and rush for his firelock. The next moment the loud and hurried beat of the drum echoed through the forest, the word of command rung sharply out, and scarce a minute had elapsed before that scattered crowd of indolent sleepers stood arrayed in firm-set ranks. But before each weapon was fairly in its place the wild war-cry of the savages burst upon them, and a storm of bullets revealed an ambuscade close upon the camp. Without waiting to return the fire, Boquet ordered two companies to charge the cover. As the gleaming bayonets came steadily on, the Indians broke and fled. The whole line then advanced, and swept the wooded heights in front. The sturdy Highlanders thought it a small matter to drive Indians from their position; but to their amazement this easy success brought no advantage; for as fast as the volleys disappeared in one direction they appeared in another; and instead of lessening, kept steadily increasing, showing that reinforcements were rapidly pouring in. Charging now on this side, and now on that, they swept the green arcades around them, and were pushing steadily on when a loud rattle of musketry in rear conveyed to them the startling intelligence that the convoy was attacked. If this should be cut off the expedition was ended; and so the whole army was instantly ordered to fall back for its protection. By this time the entire force was surrounded with a circle of fire, that every instant grew hotter and closer. Boquet, seeing that the savages invariably recoiled before the bayonet, ordered a charge wherever the fire was hottest. In sections they steadily advanced on different points at once, and always with the same success; but the ring of fire was elastic, springing back to its place the moment the pressure was removed. Thus they fought hour after hour; and though they carried every point they assailed, not the slightest advantage was gained. On the contrary, the assaults grew fiercer and the fire more deadly. Had Boquet held his troops massed together, as Braddock did near the same place seven years before, the conflict would soon have ended in a massacre. But keeping them constantly moving in sections from point to point he distracted the enemy's fire, and hence suffered less than he otherwise would have done: still his loss was severe; and as he looked around and saw how thickly the woods were strewn with tartans and plumes, he gazed anxiously on the setting sun. His force was rapidly melting away; and with this mode of fighting his defeat was simply a question of time. If he could hold on till dark, however, he knew he should have a respite; for the Indians, he was convinced, would not risk the silent charge of the bayonet in the night, when they held it in such mortal dread in broad daylight. He was not mistaken; for as the sun dropped behind the trees, and the deep shadows began to creep through the forest, the girdle of flame closed less firmly around him, and gradually receded, till the firing ceased altogether, and silence fell once more on the wilderness, broken only by the moans of the wounded. These were carefully gathered together, and laid on blankets under the trees, surrounded by meal-bags, while the dead were left unburied where they had fallen. The night that followed was a sad one to the weary troops that, without a fire to cheer the gloom, sank to rest on their arms. The rapid march of seventeen miles, followed by seven hours of uninterrupted fighting, had completely exhausted the Highlanders, to whom all this was new and strange. Forming a circle around their convoy, they stretched themselves on the ground, ready at the first alarm to spring to their feet and renew the conflict. Not a drop of water could be procured on the spot where they had been compelled to encamp. This, to the well, on this hot August night, was a terrible deprivation; but to the wounded, torture indescribable.

BOQUET'S MARCH.

It was a night of anxious suspense and gloomy forebodings, and as Boquet sat and pondered on his prospects, the melancholy fate of Braddock near this same spot would force itself on his unwilling heart. He could not advance and clear the pass at the point of the bayonet without abandoning his convoy and wounded to the savages, while to stay there and defend them was certain destruction. Whichever way he turned, defeat, or disaster equal to defeat, seemed inevitable. Still nothing could be done but wait and see what the morning might bring forth.

The short summer night, though long enough to the beleaguered little band, at length passed, and the gray light of dawn appeared above the tree tops. But before the shadows below had wholly disappeared the loud tap of the drum brought the weary troops to their feet, and the next moment the forest rung with the unearthly yells of the savages not more than five hundred yards distant. Rapidly flitting from tree to tree they closed in on every side, and firing as they advanced, threatened to make a rush on the camp. But the steady charge of the Highlanders at length forced them back. They, however, disappeared among the foliage and receding colonnades of the lofty trunks only to reappear in another direction. The scenes of the day before were now enacted over again, and the savage rush repelled by the steady charge of the bayonet wore away the morning hours. The Indians, however, by skulking behind the trees, and defeating every attempt to bring on a close conflict, avoided any serious disaster, while the troops, furnishing a conspicuous mark to the assailants, suffered severely. But the destructive fire of the savage was far easier to bear than the burning thirst that consumed them. The long struggle of the previous afternoon, followed by the warm night, had made it most distressing; and now the close struggle of the morning intensified it to a degree that drove them to the verge of madness, and they thought of victory only that they might get water.

HIGHLAND CHARGE.

Boquet, as he stood and surveyed the field, became deeply anxious, for he saw clearly that, unless the nature of the conflict was changed, it could have but one termination. His little band was long since decimated, and soon the dead and wounded would outnumber the living. Each time the companies returned from their successful charges with diminished numbers, till their ranks were now reduced to mere skeletons. This gloomy aspect of affairs was rendered still more hopeless by the steadily increasing numbers of his foes. Leaving the siege of Fort Pitt they kept pouring to the conflict, furnishing two fresh warriors for every one slain. The woods on every side of the troubled detachment were alive with them—yelling, shouting, and screeching like a multitude of demons. Unable to move either backward or forward on account of his convoy and the wounded, Boquet stood perplexed and undecided what course he ought to take in his now desperate position. The savages, seeing his powerlessness to move, grew bolder, and pressed closer and closer, till their bullets fell at length among the wounded and pack-horses. As the latter began to drop, and struggle at their fastenings, the drivers became frightened, and hid away among the bushes, where the orders of their superiors could not be heard, or if they were, were unheeded. These signs of disorder increased the anxiety of Boquet, and he resolved by a stratagem to bring on a decisive action.

The ground occupied by the troops was a slight eminence heavily wooded, on the top of which the convoy and wounded were collected, which the former surrounded in a circle. The Indians attacking the camp on all sides at the same time, rendered this arrangement necessary.

Two companies had been thrown out in the direction of Fort Pitt, where the struggle was fiercest, and these he ordered to fall back within the circle, and a few troops to fill their places as if to cover their retreat, which movement he rightly conjectured would be construed as the commencement of the retreat of the whole army. These companies were directed, however, the moment they got over the hill and were concealed by it, to wheel, and, making a circuit in the woods, fall on the enemy's flank, if, as Boquet supposed he would, he rushed forward to attack the camp. Meantime two other companies were placed in ambush on the other flank. The ruse succeeded; the Indians seeing the two companies that had so long maintained their post in front give way, and their places supplied by only a thin line of troops, broke cover with loud shouts and bore furiously down on the camp. The few, ostensibly left to hold the post, gradually retreated, until they had drawn their pursuers opposite the two companies marching back to take them in flank, when the latter wheeled and came down on the astonished savages in a fierce charge. They were completely taken by surprise, but met the onset firmly, and actually drove back the Highlanders. They saw at once that they were thoroughly committed to the conflict, and fought with a desperation that for a while made the victory doubtful. But the Highlanders, rallying to a second charge, came on with such a resolute front that the Indians after a short struggle broke and fled. At that moment the clear blast of a bugle on their other flank brought the party in ambush upon them, when the retreat became a terror-stricken flight, and the fight a massacre. Boquet, having once got them under his hand, would not let them go, but pressed furiously after, strewing the green woods with the dead. The Indians on the farther side of the circle not comprehending the cause of the severe struggle in front ceased firing, but soon receiving the news of the complete rout of the main body turned and disappeared in the forest.

Thus ended the battle of Bushy Run, and the road lay open to Fort Pitt.

It is a little singular that the only two severe battles fought around the two forts, Pitt and Detroit, in this war, should have names so similar—Bushy Run and Bloody Run. They were alike, however, only in name; for in the latter the Indians were victorious, defeating the English and American troops with great slaughter.

How many dead and wounded warriors the Indians succeeded in carrying off was not known; but they left sixty behind them scattered through the woods.

The victory did not come a moment too soon; for Boquet found, when he assembled his troops, that nearly a quarter of the whole command was dead or wounded.

The first cry of the survivors was for water; and in many cases the agony of thirst was stronger than discipline, and the soldiers broke their ranks to obtain it. The moment the yells of the savages and the rattle of musketry had ceased, the moans of the wounded were most piteous to hear. Their wounds increased their thirst a hundred-fold, and their cries for water made the woods resound. Men were detailed to bring it to them, and soon the poor sufferers were relieved from their greatest agony.

The camp, that August noon, presented a sad sight; and as Boquet surveyed the bloody and trampled field he felt that his little force had narrowly escaped a terrible doom. A hundred and more of his brave Highlanders lay scattered around—some stretched in death, and others reclining against logs and trees bleeding from their wounds. This severe loss of course prevented him from taking advantage of his victory and pressing on to the fort, and he remained here four days. Graves were dug under the green trees, and the loose earth and leaves piled over the dead Highlanders, while the Indians were left to rot where they fell.

At length, after providing in the best manner his means would allow for the wounded, and constructing rude ambulances on which to carry them, the little army took up its line of march, and soon came in sight of Fort Pitt. The log inclosure, with the English flag flying above it, was a welcome sight, and they greeted it with loud cheers, which were returned with a will by the overjoyed garrison. With drums beating and colors flying they marched through its rude portals, saluting and saluted, bearing their wounded with them, who half raised themselves from their litters to share in the general gladness. The day was given up to pleasure, and many were the eager questions and answers respecting the world without. The battle of Bushy Run was fought over again; and deliverers and delivered forgot, in their exultation, that they were shut up in the wilderness, hundreds of miles from civilization.

The Indians, disheartened by their overwhelming defeat, and despairing of success against the fort now it was so heavily reinforced, retired sullenly to their homes beyond the Ohio, leaving the country between it and the settlements free from their ravages. Communication now being rendered safe, the fugitives were able to return to their friends, or take possession again of their abandoned cabins. By comparing notes they were soon able to make out an accurate list of those who were missing—either killed or prisoners among the various tribes—when it was found to contain the names of more than two hundred men, women, and children. Fathers mourned their daughters slain, or subject to a captivity worse than death; husbands their wives left mangled in the forest, or forced into the embraces of their savage captors—some with babes at their breast, and some whose offspring would first see the light in the red man's wigwam—and loud were the cries that went up on every side for vengeance.

Boquet wished to follow up his success and march at once into the heart of the enemy's country, and wring from the hostile tribes, by force of arms, a treaty of peace which should forever put an end to these scenes of rapine and murder. But his force was too small to attempt this, while the season was too far advanced to leave time to organize another expedition before winter. He therefore determined to remain at the fort till spring, and then assemble an army sufficiently large to crush all opposition, and finish what he had so successfully begun.

While the garrison at Detroit saw with dread the coming on of winter, which brought them no respite from Pontiac, and effectually cut them off from all communication with Niagara, those at Fort Pitt rested in peace and security.

The flags of these two far outposts waving in the wintry wind filled the hearts of the Indians with fear and gloom. The terrible blow they had planned, and on the success of which their hopes depended, had failed of its purpose; for those two forts, still standing in striking distance of their homes, told of their baffled power, and at the same time pointed to a coming day of vengeance. They knew that the reinforcements which had reached them were but the forerunners of more to come when spring should again unlock the waters and open the forest paths.

Boquet, acting under instructions, matured during the winter all his plans, and soon as spring opened set on foot measures by which an army strong enough to render resistance hopeless should be placed under his command.

In the mean time the Indians had obtained powder from the French, and as soon as the snow melted recommenced their ravages along the frontier, killing, scalping, and taking prisoners men, women, and children.

Boquet could muster scarcely five hundred men of the regular army—most of them Highlanders of the 4th and 6th regiments—but Pennsylvania, at her own expense, furnished a thousand militia, and Virginia a corps of volunteers. With this imposing force he was directed to march against the Delawares, Mohicans, and Mingoes; while Colonel Bradstreet, from Detroit, should advance into the territory of the Wyandots, Ottawas, and Chippewas; and thus, by one great simultaneous movement, crush those warlike tribes. Boquet's route, however, was without any water communication whatever, but lay directly through the heart of an unbroken wilderness. The expedition, from beginning to end, was to be carried on without boats, wagons, or artillery, and without a post to fall back upon in case of disaster. The army was to be an isolated thing, a self-supporting machine.

Although the preparations commenced early in the spring, difficulties and delays occurred in carrying them forward, so that the troops, that were ordered to assemble at Carlisle, did not get ready to march till the 5th of August. Four days after, they were drawn up on parade, and addressed in a patriotic speech by the Governor of the State. This ceremony being finished, they turned their steps toward the wilderness, followed by the cheers of the people. Passing over the bloody field of Bushy Run, which still bore marks of the sharp conflict that took place there the year before, they pushed on, unmolested by the Indians, and entered Fort Pitt on the 13th of September.

In the mean time a company of Delawares visited the fort, and informed Boquet that Colonel Bradstreet had formed a treaty of peace with them and the Shawnees.

Boquet gave no credit to the story, and went on with his preparations. To set the matter at rest, however, he offered to send an express to Detroit, if they would furnish guides and safe-conduct, saying he would give it ten days to go and ten to return. This they agreed to; but unwilling to trust their word alone, he retained ten of their number as hostages, whom he declared he would shoot if the express came to any harm. Soon after other Indians arrived, and endeavored to persuade him not to advance till the express should return. Suspecting that their motive was to delay him till the season was too far advanced to move at all, he turned a deaf ear to their solicitations, saying that the express could meet him on his march; and if it was true, as they said, that peace was concluded, they would receive no harm from him. So, on the 2d of October, under a bright autumnal sky, the imposing little army of fifteen hundred men defiled out of the fort, and striking into an Indian path boldly entered the wilderness. The long train of pack-horses, and immense droves of sheep and cattle that accompanied it, gave to it the appearance of a huge caravan, slowly threading its way amidst the endless colonnades of the forest. Only one woman was allowed to each corps, and two for general hospital.

This expedition, even in our early history, was a novel one; for following no water-course, it struck directly into the trackless forest, with no definite point in view, and no fixed limit to its advance. It was intended to overawe by its magnitude—to move, as an exhibition of awful power, into the very heart of the red man's dominions. Expecting to be shut up in the forest at least a month, and receive in that time no supplies from without, it had to carry along an immense quantity of provisions. Meat of course could not be preserved, and so the frontier settlements were exhausted of sheep and oxen to move on with it for its support. These necessarily caused its march to be slow and methodical. A corps of Virginia volunteers went in advance, preceded by three scouting parties—one of which kept the path, while the other two moved in a line abreast, on either side, to explore the woods. Under cover of these the axe companies, guarded by two companies of Light Infantry, cut two parallel paths, one each side of the main path, for the troops, pack-horses, and cattle that were to follow. First marched the Highlanders, in column two-deep, in the centre path, and in the side paths in single file abreast—the men six feet apart; and behind them the corps of reserve, and the second battalion of Pennsylvania militia. Then came the officers and pack-horses, followed by the vast droves of cattle, filling the forest with their loud complainings. A company of Light Horse walked slowly after these, and the rear-guard closed the long array. No talking was allowed, and no music cheered the way. When the order to halt passed along the line the whole were to face outward, and the moment the signal of attack sounded, to form a hollow square, into the centre of which pack-horses, ammunition, and cattle were to be hurried, followed by the Light Horse.

MARCH THROUGH THE WOODS.

In this order the unwieldy caravan struggled on through the forest, neither extremity of which could be seen from the centre, it being lost amidst the thickly clustering trunks and foliage in the distance.

The first day the expedition made only three miles. The next, after marching two miles, it came to the Ohio, and moved down its gravelly beach for six miles and a half, when it again struck into the forest, and making seven miles encamped. The sheep and cattle, which kept up an incessant bleating and lowing that could be heard for more than a mile, were placed far in the rear at night and strongly guarded.

Tuesday, October 5, the march led across a level country, covered with stately timber and with but little underbrush; so that paths were easily cut, and the army made ten miles before camping. The next day it again struck the Ohio, but followed it only half a mile when it turned abruptly off, and crossing a high ridge over which the cattle were urged with great difficulty, found itself on the banks of the Big Beaver Creek. The stream was deep for fording, with a rough rocky bottom and high steep banks. The current was, moreover, strong and rapid; so that, although the soldiers waded across without material difficulty, they had great trouble in getting the cattle safely over. The sheep were compelled to swim, and being borne down by the rapid current landed, bleating, in scattered squads, along the steep banks, and were collected together again only after a long effort. Keeping down the stream they at length reached its mouth, where they found some deserted Indian huts, which the Indians with them said had been abandoned the year before, after the battle of Bushy Run. Two miles farther on they came upon the skull of a child stuck on a pole.

There was a large number of men in the army who had wives, children, and friends prisoners among the Indians, and who had accompanied the expedition for the purpose of recovering them. To these the skull of this little child brought sad reflections. Some one among them was perhaps its father, while the thought that it might stand as an index to tell the fate of all that had been captured made each one shudder. As they looked on it, bleached by the winds and rain, the anxious heart asked questions it dared not answer.

The next day was Sunday, but the camp broke up at the usual hour and the army resumed its slow march. During the day it crossed a high ridge, from the top of which one of those wondrous scenes found nowhere but in the American wilderness burst on their view. A limitless expanse of forest stretched away till it met the western heavens, broken only here and there by a dark gash or seam, showing where, deep down amidst the trees, a river was pursuing its solitary way to the Ohio, or an occasional glimpse of the Ohio itself, as in its winding course it came in the line of vision. In one direction the tree tops would extend, miles upon miles, a vast flooring of foliage, level as the bosom of a lake, and then break into green billows that went rolling gently against the cloudless horizon. In another, lofty ridges rose, crowned with majestic trees, at the base of which swamps of dark fir-trees, refusing the bright beams of the October sun, that flooded the rest of the wilderness, made a pleasing contrast of light and shade. The magnificent scene was new to officers and men, and they gazed on it in rapture and wonder.

Keeping on their course, they came, two days after, to a point where the Indian path they had been following so long divided—the two branches leading off at a wide angle. The trees at the forks were covered with hieroglyphics, describing the various battles the Indians had fought, and telling the number of scalps they had taken, etc.

The path selected by the army was so overgrown with bushes that every foot of the way had to be cleared with the axe. It led through low, soft ground, and was frequently crossed by narrow, sluggish rivulets, so deep and miry that the pack-horses could not be forced across them. After several attempts to do so, in which the animals became so thoroughly imbedded in the mud that they had to be lifted out with main force, they halted, while the artificers cut down trees and poles and made bridges. This was the hardest day's toil to which they had been subjected, and with their utmost efforts they were able to accomplish but five miles. The next day the forest was open, and so clear of undergrowth that they made seventeen miles. Friday, the 12th, the path led along the banks of Yellow Creek, through a beautiful country of rich bottom land, on which the Pennsylvanians and Virginians looked with covetous eyes, and made a note of for future reference. The next day they crossed it, and ascending a swell of land, marched for two miles in view of one of the loveliest prospects the sun ever shone upon. There had been two or three frosty nights, which had changed the whole aspect of the forest. Where, a few days before, an ocean of green had rolled away there now was spread a boundless carpet, decorated with an endless variety of the gayest colors, and lighted up by the mellow rays of an October sun. Long stripes of yellow, vast masses of green, waving lines of red, wandering away and losing themselves in the blue of the distant sky—immense spaces sprinkled with every imaginable hue, now separated clear and distinct as if by a painter's brush, and now shading gradually into each other, or mingling in inextricable, beautiful confusion, combined to form a scene that appeared more like a wondrous vision suddenly unrolled before them than this dull earth. A cloudless sky and the dreamy haze of Indian summer, overarching and enrobing all this beauty and splendor, completed the picture and left nothing for the imagination to suggest.

THE CHILD'S SKULL.

REST AT TUSCARORAS.

At length they descended to a small river, which they followed till it joined the main branch of the Muskingum, where a scene of a very different character greeted them. A little below and above the forks the shores had been cultivated and lined with Indian houses. The place was called Tuscaroras, and for beauty of situation could not well be surpassed. The high, luxuriant banks, the placid rivers meeting and flowing on together, the green fields sprinkled with huts and bordered with the rich autumnal foliage, all basking in the mellow October light, and so out of the way there in the wilderness, combined to form a sweet picture, and was doubly lovely to them after having been so long shut up in the forest.

They reached this beautiful spot Saturday afternoon, and the next day being Sunday they remained in camp, and men and cattle were allowed a day of rest. The latter revived under the smell of green grass once more, and roaming over the fields, gave a still more civilized aspect to the quiet scene.

During the day the two messengers that had been sent to Detroit came into camp, accompanied by Indian guides. The report they brought showed the wisdom of Boquet in refusing to delay his march till their return. They had not been allowed to pursue their journey, but were held close prisoners by the Delawares until the arrival of the army, when, alarmed for their own safety, they released them and made them bearers of a petition for peace.

SETTLEMENT AT MUSKINGUM.

The next day the army moved two miles farther down the Muskingum, and encamped on a high bank, where the stream was three hundred feet wide. The following day six chiefs came into camp, saying that all the rest were eight miles off, waiting to make peace. Boquet told them he would be ready to receive them next day. In the mean time he ordered a large bower to be built a short distance from camp, while sentinels were posted in every direction to prevent surprise, in case treachery was meditated.

The next day, the 17th, he paraded the Highlanders and Virginia Volunteers, and escorted by the Light Horse, led them to the bower, where he disposed them in the most imposing manner, so as to impress the chiefs in the approaching interview. The latter, as they emerged from the forest, were conducted with great ceremony to the bower, which they entered with their accustomed gravity; and without saying a word quietly seated themselves and commenced smoking. When they had finished they laid aside their pipes, and drew from their pouches strings of wampum. The council being thus opened, they made a long address, in which they were profuse in their professions of peace, laying the whole blame of the war on the young men, whom they said they could not control. Boquet, not wishing to appear eager to come to a settlement, replied that he would give his answer the next day; and the council broke up. The next day, however, a pouring storm prevented a meeting of the council till the day following. Boquet's answer was long and conciliatory, but the gist of it was he would make peace on one condition, and no other—that the Indians should give up all the prisoners in their possession within ten days.

Remaining quietly in camp till Monday, he again ordered the tents to be struck, and recommenced his march, to show his determination to enforce his demands. In three days he reached the forks of the Muskingum; and judging this to be as central a position as he could find, he resolved to fix himself here until the object of his mission was accomplished. He ordered four redoubts to be built, erected several store-houses, a mess-house, a large number of ovens, and various other buildings for the reception of the captives, which, with the white tents scattered up and down the banks of the river, made a large settlement in the wilderness, and filled the Indians with alarm. A town with nearly two thousand inhabitants, well supplied with horses, cattle, and sheep, and ample means of defense, was well calculated to awaken the gloomiest anticipations. The steady sound of the axe day after day, the lowing of cattle, and all the sounds of civilization echoing along the banks of the Muskingum within the very heart of their territory, was more alarming than the resistless march of a victorious army; and anxious to get rid of such unwelcome companions, they made every effort to collect the prisoners scattered among the various tribes.

Boquet remained here two weeks, occupied in sending and receiving messengers who were charged with business relating to the restoration of the captives. At the end of this time two hundred and six, the majority of them women and children, had been received in camp. A hundred more still remained in the hands of the Indians; yet, as they solemnly promised to restore them in the spring, and the leafless forest and biting blasts of November, and occasional flurries of snow, reminded Boquet of the coming on of winter, he determined to retrace his steps to Fort Pitt.

These two weeks, during which the prisoners were being brought in, were filled with scenes of the most intense and often painful excitement. Some of the captives had been for many years with the Indians, recipients of their kindness and love; others had passed from childhood to maturity among them, till they had forgotten their native language, and the past was to them, if remembered at all, like a half-forgotten dream. All of them—men, women, and children—were dressed in Indian costume, and their hair arranged in Indian fashion. Their features also were bronzed by long exposure to the weather; so that they appeared to have passed more than half way to a pure savage state. As troop after troop came in, the eager look and inquiries of those who had accompanied the army to find their long-lost families and kindred made each arrival a most thrilling scene. In some instances, where the separation had been only for a short period, the recognition was instantaneous and mutual, and the short, quick cry, and sudden rush into each other's arms, brought tears to the eyes of the hardy soldier. In others, doubt, agony, fear, and hope would in turn take possession of the heart, and chase each other like shadows over the face, as question after question was put, to recall some event or scene familiar to both, till at last a common chord would be touched, when the dormant memory would awake as by an electric touch, a flood of fond recollections sweep away all uncertainty, and the lost one be hurried away amidst cries and sobs of joy. Sometimes the disappointed parent or brother would turn sorrowfully away, and, with that hope deferred which makes the heart sick, sadly await the arrival of another group. But the most painful sight was when a mother recognized her own child, which however, in turn, persisted in looking on her as a stranger, and coldly turning from her embrace, clung to its savage protector; or when a mutual recognition failed to awaken affection on one side, so entirely had the heart become weaned from its early attachments. In these cases the joy of the captors knew no bounds, and the most endearing epithets and caresses would be lavished on the prisoner. But when they saw them taken away, torrents of tears attested their sincere affection and grief. The attitude of intense interest, and the exhibitions of uncontrollable sorrow of those wild children of the forest, on one side, and the ecstatic joy of the white mother as she folded her long-lost child in her arms, and the deep emotion of the husband as he strained his recovered wife to his bosom, on the other, combined to form one of the most moving, novel spectacles ever witnessed in the American wilderness. One of the captive women had an infant three months old at her breast, born in the Indian's wigwam. A Virginia volunteer instantly recognized her as his wife, stolen from his log-cabin six months previous, and rushing forward he snatched her to his bosom and flew with her to his tent, where, tearing off the savage costumes of both, he clothed them in their proper garments. After the first burst of joy was over he inquired after his little boy, two years old, who was carried off the same time she was made prisoner; but she could give no tidings of him. A few days after another group of prisoners arrived, in which was a child whose appearance answered to the description of this little fugitive. The woman was sent for, and the child placed before her. She looked at it a moment, and shook her head. But the next moment the powerful maternal instinct triumphed, and recognizing in the little savage before her her long-lost child, she dropped her babe, and snatching him to her bosom burst into a torrent of tears. The husband caught the babe from the ground on which it had fallen and both hurried away to his tent. The poor Indian mother watched their retreating forms, and then burying her face in her blanket sobbed aloud. A scene equally affecting occurred between an aged mother and her daughter, who had been carried off nine years before and adopted in a distant tribe. Though the latter had passed from childhood to womanhood in the forest, and differed from other young squaws only in the tint of her skin, which her wild life could not wholly bronze, the eyes of the parent, sharpened by maternal instinct, instantly recognized the features of her child in the handsome young savage, and called her by name, and rushed forward to embrace her. But the latter, having forgotten her native language and name, and all her childhood's life, looked on wondering, and turned, frightened from the proffered embrace, to her Indian parent. The true mother tried in every way to recall the memory of her child and awaken recognition, but in vain. At length, despairing of success, she gave way to the most passionate grief. Colonel Boquet had been a silent witness of the painful interview, and, moved at the grief of the mother, approached her, and asked if she could not recall some song with which she used to sing her child to sleep. Brightening at the suggestion, she looked up through her tears, and struck a familiar strain, one with which she used long ago to quiet her babe. The moment the ears of the maiden caught the sound her countenance changed, and as the strain proceeded a strange light stole over her features. All stood hushed as death, as that simple melody floated out through the forest, and watched with intense interest the countenances of the two actors in this touching scene. The eager, anxious look of the mother as she sang, and the rapidly changing expression of the captive's face as she listened, awoke the profoundest sympathy of Boquet's manly, generous heart, and he could hardly restrain his feelings. Slowly, almost painfully, the dormant memory awoke from its long sleep; at length the dark cloud that covered the past rent asunder, and the scenes of childhood came back in all the freshness of their early spring time, and the half wild young creature sunk in joy on her mother's bosom.

RECOVERY OF PRISONERS.

Some of the children had been so long with their captors that they looked upon them as their true parents, and cried bitterly on being separated from them. Stranger still, the young women had become so attached to their savage yet kind husbands, that, when told they were to be given up to their white friends, they refused to go; and many of them had to be bound and brought as prisoners to camp. Repelling all advances, and turning a deaf ear to entreaties, they besought Boquet to let them return to their forest homes. The promise that they should take their half-breed children with them could not change their wishes. On the other hand, the Indians clung to them with a tenacity and fondness that made the spectators forget they were looking upon savages. It was pitiful to see their habitual stoicism give way so completely at the thought of separation. They made no effort to conceal their grief; and the chieftain's eye that gleamed like his own tomahawk in battle, now wept like a child's. His strong nature seemed wholly subdued, and his haughty bearing changed to one of humility as he besought the white man to treat his pale-faced wife tenderly. His wild life suddenly lost all its charms, and he hung round the camp to get a sight of her whom, though she was lost to him, he still loved. He watched near the log building in which she was kept, leaving it only to bring from the forest pheasants, wild pigeons, or some delicacy, and lay it at her feet. Some of the young captive wives refused to be comforted, and using that sagacity they had acquired in their long sojourn with the Indians, managed to escape from their friends, and joining their swarthy lovers fled with them to the forest, where they remained in spite of all efforts to recover them.

The American wilderness never presented such a spectacle as was here exhibited on the banks of the Muskingum. It was no longer a hostile camp, but a stage on which human nature was displaying its most attractive and noble traits; or rather a sublime poem, enacted there in the bosom of the wilderness, whose burden was human affection, and whose great argument the common brotherhood of mankind.

Boquet and his officers were deeply impressed, and could hardly believe their own senses when they saw young warriors, whose deeds of daring and savage ferocity had made their names a terror on the frontier, weeping like children over their bereavement.

A treaty of peace having been concluded with the various tribes, Boquet, taking hostages to secure their good behavior and the return of the remaining prisoners, broke up his camp on the 18th of November, and began to retrace his steps toward Fort Pitt. The leafless forest rocked and roared above the little army as it once more entered its gloomy recesses; and that lovely spot on the banks of the Muskingum, on which such strange scenes had been witnessed, lapsed again into solitude and silence. The Indians gazed with various and conflicting emotions on the lessening files—some with grief and desolation of heart because they bore away the objects of their deep affection, others with savage hate, for they went as conquerors.

A few, impelled by their affection for the prisoners, refused to stay behind. Though warned by the officers of the danger they incurred in returning to the frontiers which they had drenched in blood—of the private vengeance that would be wreaked on them by those whose homes they had made desolate—they could not be persuaded to turn back. Thus, day after day, they moved on with the army, leaving it only to hunt for those who had so long shared their wigwams.

THE OLD SONG.

THE MINGO CHIEF.

Among these was a young Mingo chief, who could not be forced to leave a young Virginian woman whom he had taken for his wife. Neither persuasions nor the prospect of falling a victim to the vengeance of those whose friends he had slain could make him remain behind. He treasured the young pale-face in his fierce heart with a devotion that laughed at danger. His love was as untamable as his hate; and in his bosom the fires of passion glowed with an intensity found only in those who have never submitted to a restraint, and whose highest law is the gratification of their own desires. Silent and gloomy he accompanied the army, drawn irresistibly on by one sweet face that shut all other objects from his sight. She had left his wigwam forever, and he could no longer soothe her with caressing words and be rewarded by a gentle look; but he could hover round her path, and bring her those delicacies which he so well knew how to select. No knight in the days of chivalry ever exhibited a higher gallantry or more unselfish devotion than did this haughty young Mingo.

In ten days the army again drew up in the little clearing in front of Fort Pitt, and were welcomed with loud shouts. The war was over, and the troubled frontier rested once more in peace.

After a time Boquet went to Philadelphia, where he was received with distinguished kindness, and warmly welcomed, especially by those whose friends he had rescued from the Indians. The Assembly voted him a complimentary address; while the Home Government, as a reward for his services, promoted him to the rank of Brigadier-General, and placed him in command of the Southern Department of North America. He did not live long, however, to enjoy his honors, for three years after he died of a fever in Pensacola.

THE COAST RANGERS.

A CHRONICLE OF EVENTS IN CALIFORNIA.

III.—HUNTING ADVENTURES.

BEFORE proceeding to narrate our wonderful hunting adventures, I must fulfill the promise made in my last chapter, of telling how Captain Toby saved our vinegar and the life of our excellent friend, Tom Fry:

The Judge and Mr. Fry, it appears, were riding at some distance behind the party, enjoying a social chat on the various subjects suggested by the adventures of the day. In the course of the conversation the Judge accidentally struck upon fish-chowder, which started Mr. Fry into such a labyrinth of reminiscences in that direction that he entirely lost sight of the trail. It became necessary to cross a portion of the beach, over which a small stream from a neighboring cañon made its way. The tracks of the main party became merged in Mr. Fry's visions of fish-chowder, and the Judge, unfortunately, was too polite to interrupt that gentleman in his very pleasant dissertation. It was brought to a very abrupt conclusion, however, by the sudden disappearance of Mr. Fry from the back of his mule. That animal had unexpectedly manifested an unwillingness to proceed, and left his rider about ten feet in advance of him, plunging wildly in a bed of quick-sand. It was some moments before the unfortunate gentleman could regain his feet, and when he did, one of them broke through the deceitful surface, while he was endeavoring to make his escape with the other. The more he struggled the deeper he sank. He was soon up to his hips, and it was evident that he must go under altogether unless some relief could be afforded, and that very speedily. The Judge promptly dismounted from his mule to render assistance. Both mules being now free availed themselves of the opportunity, and started back for the Reservation, taking with them the saddles, blankets, and various equipments of their riders. Nothing was left behind except the Judge and Mr. Fry, and a small blue keg said to contain vinegar, which had been cast over the mule's head at the same time with the latter, and was now partially sunk in the sand.

"Judge," said Tom, with horror depicted in every feature of his expressive countenance, "I'm sinking, as sure as fate! What's to be done?"

Now the Judge was a man of noble and generous impulses. He was willing to do any thing in the world to save the life of a fellow-creature; but this was not a river or pond of water into which one man could plunge and pull another out. It would be the height of folly for two to get fastened in the quick-sand when the only prospect of escape was for one to keep some hold upon the firm ground. These thoughts flashed through the Judge's mind, and for a moment the prospect looked exceedingly dreary.

"Can't you throw me a rope," shouted Tom, "or something to hold on to, Judge? I'm sinking deeper and deeper!"

"A rope—yes, certainly," answered the Judge; "just wait a moment till I run after my mule."

"Don't leave me," implored Tom; "you will never be able to catch that mule, and I can't wait much longer. I'm half gone now."

"Then what in the world must I do?" exclaimed the Judge, profoundly moved by the pitiable plight of his friend; "there is not a stick or willow bush that I can see within half a mile. If there were any Indians in this vicinity I would not hesitate to solicit their services. Ungenerously as they have been treated by the white race, I scarcely think there is one so lost to every sentiment of humanity as to refuse aid to a suffering fellow-creature in an emergency like this. Indeed, instances are not rare in which they have manifested a spirit of magnanimity worthy a civilized people. It is to be regretted that the policy of the Federal Government toward them in this State, however well intended, has been so disastrous in its results. Even during our own brief intercourse with them have we not found them amiable, docile, and inoffensive, ready to perform any service required of them, looking to us as to a superior order of beings, manifesting a degree of patience under the cruel wrongs inflicted upon them that must certainly move the sympathies of every right-minded man? There is a pleading eloquence in the very helplessness of their condition more pathetic than any ever yet achieved through the gift of human language. It requires no rhetorical aid. It is the truth and nothing more, profoundly affecting because profoundly sad. When we reflect that they are rapidly disappearing from the face of the earth—" [Here the unfortunate gentleman in the quick-sand groaned.] —"that in a few years there will not be one left to tell the sad tradition of their woes—that, in short—" [Here Mr. Tom Fry cried out that he was about to disappear; he was already down to the pit of his stomach, and there was no hope for him whatever. He begged the Judge to inform the members of the Association of his unhappy fate, and to request them to dig for his body and give it a decent burial if they could find it.]

TOM FRY IN THE QUICK-SAND.

To which the Judge responded as follows: "I will certainly do so, my dear fellow, and if I can serve you in any other way, mention it while you have yet an opportunity. I don't think you will go entirely under for about ten minutes. It is even possible, calculating the rate at which you have heretofore disappeared, that you may keep your head above ground for fifteen minutes. I remember reading of a man who saved his life, under similar circumstances, by stretching himself out on the top of the sand on his belly, and working his way over the surface to the solid ground; but I fear you are too far gone for that. It might have been done in the beginning, if one only could think of it. I have no doubt the young Lord of Ravenswood might have saved himself in the same way. You remember he was lost in the quick-sand after witnessing the insanity of his betrothed, the beautiful Lucy Ashton, the Bride of Lammermoor, who 'sat gibbering in the corner.' He rode away on his horse, and was seen to disappear in the quick-sands. There is nothing in the whole range of English literature more powerfully wrought than the closing scenes of this splendid romance; the forced marriage, the insanity of the bride, and the sad fate of the young and noble Lord of Ravenswood. I never see or hear of quick-sands that I do not think of this unfortunate youth, as he vanished from the earth almost at the threshold of life. The picture is even more impressive and affecting than the closing scene of Kenilworth, in which the unhappy heroine is suffered to fall into a deep pit, where the last that is seen of her is the fluttering of her white robes."

Here the unhappy Tom protested, with streaming eyes, that His Honor would soon see the last of him also, for he was now buried to the armpits, and was working down deeper and deeper every moment.

"A very remarkable fact," said the Judge, "suggestive of the singular difference which exists between animals with warm binocular hearts and the inferior orders of creation occupying the watery elements. Even the pearl-fishers on the coast of Lower California, who are esteemed to be extraordinarily expert swimmers, and who practice diving from early childhood, can not hold their breath under the water more than two minutes; and it is scarcely possible that the most experienced of them could exist under a deep bed of quick-sand for a much greater length of time. Of all animals with warm blood the whale possesses, perhaps, the most remarkable capacity in this respect. I have been informed that they frequently remain under the water an hour before the supply of air which they take down with them is exhausted. Indeed, it is a mooted point in the science of Cetology, whether the whale really belongs to the order of animals, or whether it is not, properly speaking, a fish. We have the authority of Scripture for it that it was a great fish that swallowed Jonah, though no mention is made of the generally received fact that the fish was a whale. Pliny refers to big fishes that were bred in the Indian Ocean, among which he mentions whales; but, on the other hand, Linnæus, in his System of Nature, undertakes to show that whales should be separated from the fish tribe on account of their warm binocular hearts, their lungs, their movable eyelids, their hollow ears, and mammiferous breasts. Hunter asserts that the blood of this order is similar to that of quadrupeds, but has an idea that the red globules are in larger proportions. Baron Cuvier describes the whale as a mammiferous animal without hind feet; and the quaint old Fuller speaks of these great leviathans as mighty animals that swim in a sea of water and have a sea of oil swimming in them. Even now, my dear fellow, we can see them sporting in the distance. These must be the California or gray whales, so abundant on this coast, and for the capture of which shore fisheries have been established at San Diego, Monterey, and Crescent City. Observe how lazily they roll about, puffing up their jets of mist as if they were enjoying the best Havana cigars. It is refreshing to see the mighty inhabitants of the deep thus disport themselves in the sheen of the blue waves, warming their glistening backs and shaking their black flippers in the sunbeams. What great, jolly fellows they are—big school-boys of the brine at their holiday sport! It almost tempts one to turn whale-fisher, and go out and take a buffet with them—such a scene!"

Here Tom declared, in piteous tones, that he would turn whale-fisher, pearl-diver, or any thing else, if it were only within the bounds of possibility to save him; but he feared he was utterly gone.

At this critical juncture a voice was heard on the side of the mountain—the voice of Captain Toby, who came dashing down the cliffs on his famous Broncho, whirling his lasso round his head and singing, with stentorian lungs,

"Little pigs lie with their noses bare,
Sing angderang dare!
Lillebulero! Lillebulero! Lillebulero! ley!
Oh, my daddy's a bonny wee man,
Sing angderang dang!"

With a wild yell and a few adroit exploits of the Broncho, which he compelled to charge and retreat, rear up on the hind legs and dance over the sand in a strikingly miraculous manner, Captain Toby appeared at the scene of the disaster, and demanded what he could do to serve the great cause of suffering humanity.

The difficulty was quickly explained. Captain Toby, ever ready in resources, saw the remedy at a glance. Dashing up to the edge of the quick-sand, he whirled his lasso round his head, gave another wild whoop, and cast the noose—not over the body of the sinking man, as might be supposed, but over the keg of "vinegar," which he immediately dragged to a place of safety. Dismounting from his animal, he dexterously extracted the bung from the keg, took a protracted pull at the contents, and ejaculated fervently, "Praised be Moses, the keg is saved! There's nourishment in that vinegar!" Next moment he was mounted on the Broncho, and with a terrific whoop and flourish of the lasso he secured the unfortunate Tom Fry. By the united efforts of the Broncho, the Captain, and the Judge, Mr. Fry was safely landed on dry ground. A little scrubbing and chafing, aided by the nourishing effects of the vinegar, soon brought him to, though it was impossible to stop the chattering of his teeth.

Having performed this effective service, Captain Toby looked about for the mules. While the Judge was explaining where they had gone to, the Captain said he knew the exact spot; he had been there frequently, and was intimately acquainted with a cinnamon bear that ranged in that vicinity. Upon which he put spurs to the Broncho, and with a whoop that resounded for miles up the cañon dashed off after the mules.

It was only two miles to the camp, and the walk would thoroughly resuscitate Mr. Fry, who by this time manifested all the symptoms of a violent ague. As he was about to start off, the Judge insinuated his arm through that of his afflicted friend and gently detained him.

"After all," said his Honor, "there is something fascinating in this wild life. It is refreshing to get away from the crowded city, with all its petty trials and cares, and enjoy, even for a brief period, an aboriginal existence, free from the turmoil of business, and untrammelled by the conventionalities of society. The constitution is invigorated [Here Mr. Fry shivered like an aspen]; the mind becomes placid [Tom groaned]; the whole physical and mental organization undergo a beneficial change [Tom hoped it might be so]. It is better than that primitive condition of health which at first appears to result from the use of opium, as De Quincey informs us in his 'Confessions,' because it is followed by no depression—no remorse of conscience. As we sit on the rock of ages [Here the Judge quietly seated himself on a stump, still retaining possession of his friend's arm]—as we sit here communing with old Ocean, is not the very grandeur of the scene a balm for the sickness of care? See the swelling waves as they come rolling in over the beach. What a sweetly-mournful music they make! They are singing a hymn to the Deity for the souls of lost mariners. Yet sometimes, when the ocean is in its calmer moods, we can fancy that the waves are travelers from the islands beyond the horizon—the beautiful Islands of the South Sea—coming to tell us of palm-trees, of orange groves, and the perpetual verdure of the tropics—of the dusky maidens of Typee and Nukaheva.”

THE VINEGAR IS SAFE.

TOM FRY SAVED.

[Tom shuddered at the miserable figure he would cut in female society, covered all over with quicksand.]

“On this wild and rock-bound coast,” resumed the Judge, “the everlasting surf has carved out strange and fanciful forms—of satyrs and genii; of great black giants, who stand in the spray with dripping beards of sea-weed, ready to devour ships and their crews; of ruined temples and ‘cities by the sea,’ which loom with an alluring beauty in the distance, but change to rugged peaks and dismal fortresses of slimy rocks as men. Cries of agonized distress are mingled with the wild roar of the surf. You turn away with mute horror, feeling the utter insignificance of human power to cope with the rage that vents itself upon this stern and inhospitable coast."

THE MENDOCINO COAST.

Here a terrific whoop startled the Judge. It was the voice of Captain Toby, who came charging down the hill-side on his Broncho, swinging his riata over his head, and driving the two mules in advance. Whichever way they turned to avoid the inexorable swing of the riata, Toby was after them: over jagged rocks, through chaparral, down abrupt banks, along the edges of fearful precipices, till, panting and reeking wet, they were brought up "with a round turn" in front of the Judge and Mr. Tom Fry. As the former was about to resume his discourse on the horrors of the shores of Mendocino by giving some account of the adventures of Pedro Cabrillo, the Spanish pilot who first advanced so far to the northward, Captain Toby dismounted and requested to be informed "if the vinegar was safe?" To which his Honor responded that it was. Captain Toby drew the bung, put his mouth to the orifice, held the keg up, and found that it was.

"Gentlemen," said he, "I have been there. I was the original discoverer of that trail. Last summer I met with a very singular adventure in the immediate vicinity. I went out from camp to kill a deer. We were badly in want of meat. In the course of my ramble the Indians began to gather round me, first one, then two, then three or four, and so on until there were twenty or thirty. They seemed perfectly friendly, only they annoyed me. Each Indian as he appeared began to whistle, until the whistling swelled to a chorus that was perfectly intolerable. I begged them to desist; the more I begged the closer they followed me, and the louder they whistled. I turned off in various directions; they still followed whistling with all their might. I pointed my rifle at them; they held up their bows, and kept on whistling. No matter what I said or did, the miserable wretches kept up their abominable discord. I walked back to camp. They still followed, whistling. For two days they whistled at us without cessation. There were four of us in camp; but as we did not wish to kill them, there was no other resource than to pull up stakes and leave. It was the first time I was ever whistled out of a country. The incident is strictly true, gentlemen. You may depend upon it."

Mr. Fry said that, "upon the whole, he would rather depend upon getting to camp. He was wet to the skin, and if he remained stationary much longer he would be certain to die of cramps in the stomach."

The hint was sufficient for Captain Toby, who immediately helped his friends to mount their mules. This done, he gave a whoop that struck terror into the souls of those refractory animals, put spurs to his Broncho, whirled his lasso over his head and drove all before him, at a fearful rate, up hill and down hill, over frightful gulches, through dense masses of chaparral, till they reached the camp, where Mr. Tom Fry took an opportunity of publicly returning thanks to Captain Toby, and where he subsequently devoured such a dinner of broiled venison as completely restored the circulation of his blood and frightened away the chills—a fact that reminded his Honor the Judge of many pleasing anecdotes, with which he entertained the company till long after midnight.

Our hunters were becoming more successful every day. The camp was literally ornamented with festoons of game hung from the branches of the trees. Even the veriest tyro had killed a rabbit or a quail. The force of example at length produced its effect upon the Judge. It was evident, from the manner in which he picked up stray rifles and pointed them at distant stumps of trees, that something was brewing in his mind. Ambition had seized upon his Honor. He would go out in the hills and kill a deer. After much consideration he stated the case to Captain Toby, whose experience in these matters was at once profound and extensive. Toby was personally acquainted with every deer ranging the hills within a circuit of twenty miles. He knew exactly the local habitation of certain old bucks, with five-pointed antlers, and was intimate with two grizzly bears in the same vicinity. If his Honor desired it, they would attack the grizzlies first, and after killing them there would be no difficulty in getting a chance at the bucks. The Judge took the proposition under advisement. It would certainly be an achievement worth talking of to kill two grizzlies; but then there was a great deal of testimony going to show that the chances were about even whether the bears or the hunters would be most likely to suffer in an encounter of this kind—especially when one of the attacking party could barely hit the side of a hill at the distance of a hundred yards.

"If you know of any bucks," said his Honor, "in some other locality usually avoided by grizzly bears, it strikes me it would be more attractive under the circumstances."

Captain Toby knew of any number of places. There was a point of rocks about five miles distant where a doe and two fawns made their appearance every evening; the doe had a white face, and the fawns were speckled. They usually appeared in company with two small rabbits and a flock of quail. Within a mile of that point, in a deep gulch, there was a spiked buck, with a black nose, a little lame in one of the hind legs. To the right about half a mile there was a fine fat roe, with a bullet hole through the left ear, which he (Captain Toby) had put there last year merely by way of a mark. As for bucks, there was a hill about ten miles off alive with bucks, and no grizzly bears within a range of three miles.

The Judge thought the hill that was alive with bucks would suit. He could certainly hit some part of the hill, and kill at least one buck. It was confidentially arranged that his Honor and Captain Toby should start at daylight on the following morning, properly equipped for the adventure.

OUR CAMP.

Of course I can only give the result, as it was subsequently detailed to me by Captain Toby. They reached the hill in due time, after a most laborious ride through brush and chaparral, during which the Judge had become so enthusiastic that he manifested a strong disposition to devote the remainder of his days to the destruction of deer. As they approached the locality of the game, it was deemed necessary by Captain Toby to subdue the Judge's enthusiasm by a few brief instructions. "You must keep perfectly cool," said he, "or you will be sure to miss your game. When you see a buck and feel the ague coming on you, draw a long breath and brace your nerves. Aim a little back of the fore shoulder, nearly on a line with the fore legs, so as to take him in the heart. Get your sight plumb on the spot where you want to put your bullet, and then bang away." Scarcely had the Judge time to comprehend the full force of these useful hints, when a splendid buck bounced out from a bunch of chaparral on the opposite side of a ravine, and stood broadside within sixty yards, antlers erect, and staring fixedly at the intruders.

"There he is!" whispered Toby. "Draw a fine bead on him, and he's a dead buck."

"Where? Where?" whispered the Judge, eagerly.

"There—don't you see him—a little to the right of that bush yonder."

"Oh, yes. I see." The Judge proceeded to take aim.

"Hold!" cried Toby. "If your Honor will excuse me, that's a stump you're aiming at."

"Is it? I thought you said it was a deer."

"The deer's yonder, about fifty yards to the left. There, don't you see? Be quick, Judge. "I'll point the rifle toward him for you."

"Oh! that's the deer, is it? Now I see him." And the Judge proceeded again to fire. He drew a fine bead on the fore shoulder, as directed by Captain Toby; he then drew a long breath and braced his nerves, as likewise directed. It was a magnificent sight. The buck stood full broadside, as motionless as if carved from the solid rock—his Honor standing in beautiful relief, with a "dead bead" on him.

"Toby," said the Judge, turning his face toward the Captain, the rifle still fixed accurately upon the deer—"Toby, I shall never forget your kindness in affording me this opportunity of killing so noble an animal. Such a buck as that would be a splendid achievement for any man. Should it ever be in my power to reciprocate this favor, rest assured, my dear Sir, it will afford me the most sincere pleasure to do so. Call upon me at any time in San Francisco, and command me for any service not inconsistent with my public duties. Amidst the cares of office, this will be an incident to remember with unbounded satisfaction. I can now truly appreciate the fine flow of spirits with which Christopher North describes the chase of the red deer in the Highlands of Scotland. His sketches, indeed, may be considered the very poetry of hunting. With what genial freshness he dashes them off, as if his pen were dipped in the dew that sparkles on the mountain heather! We hear the birds sing as we wander through his aviary; we see the eagle perched upon his eyrie and the hawk swoop upon his prey. We laugh at the green goose "splay-footed and hissing in miserable imitation of a serpent, lolling from side to side like an ill-trimmed punt, and cackling angrily as if King George the Fourth were meditating mischief against him." The picture is graphic, yet, after all, is not the goose a noble bird? Popular tradition or vulgar prejudice has fixed upon him as the emblem of foolishness. Never was there a greater mistake, Captain Toby. I do not speak of that ignoble bird whose home is in the barn-yard. He is no more to be compared to the wild goose, whose eye pierces the firmament, and whose graceful form, sleek and sharp, cleaves the heavens, than the fatted calf is to the fleet and slender antelope. This noble bird is the very incarnation of beauty and wisdom. How low, dull, and groveling is the owl in comparison—the carnivorous night-bird that sits hooting in the trees, with goggle and unmeaning eyes, watching for bats! Not even the Royal Eagle, the Bird of Jove, the reputed King of the Skies, born on 'the rock of ages,' in noble instinct gazing upon the sun, 'affronting and outstaring the light,' whose palace is in the craggy cliffs, and whose domain is in the high heavens—not even he can compare with the wintry wanderer who carries the seasons upon his prow. Gross in his appetites, fierce and sensual in his character, a semi-domestic bird with a local habitation, the eagle is limited in his flights, wheeling over a few miles of weather-beaten rocks. Not for him is it to cross wintry oceans, trackless deserts, and boundless continents, in a line drawn by an inscrutable instinct through the firmament. See with what ease, steadiness, and precision the emigrant geese move in their long journey; how adroitly they elect their leader and cleave the air in an acute angle; how undeviating is their course! But Wilson, who has fallen into the prevailing error of ridiculing this noble bird, says, forsooth, it waddles upon the ground like an ill-trimmed punt—a comparison both unjust and unreasonable. The Royal Eagle scarcely walks more gracefully. Earth is not his element. Man, erect and noble, made after God's own image, walks upon the earth with a firm and elastic step, but he can not fly. Is he a subject of contempt when he topples from a height like a bag of meal? is he the less graceful that he has no balance in mid-air? Then, again, the voice. What earthly sound can be compared with the cry of the wild geese, when the 'flood-gates of heaven' are opened, and they pass night after night over the plains in their journey to the far south. It has some peculiar quality of remoteness that fills the soul with awe—something clear, cold, distant, and intangible in its melody, that is not of earth. No eagle makes such music as this. The intonation of their voices possesses a penetrating power beyond the influence of space. While they cackle cozily to each other in their rapid and steady flight miles up in the sky, one might imagine they were within gunshot. They are the incarnation of wildness, the antipodes of civilization, the Ishmaelites of the feathery world. Whence they come we know not, where they go who can tell? From north to south in autumn, and back again in spring, is all we know. What a wonderful instinct is that which teaches them to follow a line through the trackless wastes of ether, thousands of miles long, by day and by night, in sunshine and in darkness, without guide or compass, resting by the way only for food, rising again and pushing steadily onward till they reach their destination in some wild watery plain! He who holds the winds in the hollow of his hand, who sweeps the earth with trailing clouds, hath created a power more wonderful than reason; but it is not for man to penetrate the mysteries of this inscrutable instinct. In early boyhood the flight of geese possesses a charm that fills the imagination. The uncertainty of their destination is a fascination in itself. We know not where they will rest, what new and unexplored regions they will visit. As they grow dim in the distance we feel that we are of earth, earthy. Something akin to despair seizes us as the great truth flashes upon us that man, the noblest of God's works, is, after all, but a kneaded clod; in this respect at least inferior to the goose, that he can not fly. I never hear the voice of this strange and tireless wanderer of the firmament—this thing of distance and the unfathomable wilderness—without an undefinable feeling that carries me back to the days of boyhood; to something that has been, and never will be again. They strike in their rapid flight an Æolian chord, as if the wild winds played upon the heart, and wrought out of it a strain of harmony in unison with the untamed spirit that lies in the inner nature of man. Did you ever study the eye of a goose, Captain

THE JUDGE RETURNS THANKS TO CAPTAIN TOBY.

Toby? A strange question, perhaps, yet not without reason. The eye is peculiar; round, red-rimmed, cold, and clear, as if cut out of an arctic sky; not bold and piercing like that of an eagle, nor cruel and malignant like that of a hawk, but far-reaching and steadfast—looking beyond you into remote and indefinite regions. You are lost in space as you gaze upon it; icy wastes are spread before you, and the imagination is filled with vague pictures of an untrodden wilderness—a wilderness of infinite spaces."

"Yes, Judge," said Captain Toby, who was by this time getting a little thirsty—"that's so. I know it by personal experience. I have been there frequently in the course of my travels, and am perfectly familiar with the trail. I killed a fine buck there last summer. But, by-the-way, Judge, our deer has vanished. He started off about ten minutes ago."

"Vanished! started off!" exclaimed the Judge, who during all this time had kept, as he supposed, dead aim on the animal. "Have you any idea where he has gone, Captain Toby?"

"Oh yes, I am perfectly familiar with the spot. It is about three miles off; but the trail is a little gulchy."

"Very strange," said the Judge, musingly, "that he should have disappeared so suddenly!"

"Oh, not at all strange," remarked Captain Toby; "I know that buck intimately. He has a habit of getting out of the way when he sees a rifle pointed at him. Like Jack and the gallows, he thinks it is a sign of civilization."

As the prospect of getting another chance at the same buck was somewhat remote, the Judge thought it best to explore the hill in search of another. After several hours of ineffectual research, Captain Toby remembered that at this season the deer lie concealed in the brush, and it would not be possible to get them out without a dog. He remembered also that he had once come near crippling himself for life, at this season of the year, by stumbling over a fine buck that was lying concealed in some chaparral. On another occasion, as he was seated under a bank of brush waiting for the deer to come out, a buck and a doe jumped on his back, and very nearly trampled him to death. Fortunately the buck's foot struck the trigger of his rifle, and set it off; so that he accidentally killed a fine doe that was trying to make its escape in another direction. He thought it would be best to postpone further proceedings for about two months.

"On the whole, however," said the Judge, cheerfully, as they rode back toward the camp, "I am satisfied that the buck I was about to shoot pursued the most judicious course. I had a very fine aim on him, and would certainly have killed him had he remained in the same spot a moment longer."

To which Captain Toby assented; but there was a twinkle in the corner of his eye that caught the attention of the Judge.

"Toby," said his Honor, gravely, "you will confer an additional obligation on me by not detailing the incidents of this adventure in camp."

AN ESCAPE.

Of course the Captain promised. It was not until six months after that I came in possession of the facts; and I now place them upon record with a conviction that, so far from reflecting any discredit upon the Judge, they present some of the most amiable traits of his character in a new light.

I had by this time killed several deer and innumerable rabbits and squirrels. The sport was getting rather tame. Constant practice with the rifle had so far developed my natural talent in that branch of science, that I could without difficulty shoot the head of a quail off at the distance of forty paces. Colonel Jack had killed a grizzly, and his man John, the Irishman, had killed a cinnamon cub. There was no reason why I should not also distinguish myself by killing a bear. I had helped to harpoon a large number of whales; and every body knows that whales, if not so active, are much larger and more formidable than bears. The grand and primary difference between an attack upon the leviathan of the deep and any engagement upon land of which history presents a record is, that the general who leads the forces makes the attack in person, and carries his men to the "imminent deadly breach" with their backs to the enemy. The greatest warriors of antiquity never dared to do such a thing as that. It was reserved for such men as the Coffins, the Macys, the Tabers, the Potters, and their descendants, to go into battle with their ragged regiments of red-shirts facing the logger-head at the stern of the boat. Herein likewise consists a notable difference between attacking a grizzly and a whale—that while the bear-hunter always reserves to himself a chance to run or climb some hospitable tree, the pent-up whalerman, in the worst extremity, can only jump overboard, where the hungry sharks of the deep are ever ready to devour him. Allowing for a difference of elements, this is little better than jumping from the frying-pan into the fire. In fact, such a jump has often been made—not into the fire, but into the water. It is related in the Missionary Journal of Tyerman and Bennet that an old whaler once attacked a whale and wounded him. The furious monster rushed on the boat, and the crew were only preserved by leaping into the water when they saw that the onset was inevitable. I mention these facts merely to show that, by analogy, I was amply qualified to kill a grizzly; and I determined to do it. The risk was great, to be sure. I knew several gentlemen in California who had been horribly mutilated by these ferocious animals. One had the side of his face torn off; another had one of his arms "chawed up," as he expressed it; a third had suffered paralysis from a bite in the spine; a fourth had received eighteen wounds in a fight with one bear; and I knew of various cases in which men had been otherwise crippled for life or killed on the spot. Hence the peculiar charm of a fight with a grizzly! If you kill your bear, it is a triumph worthy enjoying; if you get killed yourself, some of the newspapers will give you a friendly notice; if you get crippled for life, you carry about you a patent of courage which may be useful in case you go into politics; and although honor may not be capable of binding a wounded leg, or mending a crippled arm—as Falstaff hath it—yet it will go a great way in a legislative campaign. Besides, it has its effect upon the ladies. A “chawed up” man is very much admired all over the world.

But it is time to proceed to my adventure. I never mentioned the matter to a soul in camp; nor, in fact, have I ever mentioned it, in or out of camp, up to this day, except to Captain Toby. It seemed to me that it would be better to go out and kill the bear first, and then walk leisurely back as if nothing uncommon had happened. In achievements of this kind a great deal depends upon the unconcerned manner in which they are performed. One gets credit for even more coolness than he may actually possess.

At the break of day, a few mornings after we had pitched our encampment in Bear Harbor, I saddled my mule, drank a cup of coffee, and ate some bread and venison, shouldered my rifle, and rode off. The only intimation I gave to any person of my contemplated enterprise was to request Captain Toby to send an Indian after me in case I failed to return to camp before dark. Following the coast for about two miles, I took up a ridge extending apparently to the highest point of the back range. The morning was foggy; but upon reaching an elevation of about two thousand feet it became delightfully clear—the fog lying in misty flakes over the valleys below. Ridges of every conceivable variety of outline stretched downward to the rocky shores, where the swell of the ocean was forever breaking, and dim in the distance was the horizon merged in the rays of the rising sun. Pinnacles of rocks rose like castles and battlements on the shore, around which the ocean surged with a ceaseless moan. The ravines were clothed on either side with tangled masses of chaparral; the open hills were covered with a rich carpet of wild oats, through which wound the trails of bear, elk, and deer. On distant points to the northward arose the signal-fires of the Indians, warning the various tribes of the approach of the white men. In the rear dense forests of pine and red-wood loomed up on peak above peak, till it seemed as if the whole country, as far as the eye could reach, were nothing but a confused mass of rugged mountains. The waters of the Mattole River could be distinctly traced from the higher elevations, winding through mazes of blue mountains from the direction of Long Valley toward Cape Mendocino, traversing in their course a region the wildest and most picturesque perhaps in California. The Indians of Eel River and Mendocino still inhabit the greater portion of this large circuit of country, extending for an area of more than a hundred miles, and lying between the Bald Hills of Humboldt, the headwaters of Eel River, Long Valley, and the Indian Reservation at the Noyo River. They are still comparatively wild, and will doubtless continue to be, so long as the white settlers hunt them down and kill them. Within this extensive range, as yet but thinly settled by white men, game still continues to be very abundant, especially in the wilder and more unfrequented parts bordering on the coast. It is too remote from the principal towns to render hunting for the market profitable; and hence it is visited principally by roving parties who have a natural propensity for getting out of the reach of civilization or killing Indians. The grizzly, the brown, and cinnamon bears, large black and gray wolves, panthers, wild-cats, the elk and the deer, and various kinds of smaller game, are so numerous in some of the hills south of Shelter Cove that there is no difficulty in supplying the wants of the largest camp.

But this digression has led me a little out of the line of my narrative. After enjoying the view from the top of the mountain for some time, I turned into an Indian trail, and traveled for several miles along the ridge in an easterly direction. I soon lost sight of the coast, and the reverberation of the surf no longer penetrated the wilderness of dense forests by which I was surrounded. Trees of prodigious size, which had been uprooted by heavy gales of wind, lay across the trail at frequent intervals, rendering it necessary in some places to make a detour of several hundred yards, through matted jungles of undergrowth, in order to reach the trail again on the opposite side. At one point of my journey these obstructions were so numerous that it must have taken two hours to make the distance of half a mile. The whole forest seemed to be wrenched up and scattered in a confused mass over the rugged face of the mountain; and it was often with the utmost difficulty the indications of the trail could be discerned. My mule, in traversing this dreary wilderness, was stricken with such an intense fear of some hidden danger, and so terribly impressed by the silence, that he continually whirled around and started off in a panic, as if every grizzly and wild Indian in the country were at his heels; and it was only by constant spurring, goading, and verbal remonstrances that I could get him on at all. Toward noon I reached the open peak of a mountain, which I judged to be about five miles back from the ocean, though the distance traveled must have been double that. I had seen numerous deer, but as yet nothing in the shape of a bear. The view from the point which I had now attained was absolutely grand. For a distance of more than twenty miles the forests were perfectly black, having been burned by Indian fires previous to the last rain. Many of the larger trees were still smoking; the earth was covered with ashes; nothing was wanted to complete a scene of the most absolute desolation. It was apparent that no game could be within the limits of that region. There was no longer any trace of the trail, which upon entering the burned district became lost in the ashes.

Upon consideration, I thought it best now to attempt to regain the coast by taking a westerly direction. There were some steep cañons to be crossed; but by winding around the ridges the worst parts, which were altogether impracticable for a mule, might possibly be avoided. It was not long before I became involved in a labyrinth of brush or undergrowth, out of which there appeared to be no practicable way of making an exit. It grew worse and worse, until finally I was forced to dismount and work my way through step by step. The large timber grew thicker as I advanced, so that it was soon impossible to determine the direction of the sun in consequence of the dense shade overhead, and I could only rely upon the faint indications of the north perceptible on the trunks of the trees. I was not sufficiently practiced in wood-craft to rely with certainty upon signs like these, and must admit that my situation began to inspire some feelings of uneasiness. There is something profoundly awful in the solitude of a great forest, when one first becomes conscious of being lost within its vast shades, and utterly cut off from every trace of human fellowship. What power can cope with the unseen enemies that may be hidden in every jungle; and how weak and puny one feels beside those gigantic trees which have grown and battled with the elements for centuries, and now tower to such a dizzy height above his head! In such a position as this, cut off from every prospect of relief, and in close proximity to roving bands of hostile Indians, one can form some idea of the life and character of such men as Daniel Boone and the trappers of the Far West. It is then that their achievements have a coloring of moral grandeur. Men who, not from accident but sheer love of adventure—or, to speak in a higher sense, something akin to the inspiration of discovery—choose to abandon the haunts of civilization, and live months and years amidst the accumulated dangers of savages and wild beasts; bearing patiently the rigors of climate, and all the privations to which entire isolation from their fellow-creatures could subject them. When the fact became palpable that I was lost, and so effectually that I had no more idea where the camp was than if it had never existed, my admiration for Daniel Boone was profound. That he would never have lost his way in a circuit of five or six miles in broad daylight; and that if by some extraordinary accident he had, he would find it again I felt morally certain; but I had not the same degree of confidence in my own ability to achieve the same triumph over the mysteries of nature. The only hope of getting out of the difficulty was to attain some open point where I could get some idea of the bearings of the sea. After a short rest, I again pushed on as fast as it was possible to break a way through the brush. At times my mule was so unmanageable from a constitutional fear of Indians, or snakes, or some other real or imaginary evil, that I was tempted to abandon him to his fate, and do without his services for the future. Not only was it necessary to pull him down steep cañons, but to drag him up on the other side, which, considering the roughness of the ground and the tangled mass of brush, was no easy task. In the course of a few hours I succeeded in reaching a comparatively open space covered with a thick growth of fern. The place seemed to be surrounded by tremendous cañons and broken ridges, all heavily timbered. Fortunately the undergrowth of shrubbery had given way to patches of fern, over which it was practicable to see some distance. But either the sun had gone down or was covered with clouds. I could discover no clew to the direction of the sea. Once or twice I mounted the mule and gave him the bridle; he invariably started off in a direction which seemed the exact opposite of the right one, though I have since suspected that the poor animal was right. On the whole, I thought it best to tie him to a tree, and make a little tour of discovery on foot, though this plan involved a serious consideration. It was possible to lose both the tree and the mule! Of course it would be easy to mark the tree by cutting a little of the bark off, and as the mule was tied to it by a strong riata, there would be no difficulty in finding him at the same time. But then, that was something after the fashion of the Schildburgers, who, when they buried the town bell in the sea to keep the enemy from getting it in case of an invasion, were at a loss how to designate the spot, and put a chalk-mark on the side of the boat. However, it would be easy to keep within range of a few hundred yards. Something must be done, for it was evident that night was rapidly approaching.

Following the highest apparent direction of the ridge, it was not long before a larger opening in the timber was perceptible; and this there was reason to hope would command a view of the ocean. In the excitement of the discovery I pushed on as fast as possible over the rough and jagged rocks; and upon crossing a small cañon was gratified by the familiar sound of the surf in the distance. There could now no longer be a doubt as to the proper direction. I hurried back with all speed toward the point of departure, as I supposed, but soon found that every rise in the ground and every tree had about the same general appearance. Here was another dilemma. In looking for the mule there was danger of losing the direction of the surf, and to lose both would be a sad climax to the adventure. Certainly it could not be more than half a mile to the place I had started from, and as the timber was tolerably open there was no great difficulty in seeing that far. While I was deliberating upon this unforeseen state of affairs, a crackling sound in the bushes, about fifty yards off, attracted my attention. It was too heavy for the tread of a deer. I had often heard of the peculiar "snort," or blowing sound, uttered by a grizzly when suddenly alarmed, and as the crackling of the bushes was followed by this infallible sign, there could be no doubt on the subject. I had struck upon a grizzly after all, and now was the time to achieve a reputation! To tell the honest truth, the idea of attacking such a ferocious monster single-handed, in a lonesome and desolate place like this, so far away from all human aid, was rather startling. Suppose my rifle should miss fire, and the bear should take a notion to give chase? There was no possibility of escape. Nothing short of a squirrel or a wild-cat could climb any of the trees within the range of vision; and as for running, one might as well undertake to run over an acre of upturned harrows. The question was, to shoot or not to shoot? On the one hand, there was death or mutilation; on the other, had I not come out expressly to kill a grizzly, and here was one beyond peradventure? Already I saw his back moving about above the fern. He must be a monster, for the fern was at least four feet high. Probably he was standing on his hind legs. It was impossible to discern any particular portion of his body distinctly owing to the intervening brush, but I could see sufficient to indicate his exact position. I have never been able to analyze the exact feeling which governed me at this crisis, as I suddenly raised my rifle and with a quick and uncertain aim fired. It must have been inspiration. No sooner had the sharp crack of the rifle startled the solitudes of the forest than there was a most terrific crashing of bushes, and the mingled sounds of blowing and struggling, as if the animal was in his dying agonies. The fern waved to and fro, and even a tree of considerable size close by shook as if the bear was endeavoring to tear it up by the roots. All this I saw at a glance. The next moment astonishment at what I had done seized me. Was it possible I had killed a grizzly? At all events he was mortally wounded. The way he tore up the ground and made the dust fly was evidence of that. Still he was not yet dead. He might take a notion to give chase. Many a bear had killed or maimed his adversary after receiving a mortal wound. It must not be supposed that these various thoughts occupied much time. They flashed through my mind as suddenly as the crack of the rifle. Next moment I retired; that is to say, I ran about two hundred yards, rough as the ground was, at a rate of speed that I venture to say the renowned Guildersleeve in his palmiest days never attained. I then stopped to take breath and have a look at the enemy. The ground was somewhat elevated, and I could distinctly see the spot where the bear had manifested such violent symptoms of dissolution. It was perfectly still. The fern no longer waved; the bushes no longer crashed; the dust no longer rose from the scene of the struggle. But there was something there, standing stock still, staring at me—a large animal—not the bear evidently, for there never was a grizzly or any other species of bear known in natural history with such a pair of ears as this extraordinary animal had. I looked again and again; finally took out my spectacles, wiped them deliberately, put them on, and looked again. If I was astonished at the idea of having killed an enormous grizzly, I was infinitely more astonished to discover that the animal in question was not a grizzly, nor was it dead. On the contrary, it was MY OWN MULE! apparently transfixed with horror at the attempt I had made upon his life. The discovery was mortifying enough—not so much because I had shot at the mule, as because I had missed killing him. Who would believe the story in camp? Of what use was it to have tested one's nerve in this way, and then be subjected to a broadside of ridicule? Had I killed the mule the most incredulous in the camp would have given credit for the supposed achievement.

SHOOTING A GRIZZLY.

It was some time before the frightened animal would permit me to approach him with a rifle. He was evidently unable to account for the attack made upon him, and labored under some apprehension that it might be renewed at any moment. The mark of the ball was in the tree; and the struggle on the ground which had deceived me had arisen from the fact that the riata had gotten foul of his legs, and thrown him when he attempted to run after being shot at. Had he succeeded, the very singular spectacle would have been presented to any person who might have been present, of a mule and his rider running away from each other under the mutual impression that each was seeking the life of the other.

The rest of the day's labors was without any incident worthy of record. I reached the camp about dark, rather jaded after my trip. Of course many questions were asked, but as it was not uncommon for members of the party to hunt all day without killing any thing, they were easily and satisfactorily answered. Upon mentioning the affair to Captain Toby some months after, he said it was not an uncommon incident—the very same thing had happened to him, only he was not so unfortunate. He had succeeded in killing a very fine mule worth $500.

Within a day or two our camp was alarmed by an attack from a grizzly. But I must reserve an account of this for the next chapter of these remarkable adventures.

SPORTING IN SPITZBERGEN.

NORTHERN Europe has of late years been a favorite field for British tourists. The result has been a number of capital books, the best of which are Lord Dufferin's "Letters from High Latitudes," of which we have before spoken in this Magazine, and Mr. Lamont's recent "Seasons with the Sea-Horses."

"JAMES LAMONT, Esq., F.G.S.," is a man

worth knowing. From a hint dropped here and there, we gather that he is a Scotchman of wealth and position, who has traveled over a considerable part of our globe. Thus, apropos of an old battered opera-glass with which he was watching the movements of a white bear in Spitzbergen, he mentions some of the sights which that optical instrument had seen in its day. Besides its normal employment in the opera-houses of London, Paris, Florence, Naples, and New York, it had surveyed Epsom races, Champ de Mars reviews, Seville bull-fights, and Niagara rainbows. It had stalked red deer in Scottish Highlands, scaly crocodiles on Nile sand-banks, and thick-skinned hippopotami in reedy African rivers. It had read Egyptian inscriptions at Thebes and Karnak; had peered from the Allied trenches at the frowning batteries before Sebastopol. It had seen cane-fields from the mountains of Trinidad and Martinique, overlooked Naples from Vesuvius, Cairo from the pyramids, and Jerusalem from Calvary. Though a Fellow of the Geological Society, Mr. Lamont modestly disavows all scientific claims; yet he is sufficiently versed in natural sciences to render his observations and speculations of considerable value. But the main charm of his book is its graphic descriptions of the chase of the seal, the walrus, the white bear, and the reindeer in Spitzbergen.

A yacht cruise, made in 1858, to the coast of Norway, induced him to plan a voyage still further north. His own trim yacht, the Ginevra, was not adapted to navigation among the ice; so, having secured the co-operation of his friend, Lord David Kennedy, a sportsman of renown on the plains of India, he commissioned a Norwegian friend to hire a vessel and engage a crew for a cruise against the wild game of the Arctic Europe. The preparations included casks, to stow away the blubber, for it was determined that the oil and skins should pay a part of the cost of the cruise. Mr. Lamont, though a keen sportsman, is no vulgar slaughterer. He destroys no animal for the mere pleasure of killing it; to give him pleasure the death must somehow be of advantage. More than once he notes that he refrained from shooting seals, walruses, and reindeer, simply because it would have been impossible to recover their carcasses.

The projected trip, and the consequent book, came near failure. When Mr. Lamont was almost ready to start, he was solicited to become a candidate for member of Parliament, but was defeated by a small majority. This, as he says, was "unfortunate for the walruses, though perhaps fortunate for my constituents." Certainly it was fortunate for the readers of his book. Taking this political defeat quite coolly, Mr. Lamont and his friend urged on their preparations, and early in June, 1859, his yacht, having skirted the coast of Scotland, reached the Orkney Islands. At Lerwick, immortalized by Scott in "The Pirate," they attempted to procure some fresh supplies. But in this sea-port town of 3000 inhabitants they could not find a joint of meat, a pound of butter, or a single fresh fish. "This time of year," said a shopkeeper, "is what we call the starvation months."

Leaving the Orkneys, they steered in the teeth of contrary winds for the coast of Norway, and on the 23d of June reached Hammerfest, "the most northerly town in the world." It lies in latitude 70° 42', as far north from Quebec as Quebec is from New Orleans. Yet the sea never freezes here. The uttermost skirt of the Gulf Stream touches this northern extremity of Europe. A mere fragment of the mass of heated water poured from the caldron of the Gulf of Mexico, having made a journey of 8000 miles, retains sufficient heat to give to Hammerfest a winter temperature as high as that of Boston, 2000 miles to the south. Northern Europe, indeed, owes its habitability to our Gulf Stream. Were it not for this, Great Britain would have the climate of Labrador, which lies in the same latitude.

Hammerfest, according to Mr. Lamont, is "the most unsavory place in the universe." If acres upon acres of unsalted fish drying upon the rocks, and huge boileries of walrus blubber, coal-fish, and sharks'-liver oil are sufficient to create a stench equal to those of Cologne or Tunis, possibly this northern town may lay claim to a mal-odorous pre-eminence. Where travelers disagree, we shall not venture to decide. But we may agree with Mr. Lamont that, if the consumptive consumers of "pure cod-liver oil" could see how it is prepared at Hammerfest, its use would be seriously diminished.

At Hammerfest Mr. Lamont and Lord David found the vessel which they had engaged almost ready. The sloop Anna Louisa was an ugly tub of 30 tons burden, high at bow and stern, round in bottom, looking as though she was designed to make as much leeway as possible, and to upset at the first opportunity. The cabin was five feet high, furnished with two bunks, five and a half feet long. Deducting the space occupied by bunks and lockers, the available area of the cabin was just four feet square. She had, moreover, been the previous summer on a Spitzbergen trip, and was thoroughly impregnated with the odors of putrid walrus-oil and stale bilge-water. Her crew consisted of a "skyppar," or captain, and eleven men of various degrees.

Seals, walruses, bears, and reindeer were the game of which our sportsmen were in search. The great Spitzbergen seal—the Phoca barbata of naturalists—is an unwieldy creature some nine or ten feet long and six or seven in circumference, weighing about six hundred pounds, of which half is made up of skin and fat. The blubber yields about half its weight of fine oil. When in the water they are destitute of fear, and will come boldly up to a boat, first on one side and then on the other, as if they wished to make acquaintance with the strange object. It is, however, almost useless to shoot them in the water, as they sink at once. The most approved plan is not to fire unless the boat's head is directed toward the seal, and within thirty yards from it. Then if the men pull with a will, they may be in time to thrust a harpoon into him, and so save the body; but more likely they will be only in time to see him sinking, tail downward, just beyond reach. Probably two out of three seals shot in the water are lost. Upon the ice, where he retires to rest and sleep, the seal is a very different creature. Even when asleep he is on the look-out for his great enemy the white bear, lifting up his round bullet head every three or four minutes to take a survey of his situation. He always lies close to the edge of the ice, and at the slightest alarm flings himself into the water. He will never allow a boat to approach him nearer than fifty or sixty yards; so that he can be taken only by shooting him. He must be shot dead at once, for if wounded, no matter how severely, he is in the water at once, and farewell to his hide and the ten dollars' worth of oil packed away under it. To kill a seal from a boat at this distance requires good marksmanship, for the brain is the only spot in which a wound is mortal instantly, and this is not bigger than an orange. The moment the shot is fired the men row with all their might to the ice; if they find the seal there, a pick is driven into his head to make sure that he is dead; the skin and blubber is stripped off in a single sheet, and the carcass thrown into the sea.

SEAL-SHOOTING.

WALRUSES ON THE ICE.

The chase of the walrus is far more exciting than that of the seal. They are either shot and harpooned in the water, or upon the ice, where they retire sometimes in vast herds for sleep. One morning our hunters were aroused by the cry "Hvalruus paa Ysen—Walruses on the ice!" A sight well worth seeing met their eyes. Four large flat icebergs were so densely packed with the huge creatures that they looked like solid islands of walruses. They lay with their heads upon each other's bodies like fat swine in a farm-yard. There were eighty or a hundred of them on the ice, and many more were grunting and spouting around trying vainly to climb up among their friends. There were plenty of empty icebergs around, but the walrus seem to prefer lying packed together as closely as possible. In this case the animals had not had time to settle into a comfortable snooze; the individuals in the water gave the alarm to their friends; and our hunters only succeeded in killing four of the herd.

Toward the close of August the walrus take to the land in some secluded spot, where they remain for weeks in a semi-torpid state, without moving or feeding. Thousands are sometimes congregated in a mass. The vessels have by this time nearly all departed, and the chances are that the trysting-place of the animals will not be discovered in the few days which remain of the season. But such chances are what every Spitzbergen hunter prays for by day and dreams of by night. Let him discover such a placer, and the work of a few hours will be worth a fortune. Such a chance occurred in 1852 to a couple of small sloops. Approaching one of the Thousand Islands, they discovered a herd of four thousand walrus fast asleep. They lay in a little sandy bay shut in by rocks on each side, leaving only a narrow opening to the sea. The walrus is almost helpless on land, though fierce and active in the water. Sixteen men armed with lances attacked this herd. Those in front were killed until their carcasses formed a wall, over which those in the rear could not pass. The crews worked with a will; every good lance-thrust was worth a score of dollars. They thrust and stabbed the defenseless beasts till their spears were dulled, and they themselves were utterly exhausted. In a few hours these sixteen men had killed nine hundred walrus. Their vessels would hold only a small part of their prey. They loaded them to their utmost capacity, and set sail for Hammerfest, hoping to be able to return with other vessels and secure the remainder. They were disappointed. When they came back, they found the island shut in by miles of drift ice, through which they could not pass. Before spring the skins and blubber were of course useless; so that six or seven hundred walrus were destroyed without benefit to any body. Six years later Mr. Lamont visited the island. Even then the remains of the walrus were piled up two or three deep, many of the skins and carcasses being tolerably entire, in spite of the ravages of bears, foxes, and gulls. The smell of this decaying mass of flesh was perceptible at a distance of several miles. This island, which was formerly known as a famous resort of walrus, is now entirely deserted by them.

The walrus seems to be aware of his helplessness out of water, and when a herd take to the ice for repose, a sort of watch is kept up. Once Mr. Lamont came upon a group of ten or a dozen flat bergs crowded with walrus. Many of them were asleep; but as the boats approached the sentinels alarmed their sleeping comrades by flapping them with their fore paws, and troop after troop scuffled into the water just in time to avoid a harpoon thrust. On this occasion not a single one was captured. In the water, however, the walrus is quite another creature. If let alone he is inoffensive; but when he is attacked he shows fight, which makes hunting him no child's play. His tusks are formidable weapons, of solid ivory inserted for six or seven inches into a mass of solid bone, which forms the front of his skull, the brain lying far back, in what appears to be the place of his neck. From the position of the tusks one would suppose that they could only be used for a downward blow; but the creature turns his neck with great facility, and can strike upwards and sideways as well as downwards. If a polar bear, pressed by hunger, ventures to attack a young walrus in the water, the whole herd rush upon him, drag him under water, and tear him in pieces. Sometimes an old walrus will rush upon a boat and upset it. Mr. Lamont saw a boat which had thus been overturned; and while the crew were struggling in the water, the walrus pitching upon the harpooner, tore him nearly in halves with a single blow of his tusks.

In the water, the walrus is usually captured by "jaging;" that is, chasing a herd, keeping in the direction which they appear to take when they dive. The old walrus can outswim any boat; but they accommodate their speed to that of the young. If a young one is struck, he sets up a plaintive grunt, which brings the whole herd around the boat. The affection of the dams for their young is very touching. Mr. Lamont's harpooner had once struck an old cow, when he observed that she had a young one under her right fin. The harpooner tried repeatedly to strike the "junger," but the cow seemed to watch the direction of the blow, and to receive with pleasure several harpoons intended for her young. "I shall never forget," he says, "the faces of the old walrus and her calf as they looked back at the boat. The countenance of the young one so expressive of abject terror, and yet of confidence in its mother's power of protecting it, as it swam along under her wing, and the old cow's face showing such reckless defiance for all that we could do to herself, and yet such terrible anxiety for the safety of her calf." One is almost sorry to read that the old cow was killed, and the young one harpooned, when the men commenced gently stirring him up with the but-end of a lance, in order to make him cry out, and so call back the herd—this time, however, without success, for the herd had gone out of hearing when the young one was captured. "Jaging walrus" must be exciting work. Mr. Lamont thus describes such a scene:

"Five pairs of oars, pulled with utmost strength, make the boat seem to fly through the water, while, perhaps, a hundred walrus, roaring, bellowing, blowing, snorting, and splashing, make an acre of the sea all in a foam before and around her. The harpooner stands with one foot on the thwart and the other on the front locker, with the line coiled in his right hand, and the long weapon in both hands ready balanced for a dart, while he shouts to the crew which direction to take. The herd generally keep close together. One moment you see a hundred grisly heads and long gleaming white tusks above the waves; they give one spout from their blow-holes, take one breath of fresh air, and the next moment you see a hundred brown hemispherical backs, the next a hundred pair of hind flippers flourishing, and then they are all down. On, on, goes the boat as hard as ever we can pull the oars; up come the sea-horses again, pretty close this time, and before they can draw breath the boat rushes into the midst of them: whish! goes the harpoon: birr! goes the line over the gunwale: and a luckless junger on whom Christian has kept his eye is 'fast:' his bereaved mother charges the boat instantly with flashing eyes and snorting with rage; she quickly receives a harpoon in the back and a bullet in the brains, and she hangs lifeless on the line: now the junger begins to utter his plaintive grunting bark, and fifty furious walruses are close round the boat in a few seconds, rearing up breast-high in the water, and snorting and blowing as if they would tear us all to pieces. Two of these auxiliaries are speedily harpooned in their turn, and the rest hang back a little, when, as bad luck would have it, the junger gave up the ghost, owing to the severity of his harpooning, and the others, no longer attracted by his cries, retire to a more prudent distance. But for the 'untoward' and premature decease of the junger, the men tell me we should have had more walruses on our hands than we could manage. We now devote our attention to 'polishing off' the two live walruses—well-sized young bulls—who are still towing the heavy boat, with their two dead comrades attached, as if she was behind a steam-tug, and struggling madly to drag us under the icebergs: a vigorous application of the lances soon settles the business, and we now, with some difficulty, tow our four dead victims to the nearest flat iceberg and fix the ice-anchor, by which, with the powerful aid of block and tackle, we haul them one by one on the ice and divest them of their spoils. While we were engaged in cutting up these walruses, there were at least fifty more surrounding the iceberg, snorting and bellowing, and rearing up in the water as if smelling the blood of their slaughtered friends, and curious to see what we were doing to them now. They were so close that I might have shot a dozen of them; but as they would have been sure to sink before the boat could get to them, I was not so cruel as wantonly to take their lives. When the walruses were all skinned, we followed the herd again with success; and when we left off, in consequence of dense fog suddenly coming on, we had secured nine altogether—a very fair morning's bag, we thought."

CHASE OF THE WALRUS.

The walrus-hunters of Norway are the true descendants of the Vikings and Berserkers, who were once the terror of all maritime Europe. They lead a hard and dangerous life, and have a weary and restless look about the eyes, as though they were in the perpetual presence of danger. At sea they are bold and hardy; at home their normal state is that of intoxication. Their trade is a kind of lottery, where the certainty of privation and labor is balanced by the possibility of large gains. The walrus is valuable for his oil, his skin, and his ivory. The oil is less in proportion to his bulk than that of the seal. A seal of 600 pounds will have 200 or more of fat; a walrus of 2000 pounds will have no more. A very obese old walrus, weighing 3000 pounds, may produce 500 or 600 pounds of blubber, the smaller quantity being the utmost furnished by the best specimens killed by Mr. Lamont. But then his skin is valuable, being worth from four to eight dollars. It is principally sent to Sweden and Russia, where it is used for harness and sole-leather, or twisted into ropes. Formerly nearly all the rigging of Russian and Norwegian vessels was made of walrus skin. When the market is overstocked, the surplus is boiled into glue.

From walruses we pass to bears. Mr. Lamont believes that the Polar Bear—the Ursus maritimus of naturalists—is, in a state of nature, the largest and strongest carnivorous animal in the world. Be this as it may, his first specimen—the one which he was watching through the old opera-glass of which we have spoken—was a monster. His carcass measured eight feet in length, and almost as much in circumference. He stood four and a half feet high at the shoulder. The fore-paws were 34 inches around. His weight was at least 1200 pounds: of this the fat constituted 400 pounds, and the hide 100. When skinned, his neck and shoulders were like those of a bull. The hunters say that he will kill the biggest bull-walrus, although nearly three times his own weight, by springing upon him from behind, and battering in his skull by repeated blows. Mr. Lamont believes this, though he doubts the stories told of the way in which he is killed by hunters. One man, who professes to know all about it, says that the hunters use a spear having a cross-piece a couple of feet from the point. Hunter presents point to Ursus; Ursus seizes spear by cross-piece, and in trying to drag it away buries the blade in his own body, and so kills himself.

Many stories are told of the affection of the she-bear for her young. Mr. Lamont's experience corroborates the truth of these; while it is to be regretted it indicates a total want of corresponding filial love on the part of the cubs. The very day after the destruction of the old patriarch of whom we have just spoken, a she-bear with two cubs was discovered traveling over the ice. Chase was given. The old bear stood up for a moment, looked about her, and apparently concluded that their safety depended upon flight. Away she went, with her cubs, over the rough ice, cut up by channels and gullies. She could easily overleap these, and might have escaped. Not so her cubs. They could only clamber or swim over. The mother never deserted them; but waited for them, helping them up the steep sides. This so retarded her progress that her pursuers came within range. A shot from Lord David broke her back, and completely paralyzed her. Coming up, her pursuers soon dispatched her, and tied the cubs together. While she was being skinned, the young vermin were ferociously fighting together. When the skin was taken off, they were allowed to get at the carcass, and they proceeded at once to make a hearty meal upon the smoking entrails of the mother who had just given up her own life for them. They then squatted down upon the hide, and would not stir from it; so it was used as a sledge upon which to drag the cubs to the boat. When they reached the sloop the cubs found the skin of the old bear killed the previous day stretched out on the deck. It seemed familiar to them. Very likely it may have been their father; at all events they settled upon it and went to sleep. Perhaps they thought that having supped upon the carcass of one parent, the skin of the other was the very thing for a bed at night. These two cubs became the pets and pests of the sloop. One of them—the female—was peaceable enough; but her brother so worried and annoyed her that it was necessary to separate them. He was a most ferocious young demon, biting at any thing that came in his way. More than once, when let loose for a while, for the sake of exercise, he jumped overboard and tried to swim to land, ten miles away, and was brought back only after a severe course of scratching and biting.

SHE-BEAR AND CUBS.

Stout as he is, Ursa maritimus has to use cunning to get a living. He relies mainly upon walruses and seals. Though quite competent to manage the biggest walrus singly, he is overmatched by a herd; and unluckily for him walruses are apt to go in herds. He can not pick up a "junger" without bringing down upon him a score of tusked cousins and uncles. Then the seals are so shrewd. In the water they do not fear him. They can outswim and outdive him. There they will play around him in a manner calculated to aggravate his feelings to the utmost. Mr. Lamont thinks he catches one in the water now and then, but he can not conceive how he does it. Upon the ice Ursa has the advantage. But the seals know this, and sleep with both ears and one eye open. But Ursa's eyes and nose are of the sharpest. When either of these tell him that seals are floating about on the ice he slips into the water, half a mile or so to the leeward, and paddles quietly along, with his nose only visible, until he is close under the cake of ice on the very edge of which the seal is reposing. Then one jump, and a blow of his huge paw, settles the business. Between strength and cunning Ursa manages to make a quite comfortable living, and keep himself in very good order. Three which Mr. Lamont killed yielded 600 pounds of fat. "What a thousand pities," he exclaims, "that it is not worth 3s. 6d. a pot, as in the Burlington Arcade!"

Every body has heard of good Bishop Pontopidan's famous "CHAPTER XXXIV.—ON THE SNAKES OF ICELAND," which consists of these six words: "There are no snakes in Iceland." Mr. Lamont says that he has often been asked about the "Inhabitants of Spitzbergen." His answer was very like the chapter of the Bishop: "There are no inhabitants in Spitzbergen." It is true that a couple of centuries ago, when the Spitzbergen waters abounded in whales, the Dutch had a settlement on the coast, called "Smeerenburg," or "Blubber-Town," where, according to report, one could get hot rolls for breakfast, and enjoy female society in the evening. But that was only a summer settlement, abandoned at the approach of winter. An English trading Company afterward tried to establish a permanent colony there. Some criminals were promised by Government a pardon if they would pass a winter in Spitzbergen. They were carried out in a whaler for that purpose; but when they had taken a look at the country, they made up their minds that they would rather be hanged in London than live in Spitzbergen. They were taken back, but were not hanged after all, as very likely they deserved. There are records of some two or three shipwrecked crews who have actually passed one or more winters there. It is said, also, that the Russians for some time maintained a sort of hunting colony on the coast, the men passing one winter in Spitzbergen and the next at home. That, however, was long ago. Mr. Lamont was told that in 1858 there was living at Kola, in Lapland, an old Russian who had for thirty-five years passed the alternate winters in Spitzbergen. If this was true, the old Muscovite was probably the only living man who had actually wintered in Spitzbergen. On the 17th of August, 1859, the Anna Louisa was in latitude 78°. Other fishing vessels in Spitzbergen had gone southward; there were then no "Arctic Expeditions" away, and so Mr. Lamont congratulated himself on being that day nearer the North Pole than any other human being. Not long afterward the sloop reached another degree northward. This is farther north than Van Rensselaer Harbor, where our own noble Kane passed his last Arctic winter. It is within one and a half degrees—about 130 miles—of the farthest northward point ever reached by water, which is that attained by Scoresby, in latitude 81° 30'. Parry's overland expedition, in 1827, went as high as 82° 40'; and the extreme northern point gained by the sledge-party sent out by Kane was 82° 27'—a difference northward of scarcely a dozen miles. The expeditions of Parry and Kane may fairly share the honors of having of all men approached nearest to the northern pole of the earth; for the stories of early Dutch navigators having reached the latitude of 83° or 84° are not fairly authenticated. The point to be noted is that the climates of the two hemispheres are so different that Lamont and Kennedy, on a mere pleasure expedition, with a common fishing sloop, reached without difficulty, from Spitzbergen, a point further north than Kane could gain in Greenland with all his indomitable resolution. The inference is, that if human feet are ever to stand at the North Pole of the earth, the way is by Spitzbergen rather than Greenland.

When Mr. Lamont says that Spitzbergen is uninhabited, he refers to human beings. The reindeer runs wild there, every little valley affording a troop of from three to twenty. These wild reindeer are smaller than the tame ones of Lapland; but they attain a most wonderful state of fatness. Mr. Lamont thinks this must be owing to the nutritious quality of the moss upon which they feed. Those killed in July were lean enough. A month later they were fit to take prizes at an agricultural show. The hinds giving milk and their calves were very fat, while the old stags were perfect miracles of condition. All over their bodies was a sort of cylinder of solid fat two or three inches thick: they were "seal-fat," says Mr. Lamont, emphatically. This coating which is so speedily acquired seems to be intended to enable them to exist during the long polar winter, when little food is to be had. They must live through the winter mainly upon the stores of fat accumulated in the short summer.

Mr. Lamont thinks the flesh of the reindeer the most exquisite meat he ever tasted, with perhaps the exception of a fat eland in Africa, and a little West Indian animal which the negroes call the "Lapp"—the Cavia paca of naturalists. To be fully enjoyed it must be eaten directly after the deer has been killed, as the fat in a short time acquires a rank taste and unpleasant odor. The best mode of cooking the meat is one which Mr. Lamont learned years ago in Palestine from Hadji Mohammed, a one-eyed Arab cook. This is the recipe: "First catch a fat deer, then cut a number of wooden skewers, and thread upon these alternately pieces of meat, heart, and fat, each cut to about the size and thickness of a dollar, broil upon the glowing embers, season with wood-ashes in the absence of salt and pepper, and bite them off while smoking hot. If you are hungry," he adds, sug-

REINDEER-SHOOTING.

GROUP OF REINDEER.

gestively, "you fancy this the most delicious thing you ever tasted."

Merely as sport, the hunting of the reindeer is rather tame. Not unfrequently they will of their own accord walk up within easy shot, when the hunter is not only in full view, but to the windward. The report of a rifle does not alarm them; very likely they think it the noise to which they are accustomed, of rocks and ice splitting from frost. When two or three were together all were not unfrequently killed by successive shots. Lord David once came upon five; he knocked over four with a round shot from his four-barreled rifle, and the fifth stood snuffing at his dead companions until the hunter had time to reload, when he also was dispatched. At another time the leg of an old stag was broken by a bullet; he ran a little distance, then stopped, looked around, and seeing nothing, commenced grazing, as though nothing had happened of sufficient consequence to keep him from his dinner. Their extraordinary boldness seems to arise from the fact that in the interior, where the greater part of their lives are passed, they have never seen a human being, or any thing else which could hurt them; for there are no wolves in Spitzbergen, and the bear probably never has a chance to meddle with a reindeer, unless he chances to fall in with a sick or wounded one near the seashore.

September approached. The ice began to close up the bays and fiords where the walrus resorts, and there was no more chance for blubber. Of reindeer they had in a few days killed as many as they wanted. Three tons of venison hung about the yacht, on which they had now taken up their quarters. So they contented themselves with picking off a few of the old stags whose antlers were especially fine, and salting their tongues as presents for friends at home. Returning to Hammerfest, they paid off their crew, and sold their blubber. "The price," says Mr. Lamont, "was very low—as seems always to be the case whenever one has any thing to sell. But still we realized a sum which went a long way toward paying our expenses; in addition to which we kept the young bears, the six bearskins, and all the ivory." They gave up the tub of a sloop, Lord David carving upon one of the cabin beams, which was of "soft wood, just the thing for whittling," a summary of their cruise. It ran thus:

"LORD DAVID KENNEDY and JAMES LAMONT hired this Sloop Anna Louisa, not A 1, in the Summer of the Year 1859, and killed in SPITZBERGEN 46 WALRUSES, 88 SEALS, 8 POLAR BEARS, 1 WHITE WHALE, 61 REINDEER. Total, 204 HEAD.—N.B. In addition to the above, we sunk and lost about 20 Walruses and Seals."

They had secured splendid specimens of all Spitzbergen animals worthy of a sportsman's attention, with the exception of the narwhal and the black fox. Their collection lacks the long spiral horn of the former, and the splendid skin of the latter—the rarest and most costly fur in the world. Both these animals are very rare. They saw no narwhal. Once a black fox came skulking down toward the carcass of a deer which they had killed; but he kept beyond shot, apparently aware that his sable jacket, worth a hundred dollars, was quite too valuable to be risked for a dinner.

They left Hammerfest on the 15th of September. As they had the wind directly in their teeth going out, they anticipated that, in the nature of things, it would change so as to blow in their teeth also going back. It did so; and besides they had the full benefit of the equinoctial gales. They avoided Lerwick on their return, apprehending that the "starvation months" were not over, and the hungry population might storm the yacht, to get possession of the cargo of venison.

Mr. Lamont had some difficulty in getting rid of his two young bears. He offered them to nearly every menagerie in the kingdom; but the British Barnums were overstocked with bears. Not a bid was to be had. At length they found a purchaser in the Director of the Jardin des Plantes in Paris; and a tough bargain they seem to have been. Some months after Mr. Lamont saw them in their new home. They had grown considerably; but their naturally amiable dispositions had not been improved by their confinement in a warm, dry den, adapted for tropical animals. Unlike the lion in the story, they did not welcome their former shipmate, nor manifest the least gratitude to the individual who had, so to speak, "brought them up by hand."

ORLEY FARM.

BY ANTHONY TROLLOPE.—ILLUSTRATED BY J. E. MILLAIS.

CHAPTER XXI.

CHRISTMAS IN HARLEY STREET.

It seems singular to me myself, considering the idea which I have in my own mind of the character of Lady Staveley, that I should be driven to declare that about this time she committed an unpardonable offense, not only against good-nature, but also against the domestic proprieties. But I am driven so to say, although she herself was of all women the most good-natured and most domestic; for she asked Mr. Furnival to pass his Christmas-day at Noningsby, and I find it impossible to forgive her that offense against the poor wife whom in that case he must leave alone by her desolate hearth. She knew that he was a married man as well as I do. Sophia, who had a proper regard for the domestic peace of her parents, and who could have been happy at Noningsby without a father's care, not unfrequently spoke of her, so that her existence in Harley Street might not be forgotten by the Staveleys—explaining, however, as she did so, that her dear mother never left her own fireside in winter, so that no suspicion might be entertained that an invitation was desired for her also; nevertheless, in spite of all this, on two separate occasions did Lady Staveley say to Mr. Furnival that he might as well prolong his visit over Christmas.

And yet Lady Staveley was not attached to Mr. Furnival with any peculiar warmth of friendship; but she was one of those women whose foolish hearts will not allow themselves to be controlled in the exercise of their hospitality. Her nature demanded of her that she should ask a guest to stay. She would not have allowed a dog to depart from her house at this season of the year without suggesting to him that he had better take his Christmas bone in her yard. It was for Mr. Furnival to adjust all matters between himself and his wife. He was not bound to accept the invitation because she gave it; but she, finding him there, already present in the house, did feel herself bound to give it—for which offense, as I have said before, I can not bring myself to forgive her.

At his sin in staying away from home, or rather—as far as the story has yet carried us—in thinking that he would do so, I am by no means so much surprised. An angry, ill-pleased wife is no pleasant companion for a gentleman on a long evening. For those who have managed that things shall run smoothly over the domestic rug there is no happier time of life than these long candle-light hours of home and silence. No spoken content or uttered satisfaction is necessary. The fact that is felt is enough for peace. But when the fact is not felt; when the fact is by no means there; when the thoughts are running in a direction altogether different; when bitter grievances from one to the other fill the heart, rather than memories of mutual kindness; then, I say, those long candle-light hours of home and silence are not easy of endurance. Mr. Furnival was a man who chose to be the master of his own destiny, so at least to himself he boasted; and therefore, when he found himself encountered by black looks and occasionally by sullen words, he declared to himself that he was ill-used, and that he would not bear it. Since the domestic rose would no longer yield him honey, he would seek his sweets from the stray honey-suckle, on which there grew no thorns.

Mr. Furnival was no coward. He was not one of those men who wrong their wives by their absence, and then prolong their absence because they are afraid to meet their wives. His resolve was to be free himself, and to be free without complaint from her. He would have it so, that he might remain out of his own house for a month at the time and then return to it for a week—at any rate without outward bickerings. I have known other men who have dreamed of such a state of things, but at this moment I can remember none who have brought their dream to bear.

Mr. Furnival had written to his wife—not from Noningsby, but from some provincial town, probably situated among the Essex marshes—saying various things, and among others that he should not, as he thought, be at home at Christmas-day. Mrs. Furnival had remarked about a fortnight since that Christmas-day was nothing to her now; and the base man, for it was base, had hung upon this poor, sore-hearted word an excuse for remaining away from home. “There are lawyers of repute staying at Noningsby,” he had said, “with whom it is very expedient that I should remain at this present crisis.”—When yet has there been no crisis present to a man who has wanted an excuse?—“And therefore I may probably stay”—and so on. Who does not know the false mixture of excuse and defiance which such a letter is sure to maintain; the crafty words which may be taken as adequate reason if the receiver be timid enough so to receive them, or as a noisy gauntlet thrown to the ground if there be spirit there for the picking of it up? Such letter from his little borough in the Essex marshes did Mr. Furnival write to the partner of his cares, and there was still sufficient spirit left for the picking up of the gauntlet. “I shall be home to-morrow,” the letter had gone on to say; “but I will not keep you waiting for dinner, as my hours are always so uncertain. I shall be at my chambers till late, and will be with you before tea. I will then return to Alston on the following morning.” There was at any rate good courage in this on the part of Mr. Furnival—great courage; but with it coldness of heart, dishonesty of purpose, and black ingratitude. Had she not given every thing to him?

Mrs. Furnival when she got the letter was not alone. “There,” said she, throwing it over to a lady who sat on the other side of the fire-place handling a loose sprawling mass of not very clean crochet-work. “I knew he would stay away on Christmas-day. I told you so.”

“I didn’t think it possible,” said Miss Biggs, rolling up the big ball of soiled cotton that she might read Mr. Furnival’s letter at her leisure. “I didn’t really think it possible—on Christmas-day! Surely, Mrs. Furnival, he can’t mean Christmas-day? Dear, dear, dear! and then to throw it in your face in that way that you said you didn’t care about it.”

“Of course I said so,” answered Mrs. Furnival. “I was not going to ask him to come home as a favor.”

“Not to make a favor of it, of course not.” This was Miss Biggs from ——. I am afraid if I tell the truth I must say that she came from Red Lion Square! And yet nothing could be more respectable than Miss Biggs. Her father had been a partner with an uncle of Mrs. Furnival’s; and when Kitty Blacker had given herself and her young prettinesses to the hard-working lawyer, Martha Biggs had stood at the altar with her, then just seventeen years of age, and had promised to her all manner of success for her coming life. Martha Biggs had never, not even then, been pretty; but she had been very faithful. She had not been a favorite with Mr. Furnival, having neither wit nor grace to recommend her, and therefore in the old happy days of Kepel Street she had been kept in the back-ground; but now, in this present time of her adversity, Mrs. Furnival found the benefit of having a trusty friend.

“If he likes better to be with these people down at Alston, I am sure it is the same to me,” said the injured wife.

“But there’s nobody special at Alston, is there?” asked Miss Biggs, whose soul sighed for a tale more piquant than one of mere general neglect. She knew that her friend had dreadful suspicions, but Mrs. Furnival had never as yet committed herself by uttering the name of any woman as her rival. Miss Biggs thought that a time had now come in which the strength of their mutual confidence demanded that such name should be uttered. It could not be expected that she should sympathize with generalities forever. She longed to hate, to reprobate, and to shudder at the actual name of the wretch who had robbed her friend of a husband's heart. And therefore she asked the question, "There's nobody special at Alston, is there?"

Now Mrs. Furnival knew to a furlong the distance from Noningsby to Orley Farm, and knew also that the station at Hamworth was only twenty-five minutes from that at Alston. She gave no immediate answer, but threw up her head and shook her nostrils, as though she were preparing for war; and then Miss Martha Biggs knew that there was somebody special at Alston. Between such old friends why should not the name be mentioned?

On the following day the two ladies dined at six, and then waited tea patiently till ten. Had the thirst of a desert been raging within that drawing-room, and had tea been within immediate call, those ladies would have died ere they would have asked for it before his return. He had said he would be home to tea, and they would have waited for him, had it been till four o'clock in the morning! Let the female married victim ever make the most of such positive wrongs as Providence may vouchsafe to her. Had Mrs. Furnival ordered tea on this evening before her husband's return, she would have been a woman blind to the advantages of her own position. At ten the wheels of Mr. Furnival's cab were heard, and the faces of both the ladies prepared themselves for the encounter.

"Well, Kitty, how are you?" said Mr. Furnival, entering the room with his arms prepared for a premeditated embrace. "What, Miss Biggs with you? I did not know. How do you do, Miss Biggs?" and Mr. Furnival extended his hand to the lady. They both looked at him, and they could tell from the brightness of his eye and from the color of his nose that he had been dining at his club, and that the bin with the precious cork had been visited on his behalf.

"Yes, my dear; it's rather lonely being here in this big room all by one's self so long; so I asked Martha Biggs to come over to me. I suppose there's no harm in that."

"Oh, if I'm in the way," began Miss Biggs, "or if Mr. Furnival is going to stay at home for long—"

"You are not in the way, and I am not going to stay at home for long," said Mr. Furnival, speaking with a voice that was perhaps a little thick—only a very little thick. No wife on good terms with her husband would have deigned to notice, even in her own mind, an amount of thickness of voice which was so very inconsiderable. But Mrs. Furnival at the present moment did notice it.

"Oh, I did not know," said Miss Biggs.

"You know now," said Mr. Furnival, whose ear at once appreciated the hostility of tone which had been assumed.

"You need not be rude to my friend after she has been waiting tea for you till near eleven o'clock," said Mrs. Furnival. "It is nothing to me, but you should remember that she is not used to it."

"I wasn't rude to your friend, and who asked you to wait tea till near eleven o'clock? It is only just ten now, if that signifies."

"You expressly desired me to wait tea, Mr. Furnival. I have got your letter, and will show it you if you wish it."

"Nonsense; I just said I should be home—"

"Of course you just said you would be home, and so we waited; and it's not nonsense; and I declare—! Never mind, Martha, don't mind me, there's a good creature. I shall get over it soon;" and then fat, solid, good-humored Mrs. Furnival burst out into a hysterical fit of sobbing. There was a welcome for a man on his return to his home after a day's labor!

Miss Biggs immediately got up and came round behind the drawing-room table to her friend's head. "Be calm, Mrs. Furnival," she said; "do be calm, and then you will be better soon. Here is the hartshorn."

"It doesn't matter, Martha: never mind: leave me alone," sobbed the poor woman.

"May I be excused for asking what is really the matter?" said Mr. Furnival, "for I'll be whipped if I know." Miss Biggs looked at him as if she thought that he ought to be whipped.

"I wonder you ever come near the place at all, I do," said Mrs. Furnival.

"What place?" asked Mr. Furnival.

"This house in which I am obliged to live by myself, without a soul to speak to, unless when Martha Biggs comes here."

"Which would be much more frequent, only that I know I am not welcome to every body."

"I know that you hate it. How can I help knowing it?—and you hate me too; I know you do; and I believe you would be glad if you need never come back here at all; I do. Don't, Martha; leave me alone. I don't want all that fuss. There; I can hear it now, whatever it is. Do you choose to have your tea, Mr. Furnival? or do you wish to keep the servants waiting out of their beds all night?"

"D—the servants!" said Mr. Furnival.

"Oh laws!" exclaimed Miss Biggs, jumping up out of her chair with her hands and fingers outstretched, as though never, never in her life before, had her ears been wounded by such wicked words as those.

"Mr. Furnival, I am ashamed of you," said his wife, with gathered calmness of stern reproach.

Mr. Furnival was very wrong to swear; doubly wrong to swear before his wife; trebly wrong to swear before a lady visitor; but it must be confessed that there was provocation. That he was at this present period of his life behaving badly to his wife must be allowed, but on this special evening he had intended to behave well. The woman had sought a ground of quarrel against him, and had driven him on till he had forgotten himself in his present after-dinner humor. When a man is maintaining a whole household on his own shoulders, and working hard to maintain it well, it is not right that he should be brought to book because he keeps the servants up half an hour later than usual to wash the tea-things. It is very proper that the idle members of the establishment should conform to hours, but these hours must give way to his requirements. In those old days of which we have spoken so often he might have had his tea at twelve, one, two, or three without a murmur. Though their staff of servants then was scanty enough, there was never a difficulty then in supplying any such want for him. If no other pair of hands could boil the kettle, there was one pair of hands there which no amount of such work on his behalf could tire. But now, because he had come in for his tea at ten o'clock, he was asked if he intended to keep the servants out of their beds all night!

"Oh laws!" said Miss Biggs, jumping up from her chair as though she had been electrified.

Mr. Furnival did not think it consistent with his dignity to keep up any dispute in the presence of Miss Biggs, and therefore sat himself down in his accustomed chair without further speech. "Would you wish to have tea now, Mr. Furnival?" asked his wife again, putting considerable stress upon the word now.

"I don't care about it," said he.

"And I am sure I don't at this late hour," said Miss Biggs. "But so tired as you are, dear—"

"Never mind me, Martha; as for myself, I shall take nothing now." And then they all sat without a word for the space of some five minutes. "If you like to go, Martha," said Mrs. Furnival, "don't mind waiting for me."

"Oh, very well," and then Miss Biggs took her bed-candle and left the room. Was it not hard upon her that she should be forced to absent herself at this moment, when the excitement of the battle was about to begin in earnest? Her footsteps lingered as she slowly retreated from the drawing-room door, and for one instant she absolutely paused, standing still with eager ears. It was but for an instant, and then she went on up stairs, out of hearing, and sitting herself down by her bedside allowed the battle to rage in her imagination.

Mr. Furnival would have sat there silent till his wife had gone also, and so the matter would have terminated for that evening—had she so willed it. But she had been thinking of her miseries; and, having come to some sort of resolution to speak of them openly, what time could she find more appropriate for doing so than the present? "Tom," she said—and as she spoke there was still a twinkle of the old love in her eye—"we are not going on together as well as we should do; not lately. Would it not be well to make a change before it is too late?"

"What change?" he asked; not exactly in an ill humor, but with a husky, thick voice. He would have preferred now that she should have followed her friend to bed.

"I do not want to dictate to you, Tom, but—! Oh, Tom, if you knew how wretched I am!"

"What makes you wretched?"

"Because you leave me all alone; because you care more for other people than you do for me; because you never like to be at home, never if you can possibly help it. You know you don't. You are always away now upon some excuse or other; you know you are. I don't have you home to dinner not one day in the week through the year. That can't be right, and you know it is not. Oh Tom! you are breaking my heart, and deceiving me—you are. Why did I go down and find that woman in your chamber with you, when you were ashamed to own to me that she was coming to see you? If it had been in the proper way of law business you wouldn't have been ashamed. Oh Tom!"

The poor woman had begun her plaint in a manner that was not altogether devoid of a discreet eloquence. If only she could have maintained that tone, if she could have confined her words to the tale of her own grievances, and have been contented to declare that she was unhappy, only because he was not with her, it might have been well. She might have touched his heart, or at any rate his conscience, and there might have been some enduring result for good. But her feelings had been too many for her, and as her wrongs came to her mind, and the words heaped themselves upon her tongue, she could not keep herself from the one subject which she should have left untouched. Mr. Furnival was not the man to bear any interference such as this, or to permit the privacy of Lincoln's Inn to be invaded even by his wife. His brow grew very black, and his eyes became almost blood-shot. The port wine which might have worked him to softness now worked him to anger, and he thus burst forth with words of marital vigor:

"Let me tell you once forever, Kitty, that I will admit of no interference with what I do, or the people whom I may choose to see in my chambers in Lincoln's Inn. If you are such an infatuated simpleton as to believe—"

"Yes; of course I am a simpleton; of course I am a fool; women always are."

"Listen to me, will you?"

"Listen, yes; it's my business to listen. Would you like that I should give this house up for her, and go into lodgings somewhere? I shall have very little objection as matters are going now. Oh dear, oh dear, that things should ever have come to this!"

"Come to what?"

"Tom, I could put up with a great deal—more, I think, than most women; I could slave for you like a drudge, and think nothing about it. And now that you have got among grand people, I could see you go out by yourself without thinking much about that either. I am very lonely sometimes—very; but I could bear that. Nobody has longed to see you rise in the world half so anxious as I have done. But, Tom, when I know what your goings on are with a nasty, sly, false woman like that, I won't bear it; and there's an end." In saying which final words Mrs. Furnival rose from her seat, and thrice struck her hand by no means lightly on the lloo table in the middle of the room.

"I did not think it possible that you should be so silly. I did not indeed!"

"Oh, yes, silly! very well. Women always are silly when they mind that kind of thing. Have you got any thing else to say, Sir?"

"Yes, I have; I have this to say, that I will not endure this sort of usage."

"Nor I won't," said Mrs. Furnival; "so you may as well understand it at once. As long as there was nothing absolutely wrong, I would put up with it for the sake of appearances, and because of Sophia. For myself I don't mind what loneliness I may have to bear. If you had been called on to go out to the East Indies, or even to China, I could have put up with it. But this sort of thing I won't put up with; nor I won't be blind to what I can't help seeing. So now, Mr. Furnival, you may know that I have made up my mind." And then, without waiting further parley, having whisked herself in her energy near to the door, she stalked out, and went up with hurried steps to her own room.

Occurrences of a nature such as this are in all respects unpleasant in a household. Let the master be ever so much master, what is he to do? Say that his wife is wrong from the beginning to the end of the quarrel—that in no way improves the matter. His anxiety is that the world abroad shall not know he has aught amiss at home; but she, with her hot sense of injury, and her loud revolt against supposed wrongs, cares not who hears it. "Hold your tongue, madam," the husband says. But the wife, bound though she be by an oath of obedience, will not obey him, but only screams the louder.

All which, as Mr. Furnival sat there thinking of it, disturbed his mind much. That Martha Biggs would spread the tale through all Bloomsbury and St. Pancras, of course he was aware. "If she drives me to it, it must be so," he said to himself at last. And then he also betook himself to his rest. And so it was that preparations for Christmas were made in Harley Street.

CHAPTER XXII.

CHRISTMAS AT NONINGSBY.

THE house at Noningsby on Christmas-day was quite full, and yet it was by no means a small house. Mrs. Arbuthnot, the judge's married daughter, was there, with her three children; and Mr. Furnival was there, having got over those domestic difficulties in which we lately saw him as best he might; and Lucius Mason was there, having been especially asked by Lady Staveley when she heard that his mother was to be at The Cleeve. There could be no more comfortable country-house than Noningsby; and it was, in its own way, pretty, though essentially different in all respects from The Cleeve. It was a new house from the cellar to the ceiling, and as a house was no doubt the better for being so. All the rooms were of the proper proportion, and all the newest appliances for comfort had been attached to it. But nevertheless it lacked that something, in appearance rather than in fact, which age alone can give to the residence of a gentleman in the country. The gardens also were new, and the grounds around them trim, and square, and orderly. Noningsby was a delightful house; no one with money and taste at command could have created for himself one more delightful; but then there are delights which can not be created even by money and taste.

It was a pleasant sight to see, the long, broad, well-filled breakfast table, with all that company round it. There were some eighteen or twenty gathered now at the table, among whom the judge sat pre-eminent, looming large in an arm-chair and having a double space allotted to him—some eighteen or twenty, children included. At the bottom of the table sat Lady Staveley, who still chose to preside among her own tea-cups as a lady should do; and close to her, assisting in the toils of that presidency, sat her daughter Madeline. Nearest to them were gathered the children, and the rest had formed themselves into little parties, each of which already well knew its own place at the board. In how very short a time will come upon one that pleasant custom of sitting in an accustomed place! But here, at these Noningsby breakfasts, among other customs already established, there was one by which Augustus Staveley was always privileged to sit by the side of Sophia Furnival. No doubt his original object was still unchanged. A match between that lady and his friend Graham was still desirable, and by perseverance he might pique Felix Graham to arouse himself. But hitherto Felix Graham had not aroused himself in that direction, and one or two people among the party were inclined to mistake young Staveley's intentions.

"Gus," his sister had said to him the night before, "I declare I think you are going to make love to Sophia Furnival."

"Do you?" he had replied. "As a rule, I do not think there is any one in the world for whose discernment I have so much respect as I have for yours. But in this respect even you are wrong."

"Ah, of course you say so."

"If you won't believe me, ask her. What more can I say?"

"I certainly sha'n't ask her, for I don't know her well enough."

"She's a very clever girl; let me tell you that, whoever falls in love with her."

"I'm sure she is, and she is handsome too, very; but for all that she is not good enough for our Gus."

"Of course she is not, and therefore I am not thinking of her. And now go to bed and dream that you have got the Queen of the Fortunate Islands for your sister-in-law."

But although Staveley was himself perfectly indifferent to all the charms of Miss Furnival, nevertheless he could hardly restrain his dislike to Lucius Mason, who, as he thought, was disposed to admire the lady in question. In talking of Lucius to his own family and to his special friend Graham he had called him conceited, pedantic, uncouth, unenglish, and detestable. His own family—that is, his mother and sister—rarely contradicted him in any thing; but Graham was by no means so cautious, and usually contradicted him in every thing. Indeed, there was no sign of sterling worth so plainly marked in Staveley's character as the full conviction which he entertained of the superiority of his friend Felix.

"You are quite wrong about him," Felix had said. "He has not been at an English school or English university, and therefore is not like other young men that you know; but he is, I think, well educated and clever. As for conceit, what man will do any good who is not conceited? Nobody holds a good opinion of a man who has a low opinion of himself."

"All the same, my dear fellow, I do not like Lucius Mason."

"And some one else, if you remember, did not like Dr. Fell."

"And now, good people, what are you all going to do about church?" said Staveley, while they were still engaged with their rolls and eggs.

"I shall walk," said the judge.

"And I shall go in the carriage," said the judge's wife.

"That disposes of two; and now it will take half an hour to settle for the rest. Miss Furnival, you no doubt will accompany my mother. As I shall be among the walkers you will see how much I sacrifice by the suggestion."

It was a mile to the church, and Miss Furnival knew the advantage of appearing in her seat unfatigued and without subjection to wind, mud, or rain. "I must confess," she said, "that, under all the circumstances, I shall prefer your mother's company to yours;" whereupon Staveley, in the completion of his arrangements, assigned the other places in the carriage to the married ladies of the company.

"But I have taken your sister Madeline's seat in the carriage," protested Sophia with great dismay.

"My sister Madeline generally walks."

"Then of course I shall walk with her;" but when the time came Miss Furnival did go in the carriage whereas Miss Staveley went on foot.

It so fell out as they started that Graham found himself walking at Miss Staveley's side, to the great disgust, no doubt, of half a dozen other aspirants for that honor. "I can not help thinking," he said, as they stepped briskly over the crisp white frost, "that this Christmas-day of ours is a great mistake."

"Oh, Mr. Graham!" she exclaimed.

"You need not regard me with horror—at least not with any special horror on this occasion."

"But what you say is very horrid."

"That, I flatter myself, seems so only because I have not yet said it. That part of our Christmas-day which is made to be in any degree sacred is by no means a mistake."

"I am glad you think that."

"Or rather, it is not a mistake in as far as it is in any degree made sacred. But the peculiar conviviality of the day is so ponderous! Its roast-beefiness oppresses one so thoroughly from the first moment of one's waking to the last ineffectual effort at a bit of fried pudding for supper!"

"But you need not eat fried pudding for supper. Indeed, here, I am afraid, you will not have any supper offered you at all."

"No; not to me individually, under that name. I might also manage to guard my ownself under any such offers. But there is always the flavor of the sweetmeat in the air—of all the sweetmeats, edible and non-edible."

"You begrudge the children their snap-dragon. That's what it all means, Mr. Graham."

"No; I deny it; unpremeditated snap-dragon is dear to my soul; and I could expend myself in blindman's-buff."

"You shall, then, after dinner; for of course you know that we all dine early."

"But blindman's-buff at three, with snap-dragon at a quarter to four—charades at five, with wine and sweet cake at half past six, is ponderous. And that's our mistake. The big turkey would be very good; capital fun to see a turkey twice as big as it ought to be! But the big turkey, and the mountain of beef, and the pudding weighing a hundred-weight, oppress one's spirits by their combined gravity. And then, they impart a memory of indigestion, a halo as it were of apoplexy, even to the Church services."

"I do not agree with you in the least in the world."

"I ask you to answer me fairly. Is not additional eating an ordinary Englishman's ordinary idea of Christmas-day?"

"I am only an ordinary Englishwoman, and therefore can not say. It is not my idea."

"I believe that the ceremony, as kept by us, is perpetuated by the butchers and beer-sellers, with a helping hand from the grocers. It is essentially a material festival; and I would not object to it even on that account if it were not so grievously overdone. How the sun is moistening the frost on the ground! As we come back the road will be quite wet."

"We shall be going home then, and it will not signify. Remember, Mr. Graham, I shall expect you to come forward in great strength for blindman's-buff." As he gave her the required promise, he thought that even the sports of Christmas-day would be bearable, if she also were to make one of the sportsmen; and then they entered the church.

THE CHURCH DOOR.

I do not know any thing more pleasant to the eye than a pretty country church decorated for Christmas-day. The effect in a city is altogether different. I will not say that churches there should not be decorated, but comparatively it is a matter of indifference. No one knows who does it. The peculiar munificence of the squire who has sacrificed his holly bushes is not appreciated. The work of the fingers that have been employed is not recognized. The efforts made for hanging the pendant wreaths to each capital have been of no special interest to any large number of the worshipers. It has been done by contract, probably, and even if well done has none of the grace of association. But here, at Noningsby church, the winter flowers had been cut by Madeline and the gardener, and the red berries had been grouped by her own hands. She and the vicar's wife had stood together with perilous audacity on the top of the clerk's desk while they fixed the branches beneath the cushion of the old-fashioned turret, from which the sermons were preached. And all this had of course been talked about at the house; and some of the party had gone over to see, including Sophia Furnival, who had declared that nothing could be so delightful, though she had omitted to endanger her fingers by any participation in the work. And the children had regarded the operation as a triumph of all that was wonderful in decoration; and thus many of them had been made happy.

On their return from church, Miss Furnival insisted on walking, in order, as she said, that Miss Staveley might not have all the fatigue; but Miss Staveley would walk also, and the carriage, after a certain amount of expostulation and delay, went off with its load incomplete.

"And now for the plum-pudding part of the arrangement," said Felix Graham.

"Yes, Mr. Graham," said Madeline, "now for the plum-pudding—and the blindman's-buff."

"Did you ever see any thing more perfect than the church, Mr. Mason?" said Sophia.

"Any thing more perfect? no; in that sort of way, perhaps, never. I have seen the choir of Cologne."

"Come, come; that's not fair," said Graham. "Don't import Cologne in order to crush us here down in our little English villages. You never saw the choir of Cologne bright with holly berries."

"No; but I have with cardinal's stockings, and bishop's robes."

"I think I should prefer the holly," said Miss Furnival. "And why should not our churches always look like that, only changing the flowers and the foliage with the season? It would make the service so attractive."

"It would hardly do at Lent," said Madeline, in a serious tone.

"No, perhaps not at Lent exactly."

Peregrine and Augustus Staveley were walking on in front, not perhaps as well satisfied with the day as the rest of the party. Augustus, on leaving the church, had made a little effort to assume his place as usual by Miss Furnival's side, but by some accident of war Mason was there before him. He had not cared to make one of a party of three, and therefore had gone on in advance with young Orme. Nor was Peregrine himself much more happy. He did not know why, but he felt within his breast a growing aversion to Felix Graham. Graham was a puppy, he thought, and a fellow that talked too much; and then he was such a confoundedly ugly dog, and—and—and—Peregrine Orme did not like him. He was not a man to analyze his own feelings in such matters. He did not ask himself why he should have been rejoiced to hear that instant business had taken Felix Graham off to Hong Kong; but he knew that he would have rejoiced. He knew also that Madeline Staveley was—. No; he did not know what she was; but when he was alone, he carried on with her all manner of imaginary conversations, though when he was in her company he had hardly a word to say to her. Under these circumstances he fraternized with her brother; but even in that he could not receive much satisfaction, seeing that he could not abuse Graham to Graham's special friend, nor could he breathe a sigh as to Madeline's perfections into the ear of Madeline's brother.

The children—and there were three or four assembled there besides those belonging to Mrs. Arbuthnot—were by no means inclined to agree with Mr. Graham's strictures as to the amusements of Christmas-day. To them it appeared that they could not hurry fast enough into the vortex of its dissipation. The dinner was a serious consideration, especially with reference to certain illuminated mince-pies which were the crowning glory of that banquet; but time for these was almost begrudged in order that the fast handkerchief might be tied over the eyes of the first blindman.

"And now we'll go into the school-room," said Marian Arbuthnot, jumping up and leading the way. "Come along, Mr. Felix;" and Felix Graham followed her.

Madeline had declared that Felix Graham should be blinded first, and such was his doom. "Now mind you catch me, Mr. Felix; pray do," said Marian, when she had got him seated in a corner of the room. She was a beautiful fair little thing, with long, soft curls, and lips red as a rose, and large, bright blue eyes, all soft and happy and laughing, loving the friends of her childhood with passionate love, and fully expecting an equal devotion from them. It is of such children that our wives and sweet-hearts should be made.

"But how am I to find you when my eyes are blinded?"

"Oh, you can feel, you know. You can put your hand on the top of my head. I mustn't speak, you know; but I'm sure I shall laugh; and then you must guess that it's Marian." That was her idea of playing blindman's-buff according to the strict rigor of the game.

"And you'll give me a big kiss?" said Felix.

"Yes, when we've done playing," she promised, with great seriousness.

And then a huge white silk handkerchief, as big as a small sail, was brought down from grandpapa's dressing-room, so that nobody should see the least bit "in the world," as Marian had observed with great energy; and the work of blinding was commenced. "I ain't big enough to reach round," said Marian, who had made an effort, but in vain. "You do it, Aunt Mad.,"

BLINDMAN'S BUFF.

and she tendered the handkerchief to Miss Staveley, who, however, did not appear very eager to undertake the task.

"I'll be the executioner," said grandmamma, "the more especially as I shall not take any other share in the ceremony. This shall be the chair of doom. Come here, Mr. Graham, and submit yourself to me." And so the first victim was blinded. "Mind you remember," said Marian, whispering into his ear as he was led away. "Green spirits and white; blue spirits and gray—" and then he was twirled round in the room and left to commence his search as best he might.

Marian Arbuthnot was not the only soft little laughing darling that wished to be caught and blinded, so that there was great pulling at the blindman's tails, and much grasping at his outstretched arms before the desired object was attained. And he wandered round the room skillfully, as though a thought were in his mind false to his treaty with Marian—as though he imagined for a moment that some other prize might be caught. But if so, the other prize evaded him carefully, and in due progress of play Marian's soft curls were within his grasp. "I'm sure I didn't speak or say a word," said she, as she ran up to her grandmother to have the handkerchief put over her eyes. "Did I, grandmamma?"

"There are more ways of speaking than one," said Lady Staveley. "You and Mr. Graham understand each other, I think."

"Oh, I was caught quite fairly," said Marian—"and now lead me round and round." To her at any rate the festivities of Christmas-day were not too ponderous for real enjoyment.

And then, at last, somebody caught the judge. I rather think it was Madeline; but his time in truth was come, and he had no chance of escape. The whole room was set upon his capture, and though he barricaded himself with chairs and children, he was duly apprehended and named. "That's papa; I know by his watch-chain, for I made it."

"Nonsense, my dears," said the judge. "I will do no such thing. I should never catch any body, and should remain blind forever."

"But grandpapa must," said Marian. "It's the game that he should be blinded when he's caught."

"Suppose the game was that we should be whipped when we are caught, and I was to catch you," said Augustus.

"But I would not play that game," said Marian.

"Oh, papa, you must," said Madeline. "Do—and you shall catch Mr. Furnival."

"That would be a temptation," said the judge. "I've never been able to do that yet, though I've been trying it for some years."

"Justice is blind," said Graham. "Why should a judge be ashamed to follow the example of his own goddess?" And so at last the owner of the ermine submitted, and the stern magistrate of the bench was led round with the due incantation of the spirits, and dismissed into chaos to seek for a new victim.

One of the rules of blindman's-buff at Noningsby was this, that it should not be played by candle-light—a rule that is in every way judicious, as thereby an end is secured for that which might otherwise be unending. And therefore, when it became so dark in the school-room that there was not much difference between the blindman and the others, the handkerchief was smuggled away, and the game was at an end.

"And now for snap-dragon," said Marian.

"Exactly as you predicted, Mr. Graham," said Madeline: "blindman's-buff at a quarter past three, and snap-dragon at five."

"I revoke every word that I uttered, for I was never more amused in my life."

"And you will be prepared to endure the wine and sweet cake when they come."

"Prepared to endure any thing, and go through every thing. We shall be allowed candles now, I suppose."

"Oh no, by no means. Snap-dragon by candle-light! who ever heard of such a thing? It would wash all the dragon out of it, and leave nothing but the snap. It is a necessity of the game that it should be played in the dark—or rather by its own lurid light."

"Oh, there is a lurid light, is there?"

"You shall see;" and then she turned away to make her preparations.

To the game of snap-dragon, as played at Noningsby, a ghost was always necessary, and Aunt Madeline had played the ghost ever since she had been an aunt, and there had been any necessity for such a part. But in previous years the spectators had been fewer in number and more closely connected with the family. "I think we must drop the ghost on this occasion," she said, coming up to her brother.

"You'll disgust them all dreadfully if you do," said he. "The young Sebrights have come specially to see the ghost."

"Well, you can do ghost for them."

"I! no; I can't act a ghost. Miss Furnival, you'd make a lovely ghost."

"I shall be most happy to be useful," said Sophia.

"Oh, Aunt Mad., you must be ghost," said Marian, following her.

"You foolish little thing, you; we are going to have a beautiful ghost—a divine ghost," said Uncle Gus.

"But we want Madeline to be the ghost," said a big Miss Sebright, ten or eleven years old.

"She's always ghost," said Marian.

"To be sure; it will be much better," said Miss Furnival. "I only offered my poor services hoping to be useful. No Banquo that ever lived could leave a worse ghost behind him than I should prove."

It ended in there being two ghosts. It had become quite impossible to rob Miss Furnival of her promised part, and Madeline could not refuse to solve the difficulty in this way without making more of the matter than it deserved. The idea of two ghosts was delightful to the children, more especially as it entailed two large dishes full of raisins, and two blue fires blazing up from burned brandy. So the girls went out, not without proffered assistance from the gentlemen, and after a painfully long interval of some fifteen or twenty minutes—for Miss Furnival's back hair would not come down and adjust itself into ghostlike lengths with as much readiness as that of her friend—they returned bearing the dishes before them on large trays. In each of them the spirit was lighted as they entered the school-room door, and thus, as they walked in, they were illuminated by the dark-blue flames which they carried.

"Oh, is it not grand?" said Marian, appealing to Felix Graham.

"Uncommonly grand," he replied.

"And which ghost do you think is the grandest? I'll tell you which ghost I like the best—in a secret, you know; I like Aunt Mad. the best, and I think she's the grandest too."

"And I'll tell you in a secret that I think the same. To my mind she is the grandest ghost I ever saw in my life."

"Is she indeed?" asked Marian, solemnly, thinking probably that her new friend's experience in ghosts must be extensive. However that might be, he thought that, as far as his experience in women went, he had never seen any thing more lovely than Madeline Staveley dressed in a long white sheet, with a long bit of white cambric pinned round her face.

And it may be presumed that the dress altogether is not unbecoming when accompanied by blue flames, for Augustus Staveley and Lucius Mason thought the same thing of Miss Furnival, whereas Peregrine Orme did not know whether he was standing on his head or his feet as he looked at Miss Staveley. Miss Furnival may possibly have had some inkling of this when she offered to undertake the task, but I protest that such was not the case with Madeline. There was no second thought in her mind when she first declined the ghosting, and afterward undertook the part. No wish to look beautiful in the eyes of Felix Graham had come to her—at any rate as yet; and as to Peregrine Orme, she had hardly thought of his existence. "By Heavens!" said Peregrine to himself, "she is the most beautiful creature that I ever saw;" and then he began to speculate within his own mind how the idea might be received at The Cleeve.

But there was no such realized idea with Felix Graham. He saw that Madeline Staveley was very beautiful, and he felt in an unconscious manner that her character was very sweet. He may have thought that he might have loved such a girl, had such love been a thing permitted to him. But this was far from being the case. Felix Graham's lot in this life, as regarded that share which his heart might have in it, was already marked out for him; marked out for himself and by himself. The future wife of his bosom had already been selected, and was now in course of preparation for the duties of her future life. He was one of those few wise men who have determined not to take a partner in life at hazard, but to mould a young mind and character to those pursuits and modes of thought which may best fit a woman for the duties she will have to perform. What little it may be necessary to know of the earlier years of Mary Snow shall be told hereafter. Here it will be only necessary to say that she was an orphan, that as yet she was little more than a child, and that she owed her maintenance and the advantage of her education to the charity and love of her destined husband. Therefore, as I have said, it was manifest that Felix Graham could not think of falling in love with Miss Staveley, even had not his very low position, in reference to worldly affairs, made any such passion on his part quite hopeless. But with Peregrine Orme the matter was different. There could be no possible reason why Peregrine Orme should not win and wear the beautiful girl whom he so much admired.

But the ghosts are kept standing over their flames, the spirit is becoming exhausted, and the raisins will be burned. At snap-dragon, too, the ghosts here had something to do. The law of the game is this—a law on which Marian would have insisted had not the flames been so very hot—that the raisins shall become the prey of those audacious marauders only who dare to face the presence of the ghost, and to plunge their hands into the burning dish. As a rule the boys do this, clawing out the raisins, while the girls pick them up and eat them. But here, at Noningsby, the boys were too little to act thus as pioneers in the face of the enemy, and the raisins might have remained till the flames were burned out, had not the beneficent ghost scattered abroad the richness of her own treasures.

"Now, Marian," said Felix Graham, bringing her up in his arms.

"But it will burn, Mr. Felix. Look there; see; there are a great many at that end. You do it."

"I must have another kiss, then."

"Very well, yes; if you get five." And then Felix dashed his hand in among the flames and brought forth a fistful of fruit, which imparted to his fingers and wristband a smell of brandy for the rest of the evening.

"If you take so many at a time I shall rap your knuckles with the spoon," said the ghost, as she stirred up the flames to keep them alive.

"But the ghost shouldn't speak," said Marian, who was evidently unacquainted with the best ghosts of tragedy.

"But the ghost must speak when such large hands invade the caldron;" and then another raid was effected, and the threatened blow was given. Had any one told her in the morning that she would that day have rapped Mr. Graham's knuckles with a kitchen spoon, she would not have believed that person; but it is thus that hearts are lost and won.

And Peregrine Orme looked on from a distance, thinking of it all. That he should have been stricken dumb by the beauty of any girl was surprising even to himself; for though young and almost boyish in his manners, he had never yet feared to speak out in any presence. The tutor at his college had thought him insolent beyond parallel; and his grandfather, though he loved him for his open face and plain outspoken words, found them sometimes almost too much for him. But now he stood there looking and longing, and could not summon courage to go up and address a few words to this young girl even in the midst of their sports. Twice or thrice during the last few days he had essayed to speak to her, but his words had been dull and vapid, and to himself they had appeared childish. He was quite conscious of his own weakness. More than once during that period of the snap-dragon did he say to himself that he would descend into the lists and break a lance in that tourney; but still he did not descend, and his lance remained inglorious in its rest.

At the other end of the long table the ghost also had two attendant knights, and neither of them refrained from the battle. Augustus Staveley, if he thought it worth his while to keep the lists at all, would not be allowed to ride through them unopposed from any backwardness on the part of his rival. Lucius Mason was not likely to become a timid, silent, longing lover. To him it was not possible that he should fear the girl whom he loved. He could not worship that which he wished to obtain for himself. It may be doubted whether he had much faculty of worshiping any thing in the truest meaning of that word. One worships that which one feels, through the inner and unexpressed conviction of the mind, to be greater, better, higher than one's self; but it was not probable that Lucius Mason should so think of any woman that he might meet.

Nor, to give him his due, was it probable that he should be in any way afraid of any man that he might encounter. He would fear neither the talent, nor the rank, nor the money influence, nor the dexterity of any such rival. In any attempt that he might make on a woman's heart he would regard his own chance as good against that of any other possible he. Augustus Staveley was master here at Noningsby, and was a clever, dashing, handsome, fashionable young fellow; but Lucius Mason never dreamed of retreating before such forces as those. He had words with which to speak as fair as those of any man, and flattered himself that he as well knew how to use them.

It was pretty to see with what admirable tact and judicious management of her smiles Sophia received the homage of the two young men, answering the compliments of both with ease, and so conducting herself that neither could fairly accuse her of undue favor to the other. But unfairly, in his own mind, Augustus did so accuse her. And why should he have been so venomous, seeing that he entertained no regard for the lady himself? His object was still plain enough—that, namely, of making a match between his needy friend and the heiress.

His needy friend in the mean time played on through the long evening in thoughtless happiness; and Peregrine Orme, looking at the game from a distance, saw that rap given to the favored knuckles with a bitterness of heart and an inner groaning of the spirit that will not be incomprehensible to many.

"I do so love that Mr. Felix!" said Marian, as her Aunt Madeline kissed her in her little bed on wishing her good-night. "Don't you, Aunt Mad.—?"

And so it was that Christmas-day was passed at Noningsby.

CHAPTER XXIII.

CHRISTMAS AT GROBY PARK.

CHRISTMAS-DAY was always a time of very great trial to Mrs. Mason of Groby Park. It behooved her, as the wife of an old English country gentleman, to spread her board plenteously at that season, and in some sort to make an open house of it. But she could not bring herself to spread any board with plenty, and the idea of an open house would almost break her heart. Unlimited eating! There was something in the very sounds of such words which was appalling to the inner woman.

And on this Christmas-day she was doomed to go through an ordeal of very peculiar severity. It so happened that the cure of souls in the parish of Groby had been intrusted, for the last two or three years, to a young, energetic, but not very opulent curate. Why the rector of Groby should be altogether absent, leaving the work in the hands of a curate, whom he paid by the lease of a cottage and garden and fifty-five pounds a year—thereby behaving as he imagined with extensive liberality—it is unnecessary here to inquire. Such was the case, and the Rev. Adolphus Green, with Mrs. A. Green and the four children, managed to live with some difficulty on the produce of the garden and the allotted stipend; but could not probably have lived at all in that position had not Mrs. Adolphus Green been blessed with some small fortune.

It had so happened that Mrs. Adolphus Green had been instrumental in imparting some knowledge of singing to two of the Miss Masons, and had continued her instructions over the last three years. This had not been done in any preconcerted way, but the lessons had grown by chance. Mrs. Mason the while had looked on with a satisfied eye at an arrangement that was so much to her taste.

"There are no regular lessons, you know," she had said to her husband, when he suggested that some reward for so much work would be expedient. "Mrs. Green finds it convenient to have the use of my drawing-room, and would never see an instrument from year's end to year's end if she were not allowed to come up here. Depend upon it she gets a great deal more than she gives."

But after two years of tuition Mr. Mason had spoken a second time. "My dear," he said, "I can not allow the girls to accept so great a favor from Mrs. Green without making her some compensation."

"I don't see that it is at all necessary," Mrs. Mason had answered; "but if you think so, we could send her down a hamper of apples—that is, a basketful." Now it happened that apples were very plentiful that year, and that the curate and his wife were blessed with as many as they could judiciously consume.

"Apples! nonsense!" said Mr. Mason.

"If you mean money, my dear, I couldn't do it. I wouldn't so offend a lady for all the world."

"You could buy them something handsome, in the way of furniture. That little room of theirs that they call the drawing-room has nothing in it at all. Get Jones from Leeds to send them some things that will do for them." And hence, after many inner misgivings, had arisen that purchase of a drawing-room set from Mr. Kantwise—that set of metallic "Loney Castor" furniture," containing three tables, eight chairs, etc. etc., as to which it may be remembered that Mrs. Mason made such an undoubted bargain, getting them for less than cost price. That they had been "strained," as Mr. Kantwise himself admitted in discoursing on the subject to Mr. Dockwraith, was not matter of much moment. They would do extremely well for a curate's wife.

And now on this Christmas-day the present was to be made over to the happy lady. Mr. and Mrs. Green were to dine at Groby Park—leaving their more fortunate children to the fuller festivities of the cottage; and the intention was that before dinner the whole drawing-room set should be made over. It was with grievous pangs of heart that Mrs. Mason looked forward to such an operation. Her own house was plentifully furnished from the kitchens to the attics, but still she would have loved to keep that metallic set of painted trumpery. She knew that the table would not screw on; she knew that the pivot of the music-stool was bent; she knew that there was no place in the house in which they could stand; she must have known that in no possible way could they be of use to her or hers—and yet she could not part with them without an agony. Her husband was infatuated in this matter of compensation for the use of Mrs. Green's idle hours; no compensation could be necessary—and then she paid another visit to the metallic furniture. She knew in her heart of hearts that they could never be of use to anybody, and yet she made up her mind to keep back two out of the eight chairs. Six chairs would be quite enough for Mrs. Green's small room.

As there was to be feasting at five, real roast beef, plum-pudding and mince-pies—"Mince-pies and plum-pudding together are vulgar, my dear," Mrs. Mason had said to her husband; but in spite of the vulgarity he had insisted—the breakfast was of course scanty. Mr. Mason liked a slice of cold meat in the morning, or the leg of a fowl, or a couple of fresh eggs as well as any man; but the matter was not worth a continual fight. "As we are to dine an hour earlier to-day I did not think you would eat meat," his wife said to him. "Then there would be less expense in putting it on the table," he had answered; and after that there was nothing more said about it. He always put off till some future day that great contest which he intended to wage and to win, and by which he hoped to bring it about that plenty should henceforward be the law of the land at Groby Park. And then they all went to church. Mrs. Mason would not on any account have missed church on Christmas-day or a Sunday. It was a cheap duty, and therefore rigidly performed. As she walked from her carriage up to the church door she encountered Mrs. Green, and smiled sweetly as she wished that lady all the compliments of the season.

"We shall see you immediately after church," said Mrs. Mason.

"Oh yes, certainly," said Mrs. Green.

"And Mr. Green with you?"

"He intends to do himself the pleasure," said the curate's wife.

"Mind he comes, because we have a little ceremony to go through before we sit down to dinner;" and Mrs. Mason smiled again ever so graciously. Did she think, or did she not think, that she was going to do a kindness to her neighbor? Most women would have sunk into their shoes as the hour grew nigh at which they were to show themselves guilty of so much meanness.

She staid for the sacrament, and it may here be remarked that on that afternoon she rated both the footman and housemaid because they omitted to do so. She thought, we must presume, that she was doing her duty, and must imagine her to have been ignorant that she was cheating her husband and cheating her friend. She took the sacrament with admirable propriety of demeanor, and then on her return home withdrew another chair from the set. There would still be six, including the rocking chair, and six would be quite enough for that little hole of a room.

There was a large chamber up stairs at Groby Park which had been used for the children's lessons, but which now was generally deserted. There was in it an old worn-out pianoforte—and though Mrs. Mason had talked somewhat grandly of the use of her drawing-room, it was here that the singing had been taught. Into this room the metallic furniture had been brought, and up to that Christmas morning it had remained here packed in its original boxes. Hither immediately after breakfast Mrs. Mason had taken herself, and had spent an hour in her efforts to set the things forth to view. Two of the chairs she then put aside into a cupboard, and a third she added to her private store on her return to her work after church.

But, alas, alas! let her do what she would, she could not get the top on to the table. "It's all smashed, ma'am," said the girl whom she at last summoned to her aid. "Nonsense, you simpleton; how can it be smashed when it's new?" said the mistress. And then she tried again and again, declaring, as she did so, that she would have the law of the rogue who had sold her a damaged article. Nevertheless she had known that it was damaged, and had bought it cheap on that account, insisting in very urgent language that the table was in fact worth nothing because of its injuries.

At about four Mr. and Mrs. Green walked up to the house and were shown into the drawing-room. Here was Mrs. Mason supported by Penelope and Creusa. As Diana was not musical, and therefore under no compliment to Mrs. Green, she kept out of the way. Mr. Mason also was absent. He knew that something very mean was about to be done, and would not show his face till it was over. He ought to have taken the matter in hand himself, and would have done so had not his mind been full of other things. He himself was a man terribly wronged and wickedly injured, and could not therefore in these present months interfere much in the active doing of kindnesses. His hours were spent in thinking how he might best obtain justice—how he might secure his pound of flesh. He only wanted his own, but that he would have—his own, with due punishment on those who had for so many years robbed him of it. He therefore did not attend at the presentation of the furniture.

"And now we'll go up stairs, if you please," said Mrs. Mason, with that gracious smile for which she was so famous. "Mr. Green, you must come too. Dear Mrs. Green has been so very kind to my two girls; and now I have got a few articles—they are of the very newest fashion—and I do hope that Mrs. Green will like them." And so they all went up into the school-room.

"There's a new fashion come up lately," said Mrs. Mason, as she walked along the corridor, "quite new—of metallic furniture. I don't know whether you have seen any." Mrs. Green said she had not seen any as yet.

"The Patent Steel Furniture Company makes it, and it has got very greatly into vogue for small rooms. I thought that perhaps you would allow me to present you with a set for your drawing-room."

"I'm sure it is very kind of you to think of it," said Mrs. Green.

"Uncommonly so," said Mr. Green. But both Mr. Green and Mrs. Green knew the lady, and their hopes did not run high.

And then the door was opened, and there stood the furniture to view. There stood the furniture, except the three subtracted chairs and the loo table. The claw and leg of the table indeed were standing there, but the top was folded up and lying on the floor beside it. "I hope you'll like the pattern," began Mrs. Mason. "I'm told that it is the prettiest that has yet been brought out. There has been some little accident about the screw of the table, but the smith in the village will put that to rights in five minutes. He lives so close to you that I didn't think it worth while to have him up here."

"It's very nice," said Mrs. Green, looking round her almost in dismay.

"Very nice indeed," said Mr. Green, wondering in his mind for what purpose such utter trash could have been manufactured, and endeavoring to make up his mind as to what they might possibly do with it. Mr. Green knew what chairs and tables should be, and was well aware that the things before him were absolutely useless for any of the ordinary purposes of furniture.

"And they are the most convenient things in the world," said Mrs. Mason; "for when you are going to change house you pack them all up again in these boxes. Wooden furniture takes up so much room, and is so lumberesome."

"Yes, it is," said Mrs. Green.

"I'll have them all put up again and sent down in the cart to-morrow."

"Thank you; that will be very kind," said Mr. Green, and then the ceremony of presentation was over. On the following day the boxes were sent down, and Mrs. Mason might have abstracted even another chair without detection, for the cases lay unheeded from month to month in the curate's still unfurnished room. "The fact is they can not afford a carpet," Mrs. Mason afterward said to one of her daughters, "and with such things as those they are quite right to keep them up till they can be used with advantage. I always gave Mrs. Green credit for a good deal of prudence."

And then, when the show was over, they descended again into the drawing-room—Mr. Green and Mrs. Mason went first, and Creusa followed. Penelope was thus so far behind as to be able to speak to her friend without being heard by the others.

"You know mamma," she said, with a shrug of her shoulders and a look of scorn in her eye.

"The things are very nice."

"No, they are not, and you know they are not. They are worthless; perfectly worthless."

"But we don't want any thing."

"No; and if there had been no pretense of a gift it would all have been very well. What will Mr. Green think?"

"I rather think he likes iron chairs," and then they were in the drawing-room.

Mr. Mason did not appear till dinner-time, and came in only just in time to give his arm to Mrs. Green. He had had letters to write—a letter to Messrs. Round and Crook, very determined in its tone; and a letter also to Mr. Dockwraith, for the little attorney had so crept on in the affair that he was now corresponding with the principal. "I'll teach those fellows in Bedford Row to know who I am," he had said to himself more than once, sitting on his high stool at Hamworth.

And then came the Groby Park Christmas dinner. To speak the truth Mr. Mason had himself gone to the neighboring butcher, and ordered the sirloin of beef, knowing that it would be useless to trust to orders conveyed through his wife. He had seen the piece of meat put on one side for him, and had afterward traced it on to the kitchen dresser. But nevertheless when it appeared at table it had been sadly mutilated. A stake had been cut off the full breadth of it—a monstrous cantle from out its fair proportions. The lady had seen the jovial, thick, ample size of the goodly joint, and her heart had been unable to spare it. She had made an effort and turned away, saying to herself that the responsibility was all with him. But it was of no use. There was that within her which could not do it.

"Your master will never be able to carve such a mountain of meat as that," she had said, turning back to the cook. "'Deed, an' it's he that will, ma'am," said the Irish mistress of the spit; for Irish cooks are cheaper than those bred and born in England. But nevertheless the thing was done, and it was by her own fair hands that the envious knife was used. "I couldn't do it, ma'am," the cook had said; "I couldn't raily."

Mr. Mason's face became very black when he saw the raid that had been effected, and when he looked up across the table his wife's eye was on him. She knew what she had to expect, and she knew also that it would not come now. Her eye stealthily looked at his, quivering with fear; for Mr. Mason could be savage enough in his anger. And what had she gained? One may as well ask what does the miser gain who hides away his gold in an old pot, or what does that other madman gain who is locked up for long, long years because he fancies himself the grandmother of the Queen of England?

But there was still enough beef on the table for all of them to eat, and as Mrs. Mason was not intrusted with the carving of it, their plates were filled. As far as a sufficiency of beef can make a good dinner Mr. and Mrs. Green did have a good dinner on that Christmas-day. Beyond that their comfort was limited, for no one was in a humor for happy conversation.

And over and beyond the beef there was a plum-pudding and three mince-pies. Four mince-pies had originally graced the dish, but before dinner one had been conveyed away to some upstairs receptacle for such spoils. The pudding also was small, nor was it black and rich, and laden with good things as a Christmas pudding should be laden. Let us hope that what the guests so lost was made up to them on the following day, by an absence of those ill effects which sometimes attend upon the consumption of rich viands.

"And now, my dear, we'll have a bit of bread and cheese and a glass of beer," Mr. Green said when he arrived at his own cottage. And so it was that Christmas-day was passed at Groby Park.

CHAPTER XXIV.

CHRISTMAS IN GREAT ST. HELENS.

WE will now look in for a moment at the Christmas doings of our fat friend Mr. Moulder. Mr. Moulder was a married man living in lodgings over a wine-merchant's vaults in Great St. Helens. He was blessed—or troubled—with no children, and prided himself greatly on the material comfort with which his humble home was surrounded. "His wife," he often boasted, "never wanted for plenty of the best of eating;" and for linen and silks and such like, she could show her drawers and her wardrobes with many a great lady from Russell Square, and not be ashamed neither! And then, as for drink—

"tipple," as Mr. Moulder sportively was accustomed to name it among his friends, he opined that he was not altogether behind the mark in that respect. "He had got some brandy—he didn't care what any body might say about Cognac and eau de vie; but the brandy which he had got from Betts's private establishment seventeen years ago, for richness of flavor and fullness of strength, would beat any French article that any body in the city could show. That at least was his idea. If any body didn't like it, they needn't take it. There was whisky that would make your hair stand on end." So said Mr. Moulder, and I can believe him; for it has made my hair stand on end merely to see other people drinking it.

And if comforts of apparel, comforts of eating and drinking, and comforts of the feather-bed and easy-chair kind can make a woman happy, Mrs. Moulder was no doubt a happy woman. She had quite fallen in to the mode of life laid out for her. She had a little bit of hot kidney for breakfast at about ten; she dined at three, having seen herself to the accurate cooking of her roast fowl, or her bit of sweet-bread, and always had her pint of Scotch ale. She turned over all her clothes almost every day. In the evening she read Reynolds's Miscellany, had her tea and buttered muffins, took a thimbleful of brandy-and-water at nine, and then went to bed. The work of her life consisted in sewing buttons on to Moulder's shirts, and seeing that his things were properly got up when he was at home. No doubt she would have done better as to the duties of the world had the world's duties come to her. As it was, very few such had come in her direction. Her husband was away from home three-fourths of the year, and she had no children that required attention. As for society, some four or five times a year she would drink tea with Mrs. Hubbles at Clapham. Mrs. Hubbles was the wife of the senior partner in the firm, and on such occasions Mrs. Moulder dressed herself in her best, and having traveled to Clapham in an omnibus, spent the evening in dull propriety on one corner of Mrs. Hubbles's sofa. When I have added to this that Moulder every year took her to Broadstairs for a fortnight, I think that I have described with sufficient accuracy the course of Mrs. Moulder's life.

On the occasion of this present Christmas-day Mr. Moulder entertained a small party. And he delighted in such occasional entertainments, taking extraordinary pains that the eatables should be of the very best; and he would maintain an hospitable good humor to the last—unless any thing went wrong in the cookery, in which case he could make himself extremely unpleasant to Mrs. M. Indeed, proper cooking for Mr. M. and the proper starching of the bands of his shirts were almost the only trials that Mrs. Moulder was doomed to suffer. "What the d— are you for?" he would say, almost throwing the displeasing viands at her head across the table, or tearing the rough linen from off his throat. "It ain't much I ask of you in return for your keep;" and then he would scowl at her with bloodshot eyes till she shook in her shoes. But this did not happen often, as experiences had made her careful.

But on this present Christmas festival all went swimmingly to the end. "Now, bear a hand, old girl," was the harshest word he said to her; and he enjoyed himself like Duncan, shut up in measureless content. He had three guests with him on this auspicious day. There was his old friend Snengkeld, who had dined with him on every Christmas since his marriage; there was his wife's brother, of whom we will say a word or two just now; and there was our old friend Mr. Kantwise. Mr. Kantwise was not exactly the man whom Moulder would have chosen as his guest, for they were opposed to each other in all their modes of thought and action; but he had come across the traveling agent of the Patent Metallic Steel Furniture Company on the previous day, and finding that he was to be alone in London on this general holiday, he had asked him out of sheer good-nature. Moulder could be very good-natured, and full of pity when the sorrow to be pitied arose from some such source as the want of a Christmas dinner. So Mr. Kantwise had been asked, and precisely at four o'clock he made his appearance at Great St. Helens.

But now as to this brother-in-law. He was no other than that John Kenneby whom Miriam Usbech did not marry—whom Miriam Usbech might, perhaps, have done well to marry. John Kenneby, after one or two attempts in other spheres of life, had at last got into the house of Hubbles and Grease, and had risen to be their book-keeper. He had once been tried by them as a traveler, but in that line he had failed. He did not possess that rough, ready, self-confident tone of mind which is almost necessary for a man who is destined to move about quickly from one circle of persons to another. After a six months' trial he had given that up, but during the time, Mr. Moulder, the senior traveler of the house, had married his sister. John Kenneby was a good, honest, painstaking fellow, and was believed by his friends to have put a few pounds together in spite of the timidity of his character.

When Snengkeld and Kenneby were shown up into the room, they found nobody there but Kantwise. That Mrs. Moulder should be down stairs looking after the roast turkey was no more than natural; but why should not Moulder himself be there to receive his guests? He soon appeared, however, coming up without his coat.

"Well, Snengkeld, how are you, old fellow; many happy returns, and all that; the same to you, John. I'll tell you what, my lads; it's a prime 'un. I never saw such a bird in all my days."

"What, the turkey?" said Snengkeld.

"You didn't think it'd be a ostrich, did you?"

"Ha, ha, ha!" laughed Snengkeld. "No, I didn't expect nothing but a turkey here on Christmas-day."

"And nothing but a turkey you'll have, my boys. Can you eat turkey, Kantwise?"

Mr. Kantwise declared that his only passion in the way of eating was for a turkey.

"As for John, I'm sure of him. I've seen him at the work before." Whereupon John grinned but said nothing.

"I never see such a bird in my life, certainly."

"From Norfolk, I suppose," said Snengkeld, with a great appearance of interest.

"Oh, you may swear to that. It weighed twenty-four pounds, for I put it into the scales myself, and old Gibbetts let me have it for a guinea. The price marked on it was five-and-twenty, for I saw it. He's had it hanging for a fortnight, and I've been to see it wiped down with vinegar regular every morning. And now, my boys, it's done to a turn. I've been in the kitchen most of the time myself, and either I or Mrs. M. has never left it for a single moment."

"How did you manage about divine service?" said Kantwise; and then, when he had spoken, closed his eyes and sucked his lips.

Mr. Moulder looked at him for a minute, and then said, "Gammon."

"Ha, ha, ha!" laughed Snengkeld. And then Mrs. Moulder appeared, bringing the turkey with her; for she would trust it to no hands less careful than her own.

"By George, it is a bird," said Snengkeld, standing over it and eying it minutely.

"Uncommon nice it looks," said Kantwise.

"All the same, I wouldn't eat none, if I were you," said Moulder, "seeing what sinners have been a basting it." And then they all sat down to dinner, Moulder having first resumed his coat.

For the next three or four minutes Moulder did not speak a word. The turkey was on his mind, with the stuffing, the gravy, the liver, the breast, the wings, and the legs. He stood up to carve it, and while he was at the work he looked at it as though his two eyes were hardly sufficient. He did not help first one person and then another, so ending by himself; but he cut up artistically as much as might probably be consumed, and located the fragments in small heaps or shares in the hot gravy; and then, having made a partition of the spoils, he served it out with unerring impartiality. To have robbed any one of his or her fair slice of the breast would, in his mind, have been gross dishonesty. In his heart he did not love Kantwise, but he dealt by him with the utmost justice in the great affair of the turkey's breast. When he had done all this, and his own plate was laden, he gave a long sigh. "I shall never cut up such another bird as that the longest day that I have to live," he said; and then he took out his large red silk handkerchief and wiped the perspiration from his brow.

"Deary me, M.; don't think of that now," said the wife.

"What's the use?" said Snengkeld. "Care killed a cat."

"And perhaps you may," said John Kenneby, trying to comfort him; "who knows?"

"It's all in the hands of Providence," said Kantwise, "and we should look to him."

"And how does it taste?" asked Moulder, shaking the gloomy thoughts from his mind.

"Uncommon," said Snengkeld, with his mouth quite full. "I never ate such a turkey in all my life."

"Like melted diamonds," said Mrs. Moulder, who was not without a touch of poetry.

"Ah! there's nothing like hanging of 'em long enough, and watching of 'em well. It's that vinegar as done it;" and then they went seriously to work, and there was nothing more said of any importance until the eating was nearly over.

And now Mrs. M. had taken away the cloth, and they were sitting cozily over their port-wine. The very apple of the eye of the evening had not arrived even yet. That would not come till the pipes were brought out, and the brandy was put on the table, and the whisky was there that made the people's hair stand on end. It was then that the flood-gates of convivial eloquence would be unloosed. In the mean time it was necessary to sacrifice something to gentility, and therefore they sat over their port-wine.

"Did you bring that letter with you, John?" said his sister. John replied that he had done so, and that he had also received another letter that morning from another party on the same subject.

"Do show it to Moulder, and ask him," said Mrs. M.

"I've got 'em both on purpose," said John; and then he brought forth two letters, and handed one of them to his brother-in-law. It contained a request, very civilly worded, from Messrs. Round and Crook, begging him to call at their office in Bedford Row on the earliest possible day, in order that they might have some conversation with him regarding the will of the late Sir Joseph Mason, who died in 18—.

"Why this is law business," said Moulder, who liked no business of that description. "Don't you go near them, John, if you ain't obliged."

And then Kenneby gave his explanation on the matter, telling how in former years—many years ago—he had been a witness in a lawsuit. And then as he told it he sighed, remembering Miriam Usbech, for whose sake he had remained unmarried even to this day. And he went on to narrate how he had been bullied in the court, though he had valiantly striven to tell the truth with exactness; and as he spoke an opinion of his became manifest that old Usbech had not signed the document in his presence. "The girl signed it, certainly," said he, "for I handed her the pen. I recollect it as though it were yesterday."

"They are the very people we were talking of at Leeds," said Moulder, turning to Kantwise. "Mason and Martock; don't you remember how you went out to Groby Park to sell some of them iron gimcracks? That was old Mason's son. They are the same people."

VOL. XXIII.—No. 137.—Ss

"Ah! I shouldn't wonder," said Kantwise, who was listening all the while. He never allowed intelligence of this kind to pass by him idly.

"And who's the other letter from?" asked Moulder. "But, dash my wigs, it's past six o'clock. Come, old girl, why don't you give us the tobacco and stuff?"

"It ain't far to fetch," said Mrs. Moulder. And then she put the tobacco and "stuff" upon the table.

"The other letter is from an enemy of mine," said John Kenneby, speaking very solemnly; "an enemy of mine, named Dockwrath, who lives at Hamworth. He's an attorney too."

"Dockwrath!" said Moulder.

Mr. Kantwise said nothing, but he looked round over his shoulder at Kenneby, and then shut his eyes.

"That was the name of the man whom we left in the commercial room at the Bull," said Snengkeld.

"He went out to Mason's at Groby Park that same day," said Moulder.

"Then it's the same man," said Kenneby; and there was as much solemnity in the tone of his voice as though the unravelment of all the mysteries of the iron mask was now about to take place. Mr. Kantwise still said nothing, but he also perceived that it was the same man.

"Let me tell you, John Kenneby," said Moulder, with the air of one who understood well the subject that he was discussing, "if they two be the same man, then the man who wrote that letter to you is as big a blackguard as there is from this to himself." And Mr. Moulder in the excitement of the moment puffed hard at his pipe, took a long pull at his drink, and dragged open his waistcoat. "I don't know whether Kantwise has any thing to say upon that subject," added Moulder.

"Not a word at present," said Kantwise. Mr. Kantwise was a very careful man, and usually calculated with accuracy the value which he might extract from any circumstance with reference to his own main chance. Mr. Dockwrath had not as yet paid him for the set of the metallic furniture, and therefore he also might well have joined in that sweeping accusation; but it might be that by a judicious use of what he now heard he might obtain the payment of that little bill—and perhaps other collateral advantages.

And then the letter from Dockwrath to Kenneby was brought forth and read. "My dear John," it began—for the two had known each other when they were lads together—and it went on to request Kenneby's attendance at Hamworth for the short space of a few hours—"I want to have a little conversation with you about a matter of considerable interest to both of us; and as I can not expect you to undertake expense I inclose a money order for thirty shillings."

"He's in earnest at any rate," said Mr. Moulder.

"No mistake about that," said Snengkeld.

But Mr. Kantwise spoke never a word.

It was at last decided that John Kenneby should go both to Hamworth and to Bedford Row, but that he should go to Hamworth first. Moulder would have counseled him to have gone to neither, but Snengkeld remarked that there were too many at work to let the matter sleep, and John himself observed that "anyways he hadn't done any thing to be ashamed of."

"Then go," said Moulder, at last, "only don't say more than you are obliged to."

"I does not like these business talkings on Christmas night," said Mrs. Moulder, when the matter was arranged.

"What can one do?" asked Moulder.

"It's a tempting of Providence in my mind," said Kantwise, as he replenished his glass and turned his eyes up to the ceiling.

"Now that's gammon," said Moulder. And then there arose among them a long and animated discussion on matters theological.

"I'll tell you what my idea of death is," said Moulder, after a while. "I ain't a bit afeard of it. My father was an honest man as did his duty by his employers, and he died with a bottom of brandy before him and a pipe in his mouth. I sha'n't live long myself—"

"Gracious, Moulder, don't!" said Mrs. M.

"No more I sha'n't, 'cause I'm fat as he was; and I hope I may die as he did. I've been honest to Hubbles and Grease. They've made thousands of pounds along of me, and have never lost none. Who can say more than that? When I took to the old girl there, I insured my life, so that she shouldn't want her wittles and drink—"

"Oh, M., don't!"

"And I ain't afeard to die. Snengkeld, my old pal, hand us the brandy."

Such is the modern philosophy of the Moulders, pigs out of the sty of Epicurus. And so it was they passed Christmas-day in Great St. Helens.

"MARRYING A BABY."

"UPON my word, Phil, I think you're the most entertaining person I've met since I came to New York. I really think you have made as many as three remarks, all equally brilliant, since Phil Junior was sent off to bed. I believe it's only him after all you come to see!"

Little Mrs. Ellis pouted—a pout was becoming to her strawberry mouth—and tossed a geranium from a vase near by, at the half-shut eyes of the tall brother who lay stretched at lazy length on the sofa opposite. He caught the perfumed leaf as it fell and smelled it languidly, looking at his sister with a smile, half amused, half listless.

"What a little exigeante you are, Lou!" he said, in a light, mocking tone. "Here I've been playing the devoted brother to perfection ever since your arrival. Round here at the Brevoort every evening, making myself necessary to your small boy's nocturnal peace of mind; doing opera, concert, church, and all that sort of thing with you, while your lazy liege lord over yonder smoked his Habana in inglorious ease at home; and now when it's an off-night for all those things, and I report myself at the post of duty all the same, you expect me to talk and make myself otherwise agreeable! Come now, that's too much, you know. I shall consider myself an injured individual, persecuted by an ungrateful sister. I shall wish you the best of good-nights, and hope to find you more reasonable when I return to-morrow."

Mrs. Ellis laughed at his tone of mock injury, and put out her pretty hand to stay him as he pretended to rise.

"No, no; lie still a little longer—I want to talk to you, Phil," she said, in a voice that was anxious, spite of its lightness. "Len hasn't half got through his quota of cigars—I let him smoke as many as he likes, out on the balcony! He won't heed us."

"I wait to hear," said the brother, closing his eyes with a martyred air; and the lady went on, speaking hurriedly, half-timidly.

"You won't be angry with me, Phil—you know I love you better than any one in the world except that dear, good old fellow out there, and little Phil, the boy that was named for you. But spite of that, I must tell you that I'm not half satisfied with you. You know I always aspired to such great things for you; the Presidency was never half enough—"

"You little goose—I should think not!" interrupted her brother, a smile breaking over the lips, that while they were closed had a bitter, almost hard, expression.

"And I'm just disappointed, grievously disappointed, Phil, to come back, after an absence of three years, and find you still jogging along in the old dull track, never caring to interest yourself in any thing outside of your dingy land office; so blasé in every kind of pleasure, and so tired of all sorts of people, even of yourself, that life seems to you rather a burden to be borne than a grand gift to be grandly used. It's a shame, Phil—now there!"

Philip Warner looked and listened, half amazed, half amused, to this sudden and unexpected burst of feeling from the gay, simple little sister, who had always been a kind of pet child to him.

"You dear, good, funny little creature," he began; but as she turned away with a gesture of vexation at his light tone he sprang up to an erect position and answered as seriously as she could wish.

"It is a shame, truly, Lou; no one knows that better than I. But I can not help it. The freshness and vigor have all died out of my life. I know no miraculous fountain in which I may dip and come forth a new man. The life I lead is enough to dry up the springs in any nature. Alone in a great city, where not one of the thousands I meet daily cares whether I am in the world or out of it; with no home influences to keep the heart in my body from turning to a fossil; following, day after day, the same dull routine of labor with all the ambition which once gave it zest, strangled long ago by the mire through which it must wade to reach its goal nowadays; pursuing the same insipid round of stupidities, miscalled gayeties, or else spending the endless evenings in a bachelor's den—ah, Lou, what wonder you find me a bore? But I bore no one so much as myself.”

Mrs. Ellis looked at her brother as he stood leaning against the mantle-shelf, his dark eyes growing sad and stern, and a smile more bitter than playful on his lip. Her own eyes filled with loving tears, and she could not answer for a moment: was this the end of all the young girl's fond proud dreams for the brother who had been father, mother, and every thing to her lonely orphanhood? Philip saw how he had grieved her, and he said, very kindly,

“Coax your husband to pitch his tent in this good city of ours, Lou. Make a home for me; let me be indeed a ‘noder papa’ to your boy, as he says, and you and he shall make of me what you like.”

Mrs. Ellis looked pleased and touched.

“I only wish it were possible—but you know it is not,” she said. “But, Phil, why do you not make a home for yourself? I really believe it is all you need. You have grown morbid in your solitude. Promise me now that you will marry—that you will begin to look out for a wife from this very night!”

She sprung up in her eagerness and put her hands on his shoulders—her favorite expression of affection; but the sudden bitterness that darkened his face, the cold cynicism of his tone made her start back grieved and astonished.

“Get married! Look out for a wife! That were indeed a remedy worse than the disease!”

Mrs. Ellis sat down again, and looked at her brother with a grave, steady gaze, that involuntarily compelled his hard-set features to relax.

“You must have changed very much from the high-souled and warm-hearted brother who used to be so kind to his silly little sister, if you can utter in earnest such a libel as that against women. You have no right to say such a thing, remembering our mother, or even thinking of me, Philip.”

Philip Warner was touched by her spirited yet tender words, her tone of unwonted dignity. He came and sat down beside her.

“Ah, if there were only any more women to be found like my mother, like you, my good little Louie! But there are not!”

“Nonsense!” said Mrs. Ellis, energetically. “Do you suppose your own family monopolized all the good among the sex? There are a thousand women in New York to-night, any one of whom you could probably win if you wooed her aright, for you have every thing, Phil, which makes a man attractive; and five hundred of them would make charming and loving and sensible wives, who would soon put to flight these megrims of yours. Only consent to try.”

“I have tried, Lucy.” The bitter look and tone came back.

“You tried and failed! The woman you could choose not have soul enough to see that your love was a priceless boon!”

Philip smiled at the quick flash of indignant pride. The smile was a dreary one enough.

“The fault was all mine in supposing that women nowadays had any hearts, or souls, or consciences, or any arrangements of that sort. I tell you they have not!” he went on, sternly, seeing the vexed look coming back to his sister's face. “Not the women I know; they are all slaves, and bow down to the goddess they call Society. Their whole life is given up to acquiring the art of seeming. If they can appear young, and artless, and good, and fresh-hearted, what matter whether they are any of these things or not? I was lonely after you left me. I wanted a wife. I believed in the exploded fable of wedded happiness. I knew a hundred fair-seeming women. I looked among them all to see if any where I might find simplicity, freshness, warmth, and depth. I found here artifice; here selfishness; here a cold, ambitious nature; here giddy, glittering froth. At last I thought—poor fool!—that I had realized my ideal; that I had found a woman who seemed all womanliness, and was what she seemed. I had almost come to love her, even in the meaning I give that word; I could see she liked me.”

“Well!” exclaimed Mrs. Ellis, breathlessly, as he paused a moment. Philip smiled sardonically.

“Well, we went to church together one evening; there was to be a sermon in behalf of some charity or other for children; and all the way, as we walked in the cool, clear moonlight—how could she lie so in its truthful light?—she prated, so sweetly as I thought, of her love and pity for these little ones of Christ, so tender and so helpless; she coaxed up lying tears to her eyes as the minister portrayed the sad lot of the orphan with all the artifices of eloquence; she dropped a piece of shining gold on the plate as it passed, and whispered, in a tone meant to be touchingly artless, that ‘she knew I wouldn't mind waiting for the smoking-cap she was crocheting, for really she could do nothing for the next month but sew for those poor little destitute darlings!’

“The next morning, sister mine, I chanced to see this tender-hearted creature, whose exquisite charity of soul had well-nigh riveted the chain her many other graces had wound around my heart, promenading Broadway. I was close behind her, but I would not join her just yet; it was such a pleasure to watch her unseen; to mark the graceful, springing step, the queenly carriage of the beautiful head that, proudly as it was set, drooped timidly enough toward me! Besides, there was some one with her, one of the snake-like order of girls, you know; I detested her, and it exasperated me to see my dove accompanying with her. Well, they came to a crossing soon; the streets were very muddy, but a little sweeper had made this tidy enough even for her dainty feet. I noticed how deftly she lifted her robe, how pure was the snowy skirt, how trim the tiny boot thus revealed; and while I was glowing all over with the silliest admiration and affection this artless and innocent young creature came to a sudden stop."

"Ah, Philip, you are too scornful, too bitter! I can not stand this tone. What could she have done that you should mock her so?"

Philip smiled, and his smile was worse than his former look.

"The little sweeper held out her hand for the pittance she had justly earned. It was a pretty little hand, Lou, brown and soiled as it was, and the face was like that exquisite French picture, L'Indigence—you remember. Just those wistful pleading eyes and tremulous sweet mouth."

"Yes, I remember," said Mrs. Ellis, breathlessly; "and what then?"

"What then? Why, the little dirt-stained hand chanced to touch my lady's dainty glove. She struck the little fingers sharply away with her ivory parasol, and the voice in which she uttered, 'Begone, you little beggar!' absolutely shook with rage.

"I do think the greatest nuisance in all New York is these horrid little street torments!' she went on to her companion, as the child sprang away dismayed; and this amiable lady remarked that to her all children were a nuisance!

"Are they not?" responded my charmer; 'but you would have thought I adored them if you had heard me talking to Philip Warner last night. I happened to know that he has a weakness for the little plagues—absurd, isn't it, in a great, splendid fellow like him?—some transcendental notion about their being artless and truthful, and all that. I contributed my last half eagle to an orphan's fund—more for his benefit than theirs, by-the-way—and now I shall have to wear these gloves another Sunday, with the spot that little wretch has left on them. Never mind, he praised their color and fit last night, and I'll try the efficacy of bread crumbs.'

"I haven't forgotten a word of this precious conversation, you see, Lou, but I couldn't stand any more of it. I availed myself of the next crossing to pass the ladies with a bow and a smile. No words were needed; I saw that by the sudden withering up of my fair one's roses as she met my look, and by the malicious glitter in her sweet friend's eyes. I have never had the pleasure of meeting either of them again."

"Poor Philip! My dear brother!" Little Mrs. Ellis's voice was full of indignation and pity and sorrow; all a true woman's tenderness and sympathy quivered on her lip and shone in her tearful eyes. She drew down the stately head, that ached so with its weight of loneliness and bitter feelings and disappointed hopes, upon her gentle bosom, and softly thriddled her fingers in and out the thick masses of hair.

"Poor girl, too!" she said again, gently. "You must not condemn her wholly, Philip. She was brought up probably by an ambitious mother, and taught from childhood that the chief end of woman was to make the best match possible."

Philip raised his head quickly, and the old sarcastic look returned.

"It is the lesson they all learn with their A B C's nowadays."

"I tell you it is not, Philip," rejoined his sister, steadfastly. "God meant woman to be true and devoted and self-forgetful; and there are full as many who have wrought out this lovely nature to its perfection as have been warped and stunted by lack of proper culture."

"Well, only find me one such pearl of great price, and I promise you I will sell all that I have to buy it, sister mine," said the young man, lightly. "And now I must really go. Good-night, Lou—what a pity you are my sister! Hallo, Len! He is sound asleep! Well, I consider myself insulted, but expect me at the same hour to-morrow, nevertheless."

He was gone, with only these jesting words; but the kiss he had left upon his sister's lips had said all she wanted, and she fell asleep that night more hopeful about her brother than she had felt since their meeting.

The next afternoon, as Mr. Philip Warner was walking leisurely up Broadway, on the right hand side—which he always chose, to avoid collision with the crinolines, "fair and false," that throng the fashionable side of that magnificent trottoir daily after office-hours—he suddenly felt himself thrill with that quick, delicious sensation which the exquisite, memory-haunted odor of violets ever awakes in a heart not all dried up. Yes! certainly violets; and the more pungent perfume of hyacinths; and a fresh, earthy smell, as though they verily grew out of doors. Where could they be?

He looked on the right hand and on the left, but there were no flower-stalls to be seen, and the fairy-like odor seemed to float on before him as he walked. There were, as usual, but few passers-by on this side of the street, and immediately in front of him, just then, only a decrepit old man; a tall, bony woman, with a masculine, striding step, that soon carried her far beyond; and a young girl, habited in a gray traveling suit, with a morocco satchel upon her arm.

"Of course it was she who carried the bouquet." She lived in the country, and had come in for the opera, or a party, bringing her own bunch of real spring flowers, to make envious the hearts of the belles with the card-boarded bouquets of pieced-up camellias. Even the flowers were make-believe nowadays! Never mind; these violets were real, and smelled just as sweet as though they were destined to a worthier fate; he should enjoy them as long as he could."

With this laudable determination our amiable friend kept close behind the unconscious owner of the magic-scented flowers, measuring his long paces by her little steps, and walking on in a kind of maze of dreams and memories conjured up by their glamour.

He started to a more personal consciousness as presently, reaching the corner of Bleeker

Street, the young lady crossed over, and walked on in his own homeward direction. He crossed too, still keeping close behind; and now he began to notice not only the violets but their unsuspecting owner. A light little figure: a long gray cosaque, that fell in soft, unrustling folds; a simple straw-bonnet, with only a white ribbon for trimming. He rather liked the costume, it seemed to match the flowers; and the gait was agile and springing, though very lady-like. He wondered how it was with the face.

But she never glanced backward, and her step grew more rapid, as though she were in haste. Presently, however, she came to a sudden stop; and Philip drew back a little, and stopped too: he wasn't going to give up the violets yet. They had come to a large dingy house, which looked like a boarding-house of the cheaper sort, and on the dirty marble steps a number of untidy children were sitting, chattering and squabbling like so many mud-sparrows.

One of them was quiet enough, however; she lay back, leaning against the iron railing, her face showing ghastly in its pallor and thinness from its frame-work of dead black hair, and her wan lips parted as though trying to draw in some life and strength from the warm sunset air. She started up with a wild, excited look as the dim, sweet violet odor stole upon her languid sense, and fixed her hollow eyes with a burning eagerness upon the flowers in the lady's hand. She did not speak—there was no need; for the young girl had already stopped, and was parting the clustering stems.

Philip watched and listened with an intense interest, for which it would have puzzled him to account.

“Do you like flowers so much, my child?” he heard her say, in a sweet, womanly voice; and saw her put a cluster of the delicious purple blossoms in the thin, eager hand. “I am taking these to a sick lady,” she went on; “but I will spare you some, for you look ill too. It is growing late for you to be out with that cough. If you will go in now, and put these in water, they will keep sweet a long time—never mind, you are very welcome.”

She did not wait for the child's feverish thanks, but walked rapidly away, only looking back once to see if she had obeyed her behest. Looking back thus, she encountered a curious, strangely-earnest gaze from a pair of dark eyes belonging to a tall gentleman who was walking just behind her. The pink cheeks grew pinker behind the little gray tissue veil, and the young lady slackened her pace slightly, to let the observant stranger pass; but he did not seem to choose to do so, and she hastened on again till she reached the last house on the block, and ascended its high marble steps. The color deepened then to a positive blush as, the next moment, the tall gentleman stood beside her; and Philip—how surprised he was! It was his own boarding-house! He had lived here with his sister years ago, when Bleecker Street was an aristocratic quarter; it had acquired a certain home-like feeling for him, and he would not desert it now that it was only “genteel.”

“Permit me!” he said, as she put her hand—a small hand, delicately gloved, he noticed—on the bell-handle; opening the door, meanwhile, with his night-key, and standing back to let her pass.

“A pleasant little smile, and a fresher face than one often sees,” was his mental comment, as she thanked him hastily and went in. “And she actually did a kind and graceful act all unobserved, as she supposed. I wonder if Lou can be right after all! Why, it's Lou's old room she is going into!” he went on to himself, as he sprang up the stairs behind her, and saw her enter the “second story back,” next to his own bachelor apartments.

“Let me see—that Mrs. Chester has it now, the widow of the sea-captain, and the mother of that pretty little baby. I remember now Mrs. Bonner said at breakfast she was ill. Poor thing!—hope it is nothing serious. I wonder if this is her sister? I wonder if she'll be at dinner?”

No, she was not at dinner; and Mr. Philip Warner neither saw nor heard any thing of the young lady—unless, indeed, it were she whom he heard singing the Cradle Song in the “Princess,” as he passed her door on his return from his evening visit to his sister. On the whole he thought it was she: the mamma was sick; besides, he had never before heard her invoke the aid of the Poet Laureate to soothe her baby to sleep; and her sweet, feeble voice had no such low, rich tones as these. So he sat listening in cap and gown and slippers, with clouds of fragrant smoke curling around his head, until the lulling strain died away, and all was quiet, and he himself had lapsed into an idle dream—half-sleeping, half-waking—in which a wife and a child, violets and Tennyson, were strangely mixed up together.

From this foolish vagary he was suddenly startled by a quick agitated knock at his door. Opening it hastily, he perceived his landlady, looking very much excited and distressed.

“I didn't mind disturbing you, Mr. Warner,” she said, hurriedly; “I know your kind heart of old; besides, I don't believe there's another gentleman up in the house. I want you to be so good as to go for a doctor immediately; that poor lady in the next room has been seized with convulsions, and there's no one with her but her sister, a young thing who came only this afternoon. She's helpful as can be, but she's half dead herself with the shock. Here is his address, bring him back quick with you, for Heaven's sake!”

Philip seized the card; he was too shocked for words, but almost before the kind landlady had finished speaking he had thrown on his walking garments, and was springing down the stairs. Mrs. Bonner went back to the sick-room, confirmed in her estimate of his good-heartedness—she did not know whither his thoughts had been wandering all the evening;

the paroxysm had passed off now; the sufferer was lying quiet in her sister's arm, and the good woman sat down to wait with her the coming of advice and help.

A half hour passed by drearily enough; the dim silence of the sick chamber, broken only by the convulsive breathing of the patient, and now and then a stifled sob from her on whose breast she leaned. At length, just as the gathering constriction of the features and rigid stiffening of the limbs showed that another attack was coming on, the welcome sound of hurrying manly feet was heard upon the stairs, and Mrs. Bonner sprung to open the door.

"You are in great need, doctor," said she; "and you too, come in, please, Mr. Warner. It's more than we women can do to hold her, and the babe is waking, poor little thing!"

So Philip went in, all reserve or thought of intrusion prevented by the urgency of the case. The room lay half in shadow, for the gas was turned low that its glare might not annoy the sick lady; and the night-air was heavy with the odor of violets. She whose gentle hands had gathered and brought them hither was bending over the couch of her suffering sister, stroking with soothing touch the poor throbbing temples, and looking down into the wild, unconscious eyes with her own all thickly sown with tears, like her sweet flowers with drops of dew. She glanced up an instant as Philip approached, but shook her head when he offered to relieve her of the convulsive weight that strained and shook her strength to the utmost; and only yielded when, as the physician strove to force a sedative through the tight-shut teeth, the paroxysm grew so violent that her slight power availed as nothing to resist it.

She stood aside then and watched him as he drew down the wildly-flinging arms with his strong gentle hand, and held with tender force the poor throbbing head upon his firm breast; her face so white and fixed in its mute horror and despair, that it almost broke his heart to meet that piteous appealing glance. Standing thus, gazing on her sister's convulsed and quivering countenance, she saw, first of them all, the ominous death-change slowly stealing over the quieting features.

A wild cry burst from the lips before so pale and dumb.

"She is dying! Let me come to her; let me come!" and Philip let the strengthless head droop into her clasp arms.

"Oh, sister, sister darling!" went on the piteous pleading voice. "Don't you know me, your little sister that you love; Baby's Auntie Helen! Won't you speak to me only once more, sister!"

A sudden gleam of consciousness dawned in the eyes of the dying; the strong mother-love kept back for a moment the closing clasp of the icy fingers; she raised her head, and her glance searched eagerly around the room, and rested on the spot where sat the good landlady with the baby sleeping on her knee. The tremulous lips strove feebly to find utterance, but in vain; there was no need, for Helen, whose anguished eyes had followed her sister's glance, read its meaning well.

"She shall be mine, and dear to me as my own soul! Nothing shall part us save death itself! I will make her happy, and bring her to you in heaven, if you must leave us, sister darling! But oh, stay, stay with us—spare her, dear Lord—we shall be all alone when she is gone!"

The wild cry went up in fruitless anguish; the rigid limbs were already relaxed; the quivering features still, with a faint smile of content shedding a soft light on them; the mother was dead, and the little baby slept sweetly as only a baby may.

It was Philip's strong arms that raised the unconscious form of the stricken girl from beside the lifeless body.

"Take her into your sitting-room, please," said the landlady, wiping her eyes; "she'll come to presently. It's no place for her here now. And, if you've no objections, I'll lay the baby on your bed a while; my room's away down stairs, you know, and we shouldn't hear it if it cried its heart out. It's lucky there's nobody but you on this floor, Mr. Warner; I don't seem to mind disturbing you, because you're a single man, I suppose. The doctor's going to send a woman here right away, and I shall stay and see that all is done as it ought to be for the poor dear lady."

So she bustled away, and brought the sleeping little one, and laid it carefully down on the narrow white bed in the little bachelor sleeping apartment off the hall, closing the doors softly, that no unwonted noise might break its happy slumber. Then she brought a pillow to place under the head of the still unconscious girl, whom Philip had laid reverently on his own sofa, and took from his hand the water which he was trying to pass between her lips.

"Never mind worrying her with that now," she said; "it's different from a fainting-fit; she's not sick, only stunned like. Let her stay so a while; it won't hurt her, and she'll wake up to her misery soon enough, poor thing! I'll be back as soon as I can to see to her. I am going to wake up some of the servants."

So Philip left her lying there in her white, motionless silence, her long brown tresses escaped from the net that confined them, making her face even paler by contrast, and her little hands locked tight together over her eyes, as though to shut out a sight too agonizing for them to bear. Opening the long French window he stepped out upon the balcony, and stood there watching now the sky, violet-blue and sparkling with a thousand stars, and now the pale mute face within, whose veiled eyes were blue and bright as they. There was no falsehood in the glance of pity and sympathy they had cast on the little stranger child; no artifice in their dumb, anguished gaze upon the face of the dead. There was a strange pain at his heart as he thought what a heavy cloud of grief had darkened suddenly over their childlike clearness. He wished that somehow it might be in his power to bring the sunshine back to them again.

A long shuddering sigh from within made him aware that the spell was broken at length, and the bereaved one was awaking to a consciousness of her sorrow. He re-entered the room quietly, so as not to startle her, and approached her with a grave, gentle look, that repressed the exclamation which had sprung to her lips, and made her sit up quietly and listen to what he had to say, though still with a wild, only half-comprehending look on her face.

"I am glad you are better," he said, in a voice full of sympathy. "Mrs. Bonner thought it best you should stay here a while, and I shall esteem it a great honor if you will consent to use my apartments freely. She will return soon. I will leave you now, but if it be at all in my power to serve you in any way, I beg you will trust me sufficiently to allow me to know."

He lingered a moment, but there was no answer—only a burst of passionate grief, which he felt he had no right to attempt to soothe—and he turned sorrowfully away, and went down the dark halls and staircases into the great empty drawing-room, where he threw himself on a sofa and tried to think over calmly the strange scenes of this eventful night.

His rooms were deserted when he resought them next morning, and Mrs. Bonner detained him after his late breakfast to apologize for having so unceremoniously appropriated them. Philip stopped her to ask eagerly after the young lady, and the good landlady poured out a stream of information and sympathy and comment into his willing ear.

"Poor thing! she is asleep now, and I'm going to have a cup of hot tea ready for her the moment she wakes up. I never should have got her to go to bed, only the baby seemed fretful, as if it knew something was the matter, poor little orphan! and would have her lie down beside it when it was going to take its nap. So she dropped off herself, and I was glad of it—she'll need all the strength she can get. She's determined to sit up alone with the body to-night—the funeral won't be till to-morrow, you know. She wouldn't hear to it when I talked of sending for watchers, or offered to sit with her myself. She'd rather be all alone with her sister the last night, she said. They thought the world of each other."

"Have they no other relatives?" asked Philip, more touched than he cared to show.

"I guess not, in these parts, any how. The Chesters have boarded with me ever since they were married, you know—poor things! I little thought they'd both be buried from my house—and I've never seen any relations except Miss Helen; she'd often come in to spend Saturday with her sister. She was a governess somewhere in the country. She'll have to give up her situation now though, for she'll never part with that child. She'll just stay on here in Mrs. Chester's room. Her board was paid some way ahead, and I guess the captain left some money. So they'll be comfortable enough; but it's a kind of a hard life for a young thing, isn't it? I wish some nice body would take a fancy to her for a wife. No young man, of course, would be burdened with a baby; but some one like Mr. Wiglow, for instance, the gentleman that sits at the foot of your table, you know. He's a steady, pious man, and I don't doubt he's looking out for some one to take care of that little boy of his."

Good Mrs. Bonner had rambled on, full of homely sympathy, and reading Mr. Warner's interest in his face; and she was amazed now to see the sudden gathering of his brows, and the flash of his eyes beneath them. Perhaps she had intruded too far in supposing he could care about a strange young woman's marrying.

As for Philip, he could almost have struck the worthy landlady for her stupidity! To mention that soul-full creature in the same breath with that odious Wiglow, with his yellow sanctimonious face, and white choker, and plastered locks! Step-mother to that little precocious prig of a boy of his, too—bah! But he restrained himself, and only said as he walked away,

"If there is any thing in the world I can do, pray let me be of use."

And Mrs. Bonner thought good-naturedly, as she went about her household tasks,

"He was always odd, but he's got a generous heart for all that."

The vision of a pale young face, all wet with tears and quivering with repressed grief, made its way, an unwonted visitor, more than once that day within the dusty precincts of a downtown lawyer's office. Do what he might Philip could not put out of his thoughts the last night's tragedy, and it irked him to think he had no right, even if he had the power, to do aught for the solace of the lonely survivor. If his sister were only in town, he would take her to her at once! Lou's tender womanly sympathy would be every thing to the solitary girl. But she had left this very morning in an early train for a hasty trip to Niagara, and would not return for a week; and he did not know another woman in all New York whom he would be willing to bring to a stranger in affliction!

So he was obliged to content himself with reiterating offers of service upon Mrs. Bonner, and with remaining persistently in his room, so as to be at hand if needed.

Sitting there in the April twilight with a cigar between his lips, and an unread book lying idly on his knee, he listened to the sounds that now and then reached him from the adjoining room. An infant's sleepy wail, and then those low, lulling notes of the night before, only now with such an unutterable sorrow in their plaintive minor tones! Then after a while a silence, broken only by the coming and going again of good Mrs. Bonner; and long hours after, sounding pitifully sad in the dead hush of the night, a burst of low, stifled sobs, and the heart-broken moan, "My sister! my sister!"

Philip started to his feet at the sound. "He could not stand it; it was horrible to think of, that young thing weeping her very heart away, all alone in the chamber of the dead! He would go to her," and he had actually placed his hand upon the handle of his door, when the thought "what would she think? what would people say?" came in time to stop him, and, venting an anathema upon that crooked idol, Public Opinion, he sought his bedroom and his bed instead.

It was the same thing the next day; he must go away in the morning without being able to do any thing for her, and return at night with no probability of having it in his power to offer to her the sympathy that fairly made his heart ache with its repressed intensity. But it was a comfort at least to think that she shared her chamber now with no more awful companion than the little child of her adoption, and that her tears were not shed upon the cold, unanswering face of the dead.

His patience was not to be put much longer to the test. The very next morning, as he was going down to breakfast, he encountered his fair neighbor in the hall near the door of her own room. She had a bowl of bread and milk, which she had just brought up for her little charge, in one hand, and a glass of water in the other, and was preparing to set one burden down that she might open the door.

Philip's eager attention spared her the trouble, and a faint light broke over her pale, heavy countenance as she recognized the stranger who had ministered to her sister in the hour of death, and to herself afterward.

"I have to thank you for many more kindnesses than this, Sir," she said, in a faltering voice, the quick tears springing afresh in the childlike blue eyes. "I remember—that night—and Mrs. Bonner has told me since—" But here Philip broke in, impetuously,

"If you would only permit me to be really of some service, however slight, I should be so grateful! If I might be used as a friend I would prove worthy of the trust, though an utter stranger. Let us see you sometimes below. You will make yourself ill if you remain confined so closely in one room."

She colored a little at his warmth, but shook her head sadly.

"No; I am not easily made ill, and I can not stay away from baby. But I thank you for your great kindness. I shall not mind calling upon you for service, if I should need it"—and she was gone, leaving Philip obliged to be content with this.

But now that the ice was broken, he found many ways of serving her of which she knew nothing. Why should she connect Mr. Warner with the excessive civility and attention she received from the servants, or associate his idea with the delicious oranges, and pines, and bananas which formed such unwonted addition to the meagre attractions of a boarding-house lunch? How imagine that he was the "one of the boarders" who presented to Mrs. Bonner the huge bunch of "real out-of-door" spring city flowers, lilacs, and westerias, and snow-balls, which that good lady insisted upon placing on her hearth?

Her heart was too full of its sorrow and its anxious cares for her little charge to spare much thought even for the kind, strange gentleman; yet she could not but feel, in the few chance interviews which they had in the dining-room, or on the staircase, or at the door as before, how different he was from the rest of the people in the house, kind as they all were; of how much higher type he was, indeed, than any of the few men she knew; and sometimes she almost wished that there were some tie of relationship or of old acquaintance which would permit him to offer, and her to receive, the sympathy and friendship which looked out so earnestly to her from his grave dark eyes, and of which her lonely heart stood in such sore need.

One evening—it was the last before Mrs. Ellis was to return—Philip sat in his accustomed place by the open window, smoking, looking out, and listening to the low murmured lullaby from the next room. It ceased at length, and then there was a soft rustling as of feminine garments; and presently the door opened gently, and a light step descended the stairs. A moment after the street door opened, and Philip saw the little figure of his neighbor pass beneath his window.

"Good! she is actually going to spend one of these lovely twilights elsewhere than cooped up in that close room by a baby's cradle!"

The grave, saturnine, lawyer-like man was a child in his delight. "I only wish I had the right to join her—I really believe I could make the walk pleasanter!" and then he checked himself with a smile, and almost a blush, at his own folly, and puffed away for a while in grim silence, as befitted a woman-hater.

But hark! what was that? A baby crying! and her baby, positively! the little ungrateful thing, when she had sung it to sleep! He wouldn't be guilty of such atrocity for the world if she would perform the like kind office for him! Heavens! what a scream! Nay, what a succession of infantine yells! Frightened out of its wits, poor little thing, at waking up and finding itself alone in the dark; he would go straight and bring Mrs. Bonner.

Philip jumped up and marched down stairs to the landlady's apartment. No answer to his repeated knocks upon the door; nobody in the hall, nobody in the dining-room; cook steaming wrathily over the range, warming dinner for a party who had arrived late; pronounced the mistress out—every body out but herself, and faith she never got the chance to go! What should he do? He had never cultivated any of the last set of boarders at the old place, and didn't care to set the rather snobbish circle speculating as to the unaccountable interest of a handsome young man in a poor governess's adopted baby. He reascended the stairs, baffled, and only hoping that the newly-made mamma might speedily return, or that the infant might have ceased its cries. The piercing screams that issued from the door as he passed painfully dissipated the latter delusion, and he saw no sign of the former coming to pass immediately as he leaned out of the window and looked despairingly up and down the street.

A volley of screams more violent than before made him rush from his room again. "I can never stand that," he said; "the child will kill itself, and then she will go crazy indeed. I shall go and take care of it myself. Surely she hasn't fastened the door!"

No, she had not; she had been thoughtful enough to reflect that there might be a possibility of the baby's waking, and Mrs. Bonner's coming up to attend to it; so he entered without any difficulty. The room lay dusk in the coming darkness, and the poor little creature had cried itself almost into convulsions. It held out its little hands piteously as the kind, manly face bent over it, and nestled up in his arms, sobbing and trembling, and clinging so close that Philip's heart yearned over it with a strange protective tenderness.

He paced the floor with the little trembling burden pressed to his breast, soothing its fears with gentle tones and caresses, until its cries ceased, and a little bit of a smile came to the pretty rose-bud lips in answer to some coaxing word. This greatly encouraged the amateur nurse, and now his excited nerves growing calm with the infant's returning serenity, the thought occurred to him that it might be best to take the little one to his own room; on the whole, it was not exactly the thing to be seen promenading up and down in hers, and he would listen for her return, and restore her charge without her knowing any thing about it.

So he immediately acted upon this suggestion, and little Miss Baby, pleased with her new quarters and her new attendant, vouchsafed to be extremely gracious, and laughed, and pat-a-caked, and pa-pa'd in a style that so completely fascinated Philip that he placed himself and all his possessions entirely at her disposal, and allowed the little dimpled fingers to pull his beard, and upset his writing-case and cigar-stand just as they chose.

"A pretty tell this would be for the fellows down town," he thought; and then aloud, "You little witch, do you design emptying that sand-box all over yourself?" But just then a quick, frightened rapping at the door diverted his attention, and the spilling of the sand and the tumultuous entrance of "baby's Auntie Helen" took place at one and the same instant.

"Oh, you are really here!" exclaimed the young lady, rushing up to the disconcerted Philip and seizing the baby from his arms, while the pale wild look on her face gave way to a burning blush.

"Oh, Mr. Warner, I beg a thousand pardons! I was so frightened I couldn't find the baby, and I thought I heard her crowing and laughing in here. I ought not to have left her, but I was almost obliged to go, and she woke so early this morning I was sure she would sleep till I got back. Did she cry, and you went to her? My poor little darling!"

She almost smothered the child with kisses, and then broke out again,

"Oh, how shall I ever be able to thank you, Mr. Warner?"

She looked so artless and lovely, standing there with the pretty little baby leaping in her arms, her bright, innocent face glowing with feeling, and the quick sensitive tears coming in those blue, blue eyes, that Philip "could not stand it," to use his own phrase. He came up close to her, and said, impetuously,

"Only by giving me the right to do it again whenever I please, Helen, my Helen. Let me call you so; be my little wife; let your baby be my baby, too! See, she loves me; she holds out her hands to me; will you turn away, Helen?"

It was well Philip had taken hold of the little outstretched hands, or its auntie would certainly have let the baby fall in the tumultuous trembling that seized her at these strange, sudden words.

As it was, she shook so that it seemed as if she must fall herself, but Philip's hand had closed tightly over hers too, and his eager words were in her ear.

"You know you promised not to leave her—and see, she clings to me! Speak, will you come too, Helen?"

But she could not speak; the words trembled and died on her lips, and when at last they came it was only—

"It is because you pity me—you can not have learned to love me in this little while. Let me go, let us both go—we will keep each other from being alone in the world."

"And you do not care for my being alone, meanwhile! Helen, look at me. Do not I love you?"

She could not but look up, and looking, she saw bending toward her a face so deeply in earnest, a gaze so tender and soul-full that even her modesty could doubt no longer. Her head drooped down upon the shoulder where the baby's already nestled so confidently.

"I promised never to leave her," she said, in a low, happy voice; and the first lover's kiss which either one had ever shared sealed the double vow.

"Tell me if you think it is pretty, Lou," said Philip Warner, as he sat at his sister's side the next evening. He placed in her hand a ring of heavy gold, with a single pearl, large and pure and lustrous, gleaming softly from a circlet of jet.

"Exquisite; but what are you going to do with it? It would suit some one in mourning. Tell me, Phil, at once!" pursued the impulsive little lady, reading some mystery in her brother's conscious face.

"Ah, Lou, I have found my pearl! Two of them, I may say," he went on, with mock gravity, seeing her look of incredulous astonishment.

"In fact, it was the baby who brought her to me, otherwise—"

"The baby!" gasped Mrs. Ellis, in unspeakable amazement. "Are you going to marry a baby too? Then she is a widow, and you always said you detested widows—oh, Phil!"

"Yes, I am going to 'marry a baby' too. It was the baby that managed the whole matter, I tell you. But she isn't a widow for all that."

The expression of utter stultification on his sister's usually bright face made the provoking Philip hasten to explain for fear of a sad accident to her intellects; but the reader need not stop to listen—he is already in the secret.

HOW I MADE A FORTUNE.

I AM not quite as badly off as the needy knife-grinder who had no story to tell; but my story is not very extraordinary. If the reader expects any thing sensational, he had better look elsewhere.

My name is Pepperidge Lovatt.

I was called Pepperidge after my mother's father, a wealthy pork-packer, from whom the family had great expectations, my mother being his only daughter and I her only son. The expectations were doomed to disappointment, for grandfather Pepperidge invested his fortune in a copper mine, somewhere in Pennsylvania, and in sinking a shaft sunk his money. My father, Roger Lovatt, was a bill-broker, irreverently termed by the vulgar a note-shaver. Personally he was known as Centpercent and Allforcollat—names that had reference to the liberal and generous manner in which he transacted his business. I never inquired into their origin. It was no matter to me. I always called him "the old man."

I never went to school with the common herd. Being born to a fortune it would not do. It was not the thing, you know. A private tutor prepared me for college, and to college I went in due time. I forget now nearly all I was taught there. I was put through Latin, philosophy, and things—yes! and Greek, with all kinds of crabbed-looking letters, and mathematics. I went through the last, after a fashion. Arithmetic and Algebra were my specialties, but in Geometry I was brought up by the Pons Asinorum. However, I graduated with great honor. The valedictory, which it fell to my lot to deliver, was very much applauded, though my father did think that fifty dollars was too much to pay the half-starved fellow who wrote it. That was a little trick of mine though, for I hived forty out of the money, I am now sorry to say.

After I graduated I had no difficulty about choosing a profession. My friends, taking the beautiful language of my valedictory into consideration, suggested the law as the sphere in which my talents would have the best chance of development. As it was a matter of indifference to me, I accepted the choice. I read law after the usual fashion; that is to say, I got by heart certain passages in Blackstone and Starkie and Chitty, so as to be able to answer probable questions, and in due time I was called to the bar. I forthwith hired me a handsome office, put out a tin sign with the words—"Pepperidge Lovatt, Counselor at Law," and diligently smoked a cigar in my nicely furnished rooms for one hour a day. Having thus attended to business, I put up a little notice on the door—"AT COURT. CALL TO-MORROW AT TEN O'CLOCK," and sauntered up Broadway. At night I went to the opera, or lounged at the club, or led the German at parties, and led it well. I despise boasting of my own talents; but I may properly say that I was the best dancer in our set. There was not a member of the bar that could equal me. Even Grind, of the firm of Grind and Cheathamwell, they said he was at the head of the profession, but I saw him try to polk once at Saratoga, and I was quite sure that Grind's abilities had been overrated by his friends.

I had practiced law vigorously, after the fashion I have described, for about two years and a half, when three very important things occurred. I was sauntering along Broadway one day, and amidst the press of passers, my coat button got entangled in the fringe of a lady's mantle. It was a very awkward situation for both of us. I tugged at the fringe, my face burning all the while, and the lady seeming to be vexed. It came loose at length, and the owner of the mantle turned away with a swing of her body indicating annoyance, when, swish! the fringe caught another button. This time I laughed, and the lady tittered. The fringe was disengaged and I raised my hat to bow my regret, thus getting a full view of the fair stranger's face. It was certainly pretty, but I had seen pretty faces before, without feeling any thumping beneath my waistcoat. With this, however, I was fascinated. There are some figures and faces that attract you by their home look. They seem to tell of domestic enjoyment; they suggest a quiet cup of tea, hot toast, and your slippered feet buried in the hearth-rug. But it came and went. The lady went one way and I the other. I saw her no more, but I thought of her frequently.

The other incidents were serious. One was the death of my father, who had been a widower for twelve years; the other was the failure of Bullwinkle, Badger, and Bullwinkle. The events were disastrous, especially the Bullwinkle business. For my respected parent had not only embarked a hundred thousand in the same speculation which floored the three B.'s, but his name was on the paper of the firm for nearly as much more; and the assets of the bankrupts, after the legal expenses were paid, amounted to just no cents on the dollar.

Thus I was left, without a father to support me, no rich uncle to apply to, altogether a penniless fellow, knowing little of my profession, and no chance for clients had I even been a profound lawyer. What to do I could not tell, though I smoked over the matter diligently for three days. At last, I concluded to let matters go as they would, for I supposed something would turn up, some day or other. But nothing did. Days, weeks, and months went by. I had to give up my office, for I got no practice, and could not pay my rent; my watch, my spare clothes, and all I could well pawn followed each other to the house of a liberal Hebrew gentleman on the east side of town; and one fine day in June I found myself strolling down the street, with a thread-bare coat on my back and not a cent in my pocket. I was terribly hungry too, for I had had no breakfast, and had gone to bed the night before without supper. The venerable proprietor of my lodging-rooms had just informed me that my apartment was needed for the use of a lodger who would do what I had neglected to do—pay for its use. It was plain that something or somebody must be done; but how to do either was past my ingenuity.

Suddenly it flashed on my mind that I was a fool. It was a fortunate discovery.

"Yes!" I said to myself, "I am a fool; or rather, I was—for a fool I will be no longer."

As I said this I came very near tumbling over a pork-barrel, and made a remark concerning obstructions in the street which was more forcible than chaste. I heard a low laugh, and looked up. There stood a stout, well-dressed man in the door of the store-house before me. I glanced at the sign over the door, which bore the word "Groceries." My mind was made up. I stepped in, and walked back toward the counting-room. The stout man followed and accosted me.

"What can we do for you?" he asked.

"I don't know," said I. "That is precisely what I want to find out."

The stout man stared at me. I went on:

"I am six feet, lacking a half inch, in my stockings, and, as you see, broad-shouldered," I said. "I have been brought up a gentleman, and have not a cent. I have had nothing to eat since yesterday at noon. No! you need not do that," I added, as I saw him make a movement to his vest pocket. "Begging is out of my line. I want work, if you have any."

"Well," he replied, "I expect a vacancy in my second clerk's place shortly, but—"

"I know nothing about book-keeping," I interrupted.

"My porter goes away to-day—he is about to set up a retail store; but as you are a gentleman—"

"I'll take that," I said, "if you'll take me without any recommendation but my muscle."

He laughed. "You are about the oddest customer," said he, "that I have come across recently; but I think I'll try you, if you're not above making yourself useful, and can content yourself with nine dollars a week."

"Nine dollars a week!" I exclaimed. "It is a gold mine! What am I to go at first?"

"The first thing is to get your breakfast, and the next to rig yourself out in a pair of overalls and a blue frock. The breakfast you can get at Fulton Market; the other things at the slop-shop around the corner. When you come back there are thirty bags of coffee to be delivered to an order, and the carmen will be here in an hour. I'll advance you three dollars on your week's wages. Here!"

"Very good," said I, taking the money; "I'll be back in half an hour. Your new porter's name is Lovatt."

Off I went. I had a royal breakfast!—beef-steaks, coffee, bread-and-butter—to say nothing of a pickle; and having dispatched them, I turned to and had them over again. After that I bought my blue shirt and overalls, put them on, and went back to the store-house with my coat on my arm, looking at the proprietor's name on the door-post as I entered.

"Here I am, Mr. Banks," I said; and Mr. Banks sent me to the head-clerk, who told me what to do at the moment, and I did it.

I found a cheap boarding-house at a convenient distance from the store, and worked my way along faithfully and manfully. I grew to like the work. I ate heartily, and slept soundly. Only once I felt a tremor. I was one day rolling some barrels from a car into the store-house, when I saw a former fashionable acquaintance picking his way along the sidewalk. What had brought him to that quarter I did not know, but I reddened when I saw him. He did not see me, however; and would not probably have recognized me if he had.

My employer paid no farther attention to me after the first day. One day, however, about three months after I first took the place, the chief clerk called to me:

"Lovatt," he said, "come here. I notice that you calculate very well, and write a good hand. Mr. Greene [that was the name of our new second clerk] is sick abed to-day. Couldn't you help me with this lot of invoices?"

"I'll try, if you show me what you want."

He explained, and I went at the task. I have already said that I was apt at figures, and I got through quite rapidly; and leaving the result on the desk, went back to my bags and barrels. Presently Mr. Banks came in and went into the counting-room. He had been there only about a quarter of an hour when he called me to him.

"Sit down," he said, when I entered. "Mr. Lipscombe tells me that you gave him material help to-day. As Greene is too sick to come here at present, suppose you take his place in the counting-room till he recovers."

"Very good," I replied; and, removing my overalls, I perched myself at the desk.

The result was that poor Greene never recovered, and I retained his situation. It was only twelve dollars a week, but it was a step.

Three weeks afterward another pair of incidents occurred. I was at the desk, arranging papers and copying into the invoice-book, when Mr. Banks came in.

"Lovatt," said he, "I heard mention of you last night. An acquaintance of ours—a Mr.

Van Gelt—spoke of a young Lovatt, a lawyer, who has left the profession, and gone no one knows whither—turned out a mere vagabond. From the description of personal appearance I had an idea he meant you; but as it might have annoyed you, I did not mention that you were in my employ."

"Thank you," I answered. "Van Gelt! oh yes; I remember a John Van Gelt, to whom, in my better days, I loaned five hundred dollars. I took his note for it; but as he has no money, I suppose I might as well have that much waste paper. Common gratitude might have taught him common decency when he spoke of me."

"Have you the note?"

"Yes—somewhere."

"Look it up, then. He has money now; his uncle died recently, and left him comfortable. Give me the note, and I'll see that he pays it. And, by-the-by, I have left a package of papers at home, on the library table. I wish you'd take the cars and go up to my house with this note. Mrs. Banks will hand you the papers."

I followed orders, and was soon at Banks's house—a handsome mansion on one of the fashionable streets. I sent up the note to Mrs. Banks, and was shown into the parlor.

I had not been seated more than two or three minutes before I heard a light step, and, rising, turned toward the door. There stood my young lady of the fringed mantle! The recognition was mutual. She blushed, and looked embarrassed; and I felt my face glow. She was the first to recover, and handing me the package, said,

"My mother directed me to give you these, Sir."

I bowed—I could not speak—and backed myself out of the door, running against a hat-stand in the hall, and growing redder at the awkward blunder. The young lady reddened with sympathy. Not exactly knowing what I did, I bowed profoundly to the servant who was showing me to the door, and she looked amazed and amused. This put the copestone to the fabric of my utter discomfiture, and I made my way down the street in no pleasant frame of mind.

"Pep, my boy!" I said to myself, "you are getting to be a fool again. You are a clerk with a salary of twelve dollars a week, and you're falling in love with the sweetest little—pshaw! what's Hecuba to you, or you to Hecuba? Stick to your invoices, you noodle!"

But I could not help recalling the looks of the young lady. What a neat, nice little body she was! Kind-hearted, as her countenance showed her; she must have been tickled at my awkwardness, though. What a booby I must have appeared to her to be! I felt my face redden again, and clenched my fist in my vexation, as though I would commit an assault and battery on my own person.

Two days after Mr. Banks handed me a check for five hundred and eighty-five dollars and three cents—the amount of Van Gelt's note, with interest. I knew the value of money now; and as my salary was quite enough for my immediate necessities, I deposited the sum in bank, waiting for a chance to invest it properly, and went on with my usual business. But I found myself frequently making calculations on bits of loose paper, of divers speculations in which I might double my little fortune, and keep doubling it until, in geometrical progression, it became a colossal fortune, whereon in fancy I built me a fine mansion in town, and bought me a noble country-seat, and got married to Dora Banks. Dora!—what a nice name it was, to be sure!

Unfortunately, however, nothing turned up by which I might double my money, until one day I added five-fold to it, but not through a speculation. The complicated affairs of Bullwinkle, Badger, and Bullwinkle were at length wound up, a small dividend was paid to their creditors, and after taking out letters of administration to my father's estate, I found myself possessor of a sum which made my five hundred and eighty odd dollars nearly three thousand.

Then I builded bigger air-castles than ever, with Dora for mistress of each. And yet I rarely saw her—occasionally at the house, once in the street, and once, for a whole afternoon, on her father's birthday, when Mr. Lipscombe and myself were invited to dine with our principal. On that occasion I had danced with Dora, and talked with her, though the conversation must have been very silly on my part, for I was in that state of ecstatic confusion that my tongue refused to perform its ordinary office.

I was destined to a separation from Dora, however. Nearly a year after I was first taken into Mr. Banks's employ, I was seated alone in the counting-room, Mr. Lipscombe having gone out to lunch, when our principal came in.

"Mr. Lovatt," he said, "what have you done with the money you obtained from your father's estate?"

"Nothing. It is in the savings-fund, drawing five per cent. I thought it the safest, on the whole."

"The reason I asked is, because you will need it. I am going to displace you."

I looked at him in some alarm, and stammered out a reply—I forget what.

"I have advices from Rio that it will be a more than safe speculation to send some Richmond flour there. It will about arrive at the right time. I want the matter managed adroitly, and you are the man for it, I think. Will you go out as supercargo?"

I was relieved at once, and answered promptly in the affirmative.

"I am going to give you a chance to make something for yourself. Draw out your money and invest it in this venture."

"Thank you, Sir. I should be very happy to do so, but unfortunately I have to give a month's notice."

"Never mind. Transfer the account to me, and I will draw it while you are away, and advance the amount to you now. The vessel will sail on day after to-morrow. Dine with me tomorrow afternoon. You can leave when Lipscombe comes to arrange your outfit. I will have your place supplied for you until your return. To-morrow morning I will put you in full possession of my views."

My preparations were soon made. The following day I dined at the Banks's. There was no one present but the family. After dinner I was invited to spend the evening there, and as Mr. and Mrs. Banks had a short visit to make, Dora was left to entertain me until their return.

Now, if there was any thing in the world I would have given ten years of my life for, it was for a tête-à-tête with Dora Banks. Without any sacrifice it was mine; and yet, now that I had it, what could I say? I felt that to make love to her—I being a comparatively poor clerk—would be, under the circumstances, a piece of gross ingratitude and a breach of confidence. Yet what could I talk about? We sat there, for some minutes after the elder people had departed, in embarrassed silence. Dora was evidently waiting for me to say something, and that added to my embarrassment. At length she took the initiative.

"Your departure is a rather sudden determination, is it not, Mr. Lovatt?"

"Rather so, Miss Dora—I beg pardon, Miss Banks, I mean."

A long pause, varied slightly by the very loud ticking of an ormolu clock on the mantle, accompanied by a terrible thumping under my waistcoat.

"There is not apt to be yellow-fever at Rio at the season you arrive, Mr. Lovatt?"

"Oh no, not at all."

The young lady gave a long breath, as though relieved. Another pause ensued.

"Have you been to the opera much this spring, Mr. Lovatt?"

"No, Miss Banks—but once. My duties are so laborious—so—that is—"

Another pause, of great length. I began to feel confused. I felt my face redden. I stole a glance at the lady. By Jove! she was blushing to the very roots of her hair. Just then our eyes met.

Ten minutes after the conversation was quite lively.

"I thought of you sometimes too," quoth the lady. "I recognized you the moment you came into the house."

"I had never forgotten you; and knew you on the moment," quoth the gentleman.

Now the more violently bodies, charged with electricity, are attracted to each other the more violently they are repelled. The attraction between Dora and myself must have been very strong in the first instance, for at the sound of Mr. Banks's latch-key in the door the two bodies flew hastily to the extremities of the apartment; and when the merchant and his wife entered the parlor, Pepperidge Lovatt was glancing over some knickknacks on a pier-table between the front-windows, and Dora Banks was turning over the pages of a music-book at the piano near the other end of the room.

After an hour's general conversation I bid the ladies farewell—the vessel leaving early next morning. They accompanied me to the door, and somehow or other we got mixed up, and I felt the gentle pressure of Dora's fingers, in return for a squeeze that must nearly have disabled her hand. It thrilled me from head to foot. But as I walked home I grew very miserable. I felt that I had not acted rightly. I had violated all my fine promises to myself on the first trial.

"Pepperidge Lovatt!" said I to myself, "you are a rascal. Is this your gratitude to an honest man, who has shown you such favor? Making love clandestinely to his daughter—the dear girl! Pepperidge! you ought to be ashamed of yourself. Never mind! she will forget you—and you must be glad of it. What a sweet girl she is! Ah, if I were only rich!"

Next day I sailed. We arrived at Rio after a very short passage, and our correspondent proved to be right. The flour came at the very height of the market, and coffee was unusually low. Every thing went swimmingly, and just as it was concluded a perfect fleet of vessels arrived and coffee advanced. But my confidence about the yellow-fever was misplaced. It caught me, and badly at that. The ship remained a week later, and I was sufficiently better to be able to go on board without danger.

We had been but a few days at sea when I was able to walk the deck. It happened in the course of conversation that I expressed my regrets to the captain that we had no chickens on board. I had taken a strange fancy for an omelet.

"Lord bless you!" answered the old salt, who had taken a fancy to me from the first day, "that's easily made up. Just wait a few hours, and if the weather keeps good we'll stop at my poultry-yard."

That afternoon I had an explanation of his speech, for we came in sight of a small island a few miles from the coast, and made for it. As we approached I saw it to be a nearly barren rock, about a mile in length, mostly white, with a few green patches, and rising about fifty feet in the centre from the surface of the water. But what struck me was the number of sea-birds upon it, scattered on its surface or rising in clouds. A boat was lowered, and I went with the party. We had no difficulty in effecting a landing; and while the rest were gathering eggs I wandered over the island.

It was a singular place—singular from the number of birds, old and young, but more singular from the peculiar situation of the little verdure on the island. On the long level patches nothing grew; but wherever a rock peered above the surface there a scanty soil had been made, and a few weeds or patches of grass had taken hold. The other parts were covered with a fetid, barren sand, strewn with the bones of birds. I gathered some few bleached birds' skulls and put them in my pocket, and, as a matter of curiosity, filled my handkerchief with the greenish-yellow sand. Hearing the rest call me, I went to the boat, where I found a large number of eggs gathered. We were soon on board. I asked the captain the latitude and longitude of this singular island, and he told me. I did this because I thought it worth noting from its odd appearance.

For several days we had sea-fowl eggs, in various ways, until we were all surfeited.

We arrived without misadventure. It was nearly dark when we approached the Narrows. We came to at Quarantine, and though, after examination, the doctor passed us, we lay there, intending to come up next morning. I was impatient to get home, and hired a boat to take me to the Jersey shore, where I got a conveyance to Jersey City, and crossed the ferry. It was after ten o'clock; but I knew that my news would make me welcome, and I took a hack from Cortland Street to Banks's house. On my way I thought a deal about Dora. Was she well? Had she forgotten me? But no matter how that might be, I was determined to be careful and not to let my love be seen. No! It would not be fair treatment to her father, whose kindness had bettered my fortune; and so I resolved to conceal my feelings.

I dismissed the hackman when we arrived at the house, and rang the bell. A servant came to the door and informed me that Mr. and Mrs. Banks were at the theatre with some friends from the country. Miss Dora was at home, not being very well.

I trembled from head to foot.

"I will remain till they return," I said. "I have important business with Mr. Banks."

I did not send up my name. No! I would not even let Dora know I was there. The servant showed me into the parlor and closed the door. There was a lady who turned as I entered. I trembled violently, for it was Dora herself. She stared at me wildly. Her face was pale. She gave a slight scream, followed by a burst of hysterical laughter, and staggering forward fell into my arms.

Now I put it to any man whether I was to blame under the circumstances. I ask any reasonable man—yes, even the rich father of a handsome marriageable daughter—whether the strongest resolution would not naturally give way in a like case? And could I help it, when I discovered that a report of my death by yellow fever had been brought by a vessel arriving before us, and that she had mourned me so bitterly, that I then and there told my love, and, as I think I had a right to do—taking the time, place, and circumstances into consideration—that I gave her one of those kisses which are so delicious and unfrequent in a man's life, the first kiss of an accepted lover? Who blames me?

It is useless to spin out the story. Ridiculous as it may sound in such a connection—but facts are facts—my barren rock was of as much value as a gold mine. John Van Gelt had grown sensible and gone into business. He dealt in fertilizers and agricultural implements—choosing that line, possibly, because he didn't know a Valparaiso squash from a Cashaw pumpkin. He had my yellow sand analyzed—tried to pump from me the secret of the place—and finally, for a percentage, negotiated with a great guano company on my behalf. I received, after the matter had been fairly tested, two hundred thousand dollars, less the fifty thousand which John took for commission—the grasping fellow! And when I proposed in due form for Dora, I had the pleasure of learning that the father and mother had suspected me all along; that the elder Banks had come to the conclusion that a young man brought up as I was, who could exhibit such pluck and industry, would make a good son-in-law; and that I was sent as supercargo that I might make the money which my share of the venture brought, and so pave the way to an admission to partnership. And that is the simple story of how I won fortune and Dora—commonplace, I admit; but you will remember that I warned you of that fact at the beginning.

A FEW FRENCHMEN AND YANKEES.

I.—SOME DISTINGUISHED FRENCHMEN.

IN the spring of 1848 I crossed the Atlantic in the same steamer with Prince Murat, and happened accidentally to have a seat next to him at table. He was going to France, to derive what advantage he could from the Revolution of February. I found him a most good-natured, jovial companion, with a good deal of a certain kind of shrewdness and wit. He was extremely careless about his person, an immense feeder, and the most formidable snorer I ever met. Unfortunately for me his state-room was directly opposite mine, and as he always slept with his door open, I had the full benefit of the terrific noise he made at night. More than once, after lying awake for hours, I have in sheer desperation hurled my boots at his berth; which rather forcible protest he would always take very amiably. His proportions then were of the Daniel Lambert order, but he has developed considerably since. The last time I saw him in Paris he was in full uniform, covered with orders, and a sight to behold. What a change his fortunes have undergone! To be elevated from a sort of New Jersey squatter to be a member of the Imperial family of France, with at one time a squint at the throne of Naples!

The Prince used to wear on his head a very old and very rough soft felt hat, which was any thing but ornamental. Apropos of this hat, he told me that, before he left home, his wife insisted that he should buy a proper black head-covering at Leary's so soon as he reached town; that if he would not agree to do this she would not consent to see him off; that he told her he could not afford the extravagance, and if she made so unreasonable a condition to accompanying him to New York, she might stay in New Jersey. He had with him the famous white plume which used to distinguish his father on the field of battle, or rather the whalebone remains of it.

He had acquired a great reputation in New Jersey as a horse-jockey. It was said that he would start off for a journey on the back of a sorry Rosinante, and return home, after an absence of several weeks, driving a stylish pair of horses behind an elegant carriage, the result of a series of successful swops. He had a great natural taste for mechanics; and, from his conversation, seemed to consider Mr. Stevens, of Hoboken, the greatest man of the age.

I was very much amused with a conversation I had with him one afternoon about his uncle, Joseph Bonaparte, and I will try to repeat what he said, as nearly as I can recollect, in his own words:

"My uncle Joseph was a very estimable man, with one great weakness—his excessive and ridiculous affectation of philosophy and martyrdom. He had been King of Spain; and yet he had become resigned to live in obscurity in a Republic! He used to bore me to death with this nonsense, until one day I lost my patience, and almost lost my temper. 'I am weary of these pretensions,' I said to him. 'You are not half the philosopher I am.' Compare for a moment our fates. You were born a miserable Corsican peasant. You happened to have a brother who had more brains than is frequently allotted to mankind. He grasped the sceptre of the world, and elevated you to the rank of a sovereign. You had not a very quiet time of it in your exalted position, it is true, and you were soon compelled to descend from it. But you came to the ground unharmed—not a feather ruffled; and while your illustrious brother was expiating his fate on a barren rock in the midst of a distant ocean, you retired quietly to this charming place, where you are living like a prince, surrounded by all the refinements of life, with the comfortable income of sixty thousand dollars per annum. I, on the contrary, was born on the steps of a throne. My father was shot; I escaped, with extreme difficulty, with my life, got to America, and have been a poor New Jersey farmer ever since. And I take things as they come, without ever thinking of complaining. I am a hundred times more of a philosopher than you are.'"

We arrived at Liverpool on a Sunday—the very day on which the election was to take place in France for members of the Legislative Assembly. Immediately on landing the Prince and I went together to the Adelphi Hotel, and there learned that, as luck would have it, the election had been postponed one week. The Prince took the first train for London, crossed the Channel, hurried down to his father's native department, and announced himself as a candidate. Other arrangements had been made, and other candidates were in the field; but the name of Murat was a spell, and he overcame all opposition, and was returned almost unanimously. Since then his fortunes have constantly tended upward. I called upon him in Paris. He was not in town; but a few days later he sent an aid to me, inviting me to his country seat. Unfortunately for me my engagements at the time would not permit me to avail myself of this invitation. I subsequently saw him once, as I have intimated, at a public ceremony, but had no opportunity of speaking with him.

I have never seen but two of Louis Philippe's family—the Duc de Nemours and the Duc de Montpensier. I was in Paris in the year 1843, and went one day to the races in the Champ de Mars. The Duc de Nemours was at that time the leading patron of races in France, and he had a stand of his own on the course. The carriage in which I was, however, was stationed so far off that, although I could make out that the stand was full of people, I could not distinguish any faces. After the first race was over I alighted, with the intention of walking across the course to have a look at the Prince. When I reached the stand it was empty, and I made up my mind that he must have gone home. Lighting a cigar, I turned back until I reached the middle of the course, where I stood for some time watching what was going on. Near me was a young man, who did not particularly attract my attention, in conversation with an older one. I only observed that he was very ill-dressed, and had a very unpleasant lisp in speaking. After a while he took a cigar-case from his pocket, and selecting a cigar from it, asked me for a light. "Certainly, Sir," I replied, handing him my lighted cigar. A few moments afterward an officer approached him, bareheaded, and asked him when Monseigneur would have his guard. I then knew that the young man was the Duc de Nemours.

The Duc de Montpensier I saw at a monster concert in the Champs Elysées the next year. Among the pieces performed was a chorus from the opera of Charles VI., I think, "Jamais l'Anglais ne regnera en France—Never shall the English reign in France." Feeling between the two nations was running high at that time, and the applause was tremendous. The Duke in his enthusiasm split a pair of new gloves. His unlucky marriage with the sister of the Queen of Spain did as much as any thing else to precipitate his father from the throne.

M. Guizot I had the honor of knowing. He is undoubtedly one of the purest public men of the age. I was requested to translate into English an Address which he delivered before the Academy of Moral and Political Sciences, on the Intellectual Activity of the United States. This gave me the occasion to call upon him at his modest residence several times. His character and the tone of his mind are rather English than French, and so indeed is his appearance; but when he speaks, although sober in his gestures for a Frenchman, he could not possibly be mistaken for any thing else. He is a Protestant, as is well known, and after the downfall of the King was offered the Professorship of History in the University of Oxford, which he declined. I remember once hearing him speak when Prime Minister, in the Chamber of Deputies, in 1843. He made use of the expression "La France a besoin de se sentir gouvernée—France requires to feel herself governed"—than which a truer thing was never said. This language excited storms of indignation. The Emperor Napoleon III. has shown that he believes in the same doctrine, and most intelligent Frenchmen now agree with him.

Little M. Thiers, M. Guizot's formidable adversary in his days of power, is physically about as insignificant a specimen of humanity as could be picked out of a crowd. His mental gifts are of the very highest order.

The ablest man, probably, whom the present Emperor has had in his government is M. Drouyn de l'Huys, formerly Minister of Foreign Affairs. He retired from the Ministry after the failure of the effort to patch up a peace with Russia at Vienna before the death of Nicholas, his views and those of the Emperor being understood to differ. M. Drouyn de l'Huys has one of the largest fortunes in France.

It is not generally supposed that the Emperor Napoleon cares to be surrounded by first-class men. He likes good executive officers, but prefers to do his own thinking. It is said that he never enters into a discussion at a cabinet meeting. He takes the opinion of each Minister in turn, and then announces his decision, seldom assigning reasons for it. His uncle followed very much the same system.

I have had the pleasure of the acquaintance of many other eminent Frenchmen, whose names, however, are but little known to readers on this side of the Atlantic. I presume that the public men of France are, as a class, the most laborious in the world. In a clear apprehension of abstract questions and in administrative capacity they have, probably, no equals. Ever since the Revolution of 1789 the French Government, under each successive change, has always been a most ingenious and nicely adjusted piece of machinery. Only there has generally been something wrong about the main-spring.

II.—SOME AMERICANS IN PARIS.

Our countrymen who travel abroad may be divided into two great classes—those who are so obstinately prejudiced in favor of every thing at home that they can see nothing good in foreign lands, and those who affect to despise their own institutions and become more European than Europeans themselves. There are a few exceptions of intelligent persons who recognize some excellence and some evil on both sides of the Atlantic; but the number is not large. Those who belong to the first of my great divisions are only short-sighted; the others are contemptible.

We have a permanent colony in Paris, numbering it would be difficult to say how many, but I should think not less than two thousand. The transient travel is, of course, much greater.

Some years ago I acted for a short time as Secretary of Legation, and during that year we viséd over seven thousand passports. Many of our wealthy gentlemen, who go there to reside a few years, have just retired from business, having been engaged actively all their lives in cotton or pork. Their preparation, from no fault of their own, has not usually been such as to fit them to lead, advantageously to themselves, the lives of men of leisure in the capital of France. The most unfortunate visitors that Paris receives are the horde of young men, with more money than brains, who rush wildly into all the dissipation which lies upon the surface, without even suspecting the existence of all the admirable advantages which surround them, or caring for them if they know of them. I recollect once asking a young gentleman which he preferred, Rome or Naples? "Rome," he said, "because the brandy was better!" It must be confessed, too, that Paris does no good to many of our women. If it develops in them nothing worse than frivolity, that is to be deprecated. I am inclined to think it would be better for our country if there were no Paris. We are importing thence into New York every thing evil and foolish; and I have yet to learn that we have copied the French in the first of the noble characteristics which underlie their national character, or that we have studied, to any advantage, the admirable lessons in the economy of life, in science, and in art, which Paris can teach us.

Our countrymen are a droll people when they get away from home. If the traveler be a young man, the first thing he requires on his arrival is the address of a tailor, a bootmaker, and a hatter. A visit to the Louvre and to Versailles is quite subordinate to this great necessity. Indeed at any time the dancing gardens, the masked balls at the opera, a petit souper at the Café Doré, or an introduction into the coulisses of a minor theatre, are greater attractions than all the picture-galleries and public buildings on the Continent. Insensate youth!

I recollect an absurd incident which occurred many years since. I met in the street one day an American friend, and not a very young man either, who was visiting Europe for the first time. He was delighted to see me, for I spoke French, and he did not; and I knew all the ropes, whereas he had just arrived. The first business to be attended to, as might be anticipated, was a visit to a tailor. This was dispatched. Then came the bootmaker's turn. This was likewise attended to. Then some pocket handkerchiefs were required, which it was desired to have very elegant. So I took my friend to Doucet's, in the Rue de la Paix. When we entered the shop neither M. Doucet nor any of his assistants happened to be in; they were somewhere in a back room. Lying on a counter were some beautiful specimens of cambric, each elaborately embroidered in one corner with a coronet. These at once attracted my friend's attention and admiration. He asked me what the coronet meant. I told him that the owner was some nobleman. This he doubted; the coronet might be only an ornament. He had a great mind to have some exactly similar. I ridiculed the idea, and just then M. Doucet, who speaks English, came in. "Whose handkerchiefs are these, M. Doucet?" I asked. "They belong to Prince —, a Russian." I thought this explanation would silence my companion, and so it did for a time. At length a happy thought seemed to strike him, and he suddenly asked the tradesman if he could not embroider an American Eagle on some handkerchiefs for him! It was as much as Doucet could do to keep his countenance. He replied as gravely as he could that undoubtedly it could be done, but that he was not acquainted with the peculiarities of our national bird. Thereupon my friend triumphantly took a half dollar from his pocket and threw it on the counter. The order was given and booked, and I presume executed; but I made no inquiry, and I took a vow that from that day forward I would never be induced to accompany an American on a shopping expedition.

Fathers of family when they come to Paris, probably impelled thereto by their wives and daughters, are usually frantic about presentations at Court, and invitations to balls and fêtes. I have mentioned that I acted for a short time as Secretary of Legation. A charming position that seems to be in the distance. In reality it is a most unpleasant one. The regular duties are severe if conscientiously attended to; but that is nothing. But upon the unfortunate Secretary the responsibility of the whole Social Department rests; and this is awful. Every individual who brings a passport to be signed, whether he is acquainted with any member of the Legation or not, and whether the bearer of any letters or not, immediately expects to receive attentions from the servants of the people. Why, it would employ a messenger all the time to leave sufficient cards on all these persons to satisfy their pretensions. This is bad enough. But there is worse to come. Every crack-brained inventor—and their name is legion—who tumbles upon you expects you immediately to procure for him a private interview with the Emperor, which small favor is not always to be obtained. But the greatest trial comes when the Préfet of the Seine (or some other functionary, as the case may be) notifies you of an approaching ball at the Hôtel de Ville, and politely requests you to send in a list of your countrymen whom you desire invited. What are you to do? All the permanent residents think they have peculiar claims to your courtesy, and that you are bound to take care of them. Whereas the transient people think there is no comparison in the case; it is all in their favor. Residents can go at any time; have been before, and may go again. They, on the contrary, will never have another opportunity. They have deferred their journey to Italy a week expressly on account of this ball. Jane and Maria have set their hearts upon it. In a word, they must have tickets, or look out for your political head at Washington. In despair the maddened Secretary hangs up a list in the Legation for signatures. Three to four hundred are soon appended; but this only includes a tithe of the people you are bound to think of without their taking any trouble in the premises. At last you send in your list five hundred strong, feeling ashamed of your own unavoidable impudence. Back comes a polite note from the Préfet. Very sorry, but you have asked for more invitations than can be accorded to all the foreign Legations combined. Be so good as to select forty names, and cards will be immediately sent. Those who finally go do not thank you; it was their right. The disappointed swear vengeance upon you. In this way a Secretary has a fine opportunity of making enemies of all his countrymen in less time than a twelvemonth.

There was a very odd fish in Paris the summer of 1855. He came from somewhere on our Western frontier, and crossed from New York to Havre in the North Star. He dressed in a complete suit of furs, and during the voyage slept on deck every night. He appeared to be a very intelligent man, had plenty of money, but was remarkably eccentric. In Paris he went to Meurice's Hotel, where he soon became the wonder of the crowds of cockneys who frequent that house. Standing in the centre of the courtyard, and describing around him a magic circle of tobacco juice, he would tell the most marvelous stories with a look which said, plainly, You had better not express any doubts if you do not want a bowie-knife between your ribs. The cockneys were at a complete loss what to make of him. A highly-cultivated friend of mine, who had accidentally made his acquaintance, was once guilty of the imprudence of asking him to take a walk. Now if our late Japanese visitors were to appear in the streets of Paris hardly any one would turn round to look at them, so accustomed are the people to all kinds of foreign costumes. But the big backwoodsman in his furs proved an exception to this rule, and my friend soon perceived that they were attracting more attention than was altogether agreeable to his modesty. After a time they arrived at the Cathedral of Nôtre Dame, which they entered. As soon as they got in the frontiersman commenced looking round, as if anxiously searching for something. Presently he espied a marble font or receptacle for holy water. His face at once lit up, and advancing to within six feet of it, he with the most accurate aim discharged a stream of tobacco juice directly into the centre. A sacristan who happened to be passing came up greatly excited at the sacrilege. It was some time before he could be convinced that the stranger thought the thing was a substitute for a spittoon. "What on earth else could it be meant for?" he asked.

The American students—humanes they call themselves—in the Latin quarter are a queer set. Among them were two young medical men from Louisiana, who had come over to enter the Russian service, but had never got beyond Paris. One of them carried a card, which he seriously presented whenever introduced to a Frenchman, on which was engraved as a crest two alligators fighting with their tails, and under this, Le Baron d'Attakapas. The device of the other I forget, but he sported the name of Le Comte de Plaquemines.

OF LOSS.

STRETCHED silver-spun the spider's nets;
The quivering sky was white with fire;
The blackbird's scarlet epaulets
Reddened the hemlock's topmost spire.

The mountain in his purple cloak,
His feet with misty vapors wet,
Lay dreamily, and seemed to smoke
All day his giant calumet.

From farm-house bells the noonday rung;
The teams that plowed the furrows stopped;
The ox refreshed his lolling tongue,
And brows were wiped, and spades were dropped;

And down the field the mowers stepped,
With burning brows and figures lithe,
As in their brawny hands they swept
From side to side the hissing scythe;

'Till sudden ceased the noonday task,
The scythes 'mid swathes of grass lay still,
As girls with can and cider flask
Came romping gayly down the hill.

And over all there swept a stream
Of subtle music, felt, not heard,
As when one conjures in a dream
The distant singing of a bird.

I drank the glory of the scene,
Its autumn splendor fired my veins;
The woods were like an Indian Queen
Who gazed upon her old domains.

And ah! methought I heard a sigh
Come softly through her leafy lips;
A mourning over days gone by,
That were before the white man's ships.

And so I came to think on Loss—
I never much could think on Gain.—
A poet oft will woo a cross
On whom a crown is pressed in vain.

I came to think—I know not how—
Perchance through sense of Indian wrong—
Of losses of my own, that now
Broke for the first time into song.

A fluttering strain of feeble words
That scarcely dared to leave my breast;
But like a brood of fledgeling birds
Kept hovering round their natal nest.

"O loss!" I sang—"O early loss!
O blight that nipped the buds of spring!
O spell that turned the gold to dross!
O steel that clipped the untried wing!"

"I mourn all days, as sorrows he
Whom once they called a merchant prince
Over the ships he sent to sea,
And never, never heard of since.

"To ye, O woods, the annual May Restores the leaves ye lost before;
The tide that now forsakes the bay,
This night will wash the widowed shore.

"But I shall never see again
The shape that smiled upon my youth;
A mist of sorrow veils my brain,
And dimly looms the light of truth.

"She faded, fading woods, like you!
And fleeting shone with sweeter grace;
And as she died the colors grew
To softer splendor in her face.

"Until one day the hectic flush
Was veiled with death's eternal snow;
She swept from earth amid a hush,
And I was left alone below!"

While thus I moaned I heard a peal
Of laughter through the meadows flow;
I saw the farm-boys at their meal—
I saw the cider circling go.

And still the mountain calmly slept,
His feet with valley vapors wet;
And slowly circling upward crept
The smoke from out his calumet.

Mine was the sole discordant breath
That marred this dream of peace below.
"O God!" I cried—"give, give me death,
Or give me grace to bear thy blow!"

POLL JENNINGS'S HAIR.

IT is sometimes a relief to have a story without a heroine; and this distinction alone can I claim for mine. Nothing heroic or wonderful casts its halo about little Poll Jennings, the seventh daughter of Abe Jennings the South-side fisherman. Not even one of those miraculous poor cottages that are always so exquisitely clean, and have white curtains and climbing roses through all depths of poverty and suffering, held my little girl in its romantic shelter. Abe's house, lying between three of those low sand-hills that back the shore on our New England coast, like waves of land that simulate the sea, was not in the least attractive or picturesque. At first a mere cabin of drift-wood, the increasing wants and numbers of his family had, as it were, built themselves out in odd attachments—square, or oblong, or triangular, as wood came to hand, or necessity demanded—till the whole dwelling bore the aspect externally of a great rabbit-hutch or poultry-house, such as boys build on a smaller scale out of old boards from ruined barns, palings of fence, and refuse from carpenters' shops: though no constructive magazine furnished inside or outside of the fisherman's home; it was all fashioned from the waifs of a great Destroyer—all drift-wood from the sea, that raved and thundered half a mile off, as if yet clamorous for its prey. Still uncouth and rude as was its shaping, a poet might have found it more suggestive than any model cottage in the land—if a poet be not merely the rhymers of sentiment and beauty, but he whose creative soul, from one slight thread of association spins a wide web of fancies, and tracks the idea through all its windings, till imagination becomes reality, and the real and the ideal are one. However, no poet ever entered there to talk or think all this nonsense; and the old walls, where teak, that an Indian forest missed, stood side by side with oak from English uplands and pine from the Æolian woods of Maine. The windows, that had been driven ashore, void of their crystal panes, from some full-freighted steamer, gone down too deep for any more wistful eyes to watch receding shore or hurrying storm-rack through the sashes; doors, that had swung to in the last lurch of the vessel, and made the state-rooms they guarded tombs of the dead—all these spoke nothing to the practical brain of old Abe Jennings, nor softened to any pathos the high spirits of his six rosy daughters, who laughed and romped and worked, as regardless of any outside suffering as if they were the world, and their sand-hills comprised all life and destiny. But Poll, the last and least of the seven, was one of those exceptional creatures that come as some new and strange variety of a flower does, as unlike all its congeners in tint and habit as if it were the growth of an alien soil and climate. Ruth and Mary and Martha, Nancy, Jane, and Adeline, were all straight and strong, with thick dark hair, varying only from the tar-black of Ruth's coarse curls to the shining deep-brown of Adeline's braids. Roses of the deepest dye bloomed on their faces; except Ruth, they were never sad or moody; they had their sweet-hearts and their frolics, and were altogether common-sense, ordinary, wholesome girls as one could find. Polly could lay claim to none of these charms or virtues; she was slight and pale, with great hazel eyes, that oftenest looked vague and dreamy; her very lips were colorless; and her skin, roughened and red, offered neither bloom nor purity to attract the eye, but her hair was truly magnificent. Of the deepest red, undeniably red as is the glossy coat of a bright bay horse, it fell to her feet in shining waves, so soft, so fine, yet so heavy, that it seemed as if the splendid growth had absorbed all the beauty and strength that should otherwise have been hers in face and form. But with this peculiar coloring came also the temperament of which it is the index—sensitive, passionate, shy as a quail, yet proud as only a woman can be. If Poll Jennings had been taught and trained to the height of her capacities, or even had the means of self-training, her latent genius would have dawned on her sphere in one shape or another; and perhaps an actress, perhaps an author, some star of art, some wonder of vocalization, might have delighted or astonished the world. But, happily for Poll, another and a better fate than these awaited her, though its vestibule was only a hut, and its locality the sand-hills of the Atlantic shore. Yet this special beauty of the child's—her resplendent hair—was made her peculiar torment. To her sisters and father it was red, and only red; and all the jokes that people will waste on that tint—artistic, historic, exquisite as it may be—were lavished on Polly's head till hot tears filled her eyes and burning color suffused her face at the least allusion to it. Moreover, her physical capacity was far inferior to that of her sisters; her slight hands and arms could not row a boat through the rolling seas outside the bar; she could not toil at the wash-tub, or help draw a seine; and when a young farmer from inland came down "to salt," or a sturdy fisher from another bay hauled up his boat inside the little harbor of Squamkeag Light, and trudged over to have a talk with old Abe, it was never Poll who waded out into the mud, with bare white legs and flying hair, to dig clams for supper; or who, with a leather palm, in true sailor fashion, mended sails by the fireside, singing 'longshore songs at her work. Poll's place was never there: she shrank away to gather berries or hunt for gulls' eggs, or crouched motionless in a darker corner, her great luminous eyes fixed on some paneled fragment of the wall that hungry seas had thrown ashore, painting to herself the storm and the wreck till she neither heard nor saw the rough love-making that went on beside her. So it happened that Mary and Martha, the twins, married two young farmers up the country, and led the unpastoral lives that farming women in New England must lead—lives of drudgery and care. Nancy went off with a young fisherman over to Fire Island; Ruth, the oldest, had lost her lover, years gone by, in a whale-ship that sailed away and was never heard of more; while Jane was just about to be married to hers, mate on a New Haven schooner—"Mdse. to Barbadoes," as the shipping-list said; and Adeline laughed and coquetted between half a dozen of the roughest sort.

There were enough at home to do the work, and Ruth's set sobriety, Jane's boisterous healthiness, Adeline's perpetual giggle, none of them chimed with Poll's dreamy nature. A weary sense of her own incapacity oppressed her all the time; she could not work as they did; and, worst of all, the continual feeling that she was ugly, "red-headed," "white-faced," "eyes as big as a robin's," brooded over her solitary thoughts, and made her more sad, more lonely from day to day. Yet though no refinement of speech ever turned plain "Poll" into Pauline, and no suave ministrations of higher civilization toned her wild grace into elegance or wove her beautiful locks into the crown they should have been, she had her own consolations, for Nature is no foster-mother, and she took this sobbing child into her own heart. Polly's highest pleasure was to steal out from the cabin and wander away to the shore; there, laid at length among the rank grass whose leaves waved and glittered in the wind, she watched the curling waves of beryl sweep in to leap and break in thunder, while the spray-bells were tossed far and sparkling from their crests on the beaten sands, and the crepitation of those brilliant bubbles crushed beneath the wave scarce finished its fairy peal of artillery ere another and a heavier surfswelled, and curled, and broke above it; while milk-white gulls darted and screamed overhead, or a lonely fish-hawk hovered with dire intent over the shoal of fish that dimpled and darkened the water with a wandering wave of life; and far beyond, through the purple haze that brooded on the horizon, white-sailed ships glided into sight, and, stately as dreams, vanished again whence they seemed to come. Here, while the fresh breeze swept her cheek with its keen odor of the seas, and the warm sands beneath quickened her languid pulses, Poll lay hour after hour, and dreamed, not such dreams as girls have whose life is led among luxury and society, but pure visions of far-off countries beyond the ocean, whose birds and flowers and trees were all of earth's brightest, and all quickened with the acute life of the sea itself to poignant beauty. Here, in this paradise, no mocking mirth, no harsh word, no cold or storm intruded, and in its castles a new life dawned for the fisherman's girl that held her in its trance safe from the harshness of her own, and lapped her in its soft sweetness from all that was hard and bitter in reality. So all the summer days passed away, lying on the shore or wandering on the sand-hills that rolled back to sand-plains or boggy stretches of inland; plains that had their own treasures of great open-eyed violets, azure as the sky above or white as its clouds; milky strawberry-blooms and clusters of their scarlet fragrant fruits; crowding flowers of pink and purple, trails of starry blackberry vines; and swamps that beguiled her wandering feet through fragrant thickets of bay-berry, tangled with cat-brier and sweet-brier, to great blueberry bushes, hanging thick with misty blue spheres, aromatic and sweet with a sweetness no tropic suns can give; while beside them bloomed the splendid wild lily, set thick as a pagoda with bells, and at its foot the rare orange orchis showed its concentrated sunshine, and regal cardinal-flowers flamed through the thin grass with spikes of velvet fire. Not a flower blossomed or a fruit ripened for miles about that Poll did not know: it was she who hung the shelf above the chimney with bundles of spearmint, peppermint, bone-set, marsh-rosemary, pennyroyal, mountain-mint, tansy, catnip, sweet fern, sweet-cicely, prince's piny, sassafras root, winter-green, and birch bark, part the gatherings of her own rambles at home, part a tribute from her sisters up the country, who brought Poll only "yarbs" instead of the squashes for Ruth, the apples that filled Jane's apron, and the hickory-nuts Adeline cracked in her great white teeth. So things went on till Poll was seventeen, and our story begins, when Jane's lover came home and they were married, and Adeline betook herself to see Nancy, leaving only the eldest and youngest of the seven sisters at home for the winter that set in early and bitter. The last day of November was a wild northeaster; rain, that the fierce wind drove aslant against the hut windows, froze as fast as it fell, and while Ruth sat by the stove and sewed, drawing once in a while one of those deep sighs that are the echoes of a great sorrow gone past, Poll pressed her face against the blurred window-pane to see the storm she dared not be out in, and while she looked and dreamed the outer door burst open and in came her father, dripping as if he had been drowned, followed by a stout young fellow as pale as a sheet, carrying his right arm in a sling.

"I veow!" said old Abe, shaking himself like a great water-dog, "ef this a'n't about the most weathersome weather I ever see! I ha'n't ben only jest outside the bar, an' my jib's as stiff as a tin pan, and the old fo'sail took an' cracked fore an' aft afore I could get her head on so's to run in. Ef I hadn't a had Sam Bent here along I dono but what I should ha' ben swamped whether or no; he and me both done our darnedest, and then I'll be drowned ef he didn't fall foul of a board 't was all glib ice jest as we was a landin', up flew his heels, and he kinder lay to on his right arm, so 't I expect it's broke. I slung it up with my old comforter till he could get under hatches here, 'n now you gals must take keer on him till I make sail over to Punkintown and get that are nateral bone-setter to come along and splice him."

Sam Bent was no stranger to the girls, but though Poll had often seen him before she had never exchanged half a dozen words with him; but ceremonies are spared at South-side, so Poll took the scissors which Ruth handed her, and proceeded to cut the sleeve of Sam Bent's coat and jacket, while her sister set a spare bedroom to rights, and brewed some herb-tea lest the youth might be ordered a sweat. Poll's fingers were slight and careful, and she did her office tenderly—even Sam felt it through the pain of his doubly-broken arm; and when at length Abe returned from his walk to Punkintown—a settlement some four miles inland—he found Sam released from his heavy pea-jacket and coat, wrapped in Poll's shawl, with his feet to the fire, about as comfortable as he could have been under the disadvantages of the occasion. The "nateral bone-setter" worked his usual wonders on the occasion; and having duly splintered and bandaged the young man, took his knife out of his pocket, and began to snap the blade out and in as a preliminary to conversation, while he tilted his chair back against the wall, and cleared his throat with a vigorous "ahem."

"Well, Sir; well, Sir," began Doctor Higgs, "that job is done, Sir. You will have rather of a procrastinating season with such a fracter as that is, but patience is a virtoo, Sir. Yes, Sir, and so is patients, too, we doctors think. He, he, he! Ho, ho, ho! Well, I am pleased to see you reciprocate my little joke; rayther hard to be ludiciously inclined, Sir, under the proximity of corporal anguish. Ahem: shows you have good grit into you. I expect you'll become evanescent very rapid if you don't catch a cold, nor overeat, nor overdo the prudential noway. Do you reside in these parts, Sir?"

"I live over to Mystic when I'm to home," modestly replied Sam, overcome with this torrent of words, but, fortunately for him, not knowing the difference between evanescent and convalescent.

"Well, I can't recommend to you a removal to your natyve spere immediately, Sir. No, Sir, I should rayther advise you, in order to abrogate your confinement as much as possible, to remain where you be. If any febrifugal disorders was to set in, it would concatenate the fracter, Sir, very serious, very serious! You will want considerable nussin', I think proberble; and if you can indooce this here old gentleman to inhabitate you for a spell, why I should counsel you to become stationary for the present."

"I guess I a'n't a goin' for to turn Sam Bent out o' my cabin, ef 'twa'n't no bigger 'n a yawl-boat's locker," growled old Abe. "He's his father's son, 'n that's enough, if he was the miserablest hoss-shoe crab 't ever left his back behind him. Poll here can nuss him; she a'n't good for much but pokin' round, 'n it's too consarned cold to do that this kind o' clymit."

"Well, Sir; well, Sir, I'll call over agin to-morrer, ef the weather is convenable. I am a comin' into this region to see a poor indignant female who is laid up with a neuralogy of the marrer-bones, so 't mebbe I shall be rather delayed in gettin' around, but I'm sure certain to be on hand, Providence permitting, before noon—by night whether or no. Good-day, good-day!" Wherewith the verbose Doctor departed, and Sam Bent, suddenly looking up, caught a little flicker of fun just fading out of Poll's great eyes, and laughed outright.

"He bears up hard onto big words, don't he?" said Sam, whose genuine nature detected the pretension he did not understand. "He's a kind of a nateral dictionary, I guess!"

Poll's eyes danced, and Sam fixed a long look on her; he didn't know why, no more did she; but being both uncivilized enough to feel and think without asking why or how, they were not concerned about the matter; and when Sam Bent was safely conveyed to bed in the queer little five-angled room allotted to him, he fell asleep and dreamed he was drawing a seine on the North shore, and a great sting-ray stood up on its tail and turned into Doctor Higgs; while Poll only listened to the storm outside, and fancied that she heard minute-guns and shrieks of terror through the wild wind, and at length slept too heavily to dream. But for all this a great guest was drawing near to the fisherman's hut, though in silence and secrecy—a guest that pagans hailed with wine and roses, wreaths of myrtle, and dances of joy; but we, sadder and wiser, welcome oftenest with trembling and wonder. Poll knew neither. She never even stopped to wonder why she cared no more to search the beach for its treasures or pore over the odd pictures in their Bible; nor did Sam Bent ever suspect why he liked to have his bandages renewed daily, his black hair smoothed for him, and his black ribbon knotted so carefully under the coarse white collar that set off the muscular throat and handsome head above it. Sam would not have cared if his broken arm was not set for six months, he liked so well his self-elected office of teacher to Poll, who was learning to read at his knee like a child, and listening to his discourses of other lands (as she considered Maine and Georgia!) with as much eagerness as if he had been Hakluyt himself instead of foremast hand to a coasting schooner. Under the pressure of her new duties Poll grew into new developments; she became far more handy about the house; she spoke oftener of her own accord; she moved more rapidly, and never a hole in her apron or her frock lay an hour unmended now; and taking patient lessons of Ruth, she learned to mend Sam's stockings so nicely that he, at least, considered it an ornament to have had a hole in the most conspicuous quarter possible!

But at last Sam got well, and could not evade the fact that he had been doing nothing for two months but receiving care and a home, and he began to wonder to himself what he could ever do to escape from this heavy weight of obligation. Now it never was supposed in old times that the aforesaid little deity meddled with lesser things than flowers and jewels; but great is civilization! In its faintest influence comes a subtlety unknown to dear primeval days; and at this juncture love—if love it was—dropped a timely rheumatism on Uncle Abe's old back, and the day after Sam Bent left off his sling the poor old fisherman came home groaning and hobbling, and, I regret to say, swearing after his own fishy fashion.

"Darn it!" growled he, as he let himself down into an old rush-bottomed chair that stood by the fire. "I'll be jiggered if I a'n't got to be in docks now! I couldn't but jest h'ist her over the bar 'n make out to git ashore. Flat fish 'n flounders! I ha'n't had such a spell sence ten year back, 'n what's goin' to become of the eyester bisness I should like ter tell?"

"You'd better take a sweat right away, father," said Ruth, taking down the sheaf of bone-set for the necessary brewage.

"Sweat! I calk'late I shall sweat enough with this here screwin' in my bones, gal! Loddy Doddy! ef I don't yell an' holler afore day-break I shall miss my reckonin', and all the eyesters in the bay 'll be raked up afore I'm stirrin' agin, for't all I know."

"No they won't, Uncle Abe!" said Sam, sturdily, coming up to the fire as he spoke. "Ha'n't I had a free passage here nigh on to two months, 'n you think I a'n't goin' for to work it out? I ken work the Mary Ann fust-rate, and I know the lay of the beds pretty near as well as any body. I'm all right now, and here I am, standin' on my feet, ready to do the most a feller can, though I don't never expect I can work out the kind o' care I've hed along back." With which Sam cast a sheep's-eye at Poll's place and beheld—nobody! for she was behind him, looking hard out of the window at the new and interesting prospect of an old seine and two wash-tubs—back-ground a sand-hill! But Poll's eyes were too misty to see, and her rough, red skin flushed to purple as she heard her father go on:

"Hold hard, Sam! you're your dad's son; there a'n't a doubt on't; old Paphro Bent never see a distress-signal h'isted but what he lay to an' sent aboard. But you're a young feller, 'n I a'n't a goin' for to take your vittles 'n put 'em into my jaws. You ken git a bunk aboard of any coaster, 'n get your wages reg'lar, so you 'bout ship and mind your own hellum, I can keep to my anchorage, I guess, for a spell; 'n it's no use starving while them gals has got legs to go and dig clams. I shall weather it, boy! though I don't say but what you're a good feller to think on't."

"Now look at here, Uncle Abe," said Sam, vehemently, setting his feet as wide apart and bracing his hands on his hips as firmly as if he expected old Abe to make a rush at him and try to upset him; "'ta'n't no use hailin' this here schooner with that kind of talk. I a'n't a goin' coastin'. I a'n't goin' away. I wish I may be drowned off Hatteras and come ashore at Point Judy if I do! I'm a goin' eyesterin', an' deep-sea fishin' in the Mary Ann, till that darned rheumatis o' yours goes to Joppy, ef it lasts till day after never! 'n ef you won't give me night's lodgin's and a meal of vittles here, why I'll go over to Squamkeag Light 'n get 'em out o' Ben Gould; so there's the hull on't!" With which peroration Sam turned away, and spat energetically into the fire.

Old Abe held his peace a minute; it was hard for the sturdy man to own his dependence, to become useless, and Sam's strong youth and manhood mixed regret with his simple willingness of acceptance.

"Well," said he, at last. "Lord knows I'd foller the sea till I dropped ef I hadn't no rheumatiz, but a rotten hulk a'n't no use outside. You ken take the Mary Ann, Sam Bent; she's easy handled, and she's cute enough of herself to keep school to-morrer, 'n I can tell you the lay of the eyester beds tollerble well; but look here, young feller, ef I catch you a takin' a meal of vittles or a night's sleep over to Ben Gould's, you'll hear thunder 'n ketch lightnin'!"

"Well, I won't," laughed Sam, and so the matter ended; and old Abe was put to bed with the dose of bone-set, and rose no more for long weeks. Long enough to Ruth, for a sick man's attendant has no sinecure, but Poll never wearied of the lingering days, for a step tramping over the sand-hills, and a broad, brown face full of honest delight waited to charm the day's ending, and in that anticipation nothing seemed dull or dreary. Nor did ever any man have gentler nursing than Poll lavished on her cross and unreasonable old father. One hears vast blame laid upon lovers for their seeming sweetness and excellence while yet love is new, but is not the blame unjust? For what can call out the latent lovelinesses of any character if the one rose of life does not win them to the surface? Lost in that divine blooming, wrapped in that sacred spell, shall not the desert blossom and the sands glitter with flowing springs? Still a desert; still the red sands; let us rather bless the transformer than sneer at the transformation. So the winter wore on, and if in its routine there was any bitterness, it was only when storms swept over the hut with fierce scream and heavy pinions, and Ruth shuddered over her dead lover, Poll over her living one! Meanwhile no storms wrecked Sam Bent—he raked oysters and caught sea-bass, halibut, porgies, and various other finny creatures in quantities unknown; discovered a new oyster bed "inside," in one of his long voyages round Montauk; and made money at a rate that pleased him even more than it did old Abe: while he thoroughly enjoyed having a home to go to, and exulted in his pupil's progress, who had got so far as to read fluently the book of fairy tales he bought for her in New York by the first of April. But with April home came Adeline, and Adeline being one of those women who are born coquettes, great was her delight at finding a handsome young fellow like Sam Bent domesticated in her house, and of course she immediately began a vigorous flirtation with him. Now Adeline was a sort of woman Sam had seen before, understood, and held in small account; with Poll he was respectful, shy, timid, yet self-respectful; but he laughed, jested, and romped with "Addy," spoke to her as if she were another fisherman; helped her to dig clams, and sculled her boat across the bay, with as much ease and carelessness as if she had been a boy. Poor Poll! she did not know why she grew cross to Adeline, and silent to Sam. Something told her that she ought not to steal away to her old haunts and neglect her home work, and let her father shift for himself as best he could; yet Poll did all this, and the sea and sky comforted her no more! Neither was she particularly consoled by hearing, from her sleepless pillow one night, Ruth remonstrating with Adeline on her manners to Sam.

"I don't like to have you make so free with Sam Bent, Addy," said poor prim Ruth, who had never given so much as one kiss to Jonas Scranton before he sailed away to be drowned—and probably regretted it still. "'Tain't mannerly to be a rompin' round so with a young feller."

"Oh law!" laughed Addy; "jest as ef I was goin' to be stuck up with Sam Bent! I like to plague him; he's ben cooped up all winter with you an' Poll till he wants a livenin' up."

"Well, 'tain't a good thing for Poll to see you a behavin' so, Addy; maybe she might take to them ways, 'n she a'n't a kind to take things so easy as you do, 'n maybe folks would think hard of her ef she should foller your manners; for you never was nothin' but a kitten, sence you was knee-high to a hoptoad."

Adeline laughed harder than ever. "Well, I declare!" said she; "as ef our Poll would ever take to kitin' after a feller like Sam Bent! I guess he would feel crawly if she did, poor cretur! that red hair and pink-red face of her'n a'n't very takin'!" With which she resumed her laughter as if the idea was delightfully absurd.

Ruth gave a little sigh and knit more energetically than ever; she might as well have exhorted the sea-spray as Adeline. She never even moved her to petulance with her exhortations, which would have been some comfort; but Poll turned her face to her pillow, crushed and heart-sick, and slow, hot tears crept down her cheeks one after another as she thought of her happy winter evenings, of Sam Bent's shy, kind looks, and, as climax, of her own horrid red hair and rough skin and saucer-eyes. Poor Poll!

But by May Uncle Abe's rheumatism began to be forgotten; his sturdy legs ached no more, his back straightened out, and his weather-beaten face recovered its old look of kindly shrewdness, and he was as fit as ever to handle the Mary Ann; so Sam had been "down to York," and got a place as foremast hand on a brig bound for China, to sail the first of June; a good place, and good wages, yet somehow Poll did not receive the news joyfully, and she said nothing at all to Sam Bent when he came to announce it.

Poll was not magnanimous; but who is—among women? That is not their forte; a thousand other virtues flourish with them, but this is the millennial grace, and Poll owned it not. She was as weak, as selfish, as jealous as a humble and ugly woman is apt to be when she is in love; and I shall not blame her, though I know there are plenty who will. So when Ruth had said, quietly, "I'm real glad, Sam, but we shall kinder miss you," and Adeline had giggled out, "Well, that is first-rate! 'n I guess you'll have to get me something real pretty over to Chiny," Sam missed one voice that was, after all, the only one he cared for; and looking round, saw Poll's blue-check gown flutter away over the top of a sand-hill past the window. "I declare for't!" said Sam, "if I ha'n't left a lot o' little fixin's down in the Mary Ann 't I brought from York. I'll jest step down and fetch 'em."

I regret to say that Sam had left them on purpose, having already learned the strategic lesson of lovers, in order to provide some sure way of excuse to meet or follow Poll, if she should happen to be out of the house. Would he have followed her had he known that she ran away to avoid him? He might have been a fool for his pains, like other men; but it happened he had no provocation, so he betook himself to—or toward—the Mary Ann; but as soon as the house was hidden, changed his course, and followed after the light track of Poll's steps till they were lost in the thick beach-grass. Poor child! she had thrown herself down in the glittering blades and buried her head in her apron. Faster than the clear green waves, that rolled relentless splendors on the failing shore below, did the heavy surges of her first sorrow thunder and sweep above her shrinking heart. Sam was going away! that was first, and then came in the shame, the self-contempt, the bitter grief that had racked and wasted her ever since she overheard Ruth and Addy talking about her that unhappy night. What if he did stay? he wouldn't care for her, handsome fellow! How could he bear to look at such a homely thing as she?—and that dreadful hair! so red, and so much of it! If Poll had ever read novels, she might have torn it and scattered it with highly appropriate gestures; but she had not, so she let her hair alone and only cried, and wished she was any body or any thing but Poll Jennings: even a little fiddler-crab in its hole was enviable, since it never cared for Sam Bent and hadn't got red hair.

Between the thunder of the surf and the checked apron that covered her ears and tried to stifle her sobs Poll heard nothing; but in the midst of her passive anguish suddenly a strong arm was passed round her; and stunned with surprise, she found herself lifted on to Sam Bent's knee. Any woman who knew any thing would have sprung to her feet and blazed with anger, told seven lies in one breath, defied and scorned Sam, and sent him to China a broken-hearted man, indifferent to sharks and cholera, to be rewarded, perhaps, after ten years, with an elderly and acetous woman as the meed of constancy; but Poll was a little fool; she just laid her head against Sam's red shirt, and sobbed harder than ever. Sam choked; he couldn't speak, and yet he wanted to swear. Finally he sputtered out—"Poll! what's to pay?" No answer, only a great big sob that seemed to shake the little creature in his arms all over, and made it incumbent on Sam to clasp her still tighter.

So he tried again:

"Poll, don't! hold up, dear! don't keep a cryin' so!" Useless remonstrance; for though the sobs ceased, bright drops of salt-water that the sea disowned went hopping down that red flannel shirt in a deliberate way, as if they didn't care to, but rather thought it best.

"Polly!" repeated Sam, in a gentler tone.

"What?" said Poll, faintly, lifting her head, and wiping her eyes with her apron.

"Don't do that! I see you through the winder, and I follered along; for you see, Poll, I'm a going to Chiny, 'n I wanted to—I—well—I dono— Poll, when I come back will you marry me?"

Poll's eyes opened wider and brighter than ever; she drew back and looked into Sam's face; her cheek flushed as she met his steady gaze.

"Don't make fun of me!" said she, piteously.

Sam's eyes blazed. "Make fun of you!" said he, indignantly. "Why, Poll Jinnins! what are you thinkin' about? I should think you might believe a feller was honest when he said that!"

"Oh Sam!" pleaded Poll, with moist eyes.

"Will you, Poll?"

"But—but—oh!" said she, with half a sob—"are you sure, Sam?"

"Sure of what?"

"Sure you like me?" courageously ventured Poll.

"I don't know nothin' else I'm so sure on," said he, dryly.

"But I've got such red hair, Sam!"

Sam laughed outright. He could not help it. But those great hazel eyes, full of vague apprehension, and the trembling lips sobered him.

"Well, Poll! I think your hair is the prettiest thing to you by a long sight. Sence I see it tumble down once, when you was a bindin' up my arm, I ha'n't never see the sun risin' acrost the water but what I've thought on't; it's just like the wake the sun makes—kinder crinkly, and yet slick and bright, and kinder draws your eyes to't. I wouldn't change your hair for nobody's 't ever I see."

With which Sam withdrew the comb from the massive knot, and its great bright coil slipped down over Poll's neck and across his arm, and spread into a veil of length and splendor Athene might have coveted had she "been there to see." Sam's big brown fist grasped the silken waves, and bringing them round before Poll's face he caressed his capture as if it were real gold and he a miser; threaded it through his fingers, held it in bright bows up to the sunshine, stroked its ripples over his unoccupied knee, till Poll, who had innocently laid one arm round his neck while she looked on, fairly smiled; but a sigh followed instantly.

"But I am so humbly, Sam!" (homely, she meant).

"Well," said Sam, dropping the hair and putting both arms round her, "what if you be? and I don't say 't I think you're like a pink-and-white figure-head to a liner. I a'n't one o' them that buys a boat for its paint. I never see a handsome gal I liked half so well, 'n I guess I wouldn't 'a had no better care out o' the prettiest cretur betwixt the Reefs and the Banks than I had last winter. Besides, Poll, to my mind your hair's a sight prettier 'n most folks's hull faces; 'n if your eyes be ruther big they're as bright as two starn-lanterns any day, 'n as soft as a gull's be. I don't know what for you want to quarrel with your looks, so long's I don't."

A more fastidious man would not have found fault with the look she gave Sam now—so tender, so innocently glad, so trustful; and if Sam gave no audible reply it was none the less fervently answered, and for the next hour Poll was happy. No more visions of over-sea now; no dream of tropic shores and unwithering blossoms; her tropic had come, and her fadeless flowers burst into glowing life. Her beautiful head safe on Sam's shoulder, and her face buried in his strong breast, except when he would lift it up to be kissed, she had no thought for the past or future: the only "now" of life held her fast, and in its sweet embrace she lay basking till common life, in the shape of Adeline, came full upon the deaf lovers, and remarked, sharply,

"Well! if you hadn't ought to be ashamed, Sam Bent! out here in the grass a huggin' and kissin' our Poll!"

Sam rose up with a laugh, carrying Poll with him, circled still in his arm.

"She's my Poll now, Addy! I don't know who's a better right!"

"Good Jehoshaphat!" said old Abe, who had also come up behind Adeline.

At this singular expletive Addy herself laughed, though not a little piqued and provoked at Sam's defection from her, as she fancied it. "And all her red wig down her back!" exclaimed she, laying a rough grasp on the offending tresses.

"Hands off, Addy!" threatened Sam, smilingly; "that are's mine too, 'n the biggest lady in the land might be proud on't, ef 'tis red."

Adeline sniffed.

"Well!" said old Abe, regarding the pair with his hands in his trowsers pockets and his hat askew, as if they were some great natural curiosity, "this does beat all! Our Poll and Sam Bent! Well! I can't lay no course here-away. I ha'n't got my bearin's. A'n't a goin' to trade her off down to Chiny, be ye, Sam?" concluded he, chuckling at his own facetiousness.

"Money wouldn't buy her!" said Sam, with a smile that consoled Poll for the family depreciation, and still with his arm round her the whole party drew to the hut to surprise Ruth.

She took it more quietly and kindly.

"Well, I won't say I haven't thought on't before," said she. "Poll's more of a girl latterly 'n what she was; and looks a'n't of no account, they a'n't lastin'." Ruth sighed, wondering if Jonas would know the sad dark face that looked at her from her cracked glass daily now, and went on: "I don't deny it's a misfortin' to have red hair, but then we didn't make it, 'n can't mend it, so it's no use to be troubled."

"Her hair is splendid," growled Sam, angrily, a little overdoing his praise to atone for the insult, and lifting the coil Poll was twisting to his lips, he bestowed on it a hearty smack.

"Ha'n't you burnt you?" screeched Adeline; and Sam could scarce keep a straight face till he saw a tear cloud Poll's eyes.

"You want your ears boxed," said he to Adeline, between vexation and laughter.

"I guess it'll take more'n you to box 'em," was the retort, whereupon a slight scuffle ensued, but Ruth remarked to herself that Sam made no attempt to snatch the expected kiss from Adeline, and smiled as she noticed it; while Poll knotted up her hair and wondered at herself for Sam's sake, and coiled the "red wig" tenderly, because he had praised and kissed it. Forgive her, sensible reader; I own she was a little fool.

Sam found his way to the sloop, and brought up the little package of gifts for the girls: Adeline's red ribbon and Ruth's silver thimble entirely overtopped by the delicate collar and book of pictures for Poll. But this was natural enough, though Adeline took occasion afterward to remark that he must have felt pretty sure Poll would have him when he bought them; a remark utterly neutralized by Poll's naïve and humble "Why, of course he did!"

The next morning Sam said good-by; he was going to Connecticut to see his grandmother, his only near relative living, and from there to join the brig. Poll cried bitterly but comfortably, if one may use so unsentimental a word; for she had a heart full of comfort, and just then it refused to face the possibility of loss, and bore up bravely against the need of separation.

Summer was come too, and its long days of wandering; the sea laughed again on the shore and flung its flower-spray over the relentless rocks till they looked only strong, no longer cruel; the long grass waved in soft southern winds, and the purple mists of the horizon were dotted with snowy sails, emerging and fleeing in incessant silent change; and every day, that first bright week of June, Poll strained her eager eyes to see the Flying Cloud, and every ship seemed to her the ship she watched for, till at last came news that she had been spoken far out at sea by a returning vessel, and after that Poll watched no more. But not now could she spend her whole time in the fresh fields or on the shore; grave duties impended over her, and Ruth would not let them be forgotten. Ruth herself had been under a mother's care when Jonas left her, and been trained to those duties in the sweet anticipation of their exercise in a home of her own, and it was with bitter memories that she set herself to teach Poll how to keep house. Cooking and washing, ironing, mending, cutting out new garments, and refitting old ones, might have been a dull routine to Poll before, but now it was vividly pleasant; her imagination, that hitherto, aimless and void, had wandered far and wide on fair but profitless journeys, now drew down its wings for a narrower and more blessed sphere. Love has its own miracles whether human or divine, and they who have known what it is to do every daily duty, whether trivial or important, as for one dearest object, toward whom life tends in every leaf and bough, as toward the light, can best understand what the Apostle meant in charging his Christian flock to do all things as "unto the Lord." But Poll's idol was of the earth as yet; she knew and aspired no higher, though Sam Bent's own earnest, rugged, everyday religion had recommended itself to her admiration and reverence long ago. So she did all these things as if Sam were to be directly aided and comforted by them, and soon surpassed her teacher in practice as far as she exceeded her in mental ability; one's mind having, after all, in spite of customary sneers to the contrary, an effect on something besides literary capacity. Before autumn Uncle Abe discovered that nobody on the Shore made chowder like Poll's, or stewed such flavorful dishes from despised haddock and chip-dry halibut. Also a tiny bit of mould that the accretion of years of refuse had formed behind the house, much as it might have on a coral reef, Poll had shorn of its rank weeds, dug by means of an old fire-shovel, and planted with onions, beets, and potatoes; while in one corner bloomed and thrived a daily rose-bush, Sam's parting token, brought from New York by Ben Gould the day after the Flying Cloud sailed. Those pink buds told Poll a great many tender stories as she watched their clean, bright petals unfold against the myrtle-green leaves; and if care were a specific for rose-bushes, this one ought to have flourished even more than it did;

and before autumn there grew about it, like a court about a queen, clusters of every blossom that was native to the soil, and Poll's "posy-bed" was brighter and fairer than many a parterre of exotics.

It is beyond the limits of fact to say, as we would be glad to, that this improvement of Poll's renewed her complexion and redyed her hair: unfortunately they remained as rough and red as ever; but she had grown so tidy and so self-respectful, her calico dress was always so clean and well-fitted, her rippling hair so smooth and bright and carefully knotted, that a new attraction embellished her, and approved itself to the housewifely soul of Martha, who lived up in the country, not two miles from Mary, and had come down this hot September, "to get recruited up," as she phrased it, after the labors of summer. She was so pleased with Poll, whom she had held in the same estimation that the rest bestowed on her formerly, that she asked her to go home with her for a visit, and Poll went.

But though the rich meadows and wet woods of Ewefield were beautiful enough, in their green breadth and October splendor, to bewitch Poll's unaccustomed eyes, she felt a strange languor assail her, and a sleepy sweetness in the air made it seem hard to breathe; she drooped and paled, and dragged her heavy feet from field to field, in search of gay maple leaves and new flowers, till she was fit only to sink on the door-step when she got back, and could scarce hold up her head, it ached and throbbed so hard. Long before the end of her month's stay she grew homesick for the queer old cabin and the poignant sea-breeze. Martha's gray farm-house, neat and cool and spare as it was, looked chill and dreary in every square room and clean corner; the dairy smells of curd and cheese sickened her morbidly acute sense; the quiet of the inland pastures and hills stifled her like a shroud. She could not eat, or sleep, or work, and she did not know why, except that she was homesick; and she heartily welcomed the day fixed for her to go home, and wondered at herself when the sea-wind failed to revive her, and her own little cot to rest her aching limbs. But a day or two of increasing weakness and sleeplessness revealed the secret of Poll's restless manner and flushed cheek; in the steaming meadows of Ewefield, its thick river fogs, and deep black swamps, full of rotting vegetation, lurked the breath of malaria, and a violent fever had fastened upon Poll's unacclimated frame, and begun to waste and burn and destroy like an invading army. All Ruth's simples were tried in vain; and when the redoubtable Dr. Higgs, the "nateral bone-setter," who was also the sole physician of Punkintown, was summoned, he pronounced Poll to be "in a most vicarious condition—repugnant typhus, with a determinacy to digestion of the brain." Perhaps his skill was better than his language; for he had at least sense enough to forbid either bleeding or blistering, as old Abe alternately begged for one or the other, simply because the only sickness he ever had was allayed by both.

But at last Poll became so delirious, and the danger to her brain so great, that every bit of her splendid hair was shorn, and at last shaved off, and the redundant tresses laid away in a drawer, perhaps—as Ruth thought—to be all Sam should find when he came back from China.

Days and weeks passed away. November became December, and yet Poll wrestled with the death that impended over her; for though the fever was at length mastered and abated, she was left in a state of infantile weakness, and it required all Ruth's most faithful care to keep her in life. Her mind, too, seemed feeble as her body; she remembered nothing, cared for nothing, but took her food and tonics, and dozed away the days. But by the middle of January she began to brighten, to say a few weak words, though evidently Ruth and her father were her only memories; in her delirium she had raved about Sam and her red hair, regretted it, wept over it, and caressed it by turns, till even Adeline felt painful twinges of repentance for the pain she had given the poor child in times past. But now she never mentioned Sam's name, or alluded to her hair, and though there was a letter carefully laid away in Ruth's drawer waiting to be asked for, it seemed as if Poll had forgotten—but she only slept.

One warm day in February she sat up by her window, and her eye fell on the bare branches of the little rose-tree; something stirred in her brain, a moment's painful struggle to catch the fleeting thought: one moment of that exquisitely painful wandering and groping darkness that assails the weak will and the faded memory, and Poll remembered. Ruth saw the keen agony of look that pierced her vague eyes and died out, almost as quickly to renew its spark, the flushing and paling cheek, the tremulous lips, till those eyes brightened into certainty, and her cheek burned with a blush and a smile at once, and she spoke.

"Ruth," said she, "have you heard any thing from Sam?"

"Yes," said Ruth, quietly, stepping to her drawer for the letter, which she handed to Poll. Perhaps even you, refined and well-educated reader, may forgive its spelling and grammar if I venture to transcribe it over her shoulder:

At sea. August 17th

dear Poll

This is to say I am alive And well and Hoap you enjoy the saim blasing. we wayed Anker the first of June acord-ing to orders, and maid a Steddy run acrost the atlantick till we stood off Sow-east for the cape. I now rite in hops of a Vesel pasing bye I rite for to tell you agane How much I keep a strate Course in my mind for the Port where you be Poll. my deer I think of you evry Day and likewise when I keep Watch. I seem somehow to sight the old Cabbin, and the beach-gras a shinin' all round you, where you lay when I ketched you up. deer I am no grate fist at ritin, but I want for to hev you know that I aint One of that sort o' Craft that shifts their flaggs in knew Places. I be as trew to my bearin's as our figger-head and I allays rekollects your Bewtiful hare when I see the Risin Sun acrost the sea. So no more at Present from your loving frend to Command

SAM BENT

Tears of pleasure filled Poll's eyes as she read, but when she came to the last line a sudden paleness swept across her face. She put up her hand gropingly to her head—it was smooth and soft as a mouse-skin. "Ruth!" said she, eagerly, "where is it?"

Ruth had watched her, and answered as if to a more definite question—"We had to cut it off when you were so sick, Poll; you wouldn't have got well without."

Poll lay back in her chair, faint and sick. She said nothing at first; but the slow, hot tears rolled down her cheeks, and her wan face gathered a look of pain that was sad to see: the thought that smote her so bitterly was all of Sam; what would he say? Her hair, that was "the prettiest thing about her," that he thought of so far away, that he would want to see. How she must look! And with that came a strange desire to see herself. She sat up and asked Ruth to get her some tea. A little strata-gem only; for when she left the room Poll got up and tottered to the glass that hung by the window. Poor Poll! the spectacle was not pleasant. A thin white face, eyes bigger than ever, and the small head in that ugly transition from no hair, when any color of a coming crop seems only slaty gray from its extreme shortness. Poll turned away; she was altogether humiliated. Surely she might give up Sam now and forever, for the only attraction she had possessed was gone, and she was actually repulsive besides. She was too weak to be passionately disappointed, but she laid herself on the bed like a grieved and tired child and cried herself to sleep.

A vainer or a more selfish woman might have fretted and brooded over her trouble till the fever had returned with fatal consequences; but Poll was too absorbed in Sam and his future to give so much thought to her own. She wept bitterly for days over her loss—and his; but from the first accepted it as a fact that Sam could not love her when he came back, and tried earnestly to accustom herself to the belief. And she succeeded very well till it occurred to her one day that he would marry somebody else, perhaps Adeline, and then Poll found she had not sound-ed her trouble before: she could no more face that thought than she could the looking-glass, which she had never looked into from that day when she first saw herself. But the weeks did not stop to look at her or to pity Sam Bent.

Spring came stealing on with steady advance, and Poll's naturally tenacious constitution re-vived in the soft airs and breezes. Her best consolation was her old out-of-door haunts; and though she was now habitually sad and silent, she did not mope or cry—though Ruth wondered why she withdrew herself more and more from her housekeeping duties, and even remonstrated with her to no effect, except saddening her more deeply or bringing about a brief spasm of effort.

But Poll might have looked into the glass by the middle of May with good effect—the long fever had either renovated some torpid function of her skin, or the long confinement to the house softened and soothed its habitual inflammation: for now it was smooth and fair as a child's, and every breeze brought to it a light bloom like a wild-rose petal; her lips were reddened with healthy crimson, and her broad white brow had lost its burned and tanned look, for she had now to keep on her sun-bonnet, missing the heavy covering of her hair. Yet, to tell the truth, its loss was an embellishment, for her head was covered now with thick soft rings and curls of the richest chestnut, glossy as the new skin of that nut and fine as floss: nothing prettier could have crowned her forehead, and shaded so beautifully with her eyes of the same tint, a shade darker, but softened and deepened by suffering and emotion. There was nobody to tell Poll all this. Ruth was glad her red hair had gone; but she did not say so for fear of hurting her feelings, and old Abe did not understand any beauty but the type of sturdy figures, red cheeks, and black eyes—a type rather forced on his admiration by repetition, till now he preferred it from habit. Adeline had been gone since March to see Nancy at Madison, and nobody ever came to the hut whom Poll was willing to see now; so she kept by herself, and waited with sad patience for Sam's coming, that she might tell him what she expected and have it over with.

But one rarely does just what they mean to do beforehand; and the Flying Cloud was safe in New York without Poll's hearing of her arrival for two days, and Poll herself, sitting in her low chair reading, was "taken all aback," as her father said, one bright June morning, by the heavy "thud" of a box set down on the sill of the door, and the quick jump of a man over it.

"Why, Poll!" said Sam, after the first unresisted kissing was over, holding her off to look at her, "I shouldn't ha' known you!"

"No, I guess not!" said Poll, with quivering lips. "My hair is all gone, and—and Sam, I look so—I know—"

"Look so!" interrupted Sam; "I guess you do! why you've ben and got made over!"

"Oh, Sam, don't!" said she. Somehow it was harder to bear than she had expected, and the tears would come as she went on—"I know I am as humbly as a crab, but I sha'n't feel hard about you, Sam. I know you can't love me. I—I—" Here came a big sob.

"Jethunderation!" roared Sam, getting up his biggest expletive, "you humbly? You're handsomer 'n a picture this minnit; why Poll!"

"Sam!" said she, indignantly, "don't! Do you think I don't know?"

"Yes I do," said Sam. "Hold hard a bit!" With which little exhortation he put her down, and went to his chest. Out of its capacious interior he drew a great bundle, done up in folds of canvas, wads of cotton, and wrappings of Chinese paper, which at last peeled off under his clumsy fingers, and displayed the prettiest little dressing-case of black lacker, studded with gold flowers and butterflies—its four drawers surmounted by an oval mirror in a frame of the same material. Sam triumphantly hoisted the whole of the affair on the top of the bureau, and catching up Poll in his arms, held her up and asked her to look. Oh what a pretty vision was there! A fair, sweet face, with a deep glow on either cheek; its tender, panting mouth just parted over little snow-white teeth; its great brown eyes moist and bright with the tears they had but just shed; and a head wreathed with silky ringlets whose coils caught the light with a bronze lustre as lovely as rare: the blue check dress and white ruffle identified her.

"Why!" said Poll, with a little start.

"You mean to say that a'n't hansum?" triumphantly asked Sam.

"I didn't know I looked like that," was the naïve answer.

"Don't you never look in the glass?" returned he.

"I haven't since I was sick, but once," said Poll, dropping her head.

"Here's a reef!" said Sam, light beginning to dawn on his mind. "Well, I am some took aback myself. I don't think a poor sea-farin' man like me had oughter ask sech a three-decker to marry him! Poll, I b'lieve I must haul down my flag; I can't expect you to keer for me now."

Poll turned round and looked at him; there was no mistaking the sparkle of that deep gray eye. Poll dropped her head on his shoulder. She could hear the light laughter he had repressed now.

"Oh, Sam," said she, nestling still closer to his cheek, "I'm so glad!"

The black lacker dressing-case, somewhat worn and tarnished, stands now in the "spare chamber" of a tiny gray house at the foot of Squameag Light-house; for Ben Gould was drowned, and Sam got his situation. In the upper drawer of the pretty luxury a mass of red hair, long and wavy, is coiled away, and tied up with an Indian ribbon that smells of sandal-wood; but Poll Jennings's hair has grown again down to the hem of her dress, and its beautiful coil is as bright as ever, though no longer red. Sam offers to get a divorce, now and then, on account of his "humbliness;" but at the last advices his offer was not yet accepted—"on account of the children," Poll demurely says.

TOO SENSITIVE.

IN going through a street in Boston not long since, we heard one young woman say to another as we passed, "Ain't you too sensitive?" The young woman that spoke was healthy, strong, and handsome: the young woman spoken to was sickly, weak, and plain. The contrast was so striking that, though we walked at a rapid pace, it was by one glance stamped upon our mind. The words also deeply impressed us, set our brain to work, and kept us long a thinking. As we walked we mused. "And thus," we murmured to ourselves, "the powerful and the favored treat the complainings of the feeble and the unfavored: thus the successful listen to the grumbings of the disappointed and the unfortunate." The more we reflected the more import did the words yield us. We felt that there was much of human character revealed through them—for the spirit of these words is very common in the world.

We have no toleration for whining, and we have no pity for whiners. They are among the most tormenting of social pests. Affected sensibility is disgusting—morbidity is vexatious; but worst of all is the drawling dolefulness with which certain self-consecrated martyrs persecute any acquaintance who has patience and good-nature enough to listen to them. It is the hearer who is truly the real sufferer. These talkative afflicted ones have no mercy, no compassion; without consideration or remorse, they continue to the extremity of endurance their slow, wasting torture, and care nothing for their victim's pain; are insensible to his mute anguish; give no heed to his imploring looks, and no hearing to his stifled groans. We once heard a clergyman preach upon the duty of people bearing each other's burdens. We told him after service that it would be as well to preach another sermon on the duty of people bearing their own burdens. In this matter of bearing burdens there is seldom any reciprocity. The bearing is usually all on one side, and the supply of burdens all on the other. One person furnishes the load, and another person has to carry it. Such persons are entirely opposite in character and class. The martyr-side of ethics, as the most severe and the most repugnant to instinct, is naturally the side which moralists the most strenuously urge; but needful in general as this is, the urgency may be excessive and unreasonable. The constant exhortation is, "Care nothing for self; care every thing for others." "Think and work for the comfort and happiness of your brethren; but as to your own lot, be content, even joyful, with suffering and sacrifice."

These counsels are grand when they have real meaning, and when there is positive and actual demand for patient or heroic will and deed. But as they are ordinarily given they are void of positive or serious meaning. Mostly they are only rhetorical commonplaces; full of sound, void of substance. They too often, also, seem as void of sincerity as of substance. At least they seem void of the conditions which compel belief in the sincerity of those who are frequently the most eloquent in urging them. We could particularize this statement, with any number and variety of examples; but we wish to avoid the least seeming of unfairness, and we must leave our readers to verify it from their own experience, and in their own way. One remark may be safely risked: those who insist on the duty of self-denial often appear to be in situations very favorable to self-indulgence, and they do not at all seem out of harmony with their situations. They may be sincere; but their sincerity has no convincing evidence, and, justly or unjustly, it is suspected.

Withal, in actual life in western and modern civilization, this passive theory is always in a state of chronic contradiction. Putting out of view our acknowledged sins, a great deal of our most purely intended conduct is at variance with many of our universally accepted precepts. We say in words, "Bear ye one another's burdens;" but, in fact, many of us try as best we can that each man shall make another bear his burden. Yet, if this could be actually achieved, it would be simply to institute the worst conceivable order of slavery. The weakly good would become morally submissive to the strongly bad. The kindly industrious would be workers for the viciously idle. The generous would be the prey of the base; the prudent, the bankers of the prodigal; the affectionate, the providers for the hard-hearted; the independent of generous soul, the dupes of sharpers and the care-takers of the unworthy. So, to a great degree, it is; but we should not justify it by an illusive theory, to which our active life is a natural and perpetual opposition. What right have people to load others with their troubles? or what reasonable obligation is there on others to accept the load? Oh yes; duty demands it. Duty, forsooth! Why, the real, upright, worthy duty in most of such cases, is to refuse, to resent, and to resist. And this, not only as a vindication of freedom and personality on the one side, but as the best means of real benefit to the other. Ready compliance, unresisting submission, are good for neither, and commonly are the ruin of both. A young woman wears out and wastes her life in attending to the whims of a selfish mother, who fancies herself of fragile health, and by-and-by there are two old women instead of one. Had the daughter had the courage and the conscience to act as God and Nature prompted, some brave heart with her own would have been made blessed; a group of joyous lives might have clustered around them; and the mother, who had in her the stamina of old Parr, instead of being a querulous and cross-tempered hag, would have come to reverend and sunny age, surrounded by bright and happy faces. She would, long years ago, have forgotten her rheumatism, her asthma, the extreme delicacy of her nerves, her wonderful tenderness of stomach, and that deadly "worm i' the bud"—consumption—which kept gnawing at her lungs for three quarters of a century. A father tyrannizes over his children, rules them with arbitrary caprice, prevents his daughters from settlement in life, and his sons from education or advancement; the grace and beauty that might have adorned society are lost to it in obscurity, and manhood which might have added to the strength and glory of the state, has never been cultured or matured. These children submit, and are called "good;" but they would have been better had they acted out their own right and reasonable wills against the parental injustice of wrong and unreasonable fancies. In the same way a father often sacrifices himself and the rest of his family to some worthless son or daughter; or a kind brother does so for a vain and frivolous sister; or a loving sister does so for a scoundrel brother; and most frequently of all, a wife bears, with long-suffering patience, the evil inflicted on her by a cruel or unprincipled husband; or a husband comes to infamy and ruin by indulging the follies of a dissipated wife. Some of these victims get approval from a mawkish morality, and others of them get pity from a mawkish sympathy; and we know not which is the most offensive to honest and healthy feeling—the mawkish morality of the feeble sermon, or the mawkish sympathy of the trashy novel. In the romance of “Shirley” there is a grand and vigorous passage of eloquence, in which bold and independent Charlotte denounces in her own fearless and tranchant way this insincere moralism of caring nothing for one’s self, and caring all for others. The doctrine is loud-sounding, and like all loud-sound, it most belongs to hollow or windy instruments. The selfish vociferously preach it; only the unselfish silently practice it. But honest care for one’s self is often the best and truest care for others. Health and competence, depending largely on temperance and thrift, are essential conditions of usefulness and goodness in most of the relations and callings of life. Such care for one’s self is constantly a check on the idle or unruly self of others; it is at the same time resistance and example; it may convert or cure the reckless—at the worst it garners the means of helping them in their extremity. There is, moreover, an unselfish care for self, which is the wisdom of the noblest love and the sublime prudence of heroic spirits. It is the saving, the economy, the reserved fund of thoughtful and beneficent power. This sort of care for self has been in all great souls, in prophets, apostles, teachers, soldiers, even martyrs. The truly generous and the brave shrink from having others as sharers of their troubles; and they deem it to be both ungracious and unjust to tax them even with the pain of sympathy. This is right, most right; for surely it is very unworthy to take advantage of kindly sensibilities, and make them suffer that we may have the mean luxury of expression. The brave and generous man bears his own burden to the utmost, and wills not, if he can, that any one else shall feel its weight.

We are not, as we have said, tolerant of whining, and ours are not the ethics which give encouragement to unreasonable exaction, or teach the merit of unreasonable submission.

Still, we would not push our principles into a hard and unfeeling stoicism. This would be as unnatural as it would be unchristian. As it is not in nature to be in ourselves insensible to the pains and griefs of life, it would be most selfish and unchristian to withhold sympathy from them in the case of others. If there may be unjust demand, so, too, there can be uncharitable refusal. There are instances manifold in which the sufferer bears the stinging arrow in the heart, but never puts sorrow into words, or tells any one of the hidden anguish. What a long, fearful, unsuspected martyrdom was that of Caroline, queen of George the Second! With a fatal cancer for years eating away her life, she had to amuse a brutal husband, help to do the real government of the empire, preside at Court, be graceful and easy in pageantry and ceremonial, when, possibly, torture almost to madness was concealed; and she would talk learnedly with scholars and philosophers, and in victory over pain be truly grander than they in their highest speculations.

Examples may also be in which the source of a troubled or disordered life is hidden from the victim himself. He is censured as eccentric, unsteady, or immoral—as wasteful, improvident, prodigal: if he is capable of reflection, he admits the accusation, and is miserable without being repentant; if not reflective, he runs his career, and at last the secret is revealed—which he or others had never suspected—some inscrutable disease, that as a poisoned fountain effused its morbidness through will, thought, desire, and deed. We read not long since of such a case in a letter from Spiridion—the Parisian correspondent of the Boston Traveller. He pathetically relates the life and death of Supersac—a young litterateur about town, and the type of a special class in Paris. Lodging usually in garrets; working hard at times, they live irregularly and die prematurely—well educated, well mannered, well dressed—to-day in want, to-morrow in luxury—elegant, witty, and gay, until the dark hour comes, of destiny or despair. Such it seems has been the story of not a few brilliant men of letters in Paris: a short life—a taxed and excited mind—alternations of mirth and moodiness; soon, failing resources, sickness without solace, and frequently, at last, death in the hospital. Supersac was a very decided member of this class, both in his life and death. What money he obtained by his writings or a small Government office that he held, he spent loosely. “But it must be said to his honor,” observes the writer, “and to his acuteness of observation, that he never borrowed money of his companions: he knew that nothing so ruined a man here as to borrow money. He bore his privations without an audible groan. He asked no one’s sympathy. He appealed to nobody’s kindness—all which is the wisdom of living in Paris. Laugh with the laughers, weep with the weepers, feast with the feasters, dress as well as any body, suit your face to the faces around you, and if the fox hid under garments doth gnaw your vitals, let him gnaw them; but take care to let no one suspect he is beneath that raiment cut in the latest fashion, or dream he is preying on your vitals.” And so, after a while, Supersac came to the hospital to die. “The disease of which he died,” says the writer, “was significant enough: it shows how ravenous was the fox which he hid in his breast: ’twas cancer in the brain.”

But the most heroic and the most self-enduring will sometimes, as by force, let some involuntary sighs escape them. Sad and bitter thoughts will come to those who walk on shady side of life, and when fancying they are alone they will sometimes groan aloud: if those walking on the sunny side of life should perchance hear the groan, let them not conclude the nature from which it bursts cowardly or weak. Who can tell how long and how desperate has been the struggle before the heart succumbs? If at last it bends, and even weeps, it may be but to obtain strength to renew the battle, and to gain the victory. And if in confidence it puts its troubles into words, the ear of friendship should not listen to them coldly. Take the case from which we started in these meditations. One girl was full of health—had strength and beauty. If her lot was fair, she was, no doubt, more than contented. She was hopeful, more than cheerful. She was joyous. She had society, pleasure, admiration, love. Life was pleasant, and all her feelings were glad: nature, if not understood in its suggestiveness or poetry, was yet agreeable in all its impressions on the senses—night brought wholesome rest, day had no lagging length in the weary consciousness of time, and the seasons of the year succeeded like the changing measures of a song. How could she understand the restless pining, the lonely, the undefinable sadness, the visionary longings, the hopeless fancies, of a life the opposite of her own? Why should she? Why indeed should it be expected that she could, or why should it be expected or desired? All that she had her companion wanted. It was no wonder if the living world seemed dull to that companion, and the natural world dark, and existence itself a slow and toilsome journey. We are not in these suppositions taking into account religious influences, which so powerfully modify life; for it is our object in this paper to analyze simply natural experiences. It is within such limits that we view the present and other contrasts. The weaker companion here could obtain no sympathy from the stronger—not because the stronger was ungentle or unloving, but because she could not understand the weaker. The weaker spoke an unknown language to her. The stronger had no inward interpretation for the spoken words. The living meaning of such words she had yet to learn, when trial would bring experience, and experience, knowledge. Now, however, she could only answer to her sister's murmur with, "Ain't you too sensitive?" Too sensitive! Perhaps this was the first time she had ever ventured to speak of that within her which was long a hidden pain, and which she had bravely and carefully kept to herself—and now thrown back again upon solitude and silence, she will hold her secret closely, and bear it safely to the grave.

This one illustration will stand for a large variety of other trials and experiences, which it would be useless or tiresome to bring forward separately and singly. We have given the spirit and the principle, and any one can test or verify them by examples every day, and in every circle.

Our idea—that is, our indifference to troubles which we do not feel or can not feel—may be illustrated by experiences in our more outward life. There is no hard-heartedness in the matter. We may wish to give sympathy—nay, we try to give it—and to the degree that we grasp a common sentiment with the sufferer we do give it. As far as community of feeling can carry us we go; but when that can not carry us farther, we must stop. So far as we feel we can understand, and so far as we can understand we sympathize; into the peculiar and individual we can not enter: within that there is a mystery to which we can not pierce, and for which our personal consciousness has neither type nor counterpart. If it be a great affliction, our common humanity has always the resource of pity, and we can often help where we can not understand. It is not, however, in great affliction alone that we may fail in the ability to understand others in their troubles, but also in what are considered very minor ones; perhaps, indeed, our difficulty becomes greater as such troubles become less. Our friend complains, for instance, that he has not his just place in society. He either has not the proper station allotted to him, or the station he occupies is not sufficiently respected; or, whatever be his station, he is not, as he thinks, duly recognized. We either have all the station that society can give, or we have all the station that we covet, or we are indifferent about station. In any of these cases we are not in the position to understand our friend. We have all that we can have; we can not therefore tell how we should feel if we had not. Or we have all that we desire, and so we can not imagine what would be our state of mind if we had less. Or we are indifferent to all station; we can not then tell how it would be with us if we were anxious about station. If we can not understand what our own consciousness would be as a hypothesis, how much less can we understand that of our friend as a fact; and to any arguments we urge, he can turn against us all these objections. If we tell him that outward position is mere appearance—inward worth and wisdom alone true reality—he may deny this statement. Outward position is reality—at least, it represents reality. If the individual nobleman is a fool, some one had the talent, the courage, or the cunning which procured for him his title. Even for the fool position is an advantage, and it has even for him a real influence. But, further, outward position is reality as the exponent constantly of talent, character, and successful activity. And, lastly, outward position is reality not only as a social power, but as an incitement, as an intensive force, as an authority, as a means of fixing public attention, and even as a means of moral impression. The desire for position arouses mental energy, improves the common mind, and glorifies the great. It becomes a centralizing influence to faculty and activity, and gives to endeavor direction, purpose, persistency, and end. It stamps on what a man does a certain sanction which enlarges the individual to the magnitude of collective numbers, and confers on his words the grandeur of the nation or the sovereignty of the state. Suppose that Demosthenes uttered the same words to the workmen in his sword-factory that he did in the courts, the council, or the assembly; would they seem the same words to these workmen themselves as they heard in the public orations? Suppose an obscure man could think like Burke, feel like Fox, or speak like Chatham; would he ever so think, feel, or speak in obscurity? or, if he did, who would recognize it, or who would mind it? It may be said that such men would force themselves into station. This has nothing to do with the supposition—it does not weaken, but strengthen the argument; for it shows that power seeks position. It goes still further: it implies that position is a necessary element in the action of power. An ordinary man in public station has a value given even to commonplace words that eloquence itself can not obtain or genius win in more retired situations. Every Sunday there is nobler and finer speech in scores of pulpits throughout Christendom than some of the most brilliant men pronounce in senates, yet not one preacher in a thousand rises to the fame of an orator. Is it, then, that eloquence is one thing in the pulpit and another in the senate? No. What, then, is the difference? The difference of position. The preacher speaks to a congregation, the senator speaks to nations; and for one orator in the senate there are thousands in the pulpit. And it is the same with moral influence. The peasant of worth and wisdom is not less elevated than the celebrated sage or worker; but the peasant's elevation is only dimly seen even by his family and his neighborhood—that of the celebrated sage or worker lasts during time, and is seen and known of all the world. It is therefore to no purpose that we argue; we do not reach our friend's case. He may be feeble as well as ambitious; but if we say to him, "Ain't you too sensitive?" we may but prick the sorest spot of his infirmity, and irritate when we mean to soothe.

Men also become morbid as to what they consider the measure of their own merit. No doubt there are often judgments that are extremely false and painfully unjust; and if the ill-treated are indignant and complain, it is often from a righteous truthfulness, and not from egotism or envy, vanity and moroseness. The mature veteran sees a youth sent to command him; the gray-haired curate finds in his old age the parish which he has faithfully served for half a century sold to a sporting parson, or given to the bishop's son-in-law; the bold and honest politician, true to his constituents and loyal to his country, sees that for his independence he is excluded from office, and for his integrity fails of re-election, while the worthless rise to power, and unprincipled praters win the popular suffrage; the diligent, skillful, and faithful manager of a mercantile firm, who has been the architect of its wealth and greatness, who has thrown his life into its capital, sees that year after year he remains a servant, with no chance of rising to the dignity of a partner, while the place that he has severely earned is bestowed on some idler with full purse and empty pate; superannuated and worn-out, he is dismissed upon a paltry pension. If these, and such like in every department of life, complain, we must not blame them, nor meet them with the cold inquiry, "Ain't you too sensitive?" for their sensitiveness is a part of their virtue. Yet it will be equally in vain to say it to the foolish, who imagine that others judge them falsely, because they do not rightly judge themselves. They have one standard of their own merit, those outside have another. It will be useless to try to reconcile these standards—not only different but opposite. They are contradictory which not even Hegel could harmonize. The subjective idea of their deserving in their own minds and the objective idea of it in the minds of others are, necessarily, repulsive, each of each; if any one can harmonize them, he has brought into union the subjective and the objective in a most difficult example, and solved what has been hitherto regarded by sober thinkers as the most impossible problem of metaphysics.

If, therefore, a man comes to you and tells you that his article has not been accepted by this Magazine, or that his book has been most unmercifully cut up by that Review, do not say to him, "Ain't you too sensitive?" but say to him, cordially and kindly, "My dear fellow, take care of your nervous system, and strengthen your digestion." If a friend of yours makes a bad speech and has the grace to repent it, do not prostrate him, but deepen his repentance. If the stuff is in him, he will get up again and startle those who mocked him. "Try again"—"Try again," is the maxim of all manly energy; and if one fails at last, and his efforts have been wise, his loss, in the long-run, becomes gain to others. So, if a military commander, on technical reasons, tells you why his profound strategy should have been annihilation to the enemy, but you see that the enemy is alive and kicking, forbear, wait, think—abide the issue, but do not dogmatize or prophesy. If a man descants to you on his wonderful financial sagacity, who has yet always been in a state of chronic failure, listen to him patiently, but do not lend him your money.

Still, there are always in the world men who merit success and do not gain it. They are either in advance of their time, or in some way they do not understand it, and so the time does not feel them, or soon forgets them. Say not, then, to the thinker—the writer—the singer—the worker—the enthusiast, whose genius is divinely ardent for liberty and goodness, righteousness and liberty—say not to him when he is sad, downcast, and disappointed, "Ain't you too sensitive?"

We have a few reflections to make, and then we close. One is, the absurd way in which the doctrine of compensation is generally presented. As a person hears it commonly stated, it would almost seem to be a misfortune to be handsome, stout, and healthy; to be well-born, rich, and educated. Now this is all nonsense. It is true, indeed, that in comparison with a living soul all the material universe is as nothing; that in comparison with an immortal soul all human history is but a dream; but relatively to this world, and to the present life, the good numbers in the lottery of nature are not without a marked and desirable value. To be handsome is not to be foolish: on the contrary, good-nature and a handsome face are almost a guarantee for kindly views of the world and generous conduct in its affairs, or for domestic grace and sweetness. To be stout and healthy is, in ordinary circumstances, to be also frank and brave; and if the stalwart are otherwise they meet with infamy and disgrace. The pity which is given to the petulance and irritation of the feeble is a natural penalty and a moral humiliation. To be well-born, physically or socially, is an advantage which only the most shallow or the most vulgar mind will underrate. To be rich is not to be vicious or licentious, but to have a safe-guard from most of the basest temptations, and to have in one's power an instrument of the most beneficent virtues. We, the writer, have to do the best we can with poverty; but we do most conscientiously believe we should have done wonderfully better with riches. We should have been more good-natured, good-humored, in every way more agreeable. With one half of what old Astor said a man might be well-off on, we should not be the cynic that we are; the milk in us of human kindness would not have soured; we would not have scolded our wife, or snubbed our children, or cut our friends—we would have been brightly placid as the summer lake, mildly shining as the moonlit hill; we would have been affectionate to dunces, and smiled at all creation. Despite of all the praises which the struggling, the disappointed, or the satiated lavish on the blessings of mediocrity or indigence, we sincerely believe that more truth, goodness, and all the graces and charities that make life beautiful are to be found among the wealthy than among the destitute. Ordinary virtue among the destitute is HEROISM; among the wealthy it is a matter of course.

Still more absurd are the usual forms of giving consolation or offering assistance. Sometimes the manner of doing this wounds more bitterly than the actual affliction. A feeble man was passing along a city street from a railroad station, carrying a traveling-bag which seemed to fatigue him. A stalwart fellow came beside him. "Let me carry that," said Hercules. "No, thank you," said Doddikins. "You'd better," insisted Hercules; "for you're nothing but a cripple." Now you observe that unhappy phrase, "You're nothing but a cripple," crushed a world of gratitude bubbling up in the breast of Doddikins, and for the moment blunted him to the generous good-nature in the heart of Hercules. To be gracious, and to hit the almost invisible point between grief and apathy, is the rare art which few possess of giving consolation. When affliction is present, according to Sterne, consolation is too soon; when affliction is past, it is too late: there is a space which you must hit between them both as fine as a razor's edge. But those who seem to need consolation are often as unreasonably obstinate as their comforters are awkwardly absurd. The brother of a clergyman had been prostrated by a severe domestic bereavement. The clergyman exhausted all the common topics of consolation. The afflicted man listened with dumb attention, and then at last gasped out: "Brother, I have thought on some of these things." A rough man of the world was trying to comfort a widow on the death of her husband. He exhausted all his commonplaces, and found that he had made no impression. At length, vexed and disappointed, he exclaimed: "Well, dash it, Madam! what's to be done about it?"

There are griefs that will not speak—there are griefs that can not speak—and why not leave them to the sanctity of their silence? Why obtrude on them the outward forms of even religious consolation? They are awfully holy in themselves, and the soul must endure them in its solemn solitude with God. To insult such sorrows with words, however sacred, seems to us a sort of pious profanity. Those of the olden faith, who saw in all their life the immediate action of divine power, did not mouth or mumble phrases; but while their hearts were torn, simply said—"It is the Lord: let him do what seemeth him good." They then put sackcloth on their bodies, and ashes on their heads, and bent themselves in silence to the ground: those who came to condole with them lay as they did, prostrate in the dust, and did not add to their calamity by mockery of words. Were any peculiar misfortune to befall ourselves, so much do we know of the pain it would cost to friends not to be able to feel it in the measure or degree that we should, that we would at once write to them to be at ease—to be natural. They could not have the secret of our woe. We would not wish them to have it. It is worse than cruel to put them on the rack of trying to feel what, outside of the individual, it is not in the power of humanity to comprehend or to communicate. We would at once relieve them from this great torture. We would tell them to live, as they had lived, their daily life; to do as they had done, their daily work; and enjoy as they had enjoyed, what God and nature gave them. Then might we honestly stay alone with our own heart and heaven.

Let no reader mistake our doctrine. We preach no selfish isolation. We simply maintain that there are all through life certain conditions of experience, which only similar conditions of experience can interpret; and that this interpretation is essential to any real and inward sympathy. But the want of this mind-sympathy or heart-sympathy is no barrier to any of the great charities or duties of life. We have always enough in common to secure these, and no peculiarities of individual trial change or multiply them. But as to such trial as is strictly individual, silence is most honorable wisdom; self-reliance and self-endurance, the most generous heroism. Let each, in meek and magnanimous spirit, bear the pain, which others can not share or help, within himself: and no man that respects his own personal or moral individuality will babble of his inward sufferings, whether retributive or blameless, and grieve or humiliate his friends by exacting the task-work from them of talking sympathy—which at the most can only be conventional and verbal. Generous reticence on one side—kind reserve on the other. This is what, on both sides, is sincere, just, and true; true to nature, true to honesty, true to the best goodness, and to the purest sanctities of human life.

EDWIN OF DEIRA.

BY ALEXANDER SMITH.

BOOK I.

WITH hasty rein from off the bloody field Prince Edwin with a score of followers fled Toward King Redwald's border—thither drawn By hope, which was twin-brother to despair— The grey King Redwald, though to him unknown, Long time his father's friend, who ruled a land In peace beyond the vapor-burdened hills. But Ethelbert upon the fliers swooped Like peregrine on pigeons, striking down And scattering. Edwin 'scaped, but 'scaped as one Wet-fetlocked from the Morecambe tide, that brings Sea-silence in an hour to wide-spread sands Loud with pack-horses, and the crack of whips. And on the way the steed of steeds beloved Burst noble heart and fell; and with a pang Keener than that which oftentimes is felt By human death-beds, Edwin left the corse To draw the unseen raven from the sky; Then fearful lest the villages of men Might babble of his steps to Ethelbert, Certain to sweep that way with clouds of horse, He sought rude wastes and heathy wildernesses Through which the stagnant streams crept black and sour.

Once, coming on a string of traffickers, With laden mules bound for a town, he hid Within the hollow of a ruined oak Till the blue evening steaming from the ground Made the star wink; then, signaled by the owl, He from his hiding stole. When earth was red With set of sun he passed into the land Of reed and fen, by many a wing be-clanged, And all the night he journeyed, while o'erhead The windy heaven streamed from east to west, And dim in vapor, keen in azure gulfs, The feverish stars pressed forward to their bournes. Midnighted thrice in wilderness he saw The far-meandering lake beneath the moon, Flicker in silver round a woody isle— The lake he oft had heard of. And he knew Another day would bring him to the Court Of the grey King who for his father's sake Would shelter him in this his sore distress.

Next morning, from the sandy hills he saw The bare blue desert of the sea flow out In glittering wrinkles 'neath a cloudy dawn; And when the sun burned through the mists, and grew

A mass of blinding splendor that out-rayed, He dipped into the valleys. On through woods, And roadless meads he passed, till at the hour When fiercest is the light, he weary came To a ravine that broke down from the hill With many a tumbled crag: a streamlet leapt From stony shelf to shelf: the rocks were touched By purple foxgloves, plumed by many a fern;

And all the soft green bottom of the gorge Was strewn with hermit stones that sideways leaned, Smooth-cheek'd with emerald moss. Here Edwin paused

To quench his thirst, and rising, was aware Of a gay youth that slid from off a rock With cordial greeting and toward him came: Slender as any girl: the golden hair, That plenteously unto his shoulders hung, Divided, gave to view a happy face Pure red and white as apple bloom on bough. He was a page, he said, at Redwald's Court, And going thither. "Thither go I, too," Quoth Edwin; "and have traveled since the morn. If it mislikes thee not, companionship, Poor as mine own, may kill a weary mile." So without farther parley on they went— One blithe in spirit, and as gaily dight As goldfinch swinging on a thistle top; The other sad of brow, and in attire As homely as the sparrow that has chirped Its whole life long upon a smoky thatch. And as they walked, the stranger full of life, Grew garrulous on Redwald and his sons. To him the Prince gave eager ear, though oft The kingliness behind the cloud put out A ray that dazzled, to be swift withdrawn. "Redwald," he said, "was grey and sad of blood. A man that, rooted in a bitter past, Drew sap enough to keep the trunk alive, But not enough to make the foliage green. His seven sons, hound-footed, falcon-eyed, The maddest men for hunting, who could rest No more than could the winds." And then his speech

Brightened like water round a sunbeam. "Ah, The Court is richest in a maid that comes Like silence after hoof and bugle-blare; Who owns the whitest hand, the sweetest cheek Air touches, sunlight sees. And Time, like one Who in the task delights, with every grace And glow is dressing her, so that to-day Shames yesterday, to-morrow shames to-day." From this height soon he fell and 'gan rehearse The petty spites and scandals of the Court: How the King's frown had dimmed the warrior's arms,

How the proud lady scorned the faithful knight, How all that day the forests would be loud With hound and horn, how 'twas the King's intent That night to give a feast to all his lords, Himself upon the dais. As Edwin winced, The page turned smiling. "See, my tongue runs on Of court and courtier, princess, prince, and king, Unmindful of thy business! Let me know. Perchance in me resides some little power To gain thee audience of a mighty lord,

Though in the stirrup were his hasty foot—
 Glad should I be." In strange sort Edwin smiled.
 "What trade have such as I with mighty lords?
 'Tis with King Redwald that my business lies.
 A king is like the unexpecting sun
 That shines on all alike." Discoursing thus
 They entered on a broad and public way
 Whereon were travelers and lively stir,
 And now a maid and now a knight went past
 With light upon his armor; and at length,
 The while the press was growing more and more,
 They came upon the palace, vast in shade
 Against the sunset. Noisy was the place
 With train and retinue, and the cumbrous pomps
 The feasters left without. The steeds were staked
 Upon the sward, and from the gates the folk,
 Busy as bees at entrance of a hive,
 Swarmed in and out. Men lay upon the grass,
 Men leaned with folded arms against the walls,
 Men dined with eager hands and covetous eyes;
 Men sat on grass with hauberk, greave and helm
 And great bright sword, and as they sat they sang
 The prowess of their masters deep in feast,—
 How foremost in the chase he speared the boar,
 How through the terrible battle press he rode,
 Death following like a squire. Prince Edwin paused:

On his companion's shoulder laid his hand
 With something like affection. "Here we part;
 Thanks for thy courtesy. If I regain
 That which my father on his death-bed left,
 This day thou wilt remember. Fare thee well."
 Thereat the page into the palace went:
 But Edwin sat without till darkness came,
 And dicers all had vanished; then he rose
 And, entering, claimed an audience of the King,
 For his was instant business, life and death.
 The seneschals swift bustled to and fro
 Regardless; but at last it reached the King
 That the waste dark had given up a man
 That sought his face and would not be denied:
 Then at his wish, the haggard Prince was led
 To the great hall wherein was set the feast;
 And at his step, from out the smoky glare
 And gloom of guttering torches, weeping pitch,
 A hundred bearded faces were upraised,
 Flaming with mead: and from their master's stools
 Great dogs upstarting snarled; and from the dais,
 The King, while wonder raised the eyebrow, asked What man he was? what business brought him there?

When Edwin thus, the target of all eyes:

"One who has brothered with the ghostly oats,
 That skim the twilight on their leathern wings,
 And with the rooks that caw in airy towns;
 One intimate with misery: who has known
 The fiend that in the hind's pinched entrail sits Devising treason, and the death of kings—
 Famine the evil-visaged—that once faced,
 There is no terror left to scare a man.
 Though my associates are the horrible shapes
 That press on dying eyes in wildernesses
 Where they must stare unclosed, this hand I stretch
 Is native to the sceptre, knows its touch
 Familiarly as thine. Though hunted like
 Some noisome beast, that when it steals abroad
 The cry spreads, and the village rises up
 With sticks and stones to kill it, I have seen,
 When I but oped my mouth, men look as if
 It thundered in the air."

As from a crag
 That rises sheer from out the fresh-blown surge,
 Upsprings a smoke of sea-fowl, puff on puff,
 Until the air is dark with countless wings
 And deaf with plummy clangor, from the feast
 Broke laughter. When it ceased, the smiling King
 With the intruder played. "Whence comest thou?
 What king art thou? where doth thy kingdom lie?
 In earth or air? and if indeed a king,
 Though ne'er stood king in such unkingly plight,
 Why hast thou been so strangely companied
 By midnight and the owls?"

Then Edwin cried—
 "O list fell hunger and the mountain wind
 To the loud bruit of fed prosperity,
 That never can be neighbored with distress!
 No height so high, but you can fall from it.
 Earth counts ten graves for every living man;
 A single scroll contains our victories,
 But 'tis a dreary volume, that the names
 Of our defeats o'erflow. I was a king,
 Have been destroyed in battle, lost my home,
 Have fed on berries like the moorland birds;
 Have drunk the stream that tameless creatures drink—

Slept where I could. Thou ask'st me who I am?
 From whence I come? From Deira do I come.
 I am that Egbert's son who loved thee well.
 Oft thou and he were tenants of one crib—
 Two growing apples reddening cheek to cheek
 Upon the self-same bough—two pebbles glazed
 By the same wavelet's hand. In Egbert's name—
 Egbert these twenty years in earth—his son Claims shelter from thee."

When he ceased, and when
 A murmur grew among the guests, wherein Doubt with assurance clashed, the King arose,
 A sudden flash of color on his face,
 Of which, if half was pleasure, half was shame,
 And in the seeing of the spacious hall
 Stepped down, took Edwin in his arms, while speech
 Came like a hurrying brook that overlays
 Eddy with eddy, watery swirl with swirl.
 "Something of this I heard, as one immersed
 In boundless woods, the falling of a tree:
 Who hears a sound, but can not tell from whence,
 Nor whether nibbling centuries of time
 Or woodman's axe hath sapped it. 'Twas thy fall!
 'Twas thy name rumor babbled indistinct!
 And thou art come unto thy father's friend
 For shelter! Thou shalt have it. Would that thou

Hadst asked for something costlier. So disguised!
 So covered up!—but never murky cloud
 Let slip so fair a sun! 'Tis Fortune's trick
 To muffle up her gifts in dusky hulls,
 That, when they throw their mantles off, surprise
 May richness over-double. Egbert's child
 Nay, his own self returned again to run
 A large career of noble deeds, and reap
 An aftermath of fame. It is a sight
 To make me young again! While I peruse
 The lips, the nose, the color of the curls,
 The build of brow, the contour of the cheek,
 The wild-hawk eye, and when, as now, thou smil'st,
 The face's sunbeam—all this melts away,
 And through the cloudiness of forty years
 I see thy father and myself, when we,
 Like twin lambs, raced across the meads of youth,
 Happy as lambs, and innocent as they—

While our young lives were bright as silks uncreased,

Or daggers newly gilt; the careless days
When life was May and full of singing birds;
Before that we had seen or kissed our wives;
Ere thou, young sir, wert thought of. Welcome here!

Although it were the son of my own loins
Long absent from these eyes, I could not grace
His coming with a single smile beyond
These now I give thee. Welcome, yet again!
But now have meats and drinks: the moorland fruits

And streams I thank, for hunger will enrich
This my poor table more than cups of gold.
Sit here beside me, 'twixt me and my sons—
Nay, as thou art. At bed-time, doff these weeds.
Thou art a new found jewel, and to-morrow
We'll have thee richly set."

Then Edwin stepped

Across the dogs that lay upon the floor,
With drowsy muzzles on their outstretched paws—
Oft starting into voice as if they chased
And bayed the boar in dream, and took his seat
On the right hand of Redwald, 'mong his sons,
A kingdom's strength upon a battle day.
The lordliest game of forest and of hill
Made that board paradise, within whose smell
The phoenix appetite divinely died
Into a rarer life. Sheep, steer, and boar,
And stags that on the mountain took the dawn
High o'er the rising splendors of the mists,
Were plenteously there. All fowls that pierce
In wedge or caravan the lonely sky,
At winter's sleety whistle, heaped the feast;
With herons kept for kings, and swans that float
Like water-lilies on the glassy mere.
Nor these alone. All fish of glorious scale,
The fruits of English woods, and honey pure
Slow oozing from its labyrinthine cells,
And spacious horns of mead—the blessed mead
That can unpack the laden heart of care—
That climbs a heated reveler to the brain,
And sits there singing songs. And seated high,
'Mid torches' glare and glimmer, minstrels sang
Mailed gods of war, grim giants, kings who walked
In the grey dawn and morning light of time Statured like towers; kings whose huge bulks of bone

Unmouldered, yet are seen in twilight caves,
Like some old galley with its sea-worn ribs
Half-sunk in ancient sands. And, while they sang
Of blazoned banners streaming on the wind,
Of arrows splintering on the brazen breast,
Swords red from point to hilt; of trumpets blown,
Shred armor, floundering horses, cries of men,
The light of battle burned in every eye,
Shouts burst from bearded lips be-drenched with mead,

Swords and cuirasses rusting on the wall
Clattered as life were in them. So the feast,
Led by the minstrels' scaling voice, and hand
In fury 'mong the harpstrings, roared, till dawn,
Let through a loophole, fell on torches burned,
The upset goblets of the deep debauch,
Lords tumbled on the rushes.

But long ere that

The King, with Edwin and his seven sons,
Left the fierce feasters maddening with the song.
A spacious chamber facing to the east

Was Edwin's, who threw down his weary length,
And, like a fallen column, slept till morn.
Then touched by earliest beam, he waking, stared
With a blank eyeball, troubled as a man
Who dies in sleep and wakes in another world.
The chamber broke upon him weird and strange—
He knew not what had been, or where he was—
Till, like the lightning come and gone at once,
Swift memory supplied the missing link
And knit him with himself. He rose at last,
Unbreathed on by the cold ungracious air
That lives in waste and wilderness, and saw
A pile of raiment in the chamber, heaped
In fold and golden crease. Enclathed, he shone
Like some gay kingfisher whose flight illumines
A river's sandy bank. His rich cap lay Upon the rushes when the King came in,
With a "good morrow" in his face and eye.
Well pleased, he laughed, "So, so, the grub has cracked

To a rare butterfly! Did'st rest as well
When thou wert ligg'g'neath the round-eyed owl,
And heard him scold his brethren of the waste?
Come with me to the lads, for they at noon
Will fly their falcons, and the sport will be
The gayer for thy presence." Then he led,
Through a long passage, toward a noise of dogs
That ever nearer grew, and entered straight
A mighty chamber hung with horn and head;
Its floor bestrewn with arrows, as if War
Grown weary of his trade, had there disrobed
And thrown his quiver down. And in the midst
The brothers stood in hunting gear, and stroked
Great brindled dogs, that leapt about their knees,
And talked of them the while, and called to mind
How this one charged the lowering mountain bull,
What time he stood affronted in the glade
And the spurned earth flew round him in his rage:
How the boar's tusk made that one yelp and limp
The day he came upon him in the brake.
"Lads," quoth the King, still holding Edwin's hand,
"I've brought a fair companion for your sport.
Strive which can bend the stiffest bow, which train
The swiftest hound, the highest towering hawk."
While welcome danced within their cordial eyes,
While one by one they grasped the Prince's hand,
And while the dogs, suspicious, sniffed his heel,
And while an eager babble broke of hawk
And steed and hound, and arrow-head and spear,
In at the door a moment peeped a girl,
Fair as a rose-tree growing thwart a gap
Of ruin, seen against the blue when one
Is dipped in dungeon gloom; and Redwald called.
And at the call she through the chamber came,
And laid a golden head and blushing cheek
Against his breast. He clasped his withered hands
Fondly upon her head, and bent it back,
As one might bend a downward-looking flower
To make its perfect beauty visible,
Then kissed her mouth and cheek. "My little one,
A morsel to these lion whelps of mine,
Yet pearl to pebble, precious gold to iron,
There came last night a stranger to our Court,
Who brought with him a face from out the grave,
And with an ancient friendship warmed my heart.
He stands in centre of thy brethren there Worthy thy dearest greeting." As she turned (Half-breaking from the arms that softly held)
A happy blushing face, with yellow hair
And sweet eyes azure as the flaxen flower,
The dim air brightened round her, and her voice
Brake into silvery welcome, then so stopped

That its surcease was to the ear what light
Withdrawn is to the eye. The Prince, through all
The hurry of his pulse, returned her grace
In ceremonious phrases—stately set,
Cold in themselves, yet tinged as by a dawn
Of coming passion—when the King broke in,
Words that a kiss foreran, "Now go, my girl;
Thou shouldst be very fair; thy coming stole
Thy mother from me. After last night's bout,
Day will be grateful to our heated brows.
Our guests have gone, a fiery throat with each
That will no more let stream go by unlapped
Than thirsty dogs in July. Whilst we go,
Thou canst the story of thy wrongs relate,
And then rejoin the lads." So, with these words,
Redwald led Edwin forth.

And while they walked
Toward the rookery, the Prince rehearsed
How Ethelbert, tolled on by plunder's bell,
Wasted his borders for these many years;
How when, a month ago, the routing boar
Pierced to his kingdom's heart, in haste he hid
His mother, with the women and their broods,
Within the secret places of the hills,
And raised a host; and how, one summer's day,
His squadrons dashed upon the iron foe
Effectless as the rainy flaws that smoke
On precipices that o'er-frown the vale;
And how, at a most dismal set of sun,
He saw his files lie on the bloody field
Like swathes of grass, and knew that all was lost;
And how, when the pursuit grew fierce and fell,
A hut he entered, blazoned like a king,
And issued thence a peasant; how he fled
For days and nights toward his father's friend,
Till, as he knew, last night, a famished man
He burst upon the feast. At this he dashed
Fierce tears aside, that broke upon a cheek
Stormily crimson, as the light that burns
Upon the bellied wry-necked thunder-cloud,
Rearing itself from out the inky east
Against the spokes of sunset, and he cried,

"Though earth and heaven both had knit their hands

To grant my wishes, I would only ask
To be once more before him host to host!
Ye iron destinies that rule the world
From injury preserve him till that day!
From knife, disease, and heaven's snaky fire
That licks up life like water, keep him free!
For every limb of that same Ethelbert
Is dearer unto me than to his Queen;
She never pined for him in all her love,
Or cursed the hours that kept them separate,
As I do in my hate. O, I could kill him
Fondly as e'er she kissed him! King, my realm
Is sorrow and the memory of wrong;
My courtiers are the ghosts of happiness.
Yet unmixed evil lives not. Fallen low,
I see a new proportion in the world,
And hear another murmur of events.
Although the wafture of its muffled vans
Be noiseless as the downy owl's flight,
I hear thy coming ruin climb the wind.
In me as in a mirror see thyself.
Fear this, wild Ethelbert. 'Tis not my cause
Alone I plead, but every prince's cause.
This man would break down all our diadems,
And with the gold and jewels build his own.
He has a stomach for us all. Nor think

In him ambition is a phantasy
Of idleness engendered, and as frail
As stream of summer vapor, which the crag
Tears with its horns, the sunlight can drink up.
For years within his dark and constant mind
The monstrous thing has grown. No hand but Death's

Can root it out. 'Tis like a poisonous tree
For ages anchored in a castle wall, Whose gnarled and fingery roots so clutch the stones,
That, plucked up, all is ruin. Well, what then?
Better the arrow stayed upon the string
Than shivered on the breastplate."

Edwin's words
Came like a mountain torrent swollen with rain
Adown a long ravine of cataracts,
Ending one chafe of foam. The King replied,
In measured words devolving smooth as oil:

"I need not say, in earnest of my love,
Were I assured it would thee reinstate,
In the red hand of War I'd strike my own,
And clasp it as a friend's. Were I assured—
Alas! my heart is like a troubled seer,
And speaks a cloudy language. Ethelbert
Is strong in towns and men—most subtle-brained,
Most proud of heart—yet roughly generous
To those that with submission flatter him.
Before the forthright motion of the wind
Bend like the sapling; when 't has overblown,
Erect thyself at pleasure. For myself,
Thou hast a boding eye that can discern
A tempest brewing in the sunny noon.
If a portentous cloud should climb the sky,
(Though I protest I see no present sign),
Some shelter will be found ere o'er my head
It splits in rain and fire. Why search for ills
That wander o'er the wilds of phantasy,
Which, if we seek not, we may never see?
Be not downcast, although the heavens frown;
The gods oft use us as we use our babes,
And snatch our plaything from us for a time;
Be patient, 'tis returned. Perversely fight,
The frail thing oft is broken. Do not fear;
Prosperity, like the swallow, comes and goes:
To-day there is the ruinous clay and straw;
To-morrow, sweetest twitterings fill the eaves.
The wretch plunged knee-deep in the whirling drift Cannot believe in summer, yet it comes
With all its singing birds. Remember, Time
Works often to some fair accomplishment,
Which we impatient, purblind, cannot see.
And in our eagerness stretch forth a hand,
And that one act mars all."

Then Edwin cried,
"There is scant comfort in thy words. No more
The births of time we can prognosticate
Than the next phantom of a madman's brain;
Or than the shape that yonder traveling cloud—
Now to my fancy headed like a wolf—
Will crumble into next. Most wretched he,
Unreasoning Chance's pensioner, who lives,
Like the blind beggar at the high-way side,
On alms of passers-by. I have been taught
The world is nothing but a mass of means,—
We have but what we make; that every good
Is locked by nature in a granite hand,
Sheer labor must unclench. The forest trees—
Do they fall round us into builded homes

Without an axe or arm? The blowing winds
Are but our servants when we hoist a sail.
O Redwald, Redwald! be not like the owl
That dozes with a wise and solemn face
In its own midnight, in the blaze of day.
Not for myself I speak, but all for thee.
The ravening wolf hath burst into the fold
Of peaceful kingdoms; 'tis the untouched herd,
Not the torn carcase, that hath cause to fear.
Thou yet art standing in thy pride of place,
I've known misfortune's worst; and like a soul
Refuged by death from all calamity,
Nothing can hurt me more."

Then Redwald's face
Grew troubled, for his spirit, peering out
Into the future, blenched at something there.
Uneasily he spake. "Draw once the sword,
In a strange world 'tis sheathed. When war-winds blow,

Kingdoms break up like clouds. I would thee serve,
But dare not set my dwelling in a blaze
To warm thy hands. But let this end to-day:
In private council I will take the thing,
And do not doubt that, through the voluble throng
Of diverse reasons, love for thee will plead—
An advocate silver-tongued. Come now, the lads
Will fly their hawks at noon."

Then, like a man
That brings a painful interview to end,
Turned on his heel the King, and instant went Toward the Palace. Edwin at his side
Walked, with ignited heart that fumed within,
Slow climbing to a clear bright flame of rage.
Both silent. When they reached the Palace front,
The brothers stood about the gate with grooms
And steeds, and falconers with hooded hawks,
Eager to ride. And Redwald, with pleased eyes,
Gazed on that carcanet of noble youth,
The poorest of whose seven precious stones
Would have enriched a realm, till Edwin sprang Into the saddle, and away they rode
Toward the mass of woodland in the west;
And when the last gay rider disappeared,
Within his countenance pleasure's fire went out,
And left it dark. He entered full of thought.
With muffled sound, fair glimmered man and horse
Down forest aisles, bedipt from plume to hoof
In dancing light and shade; and issuing thence
As from a roof, the riders burst in day
On an uneven waste of hillocked sand, Shagged with rude grass, and patched with withered furze,

With the great dazzle of the sea in front.
And as along they rode, though Edwin flashed
The general gladness back, as sea the sun,
Kept up the game while each derided each,
Paying gay jest with jest—'twas like a man
High-capering to no music—for the wit
Ached at the heart, and loud his laughter rose
To hide its want of joy. Some three leagues on,
Taking the wind upon a purple moor,
The happy Princes, riding hitherto
Close as a clump of primroses, broke up
And curvetted in twos; and as they broke,
Regner, the rose of all the wreath of sons,
Spurred his horse up to Edwin's, drew the talk
Slowly from this and that, to last night's feast,
Thence to the overthrow, and by what means
The pit-maker should fall into the pit,
The ruiner be ruined. Riding thus—

Prince Edwin lightening with his wrongs, the while,
By the true virtue of an open ear
Blonde Regner drew the grief that stagnated
In bitterness about the heart away—they dipped Down on a shining water-course, that led
To mountains closely drawn, and came at length
On a great boulder, black with pine, flung down
In the gorge's throat; and, rounding it, they split
A second time. Like pearls upon a string,
Each after each, they thrid a ruinous glen,
All silence, toppling crag, and falling stream,
Where nothing moved except the vapory smoke
From the abyss, or slowly crawling cloud
That hardly can sustain its weight of rain,
Eating the sunshine up and blackening all—Since earthquake passed that way. At last, they reached

The gloomy tenant of that gloomy place,
A lake of sadness, seldom shunned, that stretched
In sullen silver from a marge of reeds
To far-flung gloom of precipice and peak,
That on the northern side kept back the day.
As on the ruined shore the eight drew rein,
Uprose the startled heron with a scream,
Waking the echoes of that region dorn;
And Edwin, with a stranger's privilege,
First threw his hawk. Then Regner, riding near, Watching his countenance, caught his eye, and cried,

"When 'gainst the heron Ethelbert thou fliest,
I follow in thy track, come weal, come woe!"
And, rising fiercely in his stirrup, flung
His falcon into air. A glorious sight
To see them scale the heaven in lessening rings
Till they as motes became: while here and there
About the strand the eager brethren rode,
With shaded faces upturned to the blue,
Now crying, "This one has it!" and now "That!"
When suddenly, from out the dizzy sky,
Dropped screaming hawks and heron locked in fight,
Leaving a track of plumes upon the air.
Down came they struggling, wing and beak and claw,
And splashed beyond the rushes in the mere.
Amid the widening circles to the waist,
A falconer dashed and drew to shore the birds,
All dead save Edwin's falcon, that, with claws Struck through the heron's neck, yet pecked and tore,

Unsated in its fierceness. Regner laughed
At the weird omen, though his color rose.
"I cannot guess," quoth he, "how this will come
Unless I with thee to the battle ride,
So that is fixed. Brave falcon, with thy heart Burst on thy foeman's bill!" He gave his steed
The spur to hide his face. His brethren stood Dashed for the moment; and no more that day
Was falcon thrown from fist into the sky,
Or from its airy poisonings to the lure
Brought with a whistle. Soon the dreary lake
Lost princely voice and clang of iron hoof,
And as the six rode on the omen died,
And was entombed in laughter; farther on,
Heading the riders down the ruinous vale,
Regner and Edwin moved abreast, while love
Grew up between them purely—all untouched
By haughtiness, or thought of selfish end;
The noble love that lives in noble men;
That is ashamed of its own nakedness,
And hides itself in deeds,—would not be seen,
And tongueless lives and dies. And riding thus Toward the palace, Regner talked of days

When all would be at peace within the land,
And each man have his own inheritance,
Be it cot or citted realm: and how they twain,
When crownèd kings, would through the country
ride,

Teaching civility and raising man,
Till on the highway there should not be heard
A rude word, and till gold might lie untouched.

So talking, Edwin knew that they approached
The palace: neither mount, nor stream, nor tree,
Nor landmark, noted as they rode at morn,
Foretold its nearness, but a heart that swam
In new delight, like summer setting suns
In color. As they rode, between the twain
Speech died; and, when the billowy woods drew off,
And gave the palace clear in afternoon,
Its turrets rose in a delicious clime,
And sacred as her garment's hem had grown,
Its utmost pale and limit. As they came,
The noise of hoofs brought Redwald to the door,
A shallow ray of welcome in his face
That faded soon. Like one preoccupied
With his own thoughts, he asked What sport?
whose hawk

Had highest towered? which struck the quarry down?

And heeded not the answer when it came.
All the dismounted princes then he led
To a great board set forth with meats and drinks,
And, as he sat and carved before them all,
And as the talk rose high among the sons,
His face to Edwin—who with anxious eye
Sought there the future—seemed a doubtful day
Beyond the skill of prophet to predict
Whether 'twould darken into thunder shower
Or clear to azure and a golden set,
With promise of fair morrows. Moody-browed
He sat at feast and moody-browed he rose
And went out, leaving Edwin and his sons.
Then, after interval of sportive talk,
Regner brought all the table to the hall
Where in the morning he had stood with dogs;
But changed its grisly furniture, for now
Twilight had settled down upon the world,
And in the red and winking faggot light
Now flashed a spear-head, and now gleamed a brand.
The seven soon were busy here and there—
Some diced, one played with spear-head, one with hound.

But Edwin, feathering arrows sat apart,
For all the piled-up anguish—visible
As some high hanging tempest, which the sun
Holds back at noon, but which, when that same sun
Goes out like a red ember in the west,
Settles down bodily, a double night,
And pours through all the hollows of the hills
With voices in the blackness and the blast—
Covered him up, and in his soul he cursed
The purblind King, incapable to pierce
The curtain of a sunset, and descry
The angry-featured morn that lowered behind.
And, as they sat, and redder grew the hall,
The Princess came and sang as was her wont,
And as it chanced that night a tale of love—
Of love new-born and trembling like an Eve
Within a paradise all wide and strange
At the most perilous sweetness of herself
But one short moment known. And while her voice
Went wandering through a maze of melody,
The hand lay where it fell, and ceased the breath,
And finer grew the listening face. And when

Like a leaf's wavering course through autumn air,
The wildered melancholy music ceased,
And silence from a rack of keen delight
Unstretched their spirits to their grosser moods
And common occupations, she arose
With music lingering in her face, and eyes
That seemed to look through surfaces of things,
And would have thence withdrawn from out the hall:
But Regner caught her twixt his mighty knees,
Proud of her innocence and gentle ways,
Impatient half that she was not a glede
Fire-eyed to peck his fingers. "Tush!" he cried, Breaking in laughter like a wave in foam,
"Thy music trembles like a yearling fawn
At its own shadow. Evermore of love
Thou singest, as if love made up the world
And men were pigeons cooing on a thatch.
Was hand and arm like this of mine but made
To circle waists and finger maiden hair?
Although this love be all thou sing'st, methinks
'Tis something to be first to spear the boar,
'Tis something to have heart enough to keep
A friend, and strength enough to kill a foe.
Happy thy husband, Bertha, in his hall
Sitting unscolled, while each enterprise
That might have made him great unheeded streams
Like wild swans overhead. A gentle wife
With yellow-headed children round thy knees—
Aha, our lily leaps into a rose!
What! struggling like a very sheep in pen
Beneath the shears!" While gazed the throneless
Prince

With idle fingers on the feathered shaft,
While she, flushed rosy-red, broke loose and fled,
And while great Regner's loving laugh pursued,
Sudden, all heaven, immeasurably sweet,
Sank downward on his heart, and filled it full
As crimson fills a rose.

Then, while they slept,
The feverish heart within his body lay
Awake, and slave to giddy fear and hope,
'Twas blown from life to death, from heaven to hell,
A hundred times ere morn. But when the dawn
Flowed from the eastern cloud, and chamber wall,
And window white, and passion's fiery self
Wavered and lost their forms, and swam away,
Like watery circles into nothing, she Came floating in upon a stream of sleep,
And smiling, breathed the sacredest delight
Through all his soul. Ah, dawn among thy stars,
Yet linger, scare not with thy broadening ray
The paradise our father Adam knew!
Sudden above the shoulder of the world
The broad sun bounced and flung his shafts abroad—
One quivered redly on the dewy lawns,
One broke in rose along a mountain range,
One fired the cloud, and lark beneath the cloud.
And in the wide effulgence Edwin woke,
With heart sweet thrilling, like a string from which
The hand has vanished, though the tone is yet
By silence undevoured. And, when the sun
Had in succincter splendor turned his face
Noonwards, the Prince arose, and sought the hall;
And, after frank "Good morrow" from the sons,
And graver greeting from the King, and touch
Of Bertha's hand—the while from eye and lip
Broke sunlight for a moment, and was gone—
He put aside a plan by Regner urged,
To kill the noon, on score of weariness.
And when the King had gone, and when the sons,
With six or seven great dogs at their heels,
He, with a mighty thirst to be alone,

To weed his heart of perilous delight—
 For this new passion seemed unnatural
 As winter breeding roses—stole unseen
 From gate, and hid himself within the woods,
 That billowed on and on toward the west;
 And after roaming many a shadowy way,
 He found a green recess, a sheltered nook,
 Where many a family of violets dim
 Sweetened the forest twilight with their breaths
 Through mossy centuries unsmelt by man.
 Covered with secrecy and silence there,
 While Time sailed on, and never beat a wing,
 All Nature fed his madness. Solitude
 Spake with her voice, and Memory wore her face,
 And in the thick-leaved murmur overhead
 "Bertha" was shaped forever. Starting up,
 For his delight he feared as 'twere a fiend
 In angel's shape, with cruel-lovely eyes
 That fascinate a man against his will,
 Drawing him onward to some horrible brink,
 He left the massy coverture of leaves,
 That whispered like a tempter, and sought peace
 And some deliverance from his heart on wold,
 Brown waste, and sea-shore. But the world was full
 Of Bertha as a trembling string with sound:
 The shallow stream upon its pebble stones
 Was babbling "Bertha, Bertha!" all the air,
 Like his own brain, was singing with her voice;
 And every cliff and mount her beauty knew,
 And looked on him in passion. Worn at length
 He reached the palace, black against a west
 Yet crimson with the memory of the sun,
 And, passing through the hall, he heard, amid
 A crowd of youths that lay about the fire,
 Relaxed from chase, one talk about a stag
 That day seen in the woods, the noblest brute
 That ever antlers wore, and Regner's vow
 That, though the chase should stretch o'er half the land,
 The head would hang upon his trophied walls
 Ere set another sun. Like bows unbent
 The tired youths lay. But Regner looking up,

Saw Edwin passing, and toward him came,
 With a most gay reproachfulness of tone,
 But not the less reproachful that it wore
 A sprightly color. "All the day," quoth he,
 "I have been looking for thee, and each sport
 Renounced for want of heart in it. Come, now,
 By all the friendship as we rode last night,
 And by the better day we look for still,
 Do not forsake me so. I'd rather walk
 With thee through shower, than with another man
 Through all the summer sunshine. We are men,
 Not women, and our hearts should never dwell
 Upon our tongues—yet as the thing is said,
 Let it remain. What can I do to kill
 The tedium of the time? A mighty stag,
 (A forester has brought the welcome news,)
 Lairs in our woods to-night. Then in the morn,
 As early as thy sluggardly will let,
 Wilt thou with Bertha and the rest of us
 Ride, for his antlers I have vowed to win?"
 To him Prince Edwin, with a kindly face:
 "I'll stir, so please thee, ere the youngling birds;
 And may to-morrow prove the goodliest day
 Of a whole wreath of hunting days. Thy love
 Is to me, Regner, justly dear; and, though
 I did account it less, I am too poor
 To put it lightly by." He then adduced
 For his retirement, weariness and weight
 Of anxious thought, and to his chamber went.
 When, after preparation for the morn
 The circle broke to bed, and while the horn
 Was blowing shrilly through the hunter's dreams—
 (For, passion is a substance vaporous
 That cannot hold its shape a single hour),
 Prince Edwin sat upon his couch, with hands
 Lax hanging on his knees, while all his love
 Seemed hopeless as the feasts a famished man
 Beholds in dream; as brilliant and as frail
 As wondrous imagery of fruit and flower
 Wrought by the frost upon the window pane
 At night, while wolds are steaming white and chill,
 That in the morning runs a blur of tears.

BOOK II.

So when the light was springing in the east,
 Unkenneled staghounds bayed, men's voices rose, Steeds pawed and clanked their bridles. Then, equipped
 In hunting gear, Prince Edwin and the rest
 Trooped forth with spirits gay as their attire;
 And with the dawn, and like another dawn,
 But fairer, Bertha came. Amid the dogs
 They mounted, and the instant that the sun
 Stood on the hill-tops, prodigal of light,
 They rode with wondrous clatter on their way;
 And ever as they in their joyous haste
 Skirted dim forest, forded shallow stream—
 In which the sun had thrown a spear that lay
 Golden on amber pebbles—pushed o'er heath,
 The sound that gaily traveled on before
 Woke all things ere they came. For when afar
 At instance of a strong-lunged forester,
 The sudden bugle on the rosy cliff
 Was splintered into echoes, from the marsh
 The heron screaming rose; within his wood
 The mountain bull stood listening to the sound,
 Silent as lowering thunder, when the winds
 Are choked, and leaves hang dead; and from his lair
 Rose, with dew-dappled flanks, the stag, and snuffed
 Their coming in the wind—a moment stood,
 His speed in all his limbs—but when the pack

Dragged with them down the echoes of the vale
 And opened out, he fled, with antlers laid
 Along his back like ears. Halloo and horn Broke then upon the breeze. Now on his flight
 By flying wood, o'er wastes, thro' streams that splashed
 High o'er the saddle girths, the hunters hung,
 And ever as a slowly burning fire
 Consumed the space between. And, as it happened,
 When the increasing sun grew hot and strong
 In an impetuous whirl of stormy chase,
 The Prince and Bertha were alike thrown out.
 The rest ne'er drew a rein, for now the troop,
 With long-haired Regner far in the advance,
 Was pressing hard upon the weary brute,
 Sore-panting, black with sweat. Around a crag
 That with its gloomy pines o'er-hung the vale,
 Swept hunt and hunter out of sight and sound.
 They were alone, and in the sudden calm,
 When round them came the murmur of the woods
 Upon a sweeping sigh of summer wind—
 O moment dying ere a cymbal's clash!
 O memory enough to sweeten death!—
 The unexpected solitude surprised
 His heart to utterance, and the Princess sat
 Blinded and crimson as the opening rose
 That feels yet sees not day. Then, while the wind

To his quick heart grew still, and every leaf
Was watchful ear and eye, he pressed his lips
Upon the fairest hand in all the world
Once. That instant, like an envious fate
That rushes through, dissevering clinging joys,
A distance-muffled bugle sang à mort;
His courser started to his iron heel;
And, ere the blush had died on Bertha's cheek,
And ere her eyes could bear the conscious day,
They reached the crag with its black scalp of pines:
Rounding, they saw the end. For on a rock
That rose fern-fringed and lichened in a dell,
Tall Regner stood. "Ye twain have lost a sight!
With bursting heart he turned upon us here,
Desperate in death. Upon him climbed the dogs
To drop off gored. He would have beat them, too,
Had not I on him drawn my hunting knife—
He came down like a pine!"

So after rest,
Homeward through prime of noon the hunters wound;

The Princess rode with dewy drooping eyes
And heightened color. Voice and clang of hoof,
And all the clatter as they sounded on,
Became a noisy nothing in her ear,
A world removed. The woman's heart that woke Within the girlish bosom—ah! too soon!—
Filled her with fear and strangeness; for the path,
Familiar to her childhood, and to still
And maiden thoughts, upon a sudden dipped
To an unknown sweet land of delicate light
Divinely aired, but where each rose and leaf
Was trembling, as if haunted by a dread
Of coming thunder. Changed in one quick hour
From bud to rose, from child to woman, love
Silenced her spirit, as the swelling brine
From out the far Atlantic makes a hush
Within the channels of the careless stream,
That erst ran chattering with the pebble stones.
Somewhat in front rode on the happy Prince;
His heart was frozen on that battle-day
To one wild thought of vengeance, and stood still Like a stopped clock, aye pointing to one hour Through days of gloom and shine. But now the hate

And ancient sorrow, piled up cloud on cloud,
Lost form, and in an ecstasy dissolved,
In wandering blood that knew itself beloved,
And with the tidings ran to pulse and nerve
And thrilled them. Once again the light was sweet,
The lark sang, and the hedge wore scent and bloom,
And in his spirits' morning light, a word,
A hunter's jest, the nothings of discourse,
Were things to play with in his happiness,
As they were golden toys. So, when they reached
The palace gate, and Bertha had gone in,
Taking the sunshine with her, Edwin flung
The reins impatient on his courser's neck,
Broke through the crowd of losels gathered round,
And sought the loneliness of wood and field
To listen to the nightingale that sang Within his heart of love and love's delight;
And on it sang till, through enkindled air,
The heron flapped toward his forest home
With gullet full of fish. Returning then
Slow-paced, and miser of his own delight,
While lovely shapes of summer twilight stole
From tree-root and from hollow, and joined hands
In silence on the plain, he reached at last
The palace, stiller than its wont, and would Have entered, but from out the solid gloom,
Flung from an overhanging eave, the Page

Who met him by the rock-split streamlet, broke
With finger on his lip: "O enter not!
The place is trapped and baited for thy life.
The hate of Ethelbert is round thee here.
I know thy story as it hath been noised,
And that the King is troubled by thy case,
And would, and yet would not. So when at noon,
In absence of the Princes and thyself,
There came one seeking Redwald, travel-stained,
I was alert as a hind's ear to catch
The danger in the wind. I hid myself
Within the private chamber, where the King
Gives his selectest audience. When they came,
Without a pause, the strange man opened out
His treacherous purpose with a shameless brow,
And guessing, as I deemed, the King was weak,
And must in any strife go to the wall;
Or that the coward dwelling in his heart
Would prove the ally in the house, and fling
Out to the foe the keys of every gate,
He scorned to lacquer the accursed thing
(Which in the first flush of its hideousness,
Like a fanged snake, might make a man shriek out)
With glozing speech. And wisely. Deeds like these

Corrupt in their excuses. Ethelbert,
I gathered from their converse, having heard
That thou art come for shelter to the court—
(Ill fall the little bird that sang the news),
Threats war on Redwald if he stands thy friend—
Sharp war that will not spare a living thing.
If he betrays thee, gold is his, and part
Of thy dismembered kingdom. Long they talked—
I heard the chink of golden argument,
While Redwald's mind swayed this way now, now that,

And now he would betray thee, now defend.
Thus hearing, from my hiding-place I stole
To warn thee hence if not indeed too late.
There is no time to lose. This very night
The foul thing may be done; strange whispers pass
Throughout the palace. Openly his sons
Marvel at what's afoot. This moment fly—
I know the secretest sequestered paths
And hiding places that ne'er saw the day."

As nightmared man—when solid-seeming ground
Breaks downward in a cliff precipitous
And on the sheer edge leaves him, dizzy-brained,
Toppling o'er death,—strives to regain the morn
And the sweet healthy world, Prince Edwin strove
In coils of monstrous evil, and at last,
Trampling the foul thing underfoot, he smiled.
"I owe thee many thanks for thy regard,
And for this cruel kindness more than all.
Out of thy love for me, thou urgest flight—
The falcon hath its nature and the dove,
And by that nature is each motion shaped
And every beat of wing. Thy master's hearth
Hath warmed me, at his table have I fed,
Drunk of his cup, and 'twere the vil'st return
By hasty flight to call him traitorous
To dead and living. Doubtless, this bad hour
But swims a vapor o'er the heavenly lights
That will be clear anon. But if, indeed,
His spirit harbors murder—if the knife
Has bloody fascination for the hand—
I have no power to cover up my throat,
'Tis naked to its using."

Then the Page—
"Remain awhile within the friendly dark,
And ere the thing draws to a wicked head,

Poisoned and fanged, and raised in act to sting,
I will rejoin thee here, and lead thee far;
And, if it melts in nothingness away,
I'll be the blithest bearer of good news
That ever ran. So cloak thyself in night.
I will into the palace, where I'll tread
With foot of air, made up of ears and eyes."

When he was gone, the Prince, with heavy heart,
Not knowing what to do or where to turn,
Sat on a stone, a bow-shot from the gate,
Sore troubled. In his cloak he wrapt his face
Like one who hears the coming foot of doom
And waits the end. Hour passed on tardy hour,
And in the dreary middle of the night
The late moon rose, and then he groaning said:

"Ah, miserable me! My soldiers bleach
Beneath the moon, and she who bore me, sleeps
On flint beside the waterfall, begirt
By widows, and by children, and by all
The congregated sorrow of a realm
Most sorrowful. And I, who can alone
Bring to my people roof-tree, fire, and law,
And build again for them an ordered state,
Sit here an outcast, and the door is shut.
And Ethelbert, my deadly foe, like air
Enclips me round, and there is no escape.
Ah, wretched! for to me the healthy world
Is poisoned and deranged; where'er I go
Worth turns to baseness; and sweet love itself
That dwells with weary hinds, and makes the load
To the galled shoulder lighter, brandishes
With snow-soft arm a burning torch for me
That but reveals the face of a despair
That darkling stood, and all my prison's strength—
A prison wide as the unbounded world,
Whose walls are my own life. To-day I've fallen
From summer, and the song-bird and the rose,
To a dark ground, exempt from light, that breathes
The earthy horror of a new-made grave,
And those who should be unto me as friends
Stretch hands to push me in. So let it be:
Death heads the mighty count of human ills,
And every man can die. And in the grave
All hatred and revenge are baulked at last;
No smiles that murder hide, no star of love
Lighting my steps to ruin, no bloodhound
Hoarse baying on my track, can ever more
Disturb my quiet. A great sea of peace,
On which was never boat nor puff of wind,
'Twixt me and sorrow flows."

Thereat down pressed
With grief he forward leaned, as forward leans
The bulrush when the stream runs swift with rain.
Thus like one carved he sat, till suddenly
He felt upon him breathe an icy wind,
And with an unknown terror every hair
From heel to scalp arise; then looking up
He saw in that lone place a dark-robed man
Stand like a pillar in the setting moon;
And at the sight Prince Edwin's heart stood still.

"What man art thou that sitt'st on this cold stone
When every bird, its head beneath its wing,
Is sound asleep upon the forest bough?"

"It matters little where I sit o' nights."

"I know thy name, and why thou sittest here.
I saw thee sleeping on the naked ground

With but a rainy sky for coverlet.
I know thy story and the things thou fear'st;
What wouldst thou give if I turned Redwald's heart
And made him draw the sword in thy defence?"

"I have not much, but I would give thee all."

"What, if I clothe thy limbs with mightiness?
What if, in far days when thou tak'st the field
Beneath thine ancient banner wide displayed,
I give thee spoil and captive? If I give
Her soft voice to thine ear, her lips to thine,
Her white arms to thy neck?"

"O mock not so
My sharp distress: for any good I'll be Most answerably grateful."

"If I build
Thy throne secure against the flaws of time?
If I send teachers that will teach thee more
Of the dark world that lies beyond the grave
Than if thy father's ghost did speak with thee—
Teachers as never king in England had?"

"Who speaks with me?" cried Edwin starting up.
"Thy voice is like a trumpet that proclaims
Something, I know not what—but at the sound
Through pallid ash the embers of my hope
Have burst in flame. I tremble at the brightness."
"Who speaks with thee thou canst not know as yet;
But," here he laid his hand on Edwin's head,
"When next this sign upon thy body comes
The promise thou hast given me remember."

And lo! before the Prince could utter word
The moon had fallen and the man was gone.

He knew it was a spirit with him talked;
And like an idol-stone uncouthly hewn
In image of a man, the astonished Prince
Sat folded in his cloak the while the words
Went wandering through the regions of his mind
Like thunder 'mong far hills. Slowly the woods
Came out in ghastly glimmer, slowly dawn
Stained the horizon with a beamless red.
And when the risen sun outstretched his lance
O'er dewy earth, a sound of voices stirred
Around the palace and unfroze his limbs.
And as the world swam back into his brain,
He threw the darkness with his mantle off,
And started at the morning's lucid walls
Grown up in silence round him. And the Page,
Right in the glory of the level beam,
Came running from the shadowed palace-gate,
Dawn in his face, and called him with a voice
Sweeter than any grove of singing birds
That ever waved, an emerald of May.
"O Prince, unto the palace come again.
The messenger has gone with angry heart,
And like a cobwebbed banner from its nook
Where it has hung for ages, taken down
And streaming in the wind, the King cries 'War!'
In the rude shaking of the boughs, rich fruit
Will tumble in our laps." And then the Prince,
With an unflattered countenance and eye,
Like one who has already heard the news,
Arose and followed him within the gate.

They reached the chamber hung with horn and head,
Antler and weapon, where Redwald up and down,
Much troubled, paced with quick impatient starts.
Bertha sat weeping, but the brothers stood,
Their bold hearts tingling to the stirring time,

Its light was in their faces, like proud crags
 High up, that wear the morning ere it comes.
 The King turned sharply as the Prince approached:
 "Whether to bless or curse the hour, I know not
 That blew thee here, for everything hath clashed
 In broil since then; things unconceived have bred
 Their strangest opposites, as eagles doves,
 And fruit trees poison. I that did thee love
 Have listened with no inattentive ear
 To the sweet music of the minted gold
 That foul betrayal urged; and I that clung
 To peace—that fattens beeves, and tills the mead,
 And fills the bursting barns with harvest-home—
 Have, like a passionate whipster, drawn a sword
 That fruitless blood must paint. In even poise
 The issue hung; and, lo! a chitling's tears—
 This lily thrown into the trembling scale
 The heavier only by some dewy drops—
 Makes wisdom kick the beam. Within my heart
 There beats another heart that is not mine:
 I go, but like a steed that chafing goes.
 I am an arrow by some unknown hand
 Drawn tensely to a mark. Here yestermorn,
 As now thou know'st, a man came from thy foe
 With gold in one hand, in the other war,
 Demanding me to give thy body up.
 I kept thee, and chose war. So take my sons,
 My towns, my horses, arms, and goodly men;
 Enclothe thyself in all my kingdom's strength,
 And try the hazard of a bloody field,
 Which will, I doubt not, to the right incline,
 And with its dust at sunset shape a throne—
 Which, howsoever it turn, must cost me dear—
 And, now what can I more?" And while the King
 Went on thus chafing, Edwin's sleepless heart
 Grew silent, as an eagle's famished brood
 Huddled upon a ledge of rosy dawn,
 When sudden in the blinding radiance hangs
 Their mighty dam, a kid within her grip,
 Borne off from valleys filled with twilight cold
 That know not yet the morn. Yet somewhat sore
 At Redwald's cautious balancings and doubts,
 He fiercely spoke: "I do suspect me, King,
 The self-same wind that pushed me out to sea
 Now blows me into port. Yet, as I hold
 The golden apple in my fortunate palm,
 I need not all too curiously inquire
 Upon what bough it grew:" At that, Remorse,
 In generous crimson, rushed to cheek and brow,
 And shook his voice. "Redwald, I could thee
 thank,
 Upon the gratefulest knees that ever knelt
 On ground. But, though these words of thine surpass

All other sounds that ever reached my ear,
 As angels men, I thrill with no surprise;
 For, sitting on a stone without thy gate
 When gold was being weighed against my life,
 I knew a morning fair as this would break,
 And to this interview I walked assured,
 As one who hath been absent but a day
 Into his house, where table, bed, and stool,
 Have places kept since childhood. And I know
 This morn is prologue to a happy act:
 The future rises like a curtain up,
 And, shadow-like, I see a battle won
 And a recovered throne. And once more, King,
 A world thou'st given me wherein to live;
 I also crave the dawn to make it fair,
 To gild its forest tops, to light its streams,
 To set a rainbow in its cloudy gloom,
 To fill its soft green vales with tender light,

That I may see the work grow 'neath my hands—
 Thy daughter whom I love."

At the King's feet
 She sat, and, hearing, over neck and brow
 Brake morning; and, as love is faced like fear,
 Or wears fear's mask, she hid her own and shrank;
 And, shrinking, like a sudden burst of light,
 The unimprisoned splendor of her hair
 In coil on coil of heavy ringlets fell,
 And veiled the face that burned through hands close pressed,
 And clothed her to the knee. The King down glanced,
 And caught the sweet confusion, while his spleen
 Went out in words, like thunder's dying groan,
 When tempest passes, and reveals again
 The azure and the sun. "And dost thou, too,
 Fret in thy nest's confinement, and desire
 To flit away into the boundless world
 And range therein with some gay-feathered mate
 The summer through? We fathers are the soil
 In which a second generation grows:
 From our decrease it draws the youthful sap
 That keeps it green atop. Nay weep not, girl!
 Press not against my knee in that wild way
 A cheek all flame and tears. I cannot chide:
 It is the very order of the world;
 We have our seasons, even as the flowers.
 And I, when I did once a daughter seek,
 Made thick a father's heart. Some twenty years,
 This hour may be thine own. Most gladly, Prince,
 When time hath tried thy steadfastness of heart,
 And when the wayward fowl, Prosperity,
 Roosts in thy boughs, I'll see her wife of thine,
 Wearing with thee the crown. So, sweet, arise,
 And give the man thy heart hath chosen out
 From all his fellows a pure hand in pledge
 Of faithfulness—the one assured thing
 He ever will possess upon the earth." She heard, and, all untouched by virgin shame, False and unworthy then, erect she stood
 Before her father and her brethren seven,
 Pale as her robe, and in her cloudless eyes
 Love, to which death and time are vapory veils
 That hide not other worlds, and stretched a hand,
 Which Edwin held, and kissed before them all
 In passionate reverence; smitten dumb by thanks
 And noble shame of his unworthiness,
 And sense of happiness o'erdue. And while
 The Prince's lips still lingered on the hand
 That never more could pluck a simple flower
 But he was somehow mixed up in the act,
 She faltered, like a lark beneath the sun
 Poised on the summit of its airy flight,
 And, sinking to a lower beauteous range
 Of tears and maiden blushes, sought the arms
 That sheltered her from childhood, and hid there,
 Shaken by happy sobs. "Prince," quoth the King,
 The while his palm lay on the golden head,
 "I count myself this day most fortunate
 In that, by the sweet ministry of love,
 (Which was to me invisible as spring, Shaping itself beneath the winter's white,)
 I see the future fairly form and flow
 From happy throne to throne. I am no more
 A cliff that fronts a waste abyss of air—
 Beyond me seem to glimmer cultured fields
 And a continued world. My heart feels light
 With children yet to be. But those sweet days
 Are distant, and the present in our path
 Stands like a grisly thistle spiked with spears,
 That will draw blood from the bold hand that grasps.

I do remember me there was a time
 When fight was keenlier wooed than any girl;
 And, though my fires are wasted, even now
 This withered hand is hankering for a lance—
 Even now these feeble knees compress a steed,
 And the wild rank tears onward—and I hear
 The combat's music when great spears go crash,
 When through the dust of fight the clarions blow,
 And red blood springs. 'Tis but an old man's dream,
 And other hands must rule the battle now:
 Take Regner to thy council: think it out.
 Be wise, be wise, yet be not over-wise—
 Plot like an old man, execute like youth—
 We will discuss thy plans around the board.
 Come, Bertha!" So they went, nor did love's sun
 Vouchsafe a beam at parting.

Then the sons,
 His brethren now, came crowding round the Prince
 With joyful faces, and with many a wish
 That the miraculously blossomed time
 Would ne'er its vermeil promise falsify,
 But come to happy fruit. And Regner threw
 His arm round Edwin's neck, for elder love
 Claimed a fond precedence, and, brother-linked,
 They passed through gates to sunshine, and then struck

Adown a road, tree-shaded, silent both,
 Though many a thought was stirring at their hearts.
 At last, Prince Regner, on a ruined dyke,
 Hoary with lichens, with each crevice bossed
 And bulged with mossy emerald, sat, the while
 The sunlight, broken by the thronging boughs,
 Splashed his great limbs, and Edwin standing near,
 And all the lonely greenness of the place.
 Then turned he, smiling: "Edwin, when I dreamed
 Of distant days when we twain should be kings,
 Ruling our realms in peacefulness and joy,
 Yet with the awe of justice intermixed—
 With a most perfect friendship, good to us,
 And to our people ever issuing thence—
 I did not count on such a day as this,
 In which the dearest sister in the world
 Hath made us brothers, not in love alone,
 But by the sweetest tie that ever knit
 A man to man." Then, as a sudden wind
 Swayed every bough, and broke the mass of light
 Into a swarm of golden butterflies,
 That danced and bickered o'er the velvet sward,
 Then slowly grew to one, Prince Edwin said:
 "I know that I am happy; I know not
 How happy—and I may not ever know!
 I am as one engifted in a realm,
 Whose wide unskirted boundaries and shores
 He will not have encompassed round about
 When he is hoary grown." Then Regner's laugh
 Rang like the blackbird's whistle, loud and clear,
 When all the woods are breathing after rain.
 "It is a churlish bird that will not sing Against the ray. Bridegroom will be bridegroom,"
 The mirth died in his face as he went on.
 "Thou wilt be my superior in this war;
 At pointing of thy sword 'tis mine to ride,
 Though it point straight to death. Yet let me speak
 Before I sink into a place wherein
 My duty is obedience absolute.
 The morning after thou didst on us burst
 Like one on fire, telling the King thy wrongs,
 In likeness of a harper with a harp,
 I sent one privately to gather news.
 Last night he came, and told me how distressed
 Is that fair land in which thine enemy dwells.
 How conflagrations redden every night,

And how the mead on which he halts a space
 Looks, when he leaves it, as if charred by fire.
 But now by some fair wanton meshed and toiled,
 The King a canvas town of pleasure spreads,
 And lays his arms by for the moment. Well.
 The voice now running through my father's land
 Will make each knight collect his plump of spears,
 The smith his hammer on the anvil leave,
 The hind his lowing oxen in the trace,
 And hither will they troop. King Ethelbert
 Was drawing this way, when his heart was caught
 By white arms, glittering eyes. Yon range of hills,
 On which the heaven leans with rack and cloud,
 Is all that stands between us. Swiftly lead
 Thy files up through a world of mist, and crag,
 And dashing waterfall, and from the height,
 Upon the flushed King in the wanton's lap,
 Drop like the thunderstone and crush him out,—
 Him and his strength for ever." Edwin then:
 "But all the perilous passes! Canst thou guide?"
 And Regner, bearing on like stream at flood,
 "I know the region dwelling in the mist
 As do the wild blasts penned within it; come,
 And let us lay the thing before the King."
 So they arose and to the palace walked,
 Through wondrous fantasy of light and shade
 That danced and glimmered with each sigh of wind,
 And entering, found a plenteous table spread;
 And soon the King came in, and then the sons,
 But Bertha's place was empty all the while.

Then, through the progress of the stately feast,
 The question of the conduct of the war
 Drew all discourse, and Regner opened out
 His plan, and held it swiftest, simplest, best:
 Affirmed that Ethelbert, in pleasure drowned,
 Was helpless as a leveret in a snare;
 That Edwin need not fear his guidance up,
 For that he knew the misty mountain world
 As the fierce torrent knows its native gorge,
 Through which it has run white a thousand years.
 With Regner every brother gave his voice;
 The King was doubt-perplexed, and slowly moved,
 Like a clogged wheel, till Edwin, who had sat
 Silent among the talkers, suddenly,
 Like a grave echo from a mountain height
 That startles, gave his full adhesion in.
 And, driven thus from point to point, the King
 To half-enforced agreement warmed at last.
 They rose from table when the midnight hung,
 An emerald twilight up among the stars;
 All night the Prince tossed restless on his couch,
 With trumpets blowing in his ears, a sword
 Haunting his hand; but with the whitening dawn
 Sleep brought a shock of joy, for, out of waste
 And formless horror, Ethelbert and he Fell grappling, and in fight rolled o'er and o'er,
 Mid plunging horses, in a hug of death.

Then with the rising of the third day's sun,
 As wave doth shoulder wave toward an isle
 When thither sets the tide and blows the breeze,
 Till in the silence of its central vale
 Is heard the surgy murmur, troop on troop
 Pressed round the palace; and Prince Edwin gazed
 Down on the living sward, and saw a knight
 Go pricking through the press in harness rich,
 Dark groves of footmen standing in their ranks,
 Mares whinnying from the stake, and from the wood,
 Slow trickling through the light, a rill of spears.
 And as he gazed upon the joyous scene
 His forward-pushing spirit made his face

Pale, as a man's who, with a resolute heart,
Towers in the breach at daybreak, hand on hilt,
When shouting comes the foe. Descending then,
He found the King and all his seven sons
Standing in hall amid a hundred lords,
Brown-cheeked, fierce-eyed, long-bearded, mightylimbed,

Who from each corner of the realm were bade
To battle, and who came as to a feast.
Walking from martial knot to knot that buzzed
With all the fiery pleasure of the time,
King Redwald made each chief to Edwin known,
Summed up the spears he brought, and proudly flashed

A hurried sunbeam o'er his foregone life,
That made each brave deed sparkle jewel-like,
And wandering up and down among the lords.
More loud the din of preparation grew—
The sudden opening of a door let in,
The neigh of steeds, clashed anvils, countless fires
Blistering the noontide air, and on the skirts
Of tumult, oft a coming trumpet blown.

And Bertha in an eastern turret sate,
That took the sunrise like a cliff, and heard
The steed neigh, and the coming trumpet blow.
And knowing that her life was being shaped
By Fate's dark hands, that heed not sob or tear,
Above the tumult, like a thing divine,
Arose her voice. To this effect she sang—

“On many pastures man can feed his heart;
He drinks the wine of travel to the lees,
His is the sceptre and the golden crown,
His is the strife and glory of the field;
But ours the empty couch on which he lay,
The listening at the gate for dreadful news,
The breaking heart, and binding up of wounds.”

So all the land around the Palace glowed
With upward-striking fires when fell the night,
And shapes of men went flitting through the glare,
Gigantic. From the ruddy distance came
The hum of thousands, and steed neighed to steed:
The minstrels sang great battles to the lords,
But, in his hand the reins of all the host,
The Prince, with Redwald, Regner, and the rest,
Sat half the night discoursing, grave and sad,
For in the presence of the war each heart
Was clear and naked as a sword unsheathed.
The minstrels ceased, the Palace lights burned low,
The circle round the King arose at last.
Beside a thousand fires the army slept,
Except the watcher leaning on his spear,
Or when, affrighted by a falling brand,
A war-horse reared and snorted at the stake.

At the first wind of dawn the thousands woke
And rolled into their places, rank on rank,
Expectant, ready, shadowing large as groves;
But when the sun arose, and was afar
Mirrored in dewy lawns, a window oped,
At which King Redwald and his daughter stood
With eyes of sad farewell. A bugle's cry
Went tingling to the roots of every heart;
And, ere it died, from out the Palace gate
The Princes issued 'gainst the level rays
That burned on breast and helm, and, at the sight
The host rocked like a forest in a storm,
The banners shook, with clash and cry they cheered
The lords of Battle. Then, as the army moved Onward, like thunder's corrugated gloom

Rolling o'er desert hills, with fire reserved
For other lands, the wistful hearts and eyes
Of those within the silent Palace left
Hung on its dusty rear. Spears ceased to flash
And horns to sound. At height of noon it hung
Cloud-like upon a ridge; and as a cloud,
If the hot sun but touch it with a beam,
Crumbles into a livid dust of rain
Leaving the rock-line clear against the sky,
The shadow passed.

And nothing now stood 'twixt
The act and issue. And soft-plumaged Time,
That ere while with a soundless wafture shot
From ruddy sunrise to all-swallowing night,
Fanned hearts to fever with his creaking wings.
Still as a rooted flower the Princess sate,
With face intense that ever searched the north
For the first glitter of returning spears.
The grey King whitened in the weary hours,
And watched with vacant eyes, bewildered hands
That worked, and had forgot at what they worked:
Then at the simple carol of a bird
He started, with a scared look in his face,
As if he feared from out the invisible air
Something would break in fire. Each morn and eve
He questioned, like a voyager who knows
That land is somewhere hidden in the sky,
And, weary of the ocean's silence, thrusts
A haggard face into the eyes of dawn
And reads no news, and, when the long day falls
With its great torch of sunset o'er the west,
Revealing nothing, sickens. But afar,
On the sixth day, a courier was descried
Swift-hasting, like a solitary crow
Winging the empty heaven. Out of doors
The people, on a sudden impulse, shoaled
Impetuous, but only to be hurt
By the keen shaft the archer Sorrow sent Before he came himself. The panting man
Caught these words from the top of difficult breath:
“The field is ours—Prince Regner's ghost has fled—
King Ethelbert is cold, and all his lords—
They broke at sunset!”—As a rill is lost
In ocean's murmur, all the rest was drowned
In lamentation and a bitter cry;
And then, besurged by weeping multitudes,
The man was borne into the palace hall,
Where Bertha lay at the King's feet, while he Stood up before them, mute and stony-eyed,
Like one so far o'ercome by sore distress
That he no sharpness knows, and can but wring
Piteous incapable hands. And then the man
Rehearsed the story of the bitter field:—
“Hanging upon the midnight hill we saw Their watch-fires dot the plain. Slow broke the morn,

All damp and rolling vapor, with no sun,
But in its place a moving smear of light,
And through the mist we heard a trumpet blow.
By mid-day we were on them ere they knew,
And Ethelbert, like some wild beast at bay,
Fought but to kill, while he was being killed.
For him Prince Edwin and Prince Regner sought;
And though so knit in love their noble hearts
That each would give the other all he had,
Yet each grudged each his death. So when the sun
Broke through the clouds at setting, on a mound,
Lifted in seeing of the swaying fight,
Stood Ethelbert, surrounded by his lords,
Known by his white steed and his diadem,
And by his golden armor blurred with blood.
'Gainst him with but a single score of knights

The Princes spurred. Many were ridden down
In shock of onset. Regner's horse was speared,
And, rearing with fore feet that pawed the sky,
Fell backward on his rider, in whose side
A thirsty arrow stuck. Prince Edwin then,
With axe and arm up to the elbow red,
Drove up his horse 'gainst Ethelbert's, and struck,
Crushing the diadem and head at once,
And rode him down, and spurned him with his hooves.

Then, as a tent when the main pole has snapped
Falls into ruin, all the army fell,
On the King's death. By this, the sun had set.
They fled before us, drove on drove, like sheep,
And Edwin, like one famishing for blood,
Headed the chase, and night held up her moon,
To light us to the slaying." While the tale
Was being told, the people silent stood,
But at its close their grief broke out afresh,

When some fond memory brought back Regner's face,

His gait, his voice, some cordial smile of his,
And all the frank and cunning ways he had
To steal a gazer's heart. The long day waned,
And, at the mournful setting of the sun,
Up through the valley came the saddened files,
With Regner's body borne on leveled spears.
And, when they laid the piteous burden down
Within the gate, with a most bitter cry
The loose-haired Bertha on it flung herself,
And strove, in sorrow's passionate unbelief,
To kiss dead lips to life. The hardest eyes
Oozed pitying dew. But when the ancient King
Was, like a child, led up to see his son,
With sense of woe in woe's own greatness drowned,
With some obscure instinct of reverence
For sorrow sacreder than any crown,
The weeping people stood round, hushed as death.

BOOK III.

ROUND Regner's mighty corse, upon the mound,
Prince Edwin and the brethren weeping stood
In the red dawn, while all the men hung back.
And Edwin, when he heard his charger neigh,
Clasped hastily their hands; and, having bade
The noblest man that e'er lay dead on field
A sad, eternal farewell with his eyes,
He, with a slender following of knights,
Passed onwards through a solitary land,
O'er wastes that wore the silence of the sky,
O'er ferny hills that autumn rusts like iron.

And, when he came into his ruined town,
The news spread swift as sunrise—touched high moors,

And waterfalls that never iris wore,
And every natural fastness wherein men
Had flung themselves in haste, and stood at bay.
And, at the news, toward the blackened walls
Thin rills of people 'gan to trickle down
The barren slopes, uncertain; for each heart,
Like some frail bough from which an evil bird
Had fled on dusky wing at step and shout,
Was trembling even yet. And with the first
Of the returning folk, like one that steps
Sudden from mountain vapor, from a grief
That brooked no fellowship, his mother came,
With aspect unsubdued by woe—nay, raised,
Like something smit by heaven's fire, and more
Majestic in its ruin than its prime:
More queenly—wearing sorrow's dreary crown,
And robed in bitter wrongs—than when she moved
In youthful beauty, and the diadem
Paled in more golden hair. The people fell Back from her side in simple reverence,
And made a lane for sorrow. Tall she stood,
Like some old druid pillar by the sea,
Whose date no legend knows, with all its length
Eaten by foam-flakes and the arrowy salts
Blown blighting from the east, and wildly gazed
Upon the blackened ruins of her home,
Once loud with marriage joy, oft hushed by death,
With working nether lip, while native pride
Scorned weakness back into her heart, and strove
To shut a door on tears—in vain—she stretched Fond arms of passion out, that Edwin sought
In sudden night, then weeping like a cloud
She hung upon his breast. Though dimmed awhile
By natural sadness, from that fond embrace
He raised a countenance like a rising sun—

Such an infectious light was in his eye,
Such hope and courage in his resolute voice,
Such noble scorn of all calamity,
That from his glance it shrank, a fearful shade
That into nought dislimned. A difficult hour
To try the pith and spirit of a man!
For gathered there the helpless people stood,
Foolish and timorous as a plump of sheep
That shoots this way, now that, and only held
Compact by barking dog and shepherd's cry:
He, like a flame that rises on the wind,
Feeding on what it fights with, cried aloud:—
"The robber that hath robbed us is struck down—
The fire that wasted us is quenched in blood!
Courage, my friends! new dwellings we will raise
And fairer, from these ashes!" Then, in mood
King-like, he grasped an axe, and first disturbed
The forest's silence with a falling pine.
The shock struck heart through the uncertain crowds—

Each spirit rose as from a weight relieved—
At once the hundreds were alive like ants,
Swift-swarming to repair their citadel,
Crushed by a heedless foot. Ere twice a month
The town arose, a palace in its midst,
And girdled round by horror-breathing pines,
From whose unwilling tops the vibrant wind
Drew a hoarse murmur like the wintry surge,
A temple stood, by deities made dark,
Whose ears were closed to dulcimer and lute,
Wide to the clash of shields. And all around
The voice of industry in wood and field
Came back again, like some old pleasant tune
Long broken off, renewed, or silver stream
That sinks in earth, then, reappearing, flows
A mirror for the flowers. Once more the smoke
Uncoiled itself in evening's crimson air,
Once more the kine from out the pasture lowed,
Again within the solitude of woods
The muffled axe was heard. But ever when
On Edwin's heart the apparition came,
The old familiar world that hummed around,
Like mountains hanging green within the mere
Disturbed by dimpling breeze or lone canoe,
Became a weird confusion—something, nothing—
Commixed and mingling in the spinning brain.
As months went by, his mother Donegild,
Though still a ruin, was a ruin sunned,
Whose rents and fissures tell of thunderstroke,
But thunder long ago—where pain is not,

But only, in the quiet summer light,
The gentleness of natural decay.
And in the silent lapse of prosperous time
The bow of Edwin's spirit was relaxed.
In evil days he was the mole that broke
The dangerous surges of calamity,— Now wind and wave were down. The commonwealth

Was well cemented, and could stand alone,
Without his staying and supporting hand.
In the surcease of effort, love grew strong
And widened from that sweet point in the past,
As the pure pool of moonrise in the east
Soaks through the cloudy texture of the sky,
Till, in the tenderness of light, the woods
Grow flakes of blackness, and the monstrous forms
Of everlasting granite, clamped with iron.
Lose all their horror, and transfigured stand
Soft as the stuff of dreams. Across the hills
Time's gentle ministry was also felt;
For now the grassy mound of Regner's grave
Had grown a portion of the accustomed world—
Familiar as the shapes of distant hills,
And hardly moving sorrow more than they.
Drawn by a heart that boded happiness,
Thither Prince Edwin rode, with all his train,
Feasted a week—the while the ancient King
Was clad with flowers of holiday—and oft
In hall, in greenwood, 'neath the evening star,
In Bertha's half-turned ear, he chid delay,
For she was coy as is a backward spring
That will not take possession of delight
Nor all its buds disclose. And Redwald watched
With smiling eyes, remembering his own youth,
The amorous war of sunbeam and of snow,
And swore it was the way of bashful maids
To turn a sour face on the sweetest thing—
To pine for love, and then, whene'er it comes,
Fly with a red scared face. In his young days
Their mothers did the same. At last, the Prince
Drew the green bud to a sweet rosy tip,
Thence to the open flower; and, when he went,
The death of Regner was made up. Again
King Redwald had his wreath of sons complete.

So, in the very depth of pleasant May,
When every hedge was milky white, the lark,
A speck against a cape of sunny cloud,
Yet heard o'er all the fields—and when his heart
Made all the world as happy as itself—
Prince Edwin, with a score of lusty knights,
Rode forth a bridegroom to bring home his bride.
Brave sight it was to see them on their way,
Their long white mantles ruffling in the wind,
Their jeweled bridles, horses keen as flame
Crushing the flowers to fragrance as they moved!
Now flashed they past the solitary crag,
Now glimmered through the forest's dewy gloom,
Now issued to the sun. The summer night
Hung o'er their tents within the valley pitched,
Her transient pomp of stars. When that had paled,
And when the peaks of all the region stood
Like crimson islands in a sea of dawn,
They, yet in shadow, struck their canvas town,
For love shook slumber from him as a foe,
And would not be delayed. At height of noon,
When, shining from the woods afar in front,
The Prince beheld the Palace gates, his heart
Was lost in its own beatings, like a sound
In echoes. When the cavalcade drew near
To meet it, forth the princely brothers pranced,
In plume and golden scale; and, when they met,

Sudden, from out the Palace, trumpets rang
Gay wedding music. Bertha, 'mong her maids,
Upstarted as she caught the happy sound,
Bright as a star that brightens 'gainst the night.
When forth she came the summer day was dimmed,
For all its sunshine sank into her hair,
Its azure in her eyes. The princely man,
Lord of a happiness unknown, unknown,
Which cannot all be known for years and years—
Uncomprehended as the shapes of hills
When one stands in the midst! A week went by,
Deepening from feast to feast; and, at the close,
The grey priest lifted up his solemn hands,
And two fair lives were sweetly blent in one,
As stream in stream. Then, once again, the knights
Were gathered fair as flowers upon the sward,
While, in the distant chambers, women wept,
And, crowding, blest the little golden head,
So soon to lie upon a stranger's breast,
And light that place no more. The gate stood wide—

Forth Edwin came enclothed with happiness,
She trembled at the murmur and the stir
That heaved around: then, on a sudden, shrank,
When through the folds of downcast lids she felt
Burn on her face the wide and staring day,
And all the curious eyes. Her brothers cried,
When she was lifted on the milky steed,
“Ah! little one, 'twill soon be dark to-night!
A hundred times we'll miss thee in a day,
A hundred times we'll rise up to thy call,
And want and emptiness will come on us!
Now, at the last, our love would hold thee back!
Let this kiss snap the cord! Cheer up, my girl;
We'll come and see thee when thou hast a boy
To toss up proudly to his father's face,
To let him hear it crow!” Away they rode;
And still the brethren watched them from the door
Till purple distance took them. How she wept,
When, looking back, she saw the things she knew—
The Palace, streak of waterfall, the mead,
The gloomy belt of forest—fade away
Into the grey of mountains. With a chill
The wide strange world swept round her, and she clung,

Close to her husband's side. A silken tent
They spread for her, and for her tiring girls,
Upon the hills at sunset. All was hushed
Save Edwin, for the thought that Bertha slept
In that wild place—roofed by the moaning wind,
The black blue midnight with its fiery pulse—
So good, so precious, woke a tenderness
In which there lived uneasily a fear
That kept him still awake. And now, high up,
There burned upon the mountain's craggy top
Their journey's rosy signal. On they went;
And as the day advanced, upon a ridge,
They saw their home o'ershadowed by a cloud;
And, hanging but a moment on the steep,
A sunbeam touched it into dusty rain;
And lo the town lay gleaming 'mong the woods,
And the wet shores were bright. As nigh they drew,

The town was emptied to its very babes,
And spread as thick as daisies o'er the fields.
The wind that swayed a thousand chesnut cones,
And sported in the surges of the rye,
Forgot its idle play, and, smit with love,
Dwelt in her fluttering robe. On every side
The people leapt like billows for a sight,
And closed behind, like waves behind a ship.
Yet in the very hubbub of the joy,

A deepening hush went with her on her way;
She was a thing so exquisite, the hind
Felt his own rudeness; silent women blessed
The lady, as her beauty swam in eyes Sweet with unwonted tears. Through crowds she passed,

Distributing a largess of her smiles;
And, as she entered through the Palace gate,
The wondrous sunshine died from out the air,
And everything resumed its common look.
The sun dropped down into the golden west,
Evening drew on apace; and round the fire
The people sat and talked of her who came
That day to dwell amongst them, and they praised
Her sweet face, saying she was good as fair.

So while the town hummed on as was its wont,
With mill, and wheel, and scythe, and lowing steer
In the green field; while, round a hundred hearths,
Brown Labor boasted of the mighty deeds
Done in the meadow swathes, and envy hissed
Its poison, that corroded all it touched—
Rusting a neighbor's gold, mildewing wheat,
And blistering the pure skin of chastest maid—
Edwin and Bertha sat in marriage joy
From all removed, as heavenly creatures winged,
Alit upon a hill-top near the sun,
When all the world is reft of man and town
By distance, and their hearts the silence fills.
Not long; for unto them, as unto all,
Down from love's height unto the world of men
Occasion called with many a sordid voice.
So forth they fared with sweetness in their hearts,
That took the sense of sharpness from the thorn.
Sweet is love's sun within the heavens alone,
But not less sweet when tempered by a cloud
Of daily duties! Love's elixir, drained
From out the pure and passionate cup of youth,
Is sweet: but better, providently used,
A few drops sprinkled in each common dish
Where with the human table is set forth,
Leavening all with heaven. Seated high
Among his people, on the lofty dais,
Dispensing judgment—making woodlands ring
Behind a flying hart with hound and horn—
Talking with workmen on the tawny sands,
Mid skeletons of ships, how best the prow
May slice the big wave and shake off the foam—
Edwin preserved a spirit, calm, composed,
Still as a river at the full of tide;
And in his eye there gathered deeper blue,
And beamed a warmer summer. And when sprang
The angry blood, at sloth, or fraud, or wrong,
Something of Bertha touched him into peace,
And swayed his voice. Among the people went Queen Bertha, breathing gracious charities,
And saw but smiling faces; for the light
Aye looks on brightened colors. Like the dawn—(Beloved of all the happy, often sought
In the slow east by hollow eyes that watch—)
She seemed to husked and clownish gratitude
That could but kneel and thank. Of industry
She was the fair exemplar, as she span
Among her maids; and every day she broke
Bread to the needy stranger at her gate.
All sloth and rudeness fled at her approach;
The women blushed and curtsied as she passed,
Preserving word and smile like precious gold;
And, where on pillows clustered children's heads,
A shape of light she floated through their dreams.

But when the gentle Queen was growing pale

With the new life that stirred beneath her heart,
Her brethren rode up to the Palace gates.
Dismounting there, they greeted first the King, Then kissed her every one. They brought with them

Another kingdom's wonders, which revived
And lived around the table; and their stay
Was that long summer's glorious hunting time.
All day they roared like winds within the woods,
Kept every echo busy with their horns,
Coursed saddest wastes, and broke on lonely pools
With margins lily-paved—that knew no change
Except the snowy convoluted cloud
Down flowing to new shapes without a sound.
One evening, when the hunters sat at feast
With Donegild and Edwin, and the Queen
In silent mood, compact of life and death,
Like day and night in twilight, out they broke
In speech which somewhat antic in attire,
Yet wore most true sincerity at heart.

One cried: "Dost thou remember when we dwelt
In the old world of blue transparent air
Beyond the hills, seven mighty beechen bolls,
The day reposing on our sultry heads,
And thou, the trembling windflower at our feet,
Which no rude wind dared wag till this man came?"

Another then took up the tender thread:
"We missed thee, little sister, as a man
Reft of the special jewel from his neck
With which he loved to play; and, when his hand,
Unthinking, wanders to the empty place,
He starts to find it not!"

And then a third:
"Great changes have come o'er us since thou went'st.

The poor old father, with his grief-bleached head,
Still whitens; and the thought of Regner's death
Yet wears him as a torrent wears a hill.
There is no spring of life in these old men,
And the lopped branch can put forth no fresh leaves—

As they are, they remain. Yet, thanks to Time,
Whose touch alone can numb the bitter wound,
Our Regner's coming would be now as strange,
And would as huge unfitness wear to all,
As did his going hence. The saddest grave
That ever tears kept green must sink at last
Unto the common level of the world;
Then o'er it runs a road."

And then a fourth:
"Ay, the old lamp is sorely scant of oil,
And gutters in the wind. A gentler hand
Than ours it needs to trim the fallen wick
And shelter the still flame until it dies!"

And so they talked and talked about the past
In which we mortals sweetly rooted stand.
Week after week their going was delayed
Till the heath reddened on the rock—till, like
One golden-mouthed, September preached decay
With all its painted woods. And ere they went,
In Bertha's fragrant bosom lay asleep
The sweetest babe that ever mother blest—
A helpless thing, omnipotently weak;
Naked, yet stronger than a man in mail—
That, with its new-born struggling sob and cry,
Softened the childless Palace, and unsealed
Fountains of love undreamed of. Tenderness
Made every arm a cradle, every voice
Soft as a cradle song. Star-like it lay

In Donegild's dark lap, while o'er it she Crooned, like a druid forest, weirdest songs.
And as one poring on a precious seed,
Creates a phantom of the future plant
With odorous terraces of leaf and bloom,
Fairer perchance than ever sun will woo—
Edwin upon the infant gazed, until
Before him rose a nobly-statured man,
Unmarred by sloth, by all excess unstained,
Pure-hearted as a girl, whose edge of will
No stubborn grain could turn—wise, resolute—
The kingly crown his natural covering,
As matted hair the hind's. And Bertha hung
Over its slumber all the live-long day
As moveless as a willow that o'er droops
A well, the while there is in all the world
Not wind enough to turn a silvered leaf.

So the boy throve into his second year,
And babbled like a brook, and fluttered o'er
The rushes, like a thing all wings, to meet
His father's coming, and be breathless caught
From the great foot up to the stormy beard
And smothered there in kisses. And whene'er
Edwin and Bertha sat in grave discourse
Of threatened frontier and the kingdom's need,
If the blue eyes looked upward from their knees,
Their voices in a baby language broke
Down to his level, and the sceptre slipped
Unheeded from the hands that loved his curls
Far more to play with. Every day these twain—
Two misers with their gold in one fair chest
Enclosed—hung o'er him in his noon-day sleep
Upon the wolf-skin—blessed the tumbled hair,
Cheek pillow-dinted, little mouth half-oped
With the serenest passage of pure breath,
Red as a rose-bud pouting to a rose;
Eyelids that gave the slumber-misted blue;
One round arm doubled, while the other lay,
With dainty elbow dimpled like a cheek,
Beside a fallen plaything. Slumbering there,
The fondest dew of praises on him fell,
And the low cry with which he woke was stilled
By a proud mother's mouth.

Then, while the boy
Grew imitative as an echo, while
His mother passed beyond her girlish joys,
And sorrows transient as a summer shower
Chased by the laughing blue, and reached that peace
Of perfect love, that weather of the heart,
Which is the image of the windless days
When July sleeps within the golden air,
And the wheat ripens in its rank—and while King Edwin roamed the happiest Prince on ground—
The black cloud floated over them and broke;
In spring-time when the trees were newly-dressed,
When from its sleep came forth the snake, and when

The nestless cuckoo sought the sparrow's house,
Warm-lined in hawthorn hedge, and left her own
Among the turquoise eggs.

A robber clan
Dwelt in the wastes upon his kingdom's edge,
And harried many a homestead, many a farm;
So, when the cry for succor reached the throne,
King Edwin rose, and with a cloud of horse
Passed suddenly into a townless land,
And fought the robbers there, and many slew,
And pushed the rest, confused, into a marsh
Where rose the leader's tower. There closely cooped
He stood at bay, like badger in his hole,
While men and dogs unearth him. At the last,

The bandits, hunger-clung, burned up with thirst,
Wild-eyed, and clad in rusty iron, came forth,
And offered Edwin, for the gift of life,
Horses, and gold, and faithful following
Where'er he blew his trumpet. But the King,
With their death-warrant in his eye, broke out
Upon the troublers of the public weal,
And called them "liars, malefactors, knaves,
Ungracious creatures, countenanced like men,
Yet hearted, stomached, fanged, and clawed like beasts!

Mere kites and crows that pick the sheep's eyes out;
Mere wolves that prowl about the wattled folds,
With teeth that sharpen as the kidling bleats.
Worthless; who could destroy, but could not make.
Spoilers, who could contribute, for the good
Of toiling villages and towns of men,
But the rank greenness of their graves!" The crew
Hearing themselves thus dedicate to death,
For pardon clamored loudly—begged for life,
Would water bear, hew wood, slave in the homes
Of him and of his people—but the King
Was to all mercy inaccessible
As a sheer precipice to clutching hands,
And hanged the rabble on the doddered oaks
That stunted grew, long lichened in the marsh,
And set the torch unto the leader's tower.
And, while he sat upon his steed, and watched
The smoke of ruin rise up flecked with flame,
A man came with a letter from the Queen,
Which he broke open with a hurried hand,
And read within the saddle as he sat.
And as one walking on a pleasant way,
When tree and hedge are newly-green with spring,
Sweet thoughts in heart, and eyes upon the ground,
Pores suddenly on something at his foot,
That is not of the world in which he dwells,
And startles him into strangeness, so the King,
Perusing with a smile the loving words,
Stooped sudden down on this:—

"The strangest thing
Happened yesterday. For as I sat, a maid
Came with the news that one within the hall,—
A poor far-traveled man, whose face a sun
Warmer than ours had painted,—o'er his food
Was railing in set terms against the gods;
Whereat I went with Regner at my foot.
But when I came, he pushed aside his dish,
And raised his eyes, and blessed me and the child;
Then sat stone-still, in meekest humbleness.
I asked him 'What wrong thing the gods had done?'
Then forth there broke the music of his voice
About a dear God Christ, who hung on tree
While His own children pierced His tender side.
Quoth he, 'This English land belongs to Christ,
And all the souls upon it. He will come,
And merciful possession take of all.'
He asked me 'if the King was then at war?'
I answered 'Yes.' Then said he, 'When Lord
Christ

Comes to His own, the times of war are o'er.
Upon His raiment there are stains of blood,
But 'tis His own, for He can only love.
He never blew a trumpet to the field;
His soldiers are the men who die in fires,
With blessings on their lips for those who stack
The faggots, and who bring the blazing torch;
His nobles, those who have subdued their pride
To the forgetting of a wrong that whets
The sword to think on.' Then his eyes he fixed Upon the child that hid within my robe,
The while his face grew tender with a smile.

'O baby brow, that yet wilt wear a crown!
 O baby hand, that wilt the sceptre hold!
 Thou art beloved of our Brother Christ;
 He carries all earth's children in His heart—
 His heart more tender than a mother's is.
 A child stands ever at the foot of Christ,
 And wanders from Him into manhood. Mayst
 Thou wander not! And when the resting Christ
 Sits in His heaven when the world is done,
 Wearing pure souls as jewels in His crown,
 Mayst thou shine fairly set!' With that he rose,
 Blessing me and the child again, and went,
 Leaving his strange words burning in my ear:
 And through the night I dreamed a gracious shape
 Walked in a garden full of flowers, and full
 Of children—children fair and apple-cheeked,
 Children on pallets stretched—and when the shape
 Passed by these last, they smiled the happiest smile,
 The wan cheek reddened, from the couch they rose,
 And ran among their fellows 'neath the trees.
 When at his foot a chain of children broke,
 There stood my Regner; and methought as one
 Doth pluck the fairest flower of all the flowers,
 In some sequestered hiding-place of spring,
 He took him to his heart: and then I woke."

This letter did the grave King ponder o'er—
 Folding it up, then opening it to read,
 As if in search of something he had missed.
 When evening fell, and the thin crescent moon
 Brightened through crimson vapors, and the tower
 Glowed in the darkness like a burned-out brand,
 The King dismounted, and within his tent
 Pored o'er the letter by the cresset light
 That, star-like, hung beneath the silken roof.

So, when the robber clan was trodden out,
 And all the strongholds razed—upon a day
 Of spring's divinest sunshine, when the breeze
 Had o'er the heaven spread the winnowed cloud
 As reapers shake the loose hay o'er the fields—
 The King rode homeward with a moody heart,
 And all his lords behind, a goodly train.
 And, when they reached the Palace, in a hush—
 For by the weather on the leader's brow
 The followers dressed their own—he leapt from steed,

Flinging the careless reins upon the neck,
 And entered. In the high hall sat the Queen,
 Among her maids. They, singing, sat and span
 The carded wool. She silent bent above
 A struggling battle-piece of horse and man,
 And flying standard, terrible of look.
 The red drops trickled down the soldier's brow
 Unhelmeted. The central charger, speared,
 Rolled a wild eye, and snorted angry breath.
 Almost the trumpeter was heard to blow,
 Dead man to fall on man with iron sound.
 A thing that billowing on a gusty wall
 In blinking faggot light, with strangest life
 Might shake a gazer. By her stood the child,
 Grave for his years, with a most earnest eye,
 Watching the nimble fingers at their task
 Upon the pictured folds. In broke the King—
 In many a grisly crease the thing crept down,
 While Bertha rose and sought his open arms,
 And raised a face no higher than his breast,
 There to be kissed and kissed. And while he held
 The upturned face within his mighty palms,
 Like one with a great cloud upon his mind
 That makes it dark, he broke out, "Dearest wife,
 I cannot rid me of the strange discourse

Thou heldest with the man that came and went.
 Can gods supplant gods as one race of kings
 Another? Is there nothing fixed? Will death
 Not only heir earth's sceptres, but the homes,
 The majesty, the wisdom, and the strength
 Of deities that thunder when they speak?
 Are farewells said in heaven? and has each bright
 And young divinity a sunset hour?
 Methought, as I rode past, the temple shook,
 And deities a dying murmur made—
 Sighing farewell to empire, and to rule.
 Ay, the transparent curtain of the air,
 Hides toil and heart-break and unguessed-of change—

My Regner." Here the child came to his foot,
 All rosy cheek, blue eye, and golden curl,
 And chased dark thoughts away; and, while his brow

Cleared, Edwin from the rushes caught the babe—
 Tossed him as high 's the roof. "O ho! thou imp,
 Wearing a name the dearest to my soul,
 Mocking me with thy mother's smile and eye—
 When wilt thou head a gallant company
 Where hound and horn make music in the dale?
 When wilt thou back a steed? and couch a spear?
 And hurl some great king down in tournament
 With all the plumage of his helmet shred?
 When wilt thou in the bloody battle press
 O'er which thy banner flies, wield axe like him,
 The long-haired fellow in the canvas there,
 As men were trunks of trees? His sun will shine
 In its meridian, wife, when thine and mine
 Are low beneath the hills. Thou morsel, thou—
 Thou bud, thou babbling sweetness full of life
 From foot to curl. Thou trout in sunny pool,
 Thou butterfly in air, thou blue-eyed thing
 Crowing despair away, thou—" Here the boy
 Danced up and down upon his father's hands
 With baby laughter and delighted eyes,
 Was to his face dropped down, drowned in his beard
 And there devoured in kisses, till a noise
 Arose outside, like mews, that o'er a fish
 Clamor and wheel; and then the single voice
 Of one made clamant by a mighty wrong,
 Cried, "Justice, justice, justice for the weak!"
 Upon the floor the King set down the child
 And called out, "Let the poor man hither come;
 He shall have justice." Then into the hall,
 Drawn by the voice, a man came roughly clad
 As a sea-rock with sea-weed. Wild his face,
 Like one who knew waste places and waste hours,
 And had scant share of human fellowship.
 And in the hall he stood before the King.

Then Edwin said, "Stranger, whoe'er thou art,
 If in my realm an ill thing hath been done,
 A maid been wronged, a poor man robbed, a march
 Dishonestly been changed, it is my place
 To smite the wickedness from off the earth—
 Else wherefore is my crown? And do not fear
 There is a dweller in this commonwealth
 Whose proud head wags o'er law. From lowest hut
 To the throne's footsteps, to the throne itself,
 Let wrong and wronger perish. But this much—
 I am no idle creditor of tales
 Brought by the brushwood 'gainst the lordly oak;
 And, if a lie within thy story lurks,
 It, like a wild beast, will I track and kill.
 And desolate the place in which it dwelt.
 Wherefore on justice dost thou cry aloud?"

Then like a weir unsluiced the man began.

"I call for swift revenge upon my foe—
A mighty lord who heeds me and my rage
But as the moated tower blown thistle-down,
Great King, I had a daughter; only one—
Dearer to me a thousand times than life:
Sweet as the heather-bell that from afar
Attracts the bee; and by my side she grew
Full fourteen summers, sweeter every year.
One day, O King, the great lord came my way
And spied the lonely blossom of my life,
And coveted its beauty. It was all
I had—he, gardens of his own to roam
And pluck at will, where every rosebud cropped
With pride would redden. Mine away he stole,
And with it took the sun from out the sky,
The joy from out my life. I followed him,
Fell on my knees before his castle gate,
And prayed that he would give me back my flower,
Pure as at first; if not, then any way;
Soiled, sodden, withered, of its leaves despoiled,
To me dear ne'er the less. He mocked my grief,
Struck these old grey hairs down upon the stones."

Then rushed to Edwin's temples the hot blood.
"Old man, if this sad tale of thine be true,
The evil lord shall surely die the death,
Though he stand foremost in my roll of knights,
Yea, were my mother's son. What is his name?
However strongly girt by fosse and tower
Thy voice is his death-warrant."

Then the flame
In the man's face sank low at once. He said,
In broken meekness, "Mighty King, I am
But withered grass beneath the feet of all,
Despised and trodden, nor doth it befit
Me to arraign great lords. And, when 'tis come
To this, I tremble at the single word
That once unloosed, will, like the lightning, rend
And spread a desolation far and wide.
In this pure presence also would I not
Blazon the shame of one who beareth arms,
And eats with thee at feast. And therefore King,
I pray thee, let me in thy private ear
Whisper the name of him that did the thing."

To him then answered Edwin: "Fear, methinks, Should with the wronger dwell, not with the wronged.

Though all my knights were standing now in hall,
The name should be clear spoken out at once.
The scarlet face but to one man belongs,
To him it sticks for ever, not to thee.
Yet, if the name of that uncourteous lord,
Which to dishonor's keeping shall be given,
Among the sins and falsehoods of the world,
Ne'er to be rendered back, thou wilt not give
Where best it should be; standing on thy wrong
In the clear public air—come with me hence."
The King turned with an angry port; the man

Followed him meekly, stepping like a cat,
With silent footsteps. Hardly had they gone,
Before there twirled the distaff of a maid,
Before the patient needle of the Queen
Renewed its work on arm and brandished spear,
A sharp cry rose, a fall, and then a voice.
Like some pure bevy of white-breasted doves
By a hawk fluttered, skirred the maids, the Queen
Flew to the sound; they, gathered in a crowd,
Flocked at her heel. Against the wall the King
Leaned like one hurt, his hand upon his side,
At his foot the cursed knife; the while, the man
Upon the floor lay groveling like a beast
Whose backbone has been broken by a shot—
His face distort with pain. When these he saw,
The King smiled in that bitter sort which hides
A grievous wound, and mocks it. "Wife," he said,
"This strange wild-cat has scratched me, that is all.
And yet no thanks. For with that tumbled stool,
I've crushed the creature to a broken heap
Of agony, that ne'er will bite or claw.
Wherefore against me didst thou lift the knife?"
Whereat the writhing snake with dying lips,
Dabbled with poisonous foam: "It was not I,
'Twas Ethelbert that struck thee from the grave.
His spirit passed into me when he died,
And for thy life I hungered as for food.
My hate suborned the world against thy life.
All things were my confederates and spies;
The running stream that caught thy shadow, knew
I sought thy life, and told it to the reed.
The myriad grass-blades whispered of thy steps,
As thou didst pass intent on peace or war.
The flower from out its covert leaned and watched;
The forest leaves took note of thee, and made
A murderous murmur to my greedy ears.
Aided by grass and flower, I found thee; struck—Struck home, as thou struck'st home. O mighty King,

A poor fool hath o'erreached thee. Thou didst boast
The cunning'st lie thou couldst nose out, as hound
The skulking fox. I led thee through a land,
The foxes' trail was rank on bush and brake,
Where was thy scent then? With a lie I fanned
Thy virtuous rage for justice, made it flame
Fiercely 'gainst nothing. Dying folly mocks
A dying wisdom. Take my hand, great King,
For we are fellow travelers on the way
To death's void darkness." At this Edwin stamped,
"Ho, Offa, Cedric! I've blown the candle out,
But yet the wick stinks foully." Then he reeled
And caught at something in the deathly mist,
But Bertha stayed him. By supporting arms,
Slowly the wounded man was led to couch.
And there for many a weary day and night,
Low lay the princely pillar of the state,
And by his side, but by him all unheard,
His mother wept aloud like blustering March;
Bertha, like breathless April, close and still.

BOOK IV.

SEVEN days and nights the Queen sat by the couch
With cooling cup and pillow-smoothing hand,
And propped the wild and matted head that throbbed
With fiery veins. In watches of the night
She weeping heard, like some clock out of gear
Striking strange hours, the cool and temperate lips
Rave of a battle lost and hasty flight,
And of a hate that chased him o'er the land,
And of a stone without a traitor's gate,
And of a spirit that did prophesy

Of ruined thrones rebuilt and deaths of kings,
And of a promised something yet to come
With universal change. The wasteful sea
Of ancient sorrow which was pushed far back
By dyke and labored mole, till but a sound
Haunted with grief the shores of happiness,
Broke down its barriers, drowning cot and town,
Tillage and blossomed wood, until the caves
Which summer had o'erspread with leaf and bloom,
And all the old sea margins heard again

The wild waves welter and the sea-birds cry.
Seven days and nights the Queen sat by his couch
The while her tears and kisses were unknown.
The lords, who were to him right hand and left,
On whom he built as on the solid ground,
Were strangers; and the people thronged the doors
Devouring every morsel of the news Brought from the sick room where the King was laid,

For they were helpless as a town whose walls
Have fallen when the foe is in the field.
On the eighth night he fell in slumber deep,
And Donegild and Bertha o'er him hung,
For he lay moveless as the sea at full
Ere the tide 'gins to turn; and, when he woke
He knew the tear-wet faces and the lips
And pressing hands; and slowly glimmered back,
Like something coming out of racking mist,
The man who cried for justice, and the blow,
And then the sharp pain of his unhealed wound.
Each day thereafter like a fairy brought
The King some gift of health, some red to cheek,
Some lustre to the eye. When passed a week
And, gathering strength he lay within the hall,
The Queen upon a low stool at his feet
Played with his wasted hand, far dearer now,
In that it had been neighbor unto death,
Than when 'twas hers upon her marriage morn,
And in the childishness of her delight
She covered it with kisses. Then the hand,
Warm with the loving roses of her lips,
Slipped from her grasp, and in love's silence stroked
Bright golden hair and happy cheek that leaned—
And, as she spake she smiled at the caress.
“Husband, within the palace of thy heart
I have free range of audience hall, and room
Where people throng, or where thou sitt'st alone
Holding a thoughtful session in thy soul,
Whither each deed is summoned. Well I know
Each door is wide. But tell me, is there not
Some little private closet in the place
For which I have no key? Is there not one?
A little one? When that dark visitress,
Delirium, through the silent chamber stalked
The sad and sovereign mistress for the time,
She left a door ajar, where horror lay
And perturbation, and a fear that looks
And listens for calamity that moves
Somewhere within the future with no shape.
What spirit was it that did speak with thee?
And what will on a sudden step from air,
To change the world?” Thereat the sick King's hand

Stayed on the hair and on the nestling cheek,
And Bertha's heart beat thick before he spoke.
“I would, my Bertha, thou hadst never known,
Or that the knowledge and the thing had come Together. That were better far. For oft
When on me blows the cold foreboding wind,
The clearness of my spirit is made gross
By its own sands. For long my mood of mind
Is that of one on expectation's edge,
Who, having heard a herald's trumpet blow,
Doth wait for what 'tis blown for. Seated once,
Years bygone now, without thy father's gate,
At midnight a strange man stood at my feet
And told me that in battle huge and wide
King Ethelbert would fall with all his lords,
That I should call thee wife, and that my throne
Would be rebuilt, that I should teachers have
Who knew the secrets in the hand of death,
That once more he would come,—and then like mist

He melted, and again I sat alone.
King Ethelbert and all his nobles fell;
Thou art the truest wife that ever breathed
Or shared the joys and sorrows of a man;
My throne is 'stablished, and a little hand
Is growing for my sceptre when it falls,
Be that day soon or late. But where are they,
The teachers? And the apparitional man,
When will he reappear? I cannot doubt
The end will prove as the beginning, true.
No Summer ever yet did midway pause
And without wheaten sheaf return to Spring.
Who knows, it may be that this same Lord Christ
Of whom thou heard'st, this Christ that seems to break

O'er me like a strange dawn, within whose light
The world takes other hues, may have to do
With that for which I wait.” And then the Queen,
With a poor trembling cheer upon her lips
Upbubbling through her blank astonishment, “Ah, husband, husband! though our lives are wrapt

Within a cloud of wonder, do not fear;
The voice hath only half fulfilled itself;
Good hath its half fulfilment been; much good
For us is on the way.” And, as she leaned
Her head against his side, she hardly felt
The gaunt hand wandering over hair and cheek.

But ere King Edwin's bitter hurt was whole
He hungered for the whirr of windy mills
And din of carpenters among the ships.
While chained with weakness to a painful couch
It irked him to be like a mossing stone
Within the hearing of the running stream.
Cooped up, his thirst for noble action towered
At times unto the captured lion's mood,
When all his waste of burning sand and sky
Shrinks to a twilight den, which his disdain
Can measure at a stride. Once, as he lay
Stretched weak in hall, there came a hasty man,
Astonishment depicted on his face,
And told the King a ship lay on the sands,
And from it issued strange and foreign men.
Unknowing what the strangers might portend,
Straightway he rose from couch and sat on steed,
Gaunt, fever-wasted, pale with conquered pain,
And, as he rode adown the narrow street,
His lords behind, he broke the silent air
To murmured blessings, for at unwonted sound
Of hoofs, each window was with faces crammed;
The black-browed armorer on the anvil left
His hammer, and stood gazing from the door,
The woman held her child up as he passed,
The beggar's hand forgot to stretch for alms,
The girl laid down her pitcher. With an eye
That softened, slowly through the town he rode,
And, slowly issuing from the gate, he spurred
Along a rude sea bank of mounded sand
'Gainst which the universal glitter flowed,
With a sharp face that reddened in the wind.
But ere the foam was churning on the bit,
He saw a crowd of people sea-ward look,
As at some strange thing happening on the earth:
And, riding down upon a yellow bay,
From which the unseen moon had drawn the tide,
He drew the rein with wonder. In the bright Fringe of the living sea that came and went Tapping its planks, a great ship sideways lay,
And o'er the sands a grave procession paced
Melodious with many a chaunting voice.
Nor spear nor buckler had these foreign men;

Each wore a snowy robe that downward flowed ;
 Fair in their front a silver cross they bore ;
 A painted Saviour floated in the wind ;
 The chaunting voices, as they rose and fell,
 Hallowed the rude sea-air. On these the King
 Stared wonder-stricken—marble horse and man
 Not more bereft of motion. All the lords
 Sat silent and wide-eyed. The foremost man,
 Who seemed the leader of the white-robed train,
 Unbent, although his beard was white as snow,
 And the veins branched along his withered hands,
 Spake, while to Edwin he obeisance made.
 "To thee, who bear'st the likeness of a king,
 'Tis fit that I should speak, that thou may'st know
 What is the business of thy servants here.
 We come to traffic not in horse or man,
 Corn, wine, or oil ; nor yet to gather gold,
 Nor to win cities by the force of arms.
 O King ! we came across the dangerous seas
 To win thee and thy people from the gods
 Who cannot hear a cry or answer prayer,
 Unto the worship of the heavenly Christ,
 Of whom thou art the eldest son of all
 That in this nation dwell. We are unarmed ;
 'Tis in thy power to strike us through with spears,
 To stake us in the pathway of the tide,
 To burn us in the fire. Within thy hands
 Thou hast our lives. But yet we trust in Christ,
 From whose pure hand each king derives his crown,
 And in whose keeping are the heavenly worlds,
 No harm shall us befall. We bring thee Christ—
 The Christ before whose coming devils flee,
 Idolatrous fires burn low, and horrid drums,
 Beaten to drown the shrieks of sacrifice,
 Are covered o'er with silence."

Then the King
 Stirred from his marble trance, and color flashed
 Across his face, as something in his soul
 Murmured, like a reverberating cliff,
 The apparition's words without the gate
 Of Redwald on the night he sat alone ;
 But straightway he possessed himself and spake :

"Within my realm no harm shall thee befall ;
 And as thou hast into my kingdom come
 So far, and art desirous to make known
 Thy spirit's dear inheritance of truth,
 Or what thou deem'st its dear inheritance,
 Thou shalt have sustenance within my towns,
 And lodgement as is fit. Nay, more than this—
 To-morrow, here, beneath the open sky,
 Where magical arts are powerless, will I bring
 In council all my lords, and ancient men
 Who have inherited wisdom with their snows,
 To give thee patient hearing. For myself,
 Although not minded to desert the gods
 My fathers followed, and beneath whose sway
 The happy seasons still have come and gone,
 I keep an open door for thoughts and men
 That wear strange clothes and speak with foreign tongues ;
 Such hospitality befits a King."

Thereat the King and all the knights returned :
 Them the procession followed, with the folk
 Dispread on either side in cloudy wings ;
 And when the priests, the cross before them borne,
 Beheld the city in the yellow light,
 And all the King's train riding to the gate,
 Sudden a choir of silver voices rose :—
 "Lord Christ, we do beseech Thee in Thy grace,
 Let not Thine anger 'gainst this city burn,

Nor 'gainst Thy holy house, for we have sinned !"
 And so they sang until the gate was reached.
 There, like a stream, that fretting on a stone
 Is on itself pushed back, the tumult grew ;
 At last, from out the struggle and the press,
 Adown the street the white procession flowed,
 And, like a rookery that starts on wing,
 And hangs a noisy blackness in the air,
 The town was uproar, till a courteous knight
 Sent by the King, into a dwelling wide,
 Right opposite the palace, brought the priests,
 And closed great doors upon a crowd close pressed
 And jammed like wethers in a fold. And then
 As the tumultuous rookery that wheels
 Above its ancient trees, subsides at last,
 Each bird beside its nest upon the bough,
 And caws itself to silence, all the mass
 Dense wedged, split like an ice-floe in a thaw,
 Then gathered into clumps of twos and threes,
 And, ere the evening, from the street withdrew
 To babble of the wonder by the fire.

And, when the town had brawled itself to rest,
 Edwin went privately unto the priests
 To further learn of Christ, and stayed a space.
 Then he came back and sat beside the Queen,
 And talked of all the wonders of the day ;
 But, with a mind confused, and blurred by doubt,
 And indistinct, as in dim-weeping dawns
 When wreaths of mist are stretched from tree to tree,

The landscape which a man knows as himself !
 And, when she like a star had set, he turned
 The matter o'er and o'er within his mind,
 And broke out with a touch of fretfulness,
 For his deep wound twinged sharply. "If 'twere but

The building of a city, or a ship,
 Defence of threatened frontier, anything
 That may be compassed by apparent means,
 And, being compassed, brings apparent good !
 This Christ has ne'er been seen by living eye,
 His voice has ne'er been heard by living ear,
 And if beneath his banner I enlist,
 Service life long, obedience absolute,
 Strict abstinence from all ambitious thoughts,
 Stern curbing of the war-horse in the heart,
 Are needed ; and long years of purity,
 That shame the honor of a knight, that shame
 The nobleness of kings. War is forbid ;
 I must forgive the man that injures me.
 What if, when I am on a death-bed laid,
 Hoary with painful years, no Christ should be ?
 I have my spirit tortured for a dream :
 The man who wrongs me insolently laughs ;
 And unenlarged my kingdom for my son ;
 And unembalmed by victories, my name
 Will perish like a nothing from the earth,
 Unrescued by a harpstring. Could I place
 This Christ within the temple of the gods ?
 One must be right ! But then this man brings
 Christ

To save me from the worship of the gods,
 To smite in dust their shrines. Divinities
 Are jealous of divinities. They may Forgive the worshipper ; they ne'er forgive
 The proud thing praised and worshipped. It is kill, Kill, kill, and overturn !" So thus and thus
 From divers points the King's mind blew until
 The lamp was fading, and forgetful sleep
 Hung on the weary eyelid. Then he rose,
 Stepped to his boy and kissed him, as he lay,

Round, rosy cheeked, beneath a cloud of curls ;
And sought his couch until the early dawn.

But till the dawn he slumbered not, for—like
A rude petitioner that presses suit
In the market-place, and, urgent, dogs the heel
Of him, whose word is grace, to audience hall
And thence to private chamber—yet unlaid
By an irrevocable yea or nay,
The thing pursued him to his couch, unchanged,
Confronted him in dream. So, when the town
Was growing white with dawn, the King, to 'scape
The tyranny of thought that made him toss
From deep to deeper fever, and suborned
Against his peace the motions of the blood
That beat and surged against his ear, arose
And clothed himself and hasted out to bathe
In cool grey light soft flowing from the east,
Scented with dewy woods, and in its heart
The chirrupings of newly wakened birds.
Dawn struck on fevered forehead, and on eyes
Reddened with watching, as he paused to look Upon the glimmering city, stretching out
In slumber's silent trustfulness ; no sound—
The white light pouring down on wall and roof,
The secure raven flying low—that lit,
And from the temple croaked. "Ah little town,
Round which I am a wall, which I have fed
As tenderly as e'er a parent bird
Its nest of callow young, which I have kept
As shepherd keeps his sheep—the thing I do,
The way I turn in this grave matter scoops
A channel for thy flow to good or ill.
This thing, though clamant, is ungraspable,
Bodiless, airy, and transacts itself
In spiritual regions all unbreathed,
And strange, as is a new-created world
Unprinted by a foot. I am a staff
Placed upright on the ground, and have no power
To fall this way or that, but fall I must,
And by the way I fall shall Deira grow.
Unwise, irresolute, it is my doom
To lift on high my voice, and at my voice
A future with an unimagined face
Will break on thee and me." Thereat the King,
(As on the night he sat without the gate)
With unknown terror shook from head to heel,
And lo, there stood within a lane of dawn
A folded shape that, slow advancing, laid
A hand upon his head, and at the sign
So well remembered, waited for through years
With a desire that called it, and again
With blood chill-streaming and a cowering heart,
Edwin fell on his knees, and then the Shape—
"Kneel not to me, but to the heavenly Christ !
Have not the things I promised come to pass ?
Have I not sent Paulinus as I said ?
To his instructions give attentive ear,
And bring thy people also unto him,
That Christ may be the Lord of all. And know
This fertile island in the narrow seas
Parceled in seven states that fret and fume
Fiercely against each other, shall grow one,
And a far distant son of thine shall sit
Within its capital city high enthroned,
The crown upon his head. The crown from Christ
He will receive on coronation day.
The kingdoms and the nations of the earth
Are tools with which Christ works ; and many He Hath broken, for the metal faithless proved ;
And many He hath thrown aside to rust
In a neglected corner ; many worn

With noble service into nothingness :
This England, when 'tis tempered to His need,
Will be His instrument to shape the world
For many a thousand years. O mighty Prince,
Within the East is born a day of days,
For Christ this day will to thy kingdom come
And seek therein to dwell. Be faithful thou,
That faithfulness may live from king to king."
At this a ray smote Edwin on the face,
Each dew-drop twinkled gem-like on the thorn,
And with wet wing from out the fields behind
A lark rose singing, and when Edwin looked
He was alone with sunrise on the hills.

The town that morning was all ear and eye,
There was no sound of shipwrights on the beach,
The wind twirled empty mills, the armorer's fire
No bellows blew to crimson. Like a stream
On which frost lays his hand, all work stood still.
The child looked up into its father's face,
And, seeing what it could not understand,
Sat still and played not. As the morn drew on,
A voice, the clatter of a passing hoof,
Crammed every door with faces. Then the folk
Gathered in groups to stare upon the house
In which the priests were lodged, and strove to shape,
In ignorant wonder what event was ripe ;
And now the stirring palace took the pulse,
And raised the flying rumor which o'er-swept
The crowd, as wind a wheat field. Now one rode
As if in haste adown the narrow street,
One oped a palace window and looked forth,
One tightened girth of steed. Conjecture made
These nothings monstrous as the shade that stalks
Along the shining vapor 'mong the hills
When the red sun is at the herdsman's back.
Then, while the crowd was growing more and more,
The knight went from the palace for the priests :
And then King Edwin and his nobles rode Adown the street and issued from the gate,
And half the people thither ran ; and now
From out the dwelling streamed the holy priests,
With silver cross and Saviour raised in air,
Each clad in snowy vestments, and they sang.
The clear sweet voices and the gleam of white
Drew mothers forth that held their babes to breast,
And tottering children, and infirmest men
That by the fire had sat for many a year
Discoursing querulously of stitch and ache,
Till, like a hay-field reft of all its cocks,
Or like a beach at ebb with yawning caves
Silent and tenantless, the town was left.
Awhile the crowd surged at the narrow gate,
And then it poured upon the ample down
Beyond, where by commandment of the King
They all were seated crescent-wise on grass.
He and his lords and grey-haired counselors,
Dismounted stood within the tapering rings,
With them the white-robed priests. In front the sea
Stretched leagues of frosted silver ; on one side
The temple stood, dark with a passing cloud.

And then the King spake out right clear and loud,
Heard by the multitudes on either side.
"Demons and gods have power beneath our roofs,
But not beneath the azure. Pure soft light
Disarms them, makes them innocent ; and so
I've brought my people here to list thy words.
Friends, a strange bird has flown from o'er the sea
Into this air of England. Here it sits,
And here it meditates to build a nest.

'Tis in our power to scare the bird away,
'Tis in our choice to let it build and breed.
What say ye? Shall it go or shall it stay?"

There was a silence for some minutes' space :
At last from out the circle of the priests
Stood Coifi, giant-moulded, bred of priests,
And highest 'neath the gods : and though debarred
The use of spear or steed, his soul was aye
A broad-disked flower at gaze on battle's sun.
He never knew contentment, and his mood
Was stormful, passionate, as the mountain land
Where 'gainst the rocky barrier streams the blast,
Where the red torrent flays the gorge's throat,
The passing sunbeam smites the rainy ledge
Making it wildly shine,—and thus he spake
Fiercely, but with the fierceness curbed and reined.
"O King, consider well what shall be said,
For truly the religion we uphold
Seems to me, barren, virtueless, and dead.
What benefit is there in churlish gods
That take our rolling incense and our prayers
And give us nothing in return? The dogs
That follow at our heels we now and then
Requite with a caress, and throw them bits
From out the very dish on which we sup.
Not one of all thy people more than I
Hath worn his knees, but brighter many know
Thy countenance than I ; more prosperous
In all their undertakings are than I.
Now if the gods are good for any thing
They would advance their faithful worshipper.
The man that season after season tills
A field that yields no crop, grows tired at last,
Curses its barrenness and lets it stand,
And takes to others ; of his mind am I.
Giftless the rich churl's as the beggar's hand :
Whether the gods are churls or beggars, this
I know that they have given nought to me,
Nor do I think their hands will e'er relax ;
And so, if these new doctrines promise more,
We should accept them, King, without delay."

Thus Coifi, visaged like the thunder-cloud
That steeps the crag in lurid purple. Then
Rose Ella, hoary with a hundred years,
Who dreamed his life away, afar from men
As glimmering wraiths of twilight in old woods
That into nothing flit from oak to oak
Whene'er comes human footstep ; and his smile
Put all in memory of those days in Spring
With sunshine covered, but whose sunniness
Foretells an earlier coming on of tears
Than even gloom itself. "To me," he said,
"To me, O King, this present life of man
Seems in comparison of unknown time
Like a swift sparrow flying through a room,
Wherein thou sitt'st at supper with thy lords,
A good fire in the midst, while out of doors
In gusty darkness whirls the furious snow
That wall and window blocks. The sparrow flies
In at one door, and by another out,
Brief space of warm and comfortable air
It knows in passing, then it vanishes
Into the gusty dark from whence it came.
The soul like that same sparrow comes and goes,
This life is but a moment's sparrow-flight
Between the two unknowns of birth and death :
An arrow's passage from an unknown bow Toward an unknown bourne. O King, I have
This matter meditated all my days,
And questioned death, but with no more effect

Than if I shouted 'gainst a stormy wind
And had my words dashed back in my own face.
If therefore these new doctrines bring me light,
All things I would renounce to follow them."

He ceased : then at a signal from the King,
The grey Paulinus in his robe of white
In front of all his white-robed followers
Upraised a hushing hand, and all was still.
"Fair island people, blue-eyed, golden-haired,
That dwell within a green delicious land
With noble cities as with jewels set—
A land all shadowed by full-acorned woods,
Refreshed and beautified by stately streams—
We heard this island with its climate pure
Was given o'er to heathen deities :
That these were worshipped with the bended knee,
Unholy fire, and smoke of sacrifice.
And we are come to smite the deities,
And to the idolatrous temples set the torch.
For this we took our lives within our hands,
For this we drew a furrow through the sea,
And this we will accomplish ere we die.
And furthermore we come to speak of Christ,
Who from his heaven looked down, and saw a world
Crimson with stains of wicked battle-fields,
And loud with the oppressions of the poor.
And, moved with gracious pity, wrapt the sun
Of his Divinity in a mortal cloud
Till it was tempered to our human sight.
And, for the love he bore the race of men,
Full thirty years ungrudgingly he breathed
Our human breath, endured our human needs,
Hungered and thirsted, oft without a home.
Though but a man he seemed, such virtue dwelt
Within the compass of his mortal frame,
That poor and forlorn creatures near their death
Touched by his garments were made instant whole.
And all the time he lived upon the earth
He cast out devils, gave the blind their sight ;
With slender store of loaves and fishes fed
A hungry multitude close-ranged on grass ;
And, walking on the waters, with a word
Made all the roaring lake of Galilee
Sink to a glassy mirror for the stars.
Yea at his word a three days' buried man
Came forth to light with grave-clothes on his face.
And, when the times of wickedness were full,
When by the vilest city in the world
Nailed to a cross upreared against the sky
He hung with malefactors—dismal sight
The sun dared not to look on—with a prayer
For him who pierced his body with the spear,
For him who tore his temples with the thorns,
For him who mocked his thirst with vinegar,
The Lord Christ bleeding bowed his head and died ;
And by that dying did he wash earth white
From murders, battles, lies, ill deeds, and took Remorse away that feeds upon the heart
Like slow fire on a brand. From grave he burst ;
Death could not hold him, and ere many days
Before the eyes of those that did him love
He passed up through yon ocean of blue air
Unto the heaven of heavens, whence he came.
And there he sits this moment man and God ;
Strong as a God, flesh-hearted as a man,
And all the uncreated light confronts
With eye-lids that have known the touch of tears.
Marvel not, King, that we have come to thee.
If but one man stood on the farthest shore,
Thither I would adventure with the news—
News that undungeons all from sin and fear.

The glimmering wisp, the sprite that haunts the ford,

The silent ghost that issues from the grave
Like a pale smoke that takes the dead man's form
Can scare us never more, for Christ made all,
And lays His ear so close unto the world
That in lone desert, peril, or thick night,
A whispered prayer can reach it. In the still Abyss of midnight lives a human heart,
And therefore all the loneliness and space
And all the icy splendors cannot freeze.
Coifi, I bring to thee no churlish God:
A heaven-full of reward he has for those
That love and serve. And thou, most ancient man,
For ever musing on a grassy grave,
Death is a dinted couch; for there a space
Christ's limbs have rested, and that knowledge takes
The loneliness, which is death's fear away.
And in the light beyond earth's shade He sits
With all the happy spirits of the dead
Silent as garden flowers that feed on air,
And thither thou wilt join Him in due time.
O King! O City! seated on the grass
We have unpacked our bales. Christ cannot come
Where any idol is; so burn them down.
King, be the wind to blow these clouds away,
That Christ's clear sky may over-arch thy land."

He ceased; but on the hem of his address
Ere yet a man could say that he had ceased,
Cried Coifi, while his face in splendor broke,
And shone among the others dark with doubt;
As, when a day of rolling vapor dims
A waste of congregated pool and mere,
One, smit by sunshine from a cloudy rift,
Glitters among the gloomy brotherhood,
And wears the gleam while all the rest are dark:
"O King, give ear unto the stranger's words,
Surely the truest, best that ever ear
Gave welcome habitation to. For long
To me the worship of the native gods
Was emptiness and vapor: and if truth
In that religion dwelt, 'twas spectre-like
And fleeting as the rainbow in the shower,
That ever shifts its place and flying smiles.
In this new doctrine, if I judge aright,
Truth lives not like an unbroke skittish colt
That never yet has known the touch of man;
That starts, and whinnying flies, if but a head
O'ertops its pales, or any noise is made—
But in contentment like the paddocked steed
That has a life of noble service led
And fears not the approach of any man,
May saddled be and used. The deities
Are but the mighty shadows of ourselves,
And reach no higher than our highest moods.
But this Christ has existence all untouched
By fond imagination or belief:
And, being Lord, the richly furnished world
Is an unemptied treasury of gifts
For those He loves; and, on rebellious men,
He has for executioners the sea,
Snow-drift, and sun-fire, blast, and thunderstone,
Earthquake and shivering lightnings red with haste:
All good is resident within His smile,
All terror in His frown. And, therefore King,
It seems to me expedient that the gods,
Voiceless and empty-handed as our dreams,
Should be at once forsaken, and the torch
Be set unto the temples we have built."

And, when the full heaped wave of Coifi's words

Broke sudden in a wreath of dying foam,
The King arose, and with him rose a sound.
"Ye strangers who have come across the sea,
Ye people who have known me all my days,
I here, in seeing of the earth and sky,
Unclothe myself of the religion dark
Which I and all my forefathers have worn,
And put on Christ like raiment white and clean.
To this I am not urged by wantonness,
Nor by a weak and giddy love of change.
This thing I have considered o'er and o'er,
And, when my spirit wavered, it was fixed
And clamped unalterably as with iron
By spiritual visitors and signs;
And that these spiritual signs and shapes
Were offspring of no over-heated brain,
This kingdom I am king of is the proof.
Ye priests, I take allegiance unto Christ;
My crown I wear as vassal unto Him:
This day I Christ as my commander take,
And as His faithful soldier will I live,
And as His faithful soldier will I die.
And, as the dawn from out the heaven comes
And on the craggy mountain's highest peak
Kindles a fire, then, falling lower, breaks
In splendor on the fortress on the crag,
Then rosy makes the solitary mere
Deep in the wrinkled armpit of the hill,
Then strikes a rainbow on the cataract,
Then with a sunbeam wakes the misty vale,
Till in the light the little children laugh
And over all the world is morning—so
From me, who am the highest in the state,
This new religion will step down to priest,
From priest to noble, and from thence through all
The ranged degrees that make a commonwealth
Until it reach the laborer soiled with clay,
And Christ will o'er us rule in perfect peace.
But, being now His soldier, it is meet
That I make war upon His enemies;
Who of my priests and nobles standing round
Will first profane the temples of the gods
And all the dark enclosures sacred held?"
Then Coifi without pausing answered, "I,
For surely of thy people it befits
No one so well as him who was their priest.
If I the dwellings of the gods outrage,
With a forbidden horse, unlawful spear,
And smite them and return again unhurt,
What then? Yon ancient boulder on the hill,
That wears obscure the features of a man,
Is strong, divine, and worshipful as they.
But, if the blow and clangor of my lance
Should pierce the stony calm, and draw a voice
And lightnings that will blast me, I but die,
And by my death I bring the gods alive,
And in the fairer summers that will come
My name will be remembered oft with praise.
The profanation of the gods is mine;
Provide me, King, a stallion, and a spear."
Thereat arose confusion manifold,
And one perched on an eminence might see
That through the crowds that stood stock-still there ran
Meandering currents, like the ruffled belts
That bend and waver through the oily calm
When noonday lies in slumber on the deep.
Soon from the tumult running footmen broke
Leading the coal black stallion of the King
That plunged and neighed, his knee and counter dashed
With foamy flakes, and on him Coifi sprang

Priest-vested as he was, and curbed and reined
 The mighty brute as though his heels were armed,
 And loud cuirass and greave his daily wear.
 While with his hooves the stallion bruised the turf,
 Coifi leaned sideways, stretched a hand and caught
 A glittering spear, and, poisoning it, gave rein
 And rode toward the temple, and the crowd,
 Deeming the priest stark mad or brain-distract,
 In that he was so covetous of death,
 Broke after him in wild and shrieking lines;
 But Coifi struck them marble as he crashed
 Through the enclosures ever sacred held,
 And gained the central space unharmed, and rode Thrice round and round, then in his stirrup stood,
 And, with a high defiance on his lip,
 Smote, with a clang, an Idol, monster-faced;
 And, as he smote, the foul thing reeling, fell,
 Fell Dagon-like, face downwards on the grass.
 And, when from every heart the icy hand
 Of fear was lifted, sea-like grew the noise.
 And Coifi shouted something from the place,
 And, as in answer to the half-heard shout,
 King Edwin's voice the mighty uproar clove,
 "Consume with fire the idols and their homes;
 Burn stake and god together!" And the cries
 Within the crowds a sacred fury wrought,
 The deities were tumbled on the grass,
 The pales and the enclosures were torn down
 By naked hands, and flung into a heap,
 And one a torch applied; and through the smoke
 There flickered here and there the fiery tongues
 That crackled, spread, and ever higher climbed;
 Till the scorched beam came thundering down, and towers

Of flame rushed up, then licked the air and died.
 And when the world was quivering through a film

Of furnace heat that shook in welling lines,
 And a great smoke rolled off and sea-ward spread,
 And dimmed the gleam from headland on to cape,
 And ever louder grew the swarming crowds,
 The white-robed priests together standing sang,
 "Down falls the wicked idol on his face,
 So let all wicked gods and idols fall!
 Come forth, O light, from out the breaking East,
 And with thy splendor pierce the heathen dark,
 And morning make on continent and isle
 That thou may'st reap the harvest of thy tears,
 O Holy one that hung upon the tree."

So, when the temple lay a ruined mass,
 And the gorged flames were low upon the brand,
 And a great vapor breathed across the sea,
 King Edwin called his people; and they came
 Long line on line as tide sets to the shore.
 And then he pointed to the smoky blot
 Athwart the sea-light and the peaceful sky.
 "Behold our old religion hanging there,
 Behold it dying in the heavenly ray;
 So dies the error of a thousand years!
 Thee would we thank, Paulinus, but the top
 And pinnacle of our indebtedness,
 No language e'er can scale. Yet would we know Whose hand it was that reached us o'er the sea."
 Then to the King Paulinus answered straight,
 "I gladly shall instruct thee, mighty King.
 The holy Pontiff Gregory sent us here;
 The saintliest spirit after Christ, whose soul
 In clearest light and meditation dwells,
 And is of his corporeal body free
 As is the lark in heaven of its nest;
 One day it happened that to the market-place

In Rome, Pope Gregory went, and, through the crowds

Of buyers and of sellers walking, saw
 A crowd of lovely boys exposed for sale;
 Fair-faced were they, white-skinned, and azure-eyed,

And to their shoulders hung the yellow hair.
 Moved by their beauty, Gregory enquired
 Who were they? from what country they were brought?

And some one said they came from Britain. Then
 He marvelled if the isle that bred such youth
 Was Christian, or lay yet in pagan dusk;
 And those around him told that never yet
 That island's tongue had shaped the name of Christ.
 Then sighed he from the bottom of his heart;
 'Alas!' he said, 'that Darkness and its King
 Should such fair creatures in possession hold!
 Alas, that creatures as the morning fair
 Should live with darken'd spirits!' Then he turned,
 And went home musing o'er this island's good;
 And the desire grew powerful that the tongue
 Of Britain, which could modulate alone
 Dark idol-prayer and hoarse battle-cry,
 Should utter Hallelujah. So when time
 Was ripe, at his behest we sailed from Gaul
 Freight with prayer and the name of Christ;
 And landed here. The holy Pontiff's heart,
 That aches with the great darkness of the world,
 Is this day lightened, for among the tongues
 That rise to heaven in prayer, there is one
 Ne'er heard by Christ before; another string
 Is to the world-harp added, praising Christ.
 For what has been accomplished on this day,
 Fragrant will Gregory's memory be held
 By every race of Englishmen to be.
 From out the twilight of unnoted time
 The history of this land hath downward come
 Like an uncited stream that draws its course
 Through empty wildernesses, and but hears
 The wind sigh in the reed, the passing crane;
 But Christ this day hath been upon it launched,
 Like to a golden barge with burnished oars,
 Whose progress makes the lonely waters blush,
 And floods the marshes with melodious noise.
 And, as that river widens to the sea,
 The barge I speak of will dilate and tower,
 And put forth bank on bank of burnished oars,
 And on the waters like a sunset burn,
 And roll a lordlier music far and wide,
 And ever on the dais a King shall sit,
 And ever round the King shall nobles stand."

Thereafter in a stream that ran to sea
 The King and all his nobles and his priests,
 Were by Paulinus in Christ's name baptised
 And solemnly unto his service sealed.
 And then Paulinus lifted up his hands,
 And blessed them and the people. But by this
 The congregated clouds along a sea
 From every fret and wrinkle smoothed began
 To wear their evening colors, and the King
 Turned homeward priest and noble in his train,
 With all the people following full of awe.
 And from that day, filled with strange fire, he rode
 A mighty Idol-breaker, far and wide
 In battle-gear, Christ following in the print
 Of his war-horse's hooves. The fanes he burned
 At Goodmanham, at Yeverin, and York,
 And Cateret where the Swale runs shallowing by.
 To Redwald and his sons he bore the faith,
 And sent Paulinus to the neighboring Kings.

Near his own city, where the temple stood,
He raised to Christ a simple church of stone,
And ruled his people faithfully, until Long-haired and hoary, as a crag that looks Seaward, with matted lichens bleached by time,
He sat in Hall beholding, with dim eyes
And memory full of graves, the world's third bloom;
Grand-children of the men he knew in youth;

And dying, pillow-propped within his chair,
The watchers saw a gleam upon his face
As from an opened heaven. And so they laid
Within the church of stone, with many a tear,
The body of the earliest Christian King
That England knew; there 'neath the floor he sleeps,
With lord and priest around, till through the air
The angel of the resurrection flies.

THE ADVENTURES OF PHILIP.

BY W. M. THACKERAY.

CHAPTER XIX.

QU'ON EST BIEN À VINGT ANS.

A FAIR correspondent—and I would parenthetically hint that all correspondents are not fair—points out the discrepancy existing between the text and the illustrations of our story; and justly remarks that the story dated more than twenty years back, while the costumes of the actors of our little comedy are of the fashion of to-day.

My dear madam, these anachronisms must be, or you would scarcely be able to keep any interest for our characters. What would be a woman without a crinoline petticoat, for example? an object ridiculous, hateful, I suppose hardly proper. What would you think of a hero who wore a large high black-satin stock cascading over a figured silk waistcoat; and a blue dress-coat, with brass buttons, mayhap? If a person so attired came up to ask you to dance, could you refrain from laughing? Time was when young men so decorated found favor in the eyes of damsels who had never beheld hooped petticoats, except in their grandmothers' portraits. Persons who flourished in the first part of the century never thought to see the hoops of our ancestors' age rolled downward to our contemporaries and children. Did we ever imagine that a period would arrive when our young men would part their hair down the middle, and wear a piece of tape for a neckcloth? As soon should we have thought of their dyeing their bodies with woad, and arraying themselves like ancient Britons. So the ages have their dress and undress; and the gentlemen and ladies of Victoria's time are satisfied with their manner of raiment; as no doubt in Boadicea's court they looked charming tattooed and painted blue.

The times of which we write, the times of Louis Philippe the king, are so altered from the present, that when Philip Firmin went to Paris it was absolutely a cheap place to live in; and he has often bragged in subsequent days of having lived well during a month for five pounds, and bought a neat waistcoat with a part of the money. "A capital bedroom, au premier, for a franc a day, Sir," he would call all persons to remark, "a bedroom as good as yours, my lord, at Meurice's. Very good tea or coffee breakfast, twenty francs a month, with lots of bread and butter. Twenty francs a month for washing, and fifty for dinner and pocket-money—that's about the figure. The dinner, I own, is shy, unless I come and dine with my friends; and then I make up for banyan days." And so saying, Philip would call out for more truffled partridges, or affably filled his goblet with my Lord Ringwood's best Sillery. "At those shops," he would observe, "where I dine, I have beer: I can't stand the wine. And you see, I can't go to the cheap English ordinaries, of which there are many, because English gentlemen's servants are there, you know, and it's not pleasant to sit with a fellow who waits on you the day after."

"Oh! the English servants go to the cheap ordinaries, do they?" asks my lord, greatly amused, "and you drink bière de Mars at the shop where you dine?"

"And dine very badly, too, I can tell you. Always come away hungry. Give me some Champagne—the dry, if you please. They mix very well together—sweet and dry. Did you ever dine at Flicoteau's, Mr. Pecker?"

"I dine at one of your horrible two-franc houses?" cries Mr. Pecker, with a look of terror. "Do you know, my lord, there are actually houses where people dine for two francs?"

"Two francs! Seventeen sous!" bawls out Mr. Firmin. "The soup, the beef, the roti, the salad, the dessert, and the whitey-brown bread at discretion. It's not a good dinner, certainly—in fact, it is a dreadful bad one. But to dine so would do some fellows a great deal of good."

"What do you say, Pecker? Flicoteau's; seventeen sous. We'll make a little party and try, and Firmin shall do the honors of his restaurant," says my lord with a grin.

"Mercy!" gasps Mr. Pecker.

"I had rather dine here, if you please, my lord," says the young man. "This is cheaper, and certainly better."

My lord's doctor, and many of the guests at his table, my lord's henchmen, flatterers, and led captains, looked aghast at the freedom of the young fellow in the shabby coat. If they dared to be familiar with their host, there came a scowl over that noble countenance which was awful to face. They drank his corked wine in meekness of spirit. They laughed at his jokes trembling. One after another, they were the objects of his satire; and each grinned piteously as he took his turn of punishment. Some dinners are dear, though they cost nothing. At some great tables are not toads served along with the entrées? Yes, and many amateurs are exceedingly fond of the dish.

How do Parisians live at all? is a question which has often set me wondering. How do men in public offices, with fifteen thousand francs, let us say, for a salary—and this, for a French official, is a high salary—live in handsome apartments; give genteel entertainments; clothe themselves and their families with much more sumptuous raiment than English people of the same station can afford; take their country holiday, a six weeks' sojourn aux eaux; and appear cheerful and to want for nothing? Paterfamilias, with six hundred a year in London, knows what a straitened life his is, with rent high, and beef at a shilling a pound. Well, in Paris rent is higher and meat is dearer; and yet madame is richly dressed when you see her: monsieur has always a little money in his pocket for his club or his café; and something is pretty surely put away every year for the marriage-portion of the young folks. "Sir," Philip used to say, describing this period of his life, on which—and on most subjects regarding himself, by-the-way—he was wont to be very eloquent, "when my income was raised to five thousand francs a year, I give you my word I was considered to be rich by my French acquaintance. I gave four sous to the waiter at our dining-place—in that respect I was always ostentatious—and I believe they called me Milor. I should have been poor in the Rue de la Paix; but I was wealthy in the Luxembourg quarter. Don't tell me about poverty, Sir! Poverty is a bully if you are afraid of her, or truckle to her. Poverty is good-natured enough if you meet her like a man. You saw how my poor old father was afraid of her, and thought the world would come to an end if Dr. Firmin did not keep his butler, and his footman, and his fine house, and fine chariot and horses? He was a poor man, if you please. He must have suffered agonies in his struggle to make both ends meet. Every thing he bought must have cost him twice the honest price; and when I think of nights that must have been passed without sleep—of that proud man having to smirk and cringe before creditors—to coax butchers, by George! and wheedle tailors—I pity him: I can't be angry any more. That man has suffered enough. As for me, haven't you remarked that since I have not a guinea in the world, I swagger, and am a much greater swell than before?" And the truth is that a Prince Royal could not have called for his gens with a more magnificent air than Mr. Philip when he summoned the waiter and paid for his petit verre.

Talk of poverty, indeed! That period, Philip vows, was the happiest of his life. He liked to tell in after-days of the choice acquaintance of Bohemians which he had formed. Their jug, he said, though it contained but small-beer, was always full. Their tobacco, though it bore no higher rank than that of caporal, was plentiful and fragrant. He knew some admirable medical students; some artists who only wanted talent and industry to be at the height of their profession; and one or two of the magnates of his own calling, the newspaper correspondents, whose houses and tables were open to him. It was wonderful what secrets of politics he learned and transmitted to his own paper. He pursued French statesmen of those days with prodigious eloquence and vigor. At the expense of that old king he was wonderfully witty and sarcastical. He reviewed the affairs of Europe, settled the destinies of Russia, denounced the Spanish marriages, disposed of the Pope, and advocated the liberal cause in France, with an untiring eloquence. "Absinthe used to be my drink, Sir," so he was good enough to tell his friends. "It makes the ink run, and imparts a fine eloquence to the style. Mercy upon us, how I would belabor that poor King of the French under the influence of absinthe, in that café opposite the Bourse where I used to make my letter! Who knows, Sir, perhaps the influence of those letters precipitated the fall of the Bourbon dynasty! Before I had an office, Gilligan, of the Century, and I used to do our letters at that café; we compared notes, and pitched into each other amicably."

Gilligan of the Century, and Firmin of the Pall Mall Gazette, were, however, very minor personages among the London newspaper correspondents. Their seniors of the daily press had handsome apartments, gave sumptuous dinners, were closeted with ministers' secretaries, and entertained members of the Chamber of Deputies. Philip, on perfectly easy terms with himself and the world, swaggering about the embassy balls—Philip, the friend and relative of Lord Ringwood—was viewed by his professional seniors and superiors with an eye of favor, which was not certainly turned on all gentlemen following his calling. Certainly poor Gilligan was never asked to those dinners which some of the newspaper ambassadors gave, whereas Philip was received not unhospitably. Gilligan received but a cold shoulder at Mrs. Morning Messenger's Thursdays; and as for being asked to dinner, bedad! "That fellow, Firmin, has an air with him which will carry him through anywhere!" Phil's brother correspondent owned. "He seems to patronize an ambassador when he goes up and speaks to him; and he says to a secretary, 'My good fellow, tell your master that Mr. Firmin, of the Pall Mall Gazette, wants to see him, and will thank him to step over to the Café de la Bourse.'" I don't think Philip, for his part, would have seen much matter of surprise in a minister stepping over to speak to him. To him all folk were alike, great and small; and it is recorded of him that when, on one occasion, Lord Ringwood paid him a visit at his lodgings in the Faubourg St. Germain, Philip affably offered his lordship a cornet of fried potatoes, with which, and plentiful tobacco of course, Philip and one or two of his friends were regaling themselves when Lord Ringwood chanced to call on his kinsman.

A crust and a carafon of small-beer, a correspondence with a weekly paper, and a remuneration such as that we have mentioned—was Philip Firmin to look for no more than this pittance, and not to seek for more permanent and lucrative employment? Some of his friends at home were rather vexed at what Philip chose to consider his good fortune; namely, his connection with the newspaper and the small stipend it gave him. He might quarrel with his employer any day. Indeed no man was more likely to fling his bread and butter out of window than Mr. Philip. He was losing precious time at the bar; where he, as hundreds of other poor gentlemen had done before him, might make a career for himself. For what are colonies made? Why do bankruptcies occur? Why do people break the peace and quarrel with policemen, but that barristers may be employed as judges, commissioners, magistrates? A reporter to a newspaper remains all his life a newspaper reporter. Philip, if he would but help himself, had friends in the world who might aid effectually to advance him. So it was we pleaded with him, in the language of moderation, urging the dictates of common sense. As if moderation and common sense could be got to move that mule of a Philip Firmin; as if any persuasion of ours could induce him to do any thing but what he liked to do best himself!

"That you should be worldly, my poor fellow" (so Philip wrote to his present biographer)—"that you should be thinking of money and the main chance, is no matter of surprise to me. You have suffered under that curse of manhood, that destroyer of generosity in the mind, that parent of selfishness—a little fortune. You have your wretched hundreds" (my candid correspondent stated the sum correctly enough; and I wish it were double or treble; but that is not here the point) "paid quarterly. The miserable pittance numbs your whole existence. It prevents freedom of thought and action. It makes a screw of a man who is certainly not without generous impulses: as I know, my poor old Harpagon, for hast thou not offered to open thy purse to me? I tell you I am sick of the way in which people in London, especially good people, think about money. You live up to your income's edge. You are miserably poor. You brag and flatter yourselves that you owe no man any thing; but your estate has creditors upon it as insatiable as any usurer, and as hard as any bailiff. You call me reckless, and prodigal, and idle, and all sorts of names, because I live in a single room, do as little work as I can, and go about with holes in my boots: and you flatter yourself you are prudent, because you have a genteel house, a grave flunky out of livery, and two green-grocers to wait when you give your half dozen dreary dinner parties. Wretched man! You are a slave: not a man. You are a pauper, with a good house and good clothes. You are so miserably prudent that all your money is spent for you, except the few wretched shillings which you allow yourself for pocket-money. You tremble at the expense of a cab. I believe you actually look at half-a-crown before you spend it. The landlord is your master. The livery-stable keeper is your master. A train of ruthless, useless servants are your pitiless creditors, to whom you have to pay exorbitant dividends every day. I, with a hole in my elbow, who live upon a shilling dinner, and walk on cracked boot soles, am called extravagant, idle, reckless, I don't know what; while you, forsooth, consider yourself prudent. Miserable delusion! You are flinging away heaps of money on useless flunkies, on useless maid-servants, on useless lodgings, on useless finery—and you say, 'Poor Phil! what a sad idler he is! how he flings himself away! in what a wretched disreputable manner he lives!' Poor Phil is as rich as you are, for he has enough, and is content. Poor Phil can afford to be idle, and you can't. You must work in order to keep that great hulking footman, that great raw-boned cook, that army of babbling nursery-maids, and I don't know what more. And if you choose to submit to the slavery and degradation inseparable from your condition; the wretched inspection of candle ends, which you call order; the mean self-denials, which you must daily practice—I pity you, and don't quarrel with you. But I wish you would not be so insufferably virtuous, and ready with your blame and pity for me. If I am happy, pray need you be disquieted? Suppose I prefer independence, and shabby boots? Are not these better than to be pinched by your abominable varnished conventionalism, and to be denied the liberty of free action? My poor fellow, I pity you from my heart; and it grieves me to think how those fine honest children—honest, and hearty, and frank, and open as yet—are to lose their natural good qualities, and to be swathed, and swaddled, and stifled out of health and honesty by that obstinate worldling their father. Don't tell me about the world, I know it. People sacrifice the next world to it, and are all the while proud of their prudence. Look at my miserable relations, steeped in respectability. Look at my father. There is a chance for him, now he is down and in poverty. I have had a letter from him, containing more of that dreadful worldly advice which you Pharisees give. If it weren't for Laura and the children, Sir, I heartily wish you were ruined like your affectionate

P. F.

"N.B., PS.—Oh, Pen! I am so happy! She is such a little darling! I bathe in her innocence, Sir! I strengthen myself in her purity. I kneel before her sweet goodness and unconsciousness of guile. I walk from my room, and see her every morning before seven o'clock. I see her every afternoon. She loves you and Laura. And you love her, don't you? And to think that six months ago I was going to marry a woman without a heart! Why, Sir, blessings be on the poor old father for spending our money, and rescuing me from that horrible fate! I might have been like that fellow in the 'Arabian Nights,' who married Amina—the respectable woman, who dined upon grains of rice, but supped upon cold dead body. Was it not worth all the money I ever was heir to, to have escaped from that ghoul? Lord Ringwood says he thinks I was well out of that. He calls people by Anglo-Saxon names, and uses very expressive monosyllables; and of aunt Twysden, of uncle Twysden, of the girls, and their brother, he speaks in a way which makes me see he has come to just conclusions about them.

"PS. No. 2.—Ah, Pen! She is such a darling. I think I am the happiest man in the world."

And this was what came of being ruined! A scape-grace, who, when he had plenty of money in his pocket, was ill-tempered, imperious, and discontented; now that he is not worth two-pence, declares himself the happiest fellow in the world! Do you remember, my dear, how he used to grumble at our claret, and what wry faces he made, when there was only cold meat for dinner? The wretch is absolutely contented with bread and cheese and small-beer—even that bad beer which they have in Paris! Now and again, at this time, and as our mutual avocations permitted, I saw Philip's friend, the Little Sister. He wrote to her dutifully from time to time. He told her of his love affair with Miss Charlotte; and my wife and I could console Caroline, by assuring her that this time the young man's heart was given to a worthy mistress. I say console, for the news, after all, was sad for her. In the little chamber which she always kept ready for him, he would lie awake, and think of some one dearer to him than a hundred poor Carolines. She would devise something that should be agreeable to the young lady. At Christmas time there came to Miss Baynes a wonderfully worked cambric pocket-handkerchief, with "Charlotte" most beautifully embroidered in the corner. It was this poor widow's mite of love and tenderness which she meekly laid down in the place where she worshiped. "And I have six for him, too, ma'am," Mrs. Brandon told my wife. "Poor fellow! His shirts was in a dreadful way when he went away from here, and that you know, ma'am." So you see this wayfarer, having fallen among undoubted thieves, yet found many kind souls to relieve him, and many a good Samaritan ready with his two-pence, if need were.

The reason why Philip was the happiest man in the world of course you understand. French people are very early risers; and, at the little hotel where Mr. Philip lived, the whole crew of the house were up hours before lazy English masters and servants think of stirring. At ever so early an hour Phil had a fine bowl of coffee and milk and bread for his breakfast; and he was striding down to the Invalides, and across the bridge to the Champs Elysées, and the fumes of his pipe preceded him with a pleasant odor. And a short time after passing the Rond Point in the Elysian fields, where an active fountain was flinging up showers of diamonds to the sky—after, I say, leaving the Rond Point on his right, and passing under umbrageous groves in the direction of the present Castle of Flowers, Mr. Philip would see a little person. Sometimes a young sister or brother came with the little person. Sometimes only a blush fluttered on her cheek, and a sweet smile beamed in her face as she came forward to greet him. For the angels were scarce purer than this young maid; and Una was no more afraid of the lion than Charlotte of her companion with the loud voice and the tawny mane. I would not have envied that reprobate's lot who should have dared to say a doubtful word to this Una: but the truth is, she never thought of danger, or met with any. The workmen were going to their labor; the dandies were asleep; and considering their age, and the relationship in which they stood to one another, I am not surprised at Philip for announcing that this was the happiest time of his life. In later days, when two gentlemen of mature age happened to be in Paris together, what must Mr. Philip Firmin do but insist upon walking me sentimentally to the Champs Elysées, and looking at an old house there, a rather shabby old house in a garden. "That was the place," sighs he. "That was Madame de Smolensk's. That was the window, the third one, with the green jalousie. By Jove, Sir, how happy and how miserable I have been behind that green blind!" And my friend shakes his large fist at the somewhat dilapidated mansion, whence Madame de Smolensk and her boarders have long since departed.

I fear that baroness had engaged in her enterprise with insufficient capital, or conducted it with such liberality that her profits were eaten up by her boarders. I could tell dreadful stories impugning the baroness's moral character. People said she had no right to the title of baroness at all, or to the noble foreign name of Smolensk. People are still alive who knew her under a different name. The baroness herself was what some amateurs call a fine woman, especially at dinner-time, when she appeared in black satin and with cheeks that blushed up as far as the eyelids. In her peignoir in the morning, she was perhaps the reverse of fine. Contours which were round at night, in the forenoon appeared lean and angular. Her roses only bloomed half an hour before dinner-time on a cheek which was quite yellow until five o'clock. I am sure it is very kind of elderly and ill-complexioned people to supply the ravages of time or jaundice, and present to our view a figure blooming and agreeable, in place of an object faded and withered. Do you quarrel with your opposite neighbor for painting his house front or putting roses in his balcony? You are rather thankful for the adornment. Madame de Smolensk's front was so decorated of afternoons. Geraniums were set pleasantly under those first-floor windows, her eyes. Carcel lamps beamed from those windows: lamps which she had trimmed with her own scissors, and into which that poor widow poured the oil which she got some how and any how. When the dingy breakfast papillotes were cast of an afternoon, what beautiful black curls appeared round her brow! The dingy papillotes were put away in the drawer: the peignoir retired to its hook behind the door: the satin raiment came forth, the shining, the ancient, the well-kept, the well-wadded: and at the same moment the worthy woman took that smile out of some cunning box on her scanty toilet-table—that smile which she wore all the evening along with the rest of her toilet, and took out of her mouth when she went to bed and to think—to think how both ends were to be made to meet.

THE MORNING GREETING.

Philip said he respected and admired that woman: and worthy of respect she was in her way. She painted her face and grinned at poverty. She laughed and rattled with care gnawing at her side. She had to coax the milkman out of his human kindness: to pour oil—his own oil—upon the stormy épiciér's soul: to melt the but-terman: to tap the wine merchant: to mollify the butcher: to invent new pretexts for the land-lord: to reconcile the lady boarders, Mrs. General Baynes, let us say, and the Honorable Mrs. Boldero, who were always quarreling: to see that the dinner, when procured, was cooked properly; that Françoise, to whom she owed ever so many months' wages, was not too rebellious or intoxicated; that Auguste, also her creditor, had his glass clean and his lamps in order. And this work done, and the hour of six o'clock arriving, she had to carve and be agreeable to her table; not to hear the growls of the discontented (and at what table-d'hôte are there not grumblers?); to have a word for every body present; a smile and a laugh for Mrs. Bunch (with whom there had been very likely a dreadful row in the morning); a remark for the colonel; a polite phrase for the general's lady; and even a good word and compliment for sulky Auguste, who just before dinner-time had unfolded the napkin of mutiny about his wages.

Was not this enough work for a woman to do? To conduct a great house without sufficient money, and make soup, fish, roasts, and half a dozen entrées out of wind as it were? to conjure up wine in piece and by the dozen? to laugh and joke without the least gayety? to receive scorn, abuse, rebuffs, insolence, with gay good-humor? and then to go to bed wearied at night, and have to think about figures and that dreadful, dreadful sum in arithmetic—given, £5 to pay £6? Lady Macbeth is supposed to have been a resolute woman: and great, tall, loud, hectoring females are set to represent the character. I say no. She was a weak woman. She began to walk in her sleep, and blab after one disagreeable little incident had occurred in her house. She broke down, and got all the people away from her own table in the most abrupt and clumsy manner, because that driveling epileptic husband of hers fancied he saw a ghost. In Lady Smolensk's place Madame de Macbeth would have broken down in a week, and Smolensk lasted for years. If twenty gibbering ghosts had come to the boarding-house dinner, madame would have gone on carving her dishes, and smiling, and helping the live guests, the paying guests, leaving the dead guests to gibber away and help themselves. "My poor father had to keep up appearances," Phil would say, recounting these things in after-days; "but how? You know he always looked as if he was going to be hung." Smolensk was the gayest of the gay always. That woman would have tripped up to her funeral pile and kissed her hands to her friends with a smiling "Bon jour!"

"Pray, who was Monsieur de Smolensk?" asks a simple lady who may be listening to our friend's narrative.

"Ah, my dear lady! there was a pretty disturbance in the house when that question came to be mooted, I promise you," says our friend, laughing, as he recounts his adventures. And, after all, what does it matter to you and me and this story who Smolensk was? I am sure this poor lady had hardships enough in her life campaign, and that Ney himself could not have faced fortune with a constancy more heroic.

Well. When the Bayneses first came to her house, I tell you Smolensk and all round her smiled, and our friends thought they were landed in a real rosy Elysium in the Champs of that name. Madame had a Carrick à la Indienne prepared in compliment to her guests. She had had many Indians in her establishment. She adored Indians. N'était ce la polygamie—they were most estimable people, the Hindus. Sur-tout she adored Indian shawls. That of Madame la Générale was ravishing. The company at Madame's was pleasant. The Honorable Mrs. Boldero was a dashing woman of fashion and respectability, who had lived in the best world—it was easy to see that. The young ladies' duets were very striking. The Honorable Mr. Boldero was away shooting in Scotland, at his brother, Lord Strongitharm's, and would take Gaberlun-zie Castle and the duke's on his way south. Mrs. Baynes did not know Lady Estridge, the embassadress? When the Estridges returned from Chantilly, the Honorable Mrs. B. would be delighted to introduce her. "Your pretty girl's name is Charlotte? So is Lady Estridge's—and very nearly as tall; fine girls, the Estridges; fine long necks—large feet—but your girl, Lady Baynes, has beautiful feet. Lady Baynes, I said? Well, you must be Lady Baynes soon. The general must be a K.C.B. after his services. What, you know Lord Trim? He will and must do it for you. If not, my brother Strongitharm shall." I have no doubt Mrs. Baynes was greatly elated by the attentions of Lord Strongitharm's sister; and looked him out in the Peerage, where his lordship's arms, pedigree, and residence of Gaberlunzie Castle are duly recorded. The Honorable Mrs. Boldero's daughters, the Misses Minna and Brenda Boldero, played some rattling sonatas on a piano which was a good deal fatigued by their exertions, for the young ladies' hands were very powerful. And madame said "Thank you," with her sweetest smile; and Auguste handed about on a silver tray—I say silver, so that the conveniences may not be wounded—well, say silver that was blushing to find itself copper—handed up on a tray a white drink which made the Baynes boys cry out, "I say, mother, what's this beastly thing?" On which madame, with the sweetest smile, appealed to the company, and said, "They love orgeat, these dear infants!" and resumed her piquet with old M. Bidois—that odd old gentleman in the long brown coat, with the red ribbon, who took so much snuff and blew his nose so often and so loudly. One, two, three rattling sonatas Minna and Brenda played; Mr. Clancy, of Trinity College, Dublin (M. de Clanci, madame called him), turning over the leaves, and presently being persuaded to sing some Irish melodies for the ladies. I don't think Miss Charlotte Baynes listened to the music much. She was listening to another music, which she and Mr. Firmin were performing together. Oh, how pleasant that music used to be! There was a sameness in it, I dare say; but still it was pleasant to hear the air over again. The pretty little duet à quatre mains, where the hands cross over, and hop up and down the keys, and the heads get so close, so close. Oh, duets, oh, regrets! Pshaw! no more of this. Go down stairs, old dotard. Take your hat and umbrella and go walk by the sea-shore, and whistle a toothless old solo. "These are our quiet nights," whispers M. de Clanci to the Baynes ladies, when the evening draws to an end. "Madame's Thursdays are, I promise ye, much more fully attended." Good-night, good-night! A squeeze of a little hand, a hearty hand-shake from papa and mamma, and Philip is striding through the dark Elysian Fields and over the Place of Concord to his lodgings in the Faubourg St. Germain. Or, stay! What is that glow-worm beaming by the wall opposite Madame de Smolensk's house?—a glow-worm that wafts an aromatic incense and odor? I do believe it is Mr. Philip's cigar. And he is watching, watching at a window by which a slim figure flits now and again. Then darkness falls on the little window. The sweet eyes are closed. Oh, blessings, blessings be upon them! The stars shine overhead. And homeward stalks Mr. Firmin, talking to himself, and brandishing a great stick. I wish that poor Madame Smolensk could sleep as well as the people in her house. But care, with the cold feet, gets under the coverlet, and says, "Here I am; you know that bill is coming due to-morrow." Ah, atra cura! can't you leave the poor thing a little quiet? Hasn't she had work enough for all day?

CHAPTER XX.

COURSE OF TRUE LOVE.

WE beg the gracious reader to remember that Mr. Philip's business at Paris was only with a weekly London paper as yet; and hence that he had on his hands a great deal of leisure. He could glance over the state of Europe; give the latest news from the salons imparted to him, I do believe, for the most part, by some brother hireling scribes; be present at all the theatres by deputy; and smash Louis Philippe or Messieurs Guizot and Thiers in a few easily turned paragraphs, which cost but a very few hours' labor to that bold and rapid pen. A wholesome though humiliating thought it must be to great and learned public writers, that their eloquent sermons are but for the day; and that, having read what the philosophers say on Tuesday or Wednesday, we think about their yesterday's sermons or essays no more. A score of years hence, men will read the papers of 1861 for the occurrences narrated—births, marriages, bankruptcies, elections, murders, deaths, and so forth; and not for the leading articles. "Though there were some of my letters," Mr. Philip would say, in after-times, "that I fondly fancied the world would not willingly let die. I wanted to have them or see them reprinted in a volume, but I could find no publisher willing to undertake the risk. A fond being, who fancies there is genius in every thing I say or write, would have had me reprint my letters to the Pall Mall Gazette; but I was too timid, or she, perhaps, was too confident. The letters never were republished. Let them pass." They have passed. And he sighs, in mentioning this circumstance; and I think tries to persuade himself, rather than others, that he is an unrecognized genius.

"And then, you know," he pleads, "I was in love, Sir, and spending all my days at Omphale's knees. I didn't do justice to my powers. If I had had a daily paper, I still think I might have made a good public writer; and that I had the stuff in me—the stuff in me, Sir!"

The truth is that, if he had had a daily paper, and ten times as much work as fell to his lot, Mr. Philip would have found means of pursuing his inclination, as he ever through life has done. The being, whom a young man wishes to see, he sees. What business is superior to that of seeing her? 'Tis a little Hellespontine matter keeps Leander from his Hero? He would die rather than not see her. Had he swum out of that difficulty on that stormy night, and carried on a few months later, it might have been, "Beloved! my cold and rheumatism are so severe that the doctor says I must not think of cold bathing at night;" or, "Dearest! we have a party at tea, and you mustn't expect your ever fond Lambda to-night," and so forth, and so forth. But in the heat of his passion water could not stay him; tempests could not frighten him; and in one of them he went down, while poor Hero's lamp was twinkling and spending its best flame in vain. So Philip came from Sestos to Abydos daily—across one of the bridges, and paying a half-penny toll very likely—and, late or early, poor little Charlotte's virgin lamps were lighted in her eyes, and watching for him.

Philip made many sacrifices, mind you: sacrifices which all men are not in the habit of making. When Lord Ringwood was in Paris, twice, thrice he refused to dine with his lordship, until that nobleman smelled a rat, as the saying is—and said, "Well, youngster, I suppose you are going where there is metal more attractive. When you come to twelve lustres, my boy, you'll find vanity and vexation in that sort of thing, and a good dinner better, and cheaper, too, than the best of them." And when some of Philip's rich college friends met him in his exile, and asked him to the Rocher or the Trois Frères, he would break away from those banquets; and as for meeting at those feasts doubtful companions, whom young men will sometimes invite to their entertainments, Philip turned from such with scorn and anger. His virtue was loud, and he proclaimed it loudly. He expected little Charlotte to give him credit for it, and told her of his self-denial. And she believed any thing he said; and delighted in every thing he wrote; and copied out his articles for the Pall Mall Gazette; and treasured his poems in her desk of desks: and there never was in all Sestos, in all Abydos, in all Europe, in all Asia Minor or Asia Major, such a noble creature as Leander, Hero thought; never, never! I hope, young ladies, you may all have a Leander on his way to the tower where the light of your love is burning steadfastly. I hope, young gentlemen, you have each of you a beacon in sight, and may meet with no mishap in swimming to it.

From my previous remarks regarding Mrs.

Baynes, the reader has been made aware that the general's wife was no more faultless than the rest of her fellow-creatures; and having already candidly informed the public that the writer and his family were no favorites of this lady, I have now the pleasing duty of recording my own opinions regarding her. Mrs. General B. was an early riser. She was a frugal woman; fond of her young, or, let us say, anxious to provide for their maintenance; and here, with my best compliments, I think the catalogue of her good qualities is ended. She had a bad, violent temper; a disagreeable person, attired in very bad taste; a shrieking voice; and two manners, the respectful and the patronizing, which were both alike odious. When she ordered Baynes to marry her, Gracious Powers, why did he not run away? Who dared first to say that marriages are made in heaven? We know that there are not only blunders, but roguery in the marriage office. Do not mistakes occur every day, and are not the wrong people coupled? Had Heaven any thing to do with the bargain by which young Miss Blush-rose was sold to old Mr. Hoarfrost? Did Heaven order young Miss Tripper to throw over poor Tom Spooner, and marry the wealthy Mr. Bung? You may as well say that horses are sold in heaven, which, as you know, are groomed, are doctored, are chanted on to the market, and warranted by dextrous horse-vendors, as possessing every quality of blood, pace, temper, age. Against these Mr. Greenhorn has his remedy sometimes; but against a mother who sells you a warranted daughter, what remedy is there? You have been jockeyed by false representations into bidding for the Cecilia, and the animal is yours for life. She shies, kicks, stumbles, has an infernal temper, is a crib-biter—and she was warranted to you by her mother as the most perfect, good-tempered creature, whom the most timid might manage! You have bought her. She is yours. Heaven bless you! Take her home, and be miserable for the rest of your days. You have no redress. You have done the deed. Marriages were made in heaven, you know; and in yours you were as much sold as Moses Primrose was when he bought the gross of green spectacles.

I don't think poor General Baynes ever had a proper sense of his situation, or knew how miserable he ought by rights to have been. He was not uncheerful at times: a silent man, liking his rubber and his glass of wine; a very weak person in the common affairs of life, as his best friends must own; but, as I have heard, a very tiger in action. "I know your opinion of the general," Philip used to say to me, in his grandiloquent way: "you despise men who don't bully their wives; you do, Sir! You think the general weak, I know, I know. Other brave men were so about women, as I dare say you have heard. This man, so weak at home, was mighty on the war path; and in his wigwam are the scalps of countless warriors."

"In his wig what?" say I. The truth is, on his meek head the general wore a little curling chestnut top-knot, which looked very queer and out of place over that wrinkled and war-worn face.

"If you choose to laugh at your joke, pray do," says Phil, majestically. "I make a noble image of a warrior. You prefer a barber's pole. Bon! Pass me the wine. The veteran whom I hope to salute as father ere long—the soldier of twenty battles; who saw my own brave grandfather die at his side—die at Busaco, by George! you laugh at an account of his wig. It's a capital joke." And here Phil scowled and slapped the table, and passed his hands across his eyes, as though the death of his grandfather, which occurred long before Philip was born, caused him a very serious pang of grief. Philip's newspaper business brought him to London on occasions. I think it was on one of these visits that we had our talk about General Baynes. And it was at the same time Philip described the boarding-house to us, and its inmates, and the landlady, and the doings there.

For that struggling landlady, as for all women in distress, our friend had a great sympathy and liking; and she returned Philip's kindness by being very good to Mademoiselle Charlotte, and very forbearing with the general's wife and his other children. The appetites of those little ones was frightful, the temper of Madame la Générale was almost intolerable, but Charlotte was an angel, and the general was a mutton—a true mutton. Her own father had been so. The brave are often muttons at home. I suspect that, though madame could have made but little profit by the general's family, his monthly payments were very welcome to her meagre little exchequer. "Ah! if all my locataries were like him!" sighed the poor lady. "That Madame Boldero, whom the generaless treats always as honorable, I wish I was as sure of her! And others again!"

I never kept a boarding-house, but I am sure there must be many painful duties attendant on that profession. What can you do if a lady or gentleman doesn't pay his bill? Turn him or her out? Perhaps the very thing that lady or gentleman would desire. They go. Those trunks which you have insanely detained, and about which you have made a fight and a scandal, do not contain a hundred francs' worth of goods, and your creditors never come back again. You do not like to have a row in a boarding-house any more than you would like to have a party with scarlet-fever in your best bedroom. The scarlet-fever party stays, and the other boarders go away. What, you ask, do I mean by this mystery? I am sorry to have to give up names, and titled names. I am sorry to say the Honorable Mrs. Boldero did not pay her bills. She was waiting for remittances, which the Honorable Boldero was dreadfully remiss in sending. A dreadful man! He was still at his lordship's at Gaberlunzie Castle, shooting the wild deer and hunting the roe. And though the Honorable Mrs. B.'s heart was in the Highlands, of course, how could she join her Highland chief without the money to pay madame? The Highlands, indeed! One dull day it came out that the Honorable Boldero was amusing himself in the Highlands of Hesse Homburg; and engaged in the dangerous sport which is to be had in the green plains about Loch Badenbadenoch!

"Did you ever hear of such depravity? The woman is a desperate and unprincipled adventurer! I wonder madame dares to put me and my children and my general down at table with such people as those, Philip!" cries Madame la Générale. "I mean those opposite—that woman and her two daughters who haven't paid madame a shilling for three months—who owes me five hundred francs, which she borrowed until next Tuesday, expecting a remittance—a pretty remittance indeed—from Lord Strongitharm. Lord Strongitharm, I dare say! And she pretends to be most intimate at the embassy; and that she would introduce us there, and at the Tuileries: and she told me Lady Garterton had the small-pox in the house; and when I said all ours had been vaccinated, and I didn't mind, she fobbed me off with some other excuse; and it's my belief the woman's a humbug. Overhear me! I don't care if she does overhear me. No. You may look as much as you like, my Honorable Mrs. Boldero; and I don't care if you do overhear me. Ogoost! Pomdytare pour le général! How tough madame's boof is, and it's boof, boof, boof every day, till I'm sick of boof. Ogoost! why don't you attend to my children?" And so forth.

By this report of the worthy woman's conversation, you will see that the friendship which had sprung up between the two ladies had come to an end, in consequence of painful pecuniary disputes between them; that to keep a boarding-house can't be a very pleasant occupation; and that even to dine in a boarding-house must be only bad fun when the company is frightened and dull, and when there are two old women at table ready to fling the dishes at each other's fronts. At the period of which I now write, I promise you there was very little of the piano-duet business going on after dinner. In the first place, every body knew the girls' pieces; and when they began, Mrs. General Baynes would lift up a voice louder than the jingling old instrument, thumped Minna and Brenda ever so loudly. "Perfect strangers to me, Mr. Clancy, I assure you. Had I known her, you don't suppose I would have lent her the money. Honorable Mrs. Boldero, indeed! Five weeks she has owed me five hundred frongs. Bong swor, Monsieur Bidois! Sang song frong pas payy encor. Prommy, pas payy." Fancy, I say, what a dreary life that must have been at the select boarding-house, where these two parties were doing battle daily after dinner. Fancy, at the select soirées, the general's lady seizing upon one guest after another, and calling out her wrongs, and pointing to the wrong-doer; and poor Madame Smolensk, smirking, and smiling, and flying from one end of the salon to the other, and thanking

M. Pivoine for his charming romance, and M. Brumm for his admirable performance on the violoncello, and even asking those poor Miss Bolderos to perform their duet—for her heart melted toward them. Not ignorant of evil, she had learned to succor the miserable. She knew what poverty was, and had to coax scowling duns, and wheedle vulgar creditors. “Tenez, Monsieur Philippe,” she said, “the général is too cruel. There are others here who might complain, and are silent.” Philip felt all this; the conduct of his future mother-in-law filled him with dismay and horror. And some time after these remarkable circumstances, he told me, blushing as he spoke, a humiliating secret. “Do you know, Sir,” says he, “that that autumn I made a pretty good thing of it with one thing or another. I did my work for the Pall Mall Gazette; and Smith, of the Daily Intelligence, wanting a month’s holiday, gave me his letter and ten francs a day. And at that very time I met Redman, who had owed me twenty pounds ever since we were at college, and who was just coming back flush from Hombourg, and paid me. Well, now. Swear you won’t tell. Swear on your faith as a Christian man! With this money I went, Sir, privily to Mrs. Boldero. I said if she would pay the dragon—I mean Mrs. Baynes—I would lend her the money. And I did lend her the money, and the Boldero never paid back Mrs. Baynes. Don’t mention it. Promise me you won’t tell Mrs. Baynes. I never expected to get Redman’s money, you know, and am no worse off than before. One day of the Grandes Eaux we went to Versailles, I think, and the Honorable Mrs. Boldero gave us the slip. She left the poor girls behind her in pledge, who, to do them justice, cried and were in a dreadful way; and when Mrs. Baynes, on our return, began shrieking about her ‘sang song frong,’ Madame Smolensk fairly lost patience for once, and said, ‘Mais, madame, vous nous fatiguez avec vos cinq cent francs,’ on which the other muttered something about ‘Arsolong,’ but was briskly taken up by her husband, who said, ‘By George, Eliza, madame is quite right. And I wish the five hundred francs were in the sea.’”

Thus, you understand, if Mrs. General Baynes thought some people were “stuck-up people,” some people can—and hereby do by these presents—pay off Mrs. Baynes, by furnishing the public with a candid opinion of that lady’s morals, manners, and character. How could such a shrewd woman be dazzled so repeatedly by ranks and titles? There used to dine at Madame Smolensk’s boarding-house a certain German baron, with a large finger ring, upon a dingy finger, toward whom the lady was pleased to cast the eye of favor, and who chose to fall in love with her pretty daughter. Young Mr. Clancy, the Irish poet, was also smitten with the charms of the fair young lady, and this intrepid mother encouraged both suitors, to the unspeakable agonies of Philip Firmin, who felt often that while he was away at his work these inmates of Madame Smolensk’s house were near his charmer—at her side at lunch, ever handing her the cup at breakfast, on the watch for her when she walked forth in the garden; and I take the pangs of jealousy to have formed a part of those unspeakable sufferings which Philip said he endured in the house whither he came courting.

Little Charlotte, in one or two of her letters to her friends in Queen Square, London, meekly complained of Philip’s tendency to jealousy. “Does he think, after knowing him, I can think of these horrid men?” she asked. “I don’t understand what Mr. Clancy is talking about, when he comes to me with his ‘pomes and potry;’ and who can read poetry like Philip himself? Then the German baron—who does not call even himself baron—it is mamma who will insist upon calling him so—has such very dirty things, and smells so of cigars, that I don’t like to come near him. Philip smokes too, but his cigars are quite pleasant. Ah, dear friend, how could he ever think such men as these were to be put in comparison with him! And he scolds so; and scowls at the poor men in the evening when he comes! and his temper is so high! Do say a word to him—quite cautiously and gently, you know—in behalf of your fondly attached and most happy—only he will make me unhappy sometimes; but you’ll prevent him, won’t you?—Charlotte B.”

I could fancy Philip hectoring through the part of Othello, and his poor young Desdemona not a little frightened at his black humors. Such sentiments as Mr. Philip felt strongly he expressed with an uproar. Charlotte’s correspondent, as usual, made light of these little domestic confidences and grievances. “Women don’t dislike a jealous scolding,” she said. “It may be rather tiresome, but it is always a compliment. Some husbands think so well of themselves that they can’t condescend to be jealous.” Yes, I say, women prefer to have tyrants over them. A scolding you think is a mark of attention. Hadn’t you better adopt the Russian system at once, and go out and buy me a whip, and present it to me with a courtesy and your compliments, and a meek prayer that I should use it. “Present you a whip! present you a goose!” says the lady, who encourages scolding in other husbands, it seems, but won’t suffer a word from her own.

Both disputants had set their sentimental hearts on the marriage of this young man and this young woman. Little Charlotte’s heart was so bent on the match, that it would break, we fancied, if she were disappointed; and in her mother’s behavior we felt, from the knowledge we had of the woman’s disposition, there was a serious cause for alarm. Should a better offer present itself, Mrs. Baynes, we feared, would fling over poor Philip: or, it was in reason and nature, that he would come to a quarrel with her, and in the course of the pitched battle which must ensue between them, he would fire off expressions mortally injurious. Are there not many people, in every one’s acquaintance, who, as soon as they have made a bargain, repent of it? Philip, as "preserver" of General Baynes, in the first fervor of family gratitude for that act of self-sacrifice on the young man's part, was very well. But gratitude wears out; or suppose a woman says, "It is my duty to my child to recall my word, and not allow her to fling herself away on a beggar." Suppose that you and I, strongly inclined to do a mean action, get a good, available, and moral motive for it? I trembled for poor Philip's course of true love, and little Charlotte's chances, when these surmises crossed my mind. There was a hope still in the honor and gratitude of General Baynes. He would not desert his young friend and benefactor. Now General Baynes was a brave man of war, and so was John of Marlborough a brave man of war; but it is certain that both were afraid of their wives.

We have said by whose invitation and encouragement General Baynes was induced to bring his family to the boarding-house at Paris; the instigation, namely, of his friend and companion in arms, the gallant Colonel Bunch. When the Baynes family arrived the Bunches were on the steps of madame's house, waving a welcome to the new-comers. It was, "Here we are, Bunch, my boy. Glad to see you, Baynes. Right well you're looking, and so 's Mrs. B." And the general replies, "And so are you, Bunch; and so do you, Mrs. B. How do, boys? Hoy dyou do, Miss Charlotte? Come to show the Paris fellows what a pretty girl is, hey? Blooming like a rose, Baynes!" "I'm telling the general," cries the colonel to the general's lady, "the girl's the very image of her mother." In this case poor Charlotte must have looked like a yellow rose, for Mrs. Baynes was of a bilious temperament and complexion, whereas Miss Charlotte was as fresh pink and white as—what shall we say?—as the very freshest strawberries mingled with the very nicest cream.

The two old soldiers were of very great comfort to one another. They toddled down to Galignani's together daily, and read the papers there. They went and looked at the reviews in the Carrousel, and once or twice to the Champ de Mars—recognizing here and there the numbers of the regiments against which they had been engaged in the famous ancient wars. They did not brag in the least about their achievements; they winked and understood each other. They got their old uniforms out of their old boxes, and took a voiture de remise, by Jove! and went to be presented to Louis Philippe. They bought a catalogue, and went to the Louvre, and wagged their honest old heads before the pictures; and, I dare say, winked and nudged each other's brave old sides at some of the nymphs in the statue gallery. They went out to Versailles with their families; loyally stood treat to the ladies at the restaurateurs (Bunch had taken down a memorandum in his pocket-book from Benyon, who had been the Duke's aid-de-camp in the last campaign, to "go to Beauvillier's," only Beauvillier's had been shut up for twenty years). They took their families and Charlotte to the Théâtre Français, to a tragedy; and they had books: and they said it was the most confounded nonsense they ever saw in their lives; and I am bound to say that Bunch, in the back of the box, snored so that, though in retirement, he created quite a sensation. "Corneal," he owns, was too much for him: give him Shakspeare: give him John Kemble: give him Mrs. Siddons: give him Mrs. Jordan. But as for this sort of thing? I think our play days are over, Baynes, hey? and I also believe that Miss Charlotte Baynes, whose knowledge of the language was imperfect as yet, was very much bewildered during the tragedy, and could give but an imperfect account of it. But then Philip Firmin was in the orchestra stalls; and had he not sent three bouquets for the three ladies, regretting that he could not come to see somebody in the Champs Elysées, because it was his post-day, and he must write his letter for the Pall Mall Gazette? There he was, her Cid; her peerless champion: and to give up father and mother for him? our little Chimène thought such a sacrifice not too difficult. After that dismal attempt at the theatre the experiment was not repeated. The old gentlemen preferred their whist to those pompous Alexandrines sung through the nose, which Colonel Bunch, a facetious little colonel, used to imitate, and, I am given to understand, very badly.

The good gentleman's ordinary amusement was a game at cards after dinner; and they compared madame's to an East Indian ship, quarrels and all. Selina went on just in that way on board the Burrumpooter. Always rows about precedence, and the services, and the deuce knows what! Women always will. Selina Bunch went on in that way; and Eliza Baynes also went on in that way; but I should think, from the most trust-worthy information, that Eliza was worse than Selina.

"About any person with a title, that woman will make a fool of herself to the end of the chapter," remarked Selina of her friend. "You remember how she used to go on at Barrackpore about that little shrimp Stoney Battersby, because he was an Irish viscount's son? See how she flings herself at the head of this Mrs. Boldero—with her airs, and her paint, and her black front. I can't bear the woman! I know she has not paid madame. I know she is no better than she should be; and to see Eliza Baynes coaxing her, and sidling up to her, and flattering her: it's too bad, that it is! A woman who owes ever so much to madame! a woman who doesn't pay her washer-woman!"

"Just like the Burrumpooter over again, my dear!" cries Colonel Bunch. "You and Eliza Baynes were always quarreling; that's the fact. Why did you ask her to come here? I knew you would begin again, as soon as you met." And the truth was that these ladies were always fighting and making up again. "So you and Mrs. Bunch were old acquaintances?" asked Mrs. Boldero of her new friend. "My dear Mrs. Baynes, I should hardly have thought it, your manners are so different! Your friend, if I may be so free as to speak, has the camp manner. You have not the camp manner at all. I should have thought you—excuse me the phrase, but I'm so open, and always speak my mind out—you haven't the camp manner at all. You seem as if you were one of us. Minna! doesn't Mrs. Baynes put you in mind of Lady Hm—?" (The name is inaudible, in consequence of Mrs. Boldero's exceeding shyness in mentioning names; but the girls see the likeness to dear Lady Hm—at once.) "And when you bring your dear girl to London you'll know the lady I mean, and judge for yourself. I assure you I am not disparaging you, my dear Mrs. Baynes, in comparing you to her!" And so the conversation goes on. If Mrs. Major MacWhirter at Tours chose to betray secrets, she could give extracts from her sister's letters to show how profound was the impression created in Mrs. General Baynes's mind by the professions and conversation of the Scotch lady. Didn't the general shoot and love deer-stalking? The dear general must come to Gaberlunzie Castle, where she would promise him a Highland welcome. Her brother Strongitharm was the most amiable of men; adored her and her girls: there was talk even of marrying Minna to the captain, but she for her part could not endure the marriage of first-cousins. There was a tradition against such marriages in their family. Of three Bolderos and Strongitharms who married their first-cousins, one was drowned in Gaberlunzie lake three weeks after the marriage; one lost his wife by a galloping consumption, and died a monk at Rome; and the third married a fortnight before the battle of Culloden, where he was slain at the head of the Strongitharms. Mrs. Baynes had no idea of the splendor of Gaberlunzie Castle; seventy bedrooms and thirteen company rooms besides the picture-gallery! In Edinburgh the Strongitharm had the right to wear his bonnet in the presence of his sovereign. "A bonnet! how very odd, my dear! But with ostrich plumes I dare say it may look well, especially as the Highlanders wear frocks too!" "Lord Strongitharm had no house in London, having almost ruined himself in building his princely castle in the north. Mrs. Baynes must come there and meet their noble relatives and all the Scottish nobility. Nor do I care about these vanities, my dear, but to bring my sweet Charlotte into the world: is it not a mother's duty?" Not only to her sister, but likewise to Charlotte's friends of Queen Square, did Mrs. Baynes impart these delightful news. But this is in the first ardor of the friendship which arises between Mrs. Baynes and Mrs. Boldero, and before those unpleasant money disputes of which we have spoken.

Afterward, when the two ladies have quarreled regarding the memorable "sang song frong," I think Mrs. Bunch came round to Mrs. Boldero's side. "Eliza Baynes is too hard on her. It is too cruel to insult her before those two unhappy daughters. The woman is an odious woman, and a vulgar woman, and a schemer, and I always said so. But to box her ears before her daughters—her honorable friend of last week!—it's a shame of Eliza!"

"My dear, you'd better tell her so!" says Bunch, dryly. "But if you do, tell her when I'm out of the way, please!" And accordingly, one day when the two old officers return from their stroll, Mrs. Bunch informs the colonel that she has had it out with Eliza; and Mrs. Baynes, with a heated face, tells the general that she and Mrs. Colonel Bunch have quarreled; and she is determined it shall be for the last time. So that poor Madame de Smolensk has to interpose between Mrs. Baynes and Mrs. Boldero; between Mrs. Baynes and Mrs. Bunch; and to sit surrounded by glaring eyes and hissing innuendoes, and in the midst of feuds unhealable. Of course, from the women the quarreling will spread to the gentlemen. That always happens. Poor madame trembles. Again Bunch gives his neighbor his word that it is like the Burrumpooter East Indiaman—the Burrumpooter in very bad weather, too.

"At any rate, we won't be lugged into it, Baynes, my boy!" says the colonel, who is of a sanguine temperament, to his friend.

"Hey, hey! don't be too sure, Bunch; don't be too sure!" sighs the other veteran, who, it may be, is of a more desponding turn, as, after a battle at luncheon, in which the Amazons were fiercely engaged, the two old warriors take their walk to Galigani's.

Toward his Charlotte's relatives poor Philip was respectful by duty and a sense of interest, perhaps. Before marriage, especially, men are very kind to the relatives of the beloved object. They pay compliments to mamma; they listen to papa's old stories, and laugh appositely; they bring presents for the innocent young ones, and let the little brothers kick their shins. Philip endured the juvenile Bayneses very kindly: he took the boys to Franconi's, and made his conversation as suitable as he could to the old people. He was fond of the old general, a simple and worthy old man; and had, as we have said, a hearty sympathy and respect for Madame Smolensk, admiring her constancy and good-humor under her many trials. But those who have perused his memoirs are aware that Mr. Firmin could make himself, on occasions, not a little disagreeable. When sprawling on a sofa, engaged in conversation with his charmer, he would not budge when other ladies entered the room. He scowled at them, if he did not like them. He was not at the least trouble to conceal his likes or dislikes. He had a manner of fixing his glass in his eye, putting his thumbs into the armholes of his waistcoat, and talking and laughing very loudly at his own jokes or conceits, which was not pleasant or respectful to ladies. "Your loud young friend, with the cracked boots, is very mauvais ton, my dear Mrs. Baynes," Mrs. Boldero remarked to her new friend, in the first ardor of their friendship. "A relative of Lord Ringwood's, is he? Lord Ringwood is a very queer person. A son of that dreadful Dr. Firmin, who ran away after cheating every body? Poor young man! He can't help having such a father, as you say, and most good, and kind, and generous of you to say so, and the general and the Honorable Philip Ringwood were early companions together, I dare say. But having such an unfortunate father as Dr. Firmin, I think Mr. Firmin might be a little less prononcé; don't you? And to see him in cracked boots, sprawling over the sofas, and hear him, when my loves are playing their duets, laughing and talking so very loud, I confess isn't pleasant to me. I am not used to that kind of monde, nor are my dear loves. You are under great obligations to him, and he has behaved nobly, you say? Of course. To get into your society an unfortunate young man will be on his best behavior, though he certainly does not condescend to be civil to us. But What? That young man engaged to that lovely, innocent, charming child, your daughter? My dear creature, you frighten me! A man with such a father; and, excuse me, with such a manner; and without a penny in the world, engaged to Miss Baynes! Goodness, powers! It must never be. It shall not be, my dear Mrs. Baynes. Why, I have written to my nephew Hector to come over, Strongitharm's favorite son and my favorite nephew. I have told him that there is a sweet young creature here, whom he must and ought to see. How well that dear child would look presiding at Strongitharm Castle? And you are going to give her to that dreadful young man with the loud voice and the cracked boots—that smoky young man—oh, impossible!"

Madame had, no doubt, given a very favorable report of her new lodgers to the other inmates of her house; and she and Mrs. Boldero had concluded that all general officers returning from India were immensely rich. To think that her daughter might be the Honorable Mrs. Strongitharm, Baroness Strongitharm, and walk in a coronation in robes, with a coronet in her hand. Mrs. Baynes yielded in loyalty to no woman, but I fear her wicked desires compassed a speedy royal demise, as this thought passed through her mind of the Honorable Lenox Strongitharm. She looked him out in the Peerage, and found that young nobleman designated as the Captain of Strongitharm. Charlotte might be the Honorable Mrs. Captain of Strongitharm! When poor Phil stalked in after dinner that evening in his shabby boots and smoky paletot, Mrs. Baynes gave him but a grim welcome. He went and prattled unconsciously by the side of his little Charlotte, whose tender eyes dwelt upon his, and whose fair cheeks flung out their blushes of welcome. He prattled away. He laughed out loud while Minna and Brenda were thumping their duet. "Tuisez-vous donc, Monsieur Philippe," cries madame, putting her finger to her lip. The Honorable Mrs. Boldero looked at dear Mrs. Baynes, and shrugged her shoulders. Poor Philip! would he have laughed so loudly (and so rudely, too, as I own) had he known what was passing in the minds of those women? Treason was passing there: and before that glance of knowing scorn, shot from the Honorable Mrs. Boldero's eyes, dear Mrs. General Baynes faltered. How very curt and dry she was with Philip! how testy with Charlotte! Poor Philip, knowing that his charmer was in the power of her mother, was pretty humble to this dragon; and attempted, by uncouth flatteries, to soothe and propitiate her. She had a queer, dry humor, and loved a joke; but Phil's fell very flat this night. Mrs. Baynes received his pleasantries with an "Oh, indeed! She was sure she heard one of the children crying in their nursery. Do, pray, go and see, Charlotte, what that child is crying about." And away goes poor Charlotte, having but dim presentiment of misfortune as yet. Was not mamma often in an ill-humor; and were they not all used to her scoldings?

As for Mrs. Colonel Bunch, I am sorry to say that, up to this time, Philip was not only no favorite with her, but was heartily disliked by that lady. I have told you our friend's faults. He was loud: he was abrupt: he was rude often: and often gave just cause of annoyance by his laughter, his disrespect, and his swaggering manner. To those whom he liked he was as gentle as a woman, and treated them with an extreme tenderness and touching rough respect. But those persons about whom he was indifferent he never took the least trouble to conciliate or please. If they told long stories, for example, he would turn on his heel, or interrupt them by observations of his own on some quite different subject. Mrs. Colonel Bunch, then, positively disliked that young man, and I think had very good reasons for her dislike. As for Bunch, Bunch said to Baynes, "Cool hand, that young fellow!" and winked. And Baynes said to Bunch, "Queer chap. Fine fellow, as I have reason to know pretty well. I play a club. No club? I mark honors and two tricks." And the game went on. Clancy hated Philip, a meek man whom Firmin had yet managed to offend. "That man," the Pote Clancy remarked, "has a manner of treading on me corrans which is intolerable to me!" The truth is, Philip was always putting his foot on some other foot, and trampling it. And as for the Boldero clan, Mr. Firmin treated them with the most amusing insolence, and ignored them as if they were out of existence altogether. So you see the poor fellow had not with his poverty learned the least lesson of humility, or acquired the very earliest rudiments of the art of making friends. I think his best friend in the house was its mistress, Madame Smolensk. Mr. Philip treated her as an equal: which mark of affability he was not in the habit of bestowing on all persons. Some great people, some rich people, some would-be-fine people, he would patronize with an insufferable audacity. Rank or wealth do not seem somehow to influence this man as they do common mortals. He would tap a bishop on the waistcoat, and contradict a duke at their first meeting. I have seen him walk out of church during a stupid sermon, with an audible remark perhaps to that effect, and as if it were a matter of course that he should go. If the company bored him at dinner, he would go to sleep in the most unaffected manner. At home we were always kept in a pleasant state of anxiety, not only by what he did and said, but by the idea of what he might do or say next. He did not go to sleep at madame's boarding-house, preferring to keep his eyes open to look at pretty Charlotte's. And were there ever such sapphires as his? she thought. And hers? Ah, if they have tears to shed, I hope a kind fate will dry them quickly!

Monthly Record of Current Events.

UNITED STATES.

OUR Record closes on the 4th of September, up to which date no military operations of importance have taken place in Virginia. Immediately after the defeat at Bull Run serious apprehensions were felt for the safety of the Capital, and the Secretary of War telegraphed to the Governors of the Eastern and Middle States to dispatch all troops at once to Washington. The order was promptly obeyed, and in a few days the place of the regiments whose term had expired was abundantly filled by men enlisted for the war. The Confederates after some delay began to move slowly toward the Potomac; but up to this date no engagement, beyond collisions between pickets, has taken place.—In Western Virginia several sharp skirmishes have occurred.—General Wool has been appointed to the command of Fortress Monroe.

On the 26th of August a strong military and naval force, under command of General Butler and Commodore Stringham, left Fortress Monroe, destined for Hatteras Inlet, in North Carolina, where the Confederates had erected two forts. This inlet formed a convenient refuge for privateers. The vessels, having on board about 800 soldiers, reached their destination on the afternoon of the 27th, and the next morning about 300 men were landed. The fleet then commenced cannonading the forts, which replied. The action continued until noon of the 29th, when a white flag was hoisted, and a message was sent from the shore proposing to surrender the forts, the men being permitted to retire. This was refused, and a full capitulation insisted upon. This was yielded, and the forts and garrison were surrendered. The prisoners numbered 715 officers and men. The commander was Samuel Barron, formerly commander in the United States Navy, and now Assistant-Secretary of the Navy of the Confederate States. The loss in the forts was 8 killed and a number wounded. None of the United States troops were injured. The prisoners have been brought to New York. A considerable amount of ammunition, 31 cannon, and 1000 stand of arms were captured.

In Missouri events of decided importance have occurred. Confederate troops in large numbers from Tennessee and Arkansas, with those belonging to Missouri, under command of Generals M'Culloch and Price, advanced toward Springfield, which was occupied by the national forces under General Lyon. On the evening of the 9th of August General Lyon, at the head of about 5500 troops, marched out of Springfield to attack the enemy. The next morning he came up with a greatly superior force. A fierce engagement ensued. General Lyon was killed in the early part of the action, and the command devolved upon General Siegel. The national forces were too few to ensure success, and General Siegel retired, at first to Springfield, and then back to Rolla, some fifty miles in the direction of St. Louis.

Official reports state our loss in this action to have been 223 killed, 721 wounded. Two official reports have been published by the enemy. General Price commanding the Missouri troops, reports to Governor Jackson that the men under his command numbered 5221, of whom 156 were killed and 517 wounded. General M'Culloch commanding the Confederate troops reports to his Government. He claims a decided victory, says his forces were nine or ten thousand, and his loss 265 killed and 800 wounded. The entire loss of the Confederate troops in this action, acknowledged by themselves, is therefore 421 killed and 1317 wounded. The result of the retreat of the national troops has been to lay Southwestern Missouri open to the Confederates, and enable them to take possession of important lead mines, thus furnishing them with an article of which they have stood in great need.—On the 14th martial law was proclaimed at St. Louis by General Frémont.—Governor Jackson, who was deposed by the State Convention, has issued a proclamation, declaring the union between Missouri and the other States dissolved, and that Missouri is a free and independent State. This proclamation is dated at New Madrid on the 15th of August.—On the 24th Mr. Gamble, the Governor appointed by the Convention, issued a proclamation stating that the civil authority was insufficient to protect the lives and property of the citizens; he therefore calls into active service of the State 42,000 militia, to be as far as possible volunteers, for six months, unless peace should be sooner restored. If there were not sufficient volunteers recourse would be had to a draft.—On the 31st General Frémont issued a proclamation placing the entire State of Missouri under martial law, and the lines of the army of occupation are for the present declared to extend from Leavenworth by way of the posts of Jefferson City, Rolla, and Ironton, to Cape Girardeau, on the Mississippi. The most important clause in this proclamation reads as follows: "All persons who shall be taken with arms in their hands within those lines shall be tried by court-martial, and, if found guilty, will be shot. The property, real and personal, of all persons in the State of Missouri who shall take up arms against the United States, or who shall be directly proven to have taken active part with their enemies in the field, is declared to be confiscated to the public use; and their slaves, if any they have, are hereby declared free men." The extreme penalty of the law is threatened against all who shall destroy railroad tracks, bridges, or telegraphs; those who have been led away from their allegiance are warned to return to their homes, as their absence will be held to be presumptive evidence against them. The object of this proclamation is to enable the military authorities to give instantaneous effect to existing laws; but the ordinary tribunals are not to be suspended wherever the laws can be executed by the civil authority.

Increased activity pervades every branch of the Government. In the Navy Department, besides the vessels building, nearly 200 have been purchased or chartered to aid in the blockade.—The army, under the command of General M'Clellan, is rapidly advancing in discipline, a large number of incompetent officers resigning or being dismissed. Several attempts at insubordination have been promptly put down.—The Departments at Washington have been freed of clerks in favor of secession; and numerous arrests have been made of persons charged with aiding and assisting the enemy. The persons arrested are mostly confined at Fort Lafayette in New York Harbor. Among the prisoners are the Baltimore Police Commissioners, Mr. Berrett, Mayor of Washington, who refused to take the oath of allegiance, and Pierce Butler, of Philadelphia. Mr. Faulkner, late Minister to France, has also been placed under arrest at Washington. In New York the Grand Jury made a presentment against several newspapers, charging them with publishing treasonable articles; their transmission through the mails has been prohibited. Among these was the Daily News, edited by Benjamin Wood, a member of Congress from that city, and the Journal of Commerce, one of the oldest papers in New York; the prohibition has been rescinded in the case of this latter paper.—On the 16th of August the President issued a proclamation declaring the seceding States to be in a state of insurrection, prohibiting all commercial intercourse between them and the other parts of the Union without special permission from the Government, under penalty of the confiscation of all goods dispatched either way, and of the vessels or vehicles conveying them; and declaring that all vessels belonging wholly or in part to any citizen of the insurgent States found at sea or in a port of the United States after fifteen days from the date of the proclamation forfeited to the United States. A large number of vessels remaining in our ports contrary to this notice have been seized.—Banks in New York, Philadelphia, and Boston agreed, on the 15th of August, to take at par $50,000,000 of Treasury Notes, bearing 7·3 per cent. interest, with the privilege, in case the money was not raised by a national loan, or negotiated abroad, of taking $50,000,000 at the expiration of 60 days, and another $50,000,000 in 120 days; the Government agreeing to issue no bonds or notes other than those payable on demand, within a specified time; reserving, however, the right to negotiate its bonds abroad, and to receive subscriptions for a national loan. The Secretary of the Treasury has issued an appeal to the people, pointing out the advantages, in point of profit and security, of this loan, and announcing that subscription books would be opened at once in the principal towns and cities. The interest amounts to one cent per day for every fifty dollars.—The Secretary of State has issued an order directing that no person shall leave the country for any foreign port without a passport countersigned by the Secretary of State; nor shall any person be permitted to land from abroad unless provided with the proper passport, after a reasonable time has been given for the fact of such requirement to be known in the country from which such persons come.—The Convention of Western Virginia has passed an ordinance, to be submitted to the people on the 24th of October, cutting off about 40 counties from Virginia, and forming them into a new State, to be called Kanawha. These counties comprise about one quarter of the white population of Virginia, but have only a small proportion of slaves. Several important Acts have been passed by the Confederate Congress at Richmond. The President is directed to issue a proclamation ordering all male citizens of the United States, above the age of 14 years, to leave the Confederate States within forty days. If they remain longer, they are liable to arrest and imprisonment as alien enemies.—The President is empowered to accept the services of 400,000 men for a period not less than one year or more than three.—A Treasury and Tax Act has been passed, authorizing the issue of Treasury notes to the amount of $100,000,000, redeemable six months after the close of the war; these are to be received in payment of all Government dues, except the export duty on cotton. Besides this, $100,000,000 of bonds are to be issued, bearing interest at the rate of 8 per cent., and redeemable in twenty years. A war tax is also levied of fifty cents in the hundred dollars upon all persons whose property amounts to more than $500. The proposition to sell cotton to the Government, taking payment in Confederate bonds, seems to meet with much favor. It is said that cotton to the amount of $50,000,000 is already subscribed.—The cotton brokers in the principal ports have issued Circulars urging planters not to forward cotton to the sea-ports until the blockade is raised.—Privateering has been very actively carried on. Nearly a hundred vessels are known to have been captured. The Jeff Davis, the most daring and successful of the Confederate privateers, was wrecked on the 18th of August while attempting to cross the bar at St. Augustine, Florida. The vessel was a total loss, but the crew escaped and have reached Charleston.

SOUTHERN AMERICA.

There is no improvement in the condition of Mexico; in fact all accounts concur in representing it as worse than ever. The Juarez Government appears to be powerless, and Marquez, the most dashing of Miramon's officers, is at the head of a strong force. The French and English representatives have suspended diplomatic relations with the Mexican Government.—Some months ago the Spanish Government took possession of the Dominican republic, the southern portion of the Island of Hayti, which has since been formally annexed to the Spanish dominions, Spain pledging itself not to re-establish slavery there.—In New Granada the desultory war which has been waged for more than a year has been brought to a close by the capture of Bogota, the capital, by the revolutionary forces under General Mosquera, who has assumed the office of Provisional President. He proposes a reconstruction of the old Republic of Colombia, by the re-union of New Granada, Venezuela, and Ecuador.—Civil war has again broken out between the different provinces of the Argentine Confederation. At the latest dates from Buenos Ayres, which are of July 15, that province had sent an army into the field against the National Government. The army of the Confederation is stated to amount to 20,000 men, with 12,000 in reserve. The Congress has declared Buenos Ayres to be in a state of insurrection.

EUROPE.

The American difficulties, in their commercial relations, form the staple of our European intelligence. In Great Britain especially the attention of the manufacturers and of Government is turned toward the opening of new sources for the supply of cotton. They hope that a considerable part of the present deficiency from America will be supplied from other quarters, India being the principal; and that in a year or two they will cease to be dependent upon America for this article.

Editor's Easy Chair.

A TIME of war gives profound interest to all stories of wars. There is no book so interesting this summer as the history of our Revolution. You lay down the morning paper—which overflows with news of military movements, of battles, of camp life, of heroism, of hardship, of patriotic enthusiasm—and turning to the pages of Hildreth, or Irving, or Bancroft, or Lossing, or Marshall, you find yourself reading the same tale—but a little farther off, and in another costume.

The history of the American Revolution never tires and constantly surprises. The other day an English gentleman said, good-humoredly, "Ah, yes, Mr. Easy Chair, your revolution was all very well; but it was its success that justified it."

Mr. Easy Chair demurred entirely to such a view. Success can no more justify national than individual action. The American revolution would have been just as right if it had utterly failed. The only proper criticism then would have been that the moment for action was unwisely chosen. And as it was, the peculiar champion and Colossus of American independence, John Adams, said, in the midst of the war, that he would be thankful if things could be put back where they were at the beginning of the armed resistance.

If Burgoyne could have made his junction with Sir Henry Clinton, and by occupying the Hudson had broken the back-bone of our military operations, and if, in consequence, Washington had surrendered and the Continental Congress had sued for peace, and the foolish King of England and his mad ministry had resumed their authority over the colonies, the principle of the American Revolution would have remained as true as ever; it would have survived the temporary failure, and have been the harbinger and justification of final success.

It is as foolish to say that a state or nation can do no wrong as to say the same thing of an individual. Any man may be unjust, and a nation is only many men. If the nation is strong enough to persist in injustice unchecked, it is no more to be excused than the continued crime of a powerful criminal. If Arnold had succeeded in betraying the key of the Hudson to the enemies of America, would he have been any better man, or his act any worthier?

So, upon our side, if the revolution which aimed to establish by force a new government, and consequently to destroy the old one, among the English colonies here, had been hastily undertaken, and upon frivolous or false pretenses, or without long and patient appeal to every peaceful means of redress—if it had been an insurrection against human rights, instead of a struggle for their protection—it ought to have failed, and its success would not have ended it with dignity or worth. A new government might have been established. Succeeding generations might have flourished under it. The causes and circumstances of its origin might have been forgotten. But whenever the student turned up the stream of its history to study its sources, his unblinded moral sense would have been aghast at the springs of our prosperity, although he might himself be one of us, as the virtuous descendants of rich ancestry would burn with manly shame if they discovered that the hereditary fortune they enjoyed had been made in the slave-trade.

For there are such things as well as such words as honor, truth, justice, and right. And they are to be read in national as in individual action. Of course men may honestly differ as to the measures and methods by which to secure justice in human affairs. One man may sincerely suppose that the irresponsible despotism of a single person will more surely promote the general welfare than the wish of the majority of the people. But when that man takes up arms to establish that despotism against the wishes of the majority, regardless of peaceful means provided, and without pretense that great wrong is done, then human nature declares either for or against that man; and by the canons of human conscience and reason, by which Arnold and Washington are equally judged, that man will also be tried.

No, Mr. Bull; Mr. Easy Chair is not of opinion that our success justified our revolution, but that the wrongs we suffered, and the increasing dangers of the system under which those wrongs were done—the exhaustion of every peaceful method of remedy—the palpable fact that the possible disadvantages of forcible redress could not be greater than the certain annihilation of the liberty of the people—and that the success of the revolution would be the political enfranchisement of a people, and the establishment of juster principles of government—these are the justification of our revolution. Our success was a gain for civil liberty. It increased the sum of human happiness. It gave more men a chance; and therefore its success was justified: it did not justify.

The best tonic for the times is our own history. Not every man can tell why his grandfather, who fought in the days of '76, did not deserve to be hung as a rebel. Let him read the history, and ponder as he reads, and he will perceive the essential difference between a wicked rebellion and a justifiable revolution. There may be a mutiny on a ship. If the captain is a pirate, the crew have a right to save themselves even at the cost of the captain's life; if the crew are pirates, they have the power also to take the captain's life, but they are not justified.

THERE are not many new books for the autumnal evenings; and a man who is in the habit of reading feels, in these days, as if he might really keep pace with current literature. The difficulty, of course, always is to know what books to read. In every library an intelligent man knows that a few books hold all the knowledge. If he could only know those he would hold the key of the position. There is a savage satisfaction now in looking at the long row of Rollin's Ancient History, for instance. That is virtually a spiked battery, if only the reader has the good fortune to know it. So all Roman and Greek history, unless a man is pursuing a particular study of details, may be read in their great results in no very cumbrous form.

It is so also with Science; the difficult point always being to find a man who can tell you what is superfluous, and where you can find the latest news.

But in the literature of the imagination, of course individual taste must determine. Whether you will have Pope or Bailey, whether you will read Bacon or Tupper, is a question for your individual answering. And yet even here there are certain books that every accomplished and cultivated person will have read, or at least he will know something of them. Shakespeare, for instance, and Milton belong to this class. Walter Scott also. The Pilgrim's Progress, and Robinson Crusoe, and the Arabian Nights, and Gulliver's Travels are of it.

Then, of current literature, the same person must have read certain books; and among them, upon this principle, perhaps the works of Dickens might be first named. He is the great living novelist. In genius he is unsurpassed by any novelist of any time or country. His opulence of creation is marvelous. Scott does not equal it. There is nothing like it since Shakespeare. His sympathy, in its depth and variety, is also Shakespearian—but it is not Shakespeare's. He loved as heartily, and could draw as skillfully, a technical lady and gentleman as a clown or a villain, a trader or a clerk. Dickens is always less powerful in that direction.

His latest work, in the sense of creation, is Joe Gargery, in "Great Expectations." The Easy Chair has mentioned it before, but the book is now completed, and, with the exception of the London Spectator, it is hailed by the papers with more enthusiasm than any late novel, and much more than any novel of Dickens's since "David Copperfield." And it is said to shine peculiarly by contrast with his last story, the "Tale of Two Cities."

The Easy Chair need make no comparisons; but certainly that story is a very great work. In epical unity, in power of imagination, in breathless and tragic interest, in masterly delineation of the inward and outward aspect of national life in an utterly gloomy period, and in the portraiture of the noblest self-sacrifice, rising into sublimity at last, it would not be easy to find a parallel to the "Tale of Two Cities." The last Idyl of Tennyson's "Idyls of the King" and the conclusion of the "Tale of Two Cities" strike the highest and sweetest note in modern literature, and, in the opinion of one Easy Chair, in all English literature. That is to say, that, in the poem, King Arthur is depicted as a man fulfilling the requirements of the Christian ideal of human character, without forfeiting perfect respect for his manliness; and, in the novel, Sydney Carton offers his life, with the most utter self-renunciation, for the happiness of the woman he loves. Many have gladly died for love, indeed, but not as Sydney Carton dies. "Great Expectations" is a book which adds another leaf to the thick-clustering laurels of its author. But the new leaf does not shade or dim the last that opened there.

THE French Prince who comes to see us this year has a much quieter time than the English Prince who was our visitor a year ago. If we remember the enthusiasm with which the Prince of Wales was hailed, and reflect that the secret of it was not mere curiosity, but the persuasion that he represented a nation which was truly a friendly power through sympathy and intelligence, we can not but feel how entirely we were mistaken.

The French Prince is of a nation which is our hereditary ally. His own family has risen, indeed, upon the ruins of the régime which favored our early struggle. The Bourbons, hating England, helped us. The Bonapartes, hating England, sold us Louisiana. The help during the Revolution and the sale afterward were of the most signal service to this nation. But it is curious that both services were inspired not by love of us but by jealousy of England. In the great game of the world at that time we and our affairs were but episodic. If we could be used against the enemy, it was lucky for the power that wanted to aid us. But we were not a dangerous political power. We were not worth consideration as a political influence. England did not cease to despise and annoy us after she had made peace. France outraged us more in the early days of her revolution than she had honored us during our own.

The reason is obvious and simple enough. We were not a compact nation, with power to compel respect. As Mr. Motley truly describes our condition, we were "a mere dissolving league of jarring provinces."

But since the days when the soldiers of Rochambeau danced upon the Newport green with the rustic belles of Narragansett Bay, and the officers of his army scrawled with diamond rings the name of Polly Lawton upon the windows of his headquarters; since the days when the Count de Grasse with his stately fleet came feeling in at the mouth of the Chesapeake, while Washington and Lafayette drew closer from the land around Cornwallis; since the days when "Citizen Genet" appealed from the Government of the United States to the people of the United States—for demagogues in every age and land are exactly the same kind of men; since the days when Talleyrand would not receive our ministers or treat upon any terms, until he had received a bribe of a quarter of a million of dollars—the United States have risen from a dissolving league of provinces into a mighty nation. Its flag floats round the globe. It covers a continent. Alone among nations, it stretches from one of the great oceans to the other. All climates and soils; all great natural features of the earth; all productions and manufactures; all the rich results of art and science; all the splendors of a complex civilization are counted within its undivided domain. And the people of this nation, secure, by hereditary law of their own making, in the protection of every human right, in the speedy relief and correction of wrong and injustice, enjoying "that form and substance of government whose leading object is, to elevate the condition of men; to lift artificial weights from all shoulders; to clear the paths of laudable pursuit for all; to afford all an unfettered start and a fair chance in the race of life," are also of a higher average prosperity in every relation of human life than has heretofore been the lot of nations.

This is what the French Prince sees. The spectacle can not but be edifying. He sees also clouds, indeed, and learns anew that human society, however prosperous, has yet to contend with difficulties. We do not assume that we have already lifted all artificial weights from all shoulders. We do not claim that the great argument of our destiny is fulfilled, but we do claim that it is in process of fulfillment. We do believe that the Prince himself will yet see the principle which has created the marvelous nation he beholds triumphant, and holy Peace, with a surer benediction for the future, healing our wild discord.

As for the Prince himself—Plon Plon, as he is called in Paris—he has done nothing which distinguishes him from other princely personages. It is impossible not to look with interest upon the nephew of Napoleon Bonaparte, as upon the son of Burns or the grand-niece of Goldsmith. The interest in the case of the Prince is enhanced by his singular personal resemblance to his uncle. One evening at the theatre in Paris, when Rachel was playing, the Easy Chair, raising his eyes suddenly to the stage-box, saw what seemed Napoleon Bonaparte standing with folded arms and gazing down upon the stage. It was the face, and figure, and attitude of the Emperor more perfect than the subtlest art could reproduce them.

When the present Emperor was President, his cousin, the present Prince, sat in the assembly with the "Mountain," or the radical members. When the empire was restored, the Prince still cherished liberal views. But he has not yet distinguished himself either as statesman, soldier, or scholar. His position as possible heir to the Emperor gives him another interest. But his chief distinctions are thus far derived more from his accidental association with others than from his own talents or achievements.

Still another interest in him arises from his marriage with the daughter of the re galantuomo, Victor Emanuel of Sardinia. The Princess Clotilde is a daughter of the house of Savoy, one of the most ancient of the regal families of Europe; and her father has written his name with his sword in the history of Italy.

The conduct of Prince Napoleon in this country has been that of a quiet gentleman. He has wisely dispensed with all ceremony, and has gone about to see what he wishes in his own way, and not what Mayors and Common Councils wish, in their way. What he thinks of our difficulties, and what report he is likely to make to the Emperor, no one can say. But it may be very readily imagined that no great power is seriously sorry to see another in trouble, unless itself is immediately involved. If Louis Napoleon thinks it for the interest of France, and consequently of his own dynasty, that there should be a third great maritime nation, he will be very firm in his friendship for the Government of the United States. If he supposes that his interest requires division, he will very readily acknowledge the independence of the Southern Confederacy.

THE Committee upon the National Hymn reported that among twelve hundred contributions they found none of such striking excellence that it should receive the premium. The "newspaper press" have, upon the whole, treated the Committee very gently. When the proposition was first announced the gentlemen of the Committee might have been supposed peculiarly destitute of common sense. "Write hymns to order! A price for inspiration! A paid muse!" was the general outburst; "the gentlemen of this Committee must be singularly ignorant if they are not aware that a national song is the offspring of an emotion that can not be summoned for a price. They may call songs from the heart of a people, but they will come at no sound of chinking gold. The lyric music is no venal prostitute, but shows her face and awards her favors," etc., etc., etc.

The "newspaper press" was eloquent upon the theme that great songs could not, and were not, and are not, and, indeed, should not, be written to order. Somebody, or something, seemed to have been outraged or slighted, by the suggestion that if before a certain time a poem should be sent to certain gentlemen which seemed to them worthy to be a national hymn, they were authorized to give the author a certain sum of money.

To suppose that those gentlemen imagined that the money would necessarily produce the hymn was supposing a great deal more than the occasion warranted. But there are probably very few gentlemen who, if they were asked to do so simple a favor as the serving upon such a jury, would refuse. There is sure to be a great deal of fun in the performance of the duties; and there can be little doubt that, if the Committee could honorably have published a volume of the most extraordinary contributions sent to them, it would have been one of the drollest and most entertaining books of the season—sure to secure a considerable sum for the Patriotic Fund. And if some heart glowing with patriotic fire had flamed into song, where is the harm of giving the writer a chance to send the song to a committee and get money for it? It was not necessary that the hymn should have been written at the call of the Committee, but only that it should be written. Let it spring, as the "newspaper press" says such lyrics must spring, out of the heart swept by a passion of patriotism that can not be hired. All right. That is the way such songs generally come. Is the author, therefore, to be deprived of any reward? Is there any immorality or impropriety in offering a good dinner to a man who has written a good poem?

But there is still a word to say upon the general subject. It is not true that the greatest works of art may not be produced by commission. Mr. Pye, the Poet Laureate of George Third, certainly did not sweep the lyre to make the world resound for his pipe of canary. But the Pickwick Papers of Dickens, the Vatican frescoes of Raphael, and the Requiem of Mozart, are all works of the highest genius and were produced to order.

"I was a young man of three-and-twenty," says Mr. Dickens, "when the present publishers (Chapman and Hall), attracted by some pieces I was at that time writing in the Morning Chronicle newspaper," came to him and asked him to write a "monthly something" which "should be a vehicle for certain plates to be executed by Mr. Seymour;" and the idea of a "Nimrod Club" was suggested. Dickens preferred not to have a sporting club; but he says, "I connected Mr. Pickwick with a club because of the original suggestion."

If the publishers had issued a public advertisement that they wished a work of that general character to be written, how the public would have informed them that great works in literature were not written to order; that you couldn't buy inspiration by the page as you bought ribbon by the yard; that great works sprang out of great experience, and that Pegasus was not a livery horse. Neither the publishers nor Dickens seem to have thought of those excellent things. They issued a private advertisement, and the result was Pickwick, for which the genial writer has been paid many a rose-noble; and many more may he receive and enjoy!

As for Mozart, he did not even begin to write the Requiem until he had received part of the payment in advance.

There was, then, certainly no harm in inviting poets to send their songs, whether old or new, so they had not been published, to the Committee. It was the Committee really that was upon trial. They did not undertake to say what should be the National Hymn, for that only the favor of the people could determine. But if they awarded the prize, they did by that act declare that, in their opinion, the prize poem was worthy to be such a hymn. With great prudence, however, they reserved the right of refusing the premium to all, if none seemed to correspond to the conditions. We must allow that they were a tolerably shrewd committee. They gave themselves the largest liberty. They did not mean to decide upon abstract poetic merit. They probably did not anticipate very signal success, and they are, unquestionably, not very much disappointed.

There is, however, a book of contributions to be issued, with the consent of the authors; and the Court of Last Appeal, the Public, will have the opportunity of reversing the verdict of the lower Court, the Committee.

THE Easy Chair lately called upon an old acquaintance, or, more properly, the scion of a family which he had known upon the banks of the Nile. It is an ancient African family of wide repute and of the most solid and weighty character. The younger representatives have an extraordinary personal resemblance, so marked that, although the one upon which I called in this city was individually unknown, the general likeness and traits were so unmistakable that we had the most delightful interview. The family is not loquacious, and the family manners are languid even to laziness. But the purity and innocence of expression in the broad face are very winning, and there are a great many whom we all meet in society who talk more but are little wiser.

One curious habit which I remarked in the member of the family abroad I did not observe in the friend here. The foreign one used to bathe in milk. A tank, in fact, was filled with milk, and the scion of the old family descended into it incontinently and disappeared. It was an eccentricity, also, that he did not stay to undress himself; but, to state it candidly, went in as he was. After the lapse of some minutes his bald, benignant head and face emerged, he breathed long and heavily as if sighing, and after beaming around in token of content and amity with all mankind, he dipped again and left the world to the spectator.

Afterward I met the distinguished stranger in London. The Nepaulese ambassadors were also there, but their greatness and importance did not overshadow the claims of the African. The nobility and gentry thronged to visit him. The London Times, most obsequious of snobs, courted him, and entertained its friends with endless twaddle about him. The town in the height of the season was in a flutter of delight. But the illustrious stranger was perfectly undisturbed. He took his milk bath with the greatest equanimity before the eyes of the loveliest ladies in the land, and beamed about, upon rising, with a depth of stolidity which might have made a prime minister frantic with envy.

It was undeniable that the stranger was a Pythagorean. He ate no meat. The costliest viands, the most sumptuous banquets, were unheeded by him. He desired only farinaceous food prepared in the simplest manner. Wine, also, he seemed to be principled against; yet he never said that he was a teetotaler, nor was he once heard to inquire about Father Mathew among the distinguished people of the British empire. In truth, he confined himself in drinking to milk and water; in eating, to the plainest grains and greens. And he thrived upon it wonderfully. He was certainly much the largest stranger in London. His complexion was even more tawny than that of the Nepaulese ambassadors, and his Princely placidity was much more profound than theirs. They were sometimes guilty of betraying curiosity or surprise, but he never. You might have supposed him to be born in London, so entirely did he adjust himself to what he saw and heard. You might have believed him of the highest ton, so utterly indifferent were his manners. There are few kings or queens in the world who have such serenity of deportment as he. Like the Pope, he took his meals entirely alone. Others assisted: indeed, I have seen countesses and other fine ladies present, but they were there only as the Cardinals and Monsignori surround the Pope; they were only princely servitors. The placid stranger revived the habit which used to prevail in medieval courts, of admitting spectators to the daily repast. But I never ceased to wonder at the change which had been wrought. I left him in Cairo a hippopotamus; I found him in London a lion.

It is said, indeed, that the one which has been recently in the city is the identical marvel and sensation of London ten years ago, and, indeed, he limped, as if it were possible. But I am inclined to see in his infirmity a sore foot and not age. No unbiased eyes could look in that artless face and call it old. Time, if indeed he has been at work upon the old friend of the Easy Chair, writes no wrinkles upon his leather brow.

Of all amorphous monsters the hippopotamus is the most engaging. He is a beatified rhinoceros. He bears no horn, indeed, but then he needs no horn, except of milk and water. Innocent himself, he is the friend of little children. If he is still here when you read this line, take the children, indulgent parents, and treat them to hippopotamus.

No English poet had ever such an enthusiastic welcome as Alexander Smith when he published his first poem, seven or eight years ago. The Reviews exhausted superlatives and surprise; and while many critics declared that they did not exactly know, and could not precisely see, they were borne down by the loud cry of welcome and delight which greeted the new singer. It was hardly possible that the enthusiasm should not cool. Of course the critics presently began to call the poet to account for the ardor with which he had been received; and now that he has sent out his third venture upon the sea of public opinion, the critical journals find that there is "promise," and so forth, but that he is still crude and imitative.

Long ago, when the Easy Chair was a mere bench, or stool, he was once speaking to a philosopher about a new poet. The young Chair thought that the singer was wonderfully wise. "I don't care about his wisdom," said the philosopher; "has he music? do his lines ring? A poet who begins with jingling nonsense begins well." Alexander Smith began with more than that. And his last poem, "Edwin of Deira," which is printed entire in this number of the Magazine, shows that, despite the wild praise and the sharp sneering which have surrounded him, and which might well have sadly affected a man who had not a clear brain and a calm heart, he has quietly pushed on, cultivating and concentrating his powers, until he has produced a poem which is so much stronger and matured than any he has yet written that no one can feel that his flower was not to grow into fruit.

That it should be called Tennysonian: that we should hear that the poem would never have been written but for the "Idyls of the King:" that it should be charged with conceit and high color, is only natural, because it is a poem of this time: and every poem of to-day has, and must have, a certain interior resemblance to every other. The spirit of the age as surely makes its mark upon every work of the age as the sunlight steals into every valley, as well as pours upon the mountains. The poetry of Tennyson is typical of the poetry of the age. That Alexander Smith's may remind you of it is not necessarily more surprising than that Marlowe, or Ben Jonson, or Beaumont and Fletcher should remind you of Shakespeare. It certainly does not show that they may not be very excellent poets. "Edwin of Deira" is a broad, simple theme, treated with great skill and elaboration and delicate feeling. It is a succession of beautiful pictures of a continuous interest, which rises to an unexpected height toward the end. It is still almost too rich. To read it is almost to lunch on honey. But it draws you on with an interest deeper than curiosity or surprise—an interest which is rooted in its exquisite human feeling and its tender portraiture of love. Bertha may well be twin to "the lily maid of Astolot." And as every one naturally wishes to see the poem of the hour, "Edwin of Deira" will be as timely as it will be beautiful to the great host of our friends.

Our Foreign Bureau.

WHILE the American mind is alive only to one great subject it seems a folly to draw attention to others. And yet, Europe too has its life. Millions here, who know little of Davis or of Lincoln, are toiling, hoping, wearying through the meshes of a perplexed, and noisy, and brilliant, and disturbed existence—that may end to-morrow. Yonder, over the river (dating as we did whilom from the Quai Voltaire), they are building up new boudoirs within the old hulk of the Tuileries for the disportment of an imperial family; the new Boulevards are opening in all directions, straight, broad, splendid with every new adornment of architectural device. The click of the stone-mason's hammer comes to our ear like the unwearied song of locusts. The broad, gay placards that tell of revival of Molière or Corneille flame upon the unfinished houses. The Seine gurgles, yellow and muddy, past the ancient bridges, past the sweltering barges, past the piled up masses of bathing-houses, past the shadows of the gorgeous river palaces, past the quiet lines of stately poplars that stand on the banks toward St. Cloud, and rolls toward the sea as it rolled before our civil war was known.

We do not write this merely for prelude, but to say, in such roundabout manner as befits our gossip, that America is not the world; that our republicans, struggling in their fashion, are, after all, only so many millions out of God's hundreds of millions; that all of hope, and strength, and endeavor is not centred within the "States" we call "United;" and that the great clock which marks the centuries of the world's life does not stop, even if the "second" hand plays false and vibrates with some abnormal eccentricity.

There is this good lesson which our strife may teach us—that we are not atop of all the world; that we have not solved successfully all the riddles which belong to government and progress; that we must take our share of failures, and fire, and blood in the weary struggle we are making with other companies of nations toward the fulfillment of human destiny. We have made a grand push for a young family, and our success has intoxicated and distempered us. We have bragged till other people were weary of our bragging. We have boasted of our cheap bread and schools, as if cheap bread and schools were every thing; not remembering that bread only gave muscular vigor, and schools only mental vigor, for as much of deviltry as of godliness. The developments of our civilization which are reported over seas, in the few months last past, and the dissertations upon them, are not such as to make an American feel proud of his country. Why deny it? Why not have done with bluster? Why not put ourselves to serious, silent work, and wait for plaudits from without?

As we said, Europe has its growth and its engrossing topics apart from the great American problem. Here, in Paris, we have been celebrating the opening of a new thoroughfare—greater, and destined to be more splendid even than the Rue Rivoli. A boulevard of lavish breadth and promised lavishment of architecture has like magic been stretched through the city from the temple of the Madeleine to the line of the fortifications. The rich houses of the Rue Rumford and a host of narrow, tortuous alleys have been brushed away for its path. The Park Monceaux—another and richer "Garden of the Tuileries"—flanks it, and great pavilions, with crimson and golden hangings, and an Imperial fête have marked its inauguration. The boulevard has been so recently opened that it is not of course as yet built up; but the stagings of all the houses and churches in process of erection were completely garlanded with verdure and flowers; soldiers lined the way in their gayest attire, and a fairy pavilion of Moorish richness received the Emperor and his suite near to the triumphal arch which crowned the entrance to the Park Monceaux. Here the Préfet of the Seine discoursed upon the difficulties and the triumphs of the great undertaking; while the Emperor replied in a good municipal speech, without allusion to any matters foreign to the embellishments and prosperity of the city of Paris.

Besides this gala day the capital has enjoyed its reception of the King of Sweden (accompanied by his stalwart body-guard in a costume of the time of Louis XV.) and the attendant brilliant review of fifty thousand men upon the Champs de Mars. The fête of the 15th of August has succeeded with its whirl of lampions, its games, its crowds, and its fairy festoons of parti-colored lights stretching from the Place de la Concorde to the Arc de l'Etoile.

French talk has turned upon the Imperial health and the sojourn at Vichy; upon the manœuvres of the great camp at Chalons; upon the Romish quarrel of the commanding (French) General Goyon with the Papish (Belgic) Minister of War, and upon the renewed coolness which has grown up between the Austrian and French courts. While the grain crop of the Empire is reported smaller than an average, it is understood that large purchases have been made upon Government account in America, and the Emperor has taken a late public occasion to assure the people that, in the event of comparative scarcity, his ministers have taken ample means to insure the poor against any inordinate increase in the price of bread. He also flatters Paris with the assurance that, since the negotiation of the late commercial treaty with England, the exportation of articles of Paris manufacture has nearly doubled. Cordial relations with the Ricasoli government of Turin are still entertained; while it is hinted that latterly commissioners of Hungary have been privately admitted to an Imperial audience.

The manufacturers and commercial men of France are beginning only now to feel the full weight of the American war, and are loud and earnest in their declarations against the tariff of the Union. It affronts (they say) and destroys a sympathy which else we might give them. It is understood that our Minister to Brazil (General Webb) has had the honor of a private interview with Napoleon, and that since the affair of Manassas one or two Commissioners of the Southern States have been honored with the same attention; but it does not appear that his Imperial Majesty was specially communicative on either occasion of his intentions or of his sympathies. It is clear, however, that he watches the progress of events with the utmost eagerness, and exhausts all the sources of information bearing upon it within his reach.

The naval preparations are going on with their usual activity, and no less than ten or twelve iron-clad vessels are reported as fit for sea; while as many more are in process of construction. The building of ordinary wooden vessels for war purposes is discarded; and it is matter of amazement to the naval constructors of France that America should just now be increasing her navy in such an enormous ratio with what the authorities here are reckoning only so much tinder-wood. They feel and express the assurance that a ship like La Gloire, with rifled guns and shells charged with molten metal, would prove more than a match for any ten of the old style wooden war-ships.

Either the British and French authorities are utterly befogged, and expending millions in development of a theory which is wholly untenable, or else the new constructions of the United States navy, in event of any conflict with a foreign power, would prove worthless. The contractors, however, are probably doing well.

Italian affairs remain comparatively quiet. We wait patiently the death of the Pope, as the only event which can give a new phase to the complicity of Roman politics. Every day some rumor of a French evacuation makes the quidnuncs gape with wonderment; and every succeeding day the rumor is belied by an announcement of the continued tranquil status of the eternal city. The difficulties of the Neapolitan insurrections are real and threatening. The old Italian jealousy of Piedmont has its share in fomenting them; the unthrift and turbulence of the Neapolitan character has perhaps a larger share in the same direction; and most provocative of all is the money and the art of the exiled Bourbon family, which finds a secret ally in the Church and all its most bigoted dependents.

A new complication, moreover, of the Southern difficulties has arisen from the fact that certain Sardinian statesmen (Massimo d'Azeglio among them) have seriously and publicly questioned the right of Victor Emanuel to maintain his authority in the Sicilian kingdom, if the inhabitants persist in showing a disinclination to his rule.

Our principle, say such statists, is that the cheerful and voluntary consent of a people is an essential condition of our right to govern them and make them part of our great Italian nation. If they resent our authority, struggle against its exercise, and make their antipathy rebellion, what we have to do is to withdraw and permit them to determine for themselves. Of course this view of the matter supposes that their vote of allegiance to the King Victor Emanuel was an unfair one, or that they have outlived their wishes of that date.

Austria still stands nervously poised upon the point of dissolution. Her difficulties grow so great, and assail her from such opposite quarters, that she seems to stand erect only by the contrariety of her assailants. Hungary does not yield, and only does not fight. Styria is querulous, but does not rebel. Even Dalmatia, in the inquiry after traditionary rights, has her assertions of integrity to make, and does not fear to propound them to the Councilors of the Empire.

We hear nothing from Venetia, because they have grown there into the habit of low speech; but the calm and the silence, be they ever so long, do not mean, and never can mean, that the German and Italian currents of hope and endeavor have become mixed and are one. The Lagoon will never lift its waters to the level of the Julian Alps; and the shaggy Julian Alps will never come down to the level of the Lagoon.

The new Sultan is making good, thus far, his promise of reforms; but they are reforms which, however much they may count for Government energy, and economy, and system, count very little toward the Christianizing of the great empire of the Prophet. It is a new brandishing of the cimeter of the Levant in the face of the West—a stalwart declaration that all vigor has not yet gone out from the followers of Mohammed. Far as Bagdad the energy of the new master has reached already; dishonest officials have been cast out by the score; the trumpery jewels of three reigns are in the markets; the golden ewers are melted down; honesty has no longer its price, and “God is great,” but “Mohammed is his prophet.”

Russia is puzzled with Poland: wanting to be gracious, but yet fearful of issues. The serf question (just now coming into its most trying phase) is on its hands, and the new wars upon the borders of the Caspian. Alexander is strong by his private character, strong by reason of his amiable intentions, but he has that perverse nationality of Poland (which will not die, though trampled down never so many times) to contend with, and the ill-concealed animosity of a great host of his nobles, who do not share in his policy of emancipation. So it happens that Russia, by reason of its own home struggles, is just now written out of all the moves which strategy is devising upon the chess-board of Europe.

Prussia, though bristling with the best-appointed army (outside of France) in Europe, and though the Holstein difficulty is not solved against all chance of recurrence, may be almost written down in the same category. The Becker attempt upon the King's life has alone caused prominent mention of the new monarch. And young, heated Germany (of which Becker was a somewhat exalted type) is inditing ever-fresh poems to that eidolon of Germanic unity, which is always coquetting with its vision and always eluding its grasp.

Great Britain has had her successive sensations—over the American news—over the “iron-armor” debate—over the Northumberland Street tragedy—over the naming of Sir Robert Peel to the Chief-Secretaryship of Ireland—over the last hours of Parliament, and the Goodwood races; and now, in sober mood, is following Lord Herbert, the late War-Secretary, to his tomb; and to-morrow will be away to the moors and the grouse of Scotland.

Lord Herbert, better known as Sidney Herbert, is deserving of more than this careless mention. He was an elegant and worthy scion of the British peerage. High in birth (being son of the Earl of Pembroke), he was rich, generous, cultivated, industrious; and gave promise, if life had been spared him, to rank second to none in influence in the British Parliament.

He was buried at Wilton, near to Salisbury, where he lived, and where, some years since, he built at his own cost an exquisite parish church, at an expense of £70,000, being altogether the richest and most artistic reproduction of the Lombard school of architecture to be found in England. Near to its marvelous cloister he lies now, and the bells that swing on its campanile are heard as far as the ancient house of Pembroke, where Sir Philip Sidney wrote his "Arcadia."

And (to be prosaic) at this town of Wilton, where the "Arcadia" was written, which nobody reads, they make now the carpets which every body buys.

Editor's Drawer.

"NOTHING new under the sun" was the sentence of Solomon; and from the days of Josephus Moliter, or, as he is familiarly called, Joseph the Miller, and vulgarly Joe Miller, it has been said that no new joke has been made, no smart thing said. Indeed, the sayings of this Joseph are believed by many profound antiquarians to embrace the wit of all his humorous predecessors gathered into one comic volume and tacked to his name. It was all his grist that came to the mill of this miller, and he takes the toll of all the tales that are told of him as well as by him. So it is with modern story-tellers: they repeat themselves and their ancestors—disinterring the venerable remains of the Joe Millers that have been buried so long as to be forgotten by all the world and the rest of mankind, and bringing them out at a dinner-table as the old dining Egyptians had a skeleton shown them at the table, to remind them that, eat as much as they would, they would only come to that at last. So they laughed over the bones of their forefathers. A short time since we were greatly amused by the rule which Mr. Sparrowgrass told us the Home Guard of Yonkers had adopted—"this Guard is not to leave Yonkers except in case of invasion." We thought this very funny in Mr. Sparrowgrass. He is a wit of the first water; and there was something so very ludicrous in the idea of a Home Guard going out of town when the enemy came in that we all laughed heartily, and said, "Long live Sparrowgrass! all flesh is grass, but Sparrowgrass is fish, flesh, fowl, and every thing else that is good to take." But the grass withereth, and so the wit of Mr. Sparrowgrass is to perish in the grave of Josephus the Miller. For in his day, and perhaps before his day, the great William Pitt, who seldom said a witty thing, but many wise ones, was Lord Warden of the Cinque Ports. He presided at a public meeting held in Dover, during the war, for the purpose of raising a volunteer corps, when the secretary, in drawing up the conditions on which they were to be embodied, said to the chairman, "I suppose, Sir, that I am to insert the usual clause—not to serve out of the country." "Certainly, certainly," smiled Pitt, "except in case of invasion!"

So the Yonkers regulation was borrowed from the British service; and if any body is disposed to doubt the valor of the Home Guard, let him remember that the suggestion of leaving when the enemy enters has the highest possible authority in the words of the great Pitt!

THE Drawer has long been the reservoir for the streams of good-humor that flow in from all parts of this great country. In these times of war, when there is less fun than fighting, the Drawer is sought for to enliven the Home Guard, and help in the good work of keeping off the enemy that comes in the shape of "blue devils." What wit has to do with health and happiness it is easy to know by trying it on, not very easy to define in an essay.

War has its humors, as we shall presently see. But war is no joke. It is worse for wit than the dyspepsia: it may be truly said of the wittiest man that his jests die when he can not digest; and the explosions of gunpowder are rarely followed by those of laughter, though there is not a letter of difference between man's laughter and manslaughter.

THE other day a very dull Dominie was taking up too much of the attention of the company at dinner with talking of himself and his ailments, of which he had more than a dozen in his own imagination, and he had very little of that. At length, turning to Dr. Parker—the Physician, not the Reverend—he said, "I never can go out of doors without catching cold in my head." "No wonder," replied the Doctor, "you always go out without any thing in it!"

A CORRESPONDENT of the Drawer writes:

"In Ashtabula, Ohio, the village paper reports a festival in honor of a company returned from the wars. The Zoo Zoos were a squad of Zouaves home on furlough from the Seventh Regiment. It is not quite clear what the meaning of the last sentence is, but no doubt the editor's intention was good. The extract ought to have space in the Drawer, as a specimen of what can be furnished by Ohio:

"The festival for raising funds for the Ladies' Aid Society, to liquidate a burdensome debt, held at Smith's Hall, on Tuesday evening, was, we believe, a success, both pecuniarily and in the pleasures of the entertainment. The band gave some of their most touching strains; the ladies' smiles were prolific without strain; the Zoo Zoos went through their evolutions with military precision, eliciting much interest; and the strawberries and cream, as they went home to the seat of palatial enjoyment, opening the avenues to the intellect, and radiating every index of the soul, scattered to the winds all that refined and transcendental nonsense about the inconsistency of animal pleasures with a high state of intellectual elegance and ethereal purity."

FROM Joliet, Illinois, a contributor sends the following incident, which, he says, occurred in that city a short time since:

"The Twentieth Illinois Regiment was stationed near our city for several weeks. Captain B—, a real good fellow and Sheriff of Kankakee County, became impressed with the idea that he was unpopular with his company, which occasioned him to take a glass or two too much, and to express, in pretty strong language, the many troubles and grievances with which he had been afflicted. A good deacon of our place induced him to come into his store, and endeavored to persuade him that his suspicions in regard to his unpopularity were unfounded, and that he should bear his troubles like a man. The Captain drew himself up, and said, "Deacon, you are a good deal of a Bible man, and probably are acquainted with old Job. Now, I don't say but what he had a pretty hard time, and that they spread the boils on him mighty thick; but still you see he never commanded a company of Illinois volunteers."

To judge from the letters that find their way into the newspapers occasionally, we are disposed to believe the Illinois Captain's experience is not peculiar.

FROM Missouri a good-natured correspondent writes:

"I am sure you will be gratified to know that, amidst the gloom surrounding us in this land of neighborhood strife, many an hour, otherwise con-

separated to sadness, has been enlivened by the unflagging humors of your Drawer—one of the few institutions of our country seemingly unaffected by our national troubles.

"Connected with the difficulties in this State an incident has occurred too good to be lost. Our town which, twelve months ago, after rising to the dignity of a railroad terminus, boasted a happy and prosperous population of twelve hundred souls, can claim at this time scarcely half that number. Goldsmith's ideal of a deserted village with us has become a realization.

"Among those who fled hence to a land of greater security beyond the 'Father of Waters,' was an old and highly esteemed family by the name of H——, whose chief had occupied among us, for the long period of sixteen years, the office of County Clerk.

"Mr. H——, at the time he left, was the owner of several slaves, among whom was one of venerable age rejoicing in the name of 'Aunt Katie.'

"Now Aunt Katie has many prominent characteristics. She is benevolent and pious, and teaches many lessons of propriety to the young 'Africans,' among whom she is looked upon as an example of a very high order. She is devoted to her master and mistress, by whom she has been tendered her freedom, which she has declined to accept. Her master has been gone from here several weeks, and frequently sends Aunt Katie an expression of his desire that she should favor him with her presence in Illinois. But she persistently refuses to go, as there are, she says, too many 'abolitionists' there. She has now sent her master the following as her ultimatum: She will go whenever he executes a bond guaranteeing that the 'abolitionists shall not steal her when she gets there.' Well knowing Mr. H——'s accommodating disposition, we feel satisfied that the condition will be complied with, and Aunt Katie made happy once more."

"WE have in this county an old German who, in the days of militia trainings, commanded the 'Cornstalk Rangers.' On review-day he was drilling his men near a creek, and had marched them in line nearly to the bank of the stream. In his excitement he forgot the proper command, and called out, 'Wo-o-oh! shtop!'"

"AN amusing incident recently occurred at a theatre in a neighboring city, which illustrated the depreciation of Western Virginia currency better than the Detectors. A company of volunteers from our town, on their way to the seat of war, stopped in the city of P—— to be equipped, and some of the boys spent the evening at the theatre. The heroine of the play is desperately in love with a poor young gentleman, but her wealthy father is violently opposed to the match. In the last act, however, the 'cruel parent' relents, gives his consent to the marriage, and presents his daughter with a large sum of money. The scene was highly exciting, and the audience was breathlessly silent, when, just as the old gentleman hands his daughters the roll of notes, one of the soldiers (who had a V which he couldn't pass) exclaimed: 'Look'ee here, old fellow, if that's Wheeling money it ain't worth a cent!'"

A FRIEND in New Jersey revives some recollections of a Vermont Governor's son:

"A recent number of Harper contained in its Drawer (where all its best things are put) an amusing incident in the life of Governor Mattocks, of Vermont. His humor was always agreeable, and his wit to the point. A few years since I had the pleasure of passing a few days with his son, a Presbyterian clergyman, then settled in the eastern part of New York. During my visit at his house I was struck with many things in his character which forcibly reminded me of his father. In fact, to one who had been familiar with the Governor, it was evident that the minister was a chip of the old block. While settled in K—— he had in his church a deacon who, though rich, was so parsimonious that some even called him mean. During a protracted meeting in the neighborhood of the deacon's house, Mr. Mattocks told him, if it would be convenient, he, with three brother clergymen, would dine with him next day. Deacon B—— gave a grunt of assent; and during the remainder of the day, instead of listening to the sublime truths falling from the lips of his worthy pastor, he seemed lost in calculating the exact cost of a dinner for four hungry clergymen.

"Next day the ministers repaired to the house of the worthy deacon. When seated at the table all seemed struck with the coarse and scanty provisions. The deacon was himself at once made painfully aware of the insufficiency of the means to accomplish the ends intended, and endeavored to apologize, by saying he was sorry he could offer them nothing better, but still this was more and better than we deserve.

"'Yes, Deacon B——,' said Mr. Mattocks; 'better, far better than we deserve from the Lord; yet by no means what we ought to expect from you.'

"The old man took the rebuke in a Christian spirit, and ever after ministers fared well with Deacon B——."

WE have pleasure in giving the following letter, just as it comes to our hands, though it was a long time on the way:

"MONTEVIDEO, URUGUAY, S. A.,
"May 26, 1861.

"MR. EDITOR,—While walking my solitary watch I found one of your Magazines, and warmed myself with the spicy contents of its Drawer. Please accept two amusing incidents which happened on board this 'Uncle Sam's ship.'

"Among our marine guard is a high private from the Emerald Isle by the name of Pat Cronin. Mr. Cronin entered the service out of pure love of glory, mixed, I must confess, with a few romantic ideas of 'mountain waves and bright blue water.' Mr. Cronin wishes every one to understand that 'his father was a sojer before him.' To the point.

"One evening, when the shores of 'Columbia' were growing dim, Mr. Cronin was 'at his post' before the cabin-door. His new uniform and glittering bayonet appeared to please him, and, together with the fine weather, Mr. Cronin was delighted with his first night at sea. Suddenly Mr. Cronin was aroused from his pleasant reflections by the sonorous voice of the lieutenant of the watch, who cried,

"'Orderly!'"

"'Sur-r-r-r,' answers Mr. Cronin, dropping into the first position of a soldier, and making an exaggerated military salute.

"'LIEUTENANT. 'Orderly, inform the Captain that a hermaphrodite brig is in sight, three points off our lee-bow, bearing down.'

"'Yis, Sur-r-r,' said Mr. Cronin, with another salute, and then vanished into the cabin.

"'Oh, Captain!' says Cronin.

"'Well, what do you want, you rascal, coming into my cabin in this style?'"

"'But Captain, Sur-r-r, the gentleman what has charge of the sails says, yer honor, ther's a mortified brig three pints on top the lee-bow, Sur-r-r, and it's coming down, too, Sur-r-r.'

"SCENE ONE MORNING.—Mr. Cronin, walking his accustomed place before the cabin-door (Mr. Cronin has changed his deportment), is more military, and he performs his duty with great precision. The sailing-master appears on deck, and casts his eye at the deck, near the cabin-door.

"'Orderly!'

"'Sur-r-r,' says Cronin, with a salute.

"'Orderly, that clock is fifteen minutes too slow—how's that? I set it this morning.'

"'I don't know,' says Cronin, 'on the honor of a sojer, Sur-r-r. I does my duty, and nary a person what has no right comes near the time-piece, Sur-r-r.'

"'Well,' said the master, 'all I've got to say is, that it's very strange that clock has lost fifteen minutes in two hours.'

"'Indeed,' says Cronin, 'I don't know.'

"'Orderly, some person must have been meddling with it.'

"'Well, Sur-r-r,' said Mr. Cronin, raising his hat and scratching his red head—'I think, Sur-r-r, the clock must have stopped and gone ahead agin, Sur-r-r.'"

A BALTIMORE correspondent writes to the Drawer:

"The anecdote of Lawyer Martin, of Maryland, has been given in a book about Aaron Burr; but it is told differently, and I think I have the correct version from a lady who visited at his house, and was intimate with his nieces. It appears that he was very fond of music, but could not distinguish one tune from another. Having made himself very unpopular by his defense of Burr, a crowd surrounded his house, with a band of music, playing the Rogue's March. The old gentleman took it as a compliment, walked to the front, and thanked them politely for their music. Not expecting such a reception, the mob stared and moved on; and his family, who were much terrified, gave him a hint to slip away from the door.

"He was in the habit of reading the newspapers on his way home of an afternoon, often becoming so absorbed that he would go past his own door; then he would look up and say, 'Bless me, I have passed the house!' and, resuming his reading, would perhaps go as far on the other side, to the extreme amusement of the juveniles of the neighborhood, who reported that he once stumbled against a cow, took off his hat, and bowing, said, 'I beg your pardon, Madam!' without discovering his mistake.

"THE recent panic in this city," says the same writer, "reminded me of a story I have heard about some ladies who had a brother in the Battle of Bladensburg. They lived near enough to the field to hear the artillery, and at every report one of them would say, 'Poor Richard is gone now!' or, 'There! I expect Dick is certainly killed this time!' This was continued till poor Richard was mourned over many times; and night came down with a storm of wind and rain, which blew down the kitchen chimney, and they were unprotected, in a lonely house, without any means of closing the wide aperture. To add to their distress, they fancied they heard the howling of wild beasts in the woods. There was a report afloat of some having escaped from a menagerie in the neighborhood. At last, in the midst of their terror, the elder sister exclaimed, 'Well, we shall live till we die, kill us who dares!' At this wise maxim the others laughed, and they took courage to go to bed and wait the issue of events. I am glad to say they were left unmolested, and Richard returned home alive and well."

WE are greatly indebted to the excellent correspondent who sends us the three following stories:

An Indian's tenacity of memory is often remarked. Here is a wonderful instance: Some time since, the writer, with a party of gentlemen, was riding through an Indian settlement in the far, far West, some twelve hundred miles from St. Louis. Among the party was a Mr. S——, who had been some years before an auctioneer in St. Louis. As the Indians stood looking at us with keen attention as we passed, to our great surprise, one, an old man, sprung toward us with his eye glistening, as if he recognized an acquaintance. Coming up to Mr. S—— with extended hand, he exclaimed, in broken English, "How you do? Me know you! me know you! How you do?" Mr. S——, in great astonishment, shook his head, having never seen him before, saying, "Oh no! you don't know me." "Oh yes! me know you, me know you; how you do?" "No! you are mistaken, my friend, you don't know me!" "Yes, me know you!" "Then, if you know me, what is my name?" "Name? Name?" And he knitted his brow and seemed puzzled, musingly and abstractedly muttering, "Name? Name?" This was but for a moment. As with a flash of lightning, and with the rapid utterance of an auctioneer, that needed to be heard to be fully depicted, he called out, "Name? One dollar! One dollar! One dollar! Going! Gone!" and he slapped his right hand violently down on his left. Some twelve years before, accidentally, in St. Louis, he had passed Mr. S——'s Auction Rooms, and heard him crying as repeated. From that casual notice he remembered Mr. S——'s face, so far removed in time and place.

In a neighborhood near Cincinnati some Irish laborers were cutting a new road toward Walnut Hills that was a greatly-desired improvement; and we were impatient for it to be done—so anxious, that, before it was even safe to pass it, some adventurous travelers, at considerable risk, drove over it. One afternoon I risked it, anxious to show a friend, whom I was driving out, the improvement. In the worst part one of the laborers was wheeling earth. As a passing, pleasant remark, I said, "Halloa, Pat! when are you going to have this elegant road done?" "Arrah!" said he, "how did you know my name was Pat?" "I did not know; I only guessed it!" "By me soul, it's yerself that's good at guessing; for, faith! that same is me name. And since ye are so good at guessing, ye may jist guess when the road'll be done!" I drove rapidly on. I had read just such an answer before, but this was the first time I had heard it.

THE ignorance of American Geography, manifested by even intelligent and educated people in Europe, has often been the subject of remark with us. Mr. W——, a resident of Baltimore, was called upon some time since by a gentleman, bringing a letter of introduction from an intimate European friend, who was a very intelligent and wealthy banker in the city of H——, who prided himself on his knowledge of America, and who was received as the accredited authority on American affairs. Mr. V——, whom he wished thus to introduce, was seeking to invest a portion of his capital in this country. The letter of introduction stating this fact bespoke for Mr. V—— Mr. W——'s advice and co-operation in judicious investments. Stating the banker's knowledge of Mr. W——'s qualifications, it asked his friendly offices, and requested Mr. W—— to devote his afternoons to Mr. V——, to drive him round in his carriage, and show him the most desirable locations near Baltimor, Milwalkie, and the other towns in that vicinity.

ANXIOUS YOUTH.—“I say, Franswaw, ain't my whiskers ever coming out?”
 FRANÇOIS.—“I t'ink not—not mooch, certainement.”
 YOUTH.—“But, Franswaw, my Governor has lots of 'em.”
 FRANÇOIS.—“Mais, yees, M'sieu takes after his Mama.”

“In the pleasant city of Canton, Mississippi, lives a worthy landlord by the name of Colonel Pierce. Next door to the Pierce House was a gunsmith's-shop, kept by Bob Leonard, whose chief failing was the love of fish, squirrels, etc. When Bob wanted a day in the woods he had no scruples about closing up his establishment. Of course Bob's customers would be more numerous on the days the shop was closed. Now no place was so handy as Colonel Pierce's for the disappointed to inquire, ‘Do you know where Bob Leonard is?’ The Colonel, getting heartily tired of the annoyance, bethought him of a plan for ridding himself of the trouble of answering. He had a sign painted, and hung up in the most conspicuous part of the office, with this inscription: ‘I want it distinctly understood that I don't know where Bob Leonard is!’”

THE following anecdote is told of a prominent Southern politician, whose name we do not give, because we have little faith in the ties that connect a good story with a particular individual:

“Hon. Mr. —, with two friends, were once traveling upon a steamboat. The three, hearing rumors of pickpockets, agreed to deposit their money with the steadiest of the three, for safe-keeping. In the course of the day some passengers lost a pocket-book, and it being proposed to search every one on board, the captain took charge of the search. Coming first to Hon. Mr. —, he found that he did not have the lost wallet—or, indeed, any wallet whatever. The captain's suspicions were aroused, and taking his unwilling passenger by the collar, he showed him up to the entire company, saying, ‘This man hasn't got the pocket-book, but I advise you to look after him, for he'll be certain to have somebody's before he leaves this boat!’”

TRADESMEN are so often seriously annoyed by tedious customers, that they are not apt to enjoy any imposition of fun.

One day a wag entered a hardware store, and, inquiring for grindstones, was taken to the back yard, where there were rows of the desired article ranged on either side. The day was drizzly, the rain pouring down silently but steadily. He examined a number, but none seemed to suit his purposes. One was too large, another was too small; one was too coarse in grain, another the opposite. At last, when he saw the salesman was getting somewhat damp and uncomfortable from exposure to the weather, he thought that he would bring matters to a finale; and, laying his hands on a pretty fair specimen, he inquired: "How much do you charge a pound for this one?" "Well," replied the clerk, "I guess we can let you have that one at four cents a pound." "Well," returned Sam, "knock me off a pound and a half!"

"DICKINSON COLLEGE" furnishes the following brace of characteristic anecdotes:

One morning the Professor of Natural Science discovered two calves in his lecture-room. As the class came in to recite the Professor was urging the obstinate animals down the steps; but as he would approximate success, the boys drove them back. At length, being completely nonplused, the Professor in the most indignant tone exclaimed, "Gentlemen, your class is sufficiently large already." This was a poser, and the calves left the room precipitately.

On another occasion, after a recitation in Butler's Analogy, the President desired to change the hour for recitation. But Professor W—— had already appropriated the hour for his lecture, alleging, as a reason, that he had not sufficient opportunity to prepare the gases for his experiments. The President inquired why he had made the change. K——, who was something of a wag, immediately replied, "The Professor said he hadn't time to prepare his gas!" Prex bit his lips, and the class indulged in a round of applause.

THE following judgment is worthy of the Court of Solomon:

A trial was going on one day in which the parties were A versus B. Question in dispute was, the ownership of a certain dog. Both parties claimed the dog as theirs, by certain marks upon him. The testimony in regard to identity was full and clear upon both sides. After hearing the testimony, the Judge ordered the dog brought into Court. All being seated, he directed the Sheriff to hold the dog. A was to stand on the north side of the room, B on the south side, the Judge's seat being the east end, and the outside door was opened at the west end. He gave orders that at a certain sign A should whistle, B whistle, and he the Judge would whistle; and at another signal the Sheriff should let the dog loose. A whistled, B whistled, and the Court whistled. At the second signal the dog was let loose, and at four jumps he was outside the door, despite of all the whistling, and over the hills out of sight. The Judge then ordered the clerk to enter "Neither Party," and thus ended the dog case.

A VILLAINOUS specimen of humanity was brought into the Police Court before Justice Cole, of Albany, charged with having brutally assaulted his wife. The charge was substantiated in the clearest and most positive manner, and exhibited the most heartless cruelty on the husband's part. On his examination before the Justice he had a good deal to say about "getting justice." "Justice!" exclaimed Squire Cole; "you can't get it here. This Court has no power to hang you!"

ANY one who has a fancy for interesting details will peruse this "little bill," sent to us by a Baltimore correspondent, who secured the curiosity in Virginia. It will serve to remove the impression, so general in the North, that there is a lack of mechanical talent in the Southern portion of our beloved country:

1860

July 17 & $\frac{1}{2}$ of the 18th.

THOMPSON ATKINS'S WILLIAM a boot & shoe maker
To PARKER A WRIGHT.....Dr

To repairs on a double cased silver watch makers name Jn. Denby London No. 6026 To take said watch a part True the balance & dress up top pivot of virge, close pivot hole of same, take out the portent, & solder in the bush of bottom virge pivot hole, dress off all around the balance, & dress off collar of virge to prevent friction (they rubed) Dress off both top & bottom of Tumbler, to prevent friction of plate on the center wheel, To recoil hairspring to suit slide of regulator & take up the same $\frac{1}{2}$ inch (it was too weak), take out dents of outer case, tighten hands, & clean & oil the whole & put it up in good order & furnish a winding key, start & regulate same to run well, also to gear the balance wheel deeper in pallets of virge to give balance a better motion The job being worth \$2.50 but as he is a black man & it taking me $1\frac{1}{2}$ days I charge him only \$1.50 & 10 cents for the key..... \$1.60

A CORRESPONDENT in C. S. A. sends us the following anecdote, for the truth of which he vouches, not we:

"When Rev. Peter Cartwright was a boy some fourteen years old, he and his brother were so much in the habit of fighting that when their parents went to church on Sunday they always tied the boys to separate trees in the yard. Upon one occasion a traveler came along by the house, and inquired of the boys why they were tied up.

"'Oh,' said they, 'daddy and mammy tied us up here to keep us from fighting.'

"'And would you fight if I were to untie you?' said the traveler.

"'Yes, that we would,' said the boys; 'just try us.'

"'Well,' said the traveler, 'I will let you loose.' And so he did. So soon as the two boys were loose at it they went with a relish. Presently Peter was about to prove too hard for his adversary, when all at once his adversary turned upon the traveler, and roared, 'Confound you! you are to blame for letting us loose!' And Peter, seeing his brother engaged with the traveler, joined in with all his might. With doubled teams on him, the traveler could not stand his ground, but fled for the fence, which to jump he was prevented by the boys. They laid hold of him and pounded him for some time. At length, after a terrible drubbing, the traveler fled over the fence, when Peter turned upon his brother with—'Confound you! you turned him loose!' and at it they went again. The traveler rode off a wiser if not a better man, leaving the two boys hard at it. How long they fought was never known; but that Peter whipped no one ever doubted, for he could whip his weight in wild-cats."

In the earlier days of Washington Territory—and they are not many years since—there was a roving, rollicking set of people congregated at Port Townsend from all quarters of the world. As is usual on the frontiers, some of these people were queer fellows, who did odd things and uttered odd thoughts. One of these celebrities was named Cozzens, who kept a little grocery on the beach, where strychnine whisky, dried apples, salt fish, and hard bread, with the usual concomitants of a general trader, were mixed in glorious confusion. Another of these queer fish was named Powell, who, when about half-tight, would express himself whenever or wherever he pleased—in fact, he would "talk right out in meet-in." The third who figured on this particular occasion was "Old Yank," well known on the Sound as an individual who, according to his own words, was "Mr. Watkins" when sober and "Old Yank" when drunk. Governor Stevens had come to address the citizens on the subject of the North Pacific Railroad and other matters pertaining to the good of the Territory, and was invited to address the crowd at Cozzens's house, adjoining the grocery. A lunch was prepared, and on the Governor's making his appearance he was invited to partake. "Take a cup of coffee, Governor," said Cozzens. "It is weak, I admit—in fact, it is very weak. But here is some good democratic whisky. Put a little of this democratic whisky into the coffee, Governor, and it will give it tone. And here is some smoked salmon, Governor; I cured it myself. It is democratic salmon; and three spoonfuls of that democratic salmon will make a hash for twenty men, Governor, provided you put potatoes enough with it."

After the lunch the Governor addressed the assembly, dwelling at length upon the beauty of the scenery of the Territory, its vast resources in its forests, its fisheries, its agriculture, and its great mineral deposits of coal, iron, lead, and its rich placers of gold. When in the most interesting portion of his remarks, Powell calls out, "Governor!"

"Well?" replied his Excellency.

"Governor, we all know about this country. I don't think there is a man, woman, or child but what is perfectly aware that this is a great country. In fact, we know it. Now can't you tell us something about the wars in Europe?"

"Presently," says the Governor; "I have not come to that yet."

Order being restored the Governor then spoke about the great railroad project, and after eloquently depicting the great advantages it would present not only to the Territory but the whole country, added that to carry out the plans the older States must come forward to assist. "We must get Massachusetts," said he, "the Old Bay State, to lend us a helping hand." Here Old Yank, who had been wearing about, suddenly spoke out: "Governor, if the Old Bay State won't lend you any money on your railroad you may call on Old Yank!" It is needless to add that Yank was put out of the house; but as he went he added, "If I feel sorry for any thing I have said I am willing to be forgiven!"

A WESTERN lady writes: "Early last fall there came to our town a poor widow with several children, for whom she was willing to work hard. She would take in washing, or go out house-cleaning, and she soon had all the work she could do. But in a few weeks' time she fell sick, and having very few poor people in our place, the ladies felt a deep interest in the poor widow. By the time winter set in she was entirely well again, and herself and children better clothed than they had ever been before. One had given her a nice cloth cloak, very little the worse for wear; another had made over for her a dark merino dress and a velvet bonnet. To be sure the velvet hat was not just this winter's style, but it was a very genteel affair, and the widow felt determined to let the town see how nice she looked dressed up. Mrs. F—— was not a little surprised one day shortly after the widow's recovery by the entrance of the widow's little girl, saying, as she sunk in the arms of the crimson velvet easy chair by the side of Mrs. F——, 'I say, mammy wants to know if you'll have time to make some calls with her this afternoon, she wants to show off her new things, she does!' Mrs. F—— has not made what is called a 'dress-up call' since."

"COLONEL — once, in a crowd of men, was speaking in a pompous manner of a visit he paid to General Jackson; what the General said and did; and what he said and did. Major —, one of the company present, impatiently asked, 'And did you black his boots, Sir?' The Colonel soon had an opportunity of fully retorting upon his insulting interrogator. The Major was speaking of a company of the luminaries at Washington in which he was once thrown, and remarked, 'It would have made a common man feel "small potatoes."' The Colonel asked, 'Pray, how did you feel, Major?'

"This evening from the sun's decline arrived.
Who tells of some infernal spirit seen Hitherward bent."—Par. Lost, iv.

"What thou seest,
What there thou seest, fair creature, is thyself.
With thee it came and goes."—Par. Lost, iv.

HINTS FOR EQUESTRIANS.

HINT 1. "Choice of Horse—Adapt your horse to your stature. A tall man upon a low horse, or vice versa, presents an incongruous appearance."

HINT 2. "Seat.—A graceful seat is essential to a thorough equestrian. The attitude of a shopkeeper recommending dry-goods is not graceful on horseback."

HINT 3. "Demeanor.—Preserve a cheerful countenance while riding. You are not supposed to be attending a funeral."

HINT 4. "Locality.—In riding it is of advantage to choose the best localities. By so doing you will not unfrequently be enabled to make your entrée into circles of Society which would otherwise be inaccessible to you."

HINT 5. "Being thrown.—If you find that you can not keep your seat, hold on by the mane until you reach a soft spot; then let go."

HINT 6. "Falling.—After being thrown, lie quiet for a while. A spirited horse will sometimes kick out when his rider makes any disturbance."

"ONE day, while preparing to shave, and singing to myself, 'I would not live always,' I observed that my little one was trying to get my attention, but I concluded the first verse, and then asked her what she wanted to say to me. 'Well, father,' she replied, 'it ain't much; only I was thinking that I would not like to live always either.' Surprised at her remark, I asked her what she meant? 'Why,' said she, 'you was singing "I would not live always," and I thought I wouldn't either, for some ways are real dirty ways!'"

"A FEW days since I took a little friend of mine to see a drill of the new company of Highlanders: highly pleased with which exhibition, he asked his mother to make him a suit of 'soger clothes,' but she would not consent. After begging a long while, he desisted. At length, suddenly rolling up his inexpressibles above his knees and jumping up on a stool, he cried out, 'Who can't be a Scotchman?'"

DURING a trial before a Squire of doubtful orthodoxy, a witness was objected to as incompetent, not knowing the nature of an oath. The Court examined the witness in the following original mode, and pronounced this novel opinion:

"Do you know the nature of an oath?"

"No."

"Don't you know that if you should swear to a lie you would go to hell, if there is any hell?"

"No."

"Don't you know that if you swear to what is not true you would offend God, if there is any God?"

"No."

"We will swear her; she is just as liable to tell the truth as any body!"

"I HAVE a little nephew, between three and four years old, who is the idol of his pious grandma; he sleeps with her, and the moment they are awake in the morning they have a concert of prayer between them, each addressing (with uplifted eyes and folded hands) God on behalf of the other. The little fellow had finished his petition, when grandma began hers by begging 'God to preserve her dear Alfred all day—' He put his hand, with an alarmed air, to her mouth. 'Stop, grandma! don't ask God to do that; I don't want to be PRESERVED!' 'Why!' said his grandma, in astonishment, 'not want to be preserved!' 'No,' said he, sturdily, with a half-ludicrous half-defiant countenance, 'do you suppose I want to be boiled in sugar?'"

STUDENT'S SONG.

THOUGH we're deep in Titus Livius,
Or in Plato all the day,
Trust us, we are not oblivious
Of our maidens far away.

Though we bide in far-off places,
Working ever week by week,
We remember your dear faces,
Learning Latin, grinding Greek.

Living up in dismal attics,
Or in coziest first-floors—

Reading toughest mathematics,
Classics, science—horrid bores.

Turning leaves of dictionary,
Working hard as work we can,
We remember pretty Mary,
Lively Louie, gentle Anne.

Though we're deep in Titus Livius,
Or in Plato night and day,
Trust us, we are not oblivious
Of our maidens far away.

Fashions for October.

Furnished by Mr. G. BRODIE, 300 Canal Street, New York, and drawn by VOIGT from actual articles of Costume.

FIGURE 1.—VELVET CLOAK.

FIGURE 2.—CAP NO. 1.

FIGURE 3.—CAP NO. 2.

THE CLOAK which we present is a special favorite among the many styles which are now offered. This may be made of any seasonable material. The one from which our illustration is taken is composed of black velvet. The trimming consists of an arabesque ornament, with tassels upon the cape.

CAPS.—No. 1 is composed of lace, with loops and bows of taffeta, alternately white and blue; a plaiting of the same forming the inside border.—No. 2 is a simple arrangement of wide pale rose-colored ribbon and Valenciennes.

UNDER-SLEEVES.—In No. 1 the frills, which are double, are headed by a plaiting of taffeta similar to that upon the Cap No. 1.—No. 2 is made by alternating bands of insertion and taffeta ribbon; it is en suite with the Chemisette, Figure 6.

CHEMISETTE.—The design and construction of this will be perceived from the illustration, without the aid of verbal description.

FIGURE 4.—UNDER-SLEEVE NO. 1.

FIGURE 5.—UNDER-SLEEVE NO. 2.

FIGURE 6.—CHEMISETTE.

HARPER'S NEW MONTHLY MAGAZINE.

No. CXXXVIII.—NOVEMBER, 1861.—VOL. XXIII.

BENEDICT ARNOLD.

THERE were three eminent traitors to the American cause during the old war for Independence, namely, Doctor Benjamin Church, of Massachusetts; Major-General Charles Lee, of Virginia; and Major-General Benedict Arnold, of Connecticut. Of these traitors Arnold was the chief.

In a plain, gambrel-roofed, two-storied house, about half way from Norwich City to the upper town, between the Yantic and Shetucket, Benedict Arnold was born on the 3d of January, 1740. His father was a man of "suspicious integrity, little respected, and less esteemed." His mother was the reverse of this—a patient, pious, excellent woman, beloved by all who knew her. Benedict was their only son. He early exhibited signs of superior genius, accompanied by traits of character that prophesied of a cloudy future. He was willful, irritable, cruel, and reckless. At the age of sixteen years he clandestinely enlisted in the British army, but was released and taken home.

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the year 1861, by Harper and Brothers, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court for the Southern District of New York.

ARNOLD'S BIRTH-PLACE.

He soon afterward ran away and re-enlisted; and not long afterward was subjected to the discipline and labor of garrison duty at Ticonderoga. He disliked both, deserted, returned home, and was apprenticed to the brothers Latham, druggists in Norwich, and his mother's kinsmen. He gave them a world of trouble; yet, because of his kinship, they afforded him pecuniary aid in establishing himself in business in New Haven. His mother died broken-hearted because of her husband's debasement and her son's unpromising career, before he arrived at manhood. He and his sweet sister Hannah were soon the sole survivors of the family.*

Arnold was a druggist and bookseller in New Haven several years. Fond of military life, he raised and commanded a company called the Governor's Guards. He was still in command when intelligence came of the skirmishes at Lexington and Concord. The bells of New Haven were rung, and the people crowded to the green or public square. Arnold addressed them, called for volunteers, appointed a place of rendezvous that afternoon, and there found himself at the head of sixty men, chiefly of his own company, with a few students in Yale College, ready to march to Cambridge, where an army was gathering to besiege the British in Boston. The cautious Selectmen refused to furnish them with powder without the sanction of higher authority. There was no time to be lost. Arnold sneered at such scruples in times of public danger, and threatened to break open the magazine and take the powder without leave. The authorities yielded, and the next morning Arnold with his volunteers was on his way toward Boston.

* Hannah Arnold, who remained the fast friend of her erring brother in his abasement, and charged the guilt of his treason upon his Tory wife (though without any proof), was never married, owing, probably, to the wickedness of her brother in early life. She was wooed and won by a young Frenchman of Norwich, whom young Benedict disliked. His persuasions would not make Hannah break the engagement with the foreigner, and he threatened him with violence if he should ever venture under his home-roof again. The young man disregarded the threat. Arnold rushed into the room with a loaded pistol, and discharged it at the Frenchman as he escaped from the window. Arnold and the Frenchman met in the West Indies in after-years, and fought a duel, in which the latter was severely wounded.

A scheme for seizing Fort Ticonderoga, on Lake Champlain, had been secretly planned at Hartford. Arnold had doubtless heard of it, for on his arrival at Cambridge he laid before the Committee of Safety a proposition to lead an expedition against the lake fortresses. It was eagerly approved. Arnold was commissioned a Colonel in the Massachusetts service, and authorized to raise not more than four hundred men in the western part of the province for the expedition. Full of enthusiasm, he proceeded to Stockbridge. There he was deeply chagrined by the fact that a similar expedition was on foot, composed of a few Connecticut and Massachusetts men and quite a large number of Green Mountain boys, under the command of Colonel Ethan Allen. They were on their march for Lake Champlain. Arnold overtook them at Castleton, and with insolent assurance assumed to be the Commander-in-chief by virtue of his commission. "We will follow no other leader than our own," said the Green Mountain boys. Arnold yielded as gracefully as his ambition would allow, and joined the expedition as a volunteer. Early on the following morning (10th May, 1775) Allen and his followers entered Ticonderoga as victors, demanding the surrender of the fortress in the name of the Great Jehovah and the Continental Congress. Colonel Seth Warner pushed on and captured Crown Point two days afterward.

At Ticonderoga Arnold again claimed chief command, with the same result. He sought consolation in his disappointment by sending to the Massachusetts authorities a protest and a list of his alleged grievances. He could not be idle; and while contemplating what next to do, he was joined by about fifty men recruited by his order, who brought with them a schooner they had seized at Skenesborough, now Whitehall, at the foot of the lake. These were his troops. Manning the schooner, he sailed down the lake to St. Johns on the Sorel, surprised and captured the garrison and fort, seized a king's sloop, destroyed five bateaux, and placing valuable plunder on four others, sailed away for Crown Point.

The British Governor of Canada made immediate preparations to drive back the invaders and retake the forts. Arnold summoned his maritime experience to his aid, and prepared a flotilla to meet the foe, constituting himself admiral of the embryo fleet. He had one hundred and fifty men, with several field-pieces and swivels. He had sent agents to Montreal and other places in Canada, and obtained such information as seemed to warrant him in writing to the Continental Congress, expressing his conviction that with two thousand men he could easily capture Canada. But the Congress, alarmed by what had already been done in the way of aggression in that quarter, would not listen to his proposals.

Many complaints against Arnold having gone

THE ASSAULT ON QUEBEC.

from the lake to the Massachusetts authorities, an investigating committee was sent to Crown Point. They found Arnold busily engaged in preparations for the campaign, as admiral of the fleet and commander-in-chief of the land forces at the fort. When they explained the object of their errand he manifested the hottest indignation. When he became calm he offered his resignation, discharged his men, and set out for Cambridge, breathing execrations against those who had ill-treated him.

Washington was now in command of the Continental army at Cambridge. The Congress had resolved to send an invading army into Canada by way of Lake Champlain, and Washington had conceived the plan of sending a co-operating force across the wilderness of the Kennebec and Chaudière to Quebec. The enterprise was bold and its execution would be perilous. The commander-in-chief had confidence in Arnold, and he appointed him to the command of the expedition. The irritated soldier was delighted, and with eleven hundred effective men he left Fort Western, opposite Augusta, on the Kennebec, late in September, and penetrated the gloomy, uninhabited wilderness. The history of the movements of that expedition, from this point to the French settlements near the St. Lawrence, is one of the most wonderful on record. For thirty-two days they traversed the wilderness, through marshes, over cliffs, among tangled thickets, up and down rapid rivers, and through snow, ice, and mud. Their sufferings were terrible, and their endurance wonderful. At length they reached the French settlements, when, after enjoying food, warmth, and repose, Arnold led them, in the face of a severe snow-storm, to Point Levi, opposite Quebec. There they appeared early in November, to the great terror of many of the inhabitants of Quebec. They seemed to have dropped from the clouds.

After a little delay Arnold crossed the St. Lawrence, ascended to the Plains of Abraham, where Wolfe fell sixteen years before, and menaced the city. Finally, with foolish pomp he demanded an immediate surrender of the town and garrison, and threatened the veteran M'Lean with terrible disaster in the event of his refusal. Just then he heard that Governor Carleton, with a considerable force, who had fled from Montreal on the approach of the Americans under General Montgomery, was hastening to Quebec. A friend in the city had also informed him of an intended sortie to drive him off. Advised by prudence, he raised the siege, and took post at Point aux Trembles, twenty miles up the river, to await the arrival of Montgomery. They joined forces on the first of December. Montgomery assumed chief command, and all pushed forward to Quebec.

For three weeks the little army besieged the Canadian capital, and then, in two divisions, attempted to carry the place by storm. Montgomery led one division by way of the St. Lawrence, and Arnold led the other by way of the St. Charles. Both parties were moving at dawn on the morning of the 31st of December, in the face of a blinding snow-storm. Montgomery was killed at the foot of Cape Diamond, and Arnold, while at the head of his troops, urging forward a cannon in the deep snow, to attack an obstructing battery, was severely wounded in the knee, and carried to the general hospital. Most of their troops were speedily captured, and the siege and assault were abandoned.

The command now devolved on Arnold, who was soon afterward commissioned a brigadier-general. He could muster only about eighty effective men. With these he formed a camp three miles from the city, and established a land blockade, hoping thereby to starve the garrison and citizens into a surrender. He failed. Finally, on the first of April, General Wooster arrived from Montreal with reinforcements and took chief command. Preparations were made to renew the siege, but these were abandoned. The disabled Arnold (whose wounded leg had been much injured by the falling of his horse upon it) asked leave of absence, and retired to Montreal, where he became military governor.

SAULT AU MATELOT—THE PLACE WHERE ARNOLD WAS WOUNDED.

He was glad to escape from the incompetent Wooster.

Not long after this the Americans were driven out of Canada. Montreal was the last place evacuated, and Arnold escaped to St. Johns with the enemy at his heels. General Sullivan soon arrived with his fugitive forces. When they were all embarked, under Arnold's superintendence, that officer mounted his horse and with one of his aids rode back two miles. There they discovered Burgoyne and a large force pressing toward St. Johns. Arnold hastened back, stripped and shot the horses of himself and aid, jumped into a small boat, and overtook the flotilla at twilight.

Arnold's quarrelsome disposition had already won for him the ill-will of many officers of the army, and his operations at Montreal had caused him to be charged with peculation. Of this he never purged himself fully; and in these charges was the commencement of his future degradation.

Preparations were now made to oppose a counter-invasion from Canada. Arnold fitted out a little squadron bearing an aggregate armament of fifty-one guns. It consisted of three schooners, two sloops, three galleys, eight gondolas, and twenty-one gun-boats. Early on the morning of the 11th of October (1776) he saw the British squadron sweeping around Cumberland Head. He was near Valcour Island, not far above Plattsburgh, and there awaited the enemy. The conflict began at noon. Arnold was on the Congress galley, and pointed almost every gun himself. The battle became general at one o'clock, and the Congress suffered severely. She was hulled twelve times, received seven shots between wind and water, had the main-mast shattered in two places, and the rigging cut in pieces. The desperate conflict lasted five hours, and only ceased when night fell upon the scene. Arnold's vessels were dreadfully shattered; and during the intense darkness of the ensuing night, favored by a fair wind, he passed the enemy, and fled toward Crown Point. The British gave chase, and overtook him on the 13th, when another desperate contest occurred. For four hours the whole force of the attack fell on the Congress galley that bore Arnold. When she was reduced almost to a wreck, he gave orders to run her ashore, with four gondolas, and set them on fire, while the marines, bearing their arms aloft, should wade to the beach, and from the bank keep the enemy at bay until the whole flotilla should be consumed. Arnold was the last to leave the flaming galley. He let himself into the water by a rope, joined his men on shore, and kept his position until his little squadron disappeared. He then marched to Crown Point, ten miles distant. For these exploits Arnold received the hearty applause of the whole country.

ARNOLD LEAVING THE "CONGRESS."

The British went back to winter-quarters in Canada, and many of the troops at Ticonderoga marched to join the army of Washington that fled from the Hudson through New Jersey to the Delaware. Arnold accompanied them. He reached head-quarters a week before the battle of Trenton, and was immediately sent to join General Spencer at Providence, Rhode Island, to rally the New England militia, and watch the British, then in possession of Newport. He remained there all winter; and during that time suffered an indignity which was keenly felt by his sensitive nature thirsting for military glory.

EXPLANATION OF THE MAP.—A, American squadron under Arnold; B, 21 American gun-boats; C, British schooner Carleton, 12 six pounders; D, British ship Inflexible, the Commodore's flag-ship; E, anchorage of the British fleet, during the night, to cut off the retreat of the Americans; F, British radeau Thunderer, 6 twenty-four pounders, and 12 six pounders; G, British gondola Loyal Convert, 7 nine pounders; H, British schooner Maria, 14 six pounders, with General Carleton, Governor of Canada, on board; I, place where the American schooner Royal Savage was burned. She carried 8 six pounders and 4 four pounders. She grounded and was burned. The force of the British in this desperate action was much superior to that of the Americans. The British vessels were manned by seven hundred chosen seamen.

Congress passed him by in the appointment of five major-generals. He had been made a brigadier at Quebec, and he felt that his subsequent exploits entitled him to promotion.

Arnold accused his countrymen of ingratitude. Washington was mortified by the neglect of the brave soldier, and wrote him a soothing letter. The wounded hero was calmed but not pacified. "It is a very civil way," he said, "of requesting my resignation as unqualified for the office I hold." He finally determined to visit head-quarters and ask permission to visit Congress in person and demand an investigation of his conduct. While in Connecticut, on his way, Governor Tryon invaded that State and burned Danbury. Generals Silliman and Wooster rallied the militia to repel the invasion. Arnold joined them, and placed himself at the head of five hundred men. A stand was made at Ridgefield, and the Americans were obliged to retreat. Arnold's horse was shot dead under him, and he escaped on foot to a neighboring swamp. His flight was short. He soon rallied his men, and hung on the flank and rear of the enemy in his retreat to his ships at Compo. There, in a skirmish, his second horse was shot through the neck. On all occasions, during the two days, he was conspicuous in every post of danger, and won for himself the admiration of his countrymen.

Congress immediately promoted Arnold to major-general, but left him in rank, by the date of his commission, below the five major-generals recently appointed. He felt the neglect keenly, and demanded of Congress an investigation of his conduct. By this he soon discovered that his inherent defects of character, and the unfavorable impressions he had made at Crown Point and Montreal, stood in the way of his cordial promotion. His accounts, examined by a committee of Congress at this time, also gave presumptive evidence of his dishonesty. Now was planted in his bosom the thorn that rankled until the foul fester of treason was produced.

Arnold was appointed to the command of the army in the vicinity of Philadelphia, charged with the duty of watching the movements of General Howe, then in New Jersey, and to oppose his passage of the Delaware. The duties of his position were faithfully performed by Arnold, and with his accustomed energy. Meanwhile he reiterated his demands upon Congress for the promotion of his rank. They paid no attention to his appeals. At length, incensed by their indifference, he offered his resignation, declaring that he had been driven to that step by injustice; that he loved his country as well as any living man; and adding—"Honor is a sacrifice no man ought to make; as I received it, so I wish to transmit it to posterity."

Intelligence now reached the Congress of the invasion of the Northern frontier by a large force under Lieutenant-General Burgoyne; and on the same day when Arnold's resignation was laid before the Congress they received a letter from Washington, recommending that General Arnold should be immediately sent to the northern army. "He is active, judicious, and brave," wrote Washington, "and an officer in whom the militia repose great confidence." Arnold was flattered and soothed by these sincere compliments, and repaired to the northern army with alacrity. He joined General Schuyler at Fort Edward toward the close of May, and was placed in command of one of the two divisions of the army there.

At about this time the question of Arnold's rank was acted upon in the Congress, and his claims were disallowed by an overwhelming majority. Mortified and vexed, Arnold asked General Schuyler for permission to retire. That officer, who knew his military worth, persuaded him to remain.

ARNOLD AT SARATOGA.

Schuyler's army slowly retreated before Burgoyne to the Mohawk River. While there, intelligence came of a threatened invasion of the Mohawk valley by British, Tories, and Indians, then investing Fort Schuyler, now Rome. Arnold was immediately dispatched with volunteers to drive off the invaders. By quick movements, dexterity, and stratagem he succeeded fully. The enemy fled to Lake Ontario and did not return.

General Gates now took command of the northern army, and advanced to Bemis's Heights, in the Upper Valley of the Hudson. Onward came Burgoyne, proud and confident, and on the 19th September, 1777, a severe battle was fought in front of Gates's lines, wholly by detachments from Arnold's division, on the part of the Americans, except one regiment. But Arnold himself was kept inactive by Gates until toward evening, when intelligence came that the result of the conflict was doubtful. Arnold was sitting upon his horse in great impatience. "I will put an end to it!" he exclaimed, and dashed toward the field pursued by one of Gates's aids with orders for him to return. He passed on, animated his men, and victory remained with the Americans. Gates had not left his camp at all, and had no claim to the honors of the triumph, yet he coveted all, and did not even mention Arnold's name in his official dispatches. A quarrel ensued; and when, eighteen days afterward, another battle was fought at Saratoga, Arnold was deprived of all command. He became intensely excited while the conflict was raging; and, finally, breaking through all the restraints of military discipline, he spurred forward from the camp to the field, placed himself at the head of troops formerly under his command, and with the impetuosity of the whirlwind attacked the enemy, assailed and captured the Hessian intrenchments, and secured a victory. Impartial history must accord to Arnold the honor of humbling Burgoyne—an honor long undeservedly borne by Gates.

MEETING OF ARNOLD AND ANDRE.

In that last conflict Arnold received a severe wound in the leg that disabled him. It was the same limb that was wounded at Quebec. He was conveyed to Albany, where he was confined to his room all winter. Before the end of May he joined Washington at Valley Forge, and when the British army evacuated Philadelphia he was placed in command there. He made his quarters in the old mansion of William Penn, and commenced a style of living altogether too extravagant for his income. In furniture, horses, carriage, and dinners he made an ostentatious display, the cost of which soon brought importunate creditors to his door. He mingled freely in the Tory society of Philadelphia, and married the beautiful daughter of Edward Shippen, a leading loyalist of the city. She was only eighteen years of age, and he was a fine-looking widower of forty.

Arnold's deportment made him very unpopular, and his extravagant habits caused him to prostitute his power for private gain. At length charges of a serious nature, involving his honor and honesty, were preferred against him by the authorities of Pennsylvania. Congress prosecuted a partial investigation, and then handed the matter over to Washington and a court-martial. It was nearly two years before a decision was reached, when Arnold was adjudged to be sufficiently guilty to deserve a reprimand from the Commander-in-chief. It was administered with the greatest delicacy, yet Arnold exhibited great indignation. No doubt he was thankful for the alleged "persecution;" for it gave him a slight excuse for the treasonable preparations for betraying the liberties of his country, in which it was afterward ascertained he had then been engaged for more than eight months.

We shall not attempt, in this sketch, more than the most concise statement of the prominent events in Arnold's treason. These have been given in full in the third volume of the Magazine.

While the British army was in Philadelphia, in the spring of 1778, a grand parting entertainment was given to Sir William Howe, the British Commander-in-chief. Major Andrè, made Adjutant-General of the army by Howe's successor, was one of the chief managers of the affair. Miss Shippen figured conspicuously among the actors at the entertainment, and she and Andrè kept up a correspondence afterward. Through this channel Arnold saw, after his marriage with Miss Shippen, an opportunity for communicating with Sir Henry Clinton, at New York. He opened a treasonable correspondence with Andrè, under an assumed name and in commercial language, and this was continued till the last. When all things were ready for consummation, he asked Washington for the command of West Point and its dependencies, the important post in the Hudson Highlands which he had agreed to surrender into the hands of the enemy, and for which service he was to receive fifty thousand dollars and the commission of a Brigadier-General by brevet in the British army.

The command of West Point was unsuspectingly given to Arnold, and he made his quarters at the seat of the Tory Colonel Robinson, opposite. The time chosen for the performance of his overt act of treason was about the middle of September, 1780, while Washington was absent in Connecticut conferring with Rochambeau, commander of the French allies lately arrived. He sought and held a personal interview with Andrè, before dawn, on the western shore of the Hudson, several miles below West Point. It continued until daylight, when they went to a house not far distant to complete the arrangements. There Andrè anxiously awaited the return of night for his secret departure for the Vulture, the vessel that brought him up the river. She was driven from her anchorage by a cannon on shore during the day, and disappeared. Andrè was obliged to return by land. He crossed the river in disguise, and with a pass from Arnold. At Tarrytown he was met and questioned by some young American militiamen. They searched him thoroughly, and in his boots found papers of great interest to the British, which had been given him by Arnold. They conveyed him to the nearest American post; but the stupid commander, not comprehending the matter, informed Arnold of the arrest. The alarmed traitor immediately fled in his barge to the Vulture, in the Tappan Sea, leaving Andrè to his fate. The unfortunate young man, who had been conveyed within the American lines against his will, was taken to Tappan, where he was condemned and executed as a spy, on the 2d of October, 1780. Arnold lived many years to experience the tortures of an utter outcast.

The traitor entered into the service of his royal purchaser immediately. He first addressed an explanatory letter to his "late countrymen," and then issued a proclamation calling upon American officers and soldiers to imitate his example, and join the army of the King. He was successful in neither. He was finally sent to Virginia on a marauding expedition, at the head of sixteen hundred men. It was a suitable employment. With the malice of an unprincipled renegade he plundered and destroyed.* Having finished his work there, he was sent to New England on the same errand; and burned New London, almost in sight of his birth-place and the grave of his mother! This was the closing scene of his military career.

Arnold was thoroughly despised by the British officers. They accepted the treason, but hated the traitor. Cornwallis refused to associate with him in Virginia; and he was shunned by all, as far as prudence and the good of the service would allow. He found himself uneasy in inactivity; and the war having virtually ended with the surrender of Cornwallis at Yorktown, in October, 1781, he sailed for England with his family a few weeks afterward, bearing a letter of introduction to Lord George Germain from Sir Henry Clinton, who spoke of his "spirited and meritorious conduct since he joined the British army." He commended him to the "countenance and support" of his lordship.

Efforts were made by the politic to give Arnold position in London, but they failed. The King and his Council, and a few others connected with the Government, noticed him from motives of policy, but he soon sunk into obscurity. No gentleman would associate with him, nor endure his company if it could be avoided; and his presence at court was an offense to men of character. When the petition for a bill authorizing a negotiation of peace with the Americans was presented to the King, Arnold was standing near the throne, apparently basking in the sunshine of the royal favor. Lord Lauderdale, it is said, on retiring to the Senate, declared that, "however gracious might be the language he had heard from the throne, his indignation could not but be highly excited at beholding his Majesty supported by a traitor."

* In a successful skirmish between Petersburg and Richmond, during this expedition, Arnold took some prisoners. To one of them he said, "Suppose the Americans should catch me, what would they do with me?" The prisoner promptly replied, "They would cut off and bury with military honors the leg that was wounded at Quebec and Saratoga, and hang the remainder of you upon a gibbet."

CAPTURE OF ANDRE.

Arnold was at the drawing-room of the King one evening, when Lord Shelburne offered to introduce him to Earl Balcarras, who was with Burgoyne at Saratoga. The Earl refused his proffered hand, saying, with tones of keen contempt, "I honored you as a brave man in battle; I despise you as a traitor to your country, unworthy of the notice of honest men. Your touch would be pollution." Turning upon his heel he left Arnold to chew in silence the bitter weed of deepest chagrin. At another time, when Lord Surry had risen in the British Senate to speak, he saw Arnold in the gallery. He immediately sat down, and pointing toward him, exclaimed, "I will not speak while that man is in the house!"

When Talleyrand was in England, and was about to embark for America, he heard that an American gentleman was stopping at the same hotel with himself. He sought an interview, was pleased with the intelligence and fluency of speech of his new friend, and asked him to give him letters of introduction to some of his friends in his own country. "Alas!" exclaimed the American, with much emotion, "I have no country nor countrymen!" It was Benedict Arnold.

An officer of rank in the American army, who had known Arnold in early life, was in London after the war. The traitor called at his lodgings and sent in his card. "Tell the gentleman I am not at home," said the officer to the bearer, "and never shall be for General Arnold."

After the war Arnold made his abode at St. John's, in the British province of New Brunswick, where many refugee loyalists who fled from the United States had settled. He engaged in a profitable shipping business, made money, lived in a style of ostentatious profusion, and thus purchased entrance into the society of the so-called higher classes. His known fraudulent dealings and haughty deportment made him very unpopular with the people; and on one occasion they showed their resentment and contempt by suspending his effigy in public, labeled TRAITOR, in such a position as to be easily seen from his house. It was then committed to the flames with loud huzzas. This was in 1792.

ARNOLD AND BALCARRAS.

He went to St. John's in 1786. Every year his unpopularity increased, and in 1794 he closed his business, sailed first for the West Indies and then for England, and there made his permanent abode. When war broke out between England and France he petitioned for employment in the British army. His prayer was rejected because not a solitary officer could be found who would serve with him.

Arnold resided temporarily in the West Indies several times when engaged in commercial pursuits. He was at Point Petre, in Guadaloupe, when that island was retaken by the French. He had accumulated a large sum of money there, and fearing it might be taken by the French if his name and character should be known, he assumed the name of Anderson. He was put on board a French prison-ship in the harbor. A sentinel soon informed him that he was known.

He at once planned a method of escape with his treasure. He inclosed it in an empty cask, which, under cover of the darkness of night, he let down into the sea, so that the waves might carry it ashore where the English were encamped. Inside of the cask he placed a letter, informing the English that the cask and contents belonged to him. He then embarked upon a rude raft of planks which he had prepared, with which he reached a small boat. In this he escaped to the English fleet, and saved both his life and money.

Arnold returned to England soon after his perilous adventure in the West Indies, and lived in perfect retirement on Gloucester Place. There he died on the 14th of June, 1801, at the age of sixty-one years. His wife, who was more than twenty years his junior, died there in June, 1804.

THE TENEMENT HOUSE.

I.

A NICE little dinner at Ormolu's;
 A chosen few, and no ladies there:
 Every man is a millionaire,
 With ample waistcoat and creaking shoes.
 The dinner, of course, is a great success—
 Dinners at Ormolu's always are—
 From the delicate bisque to the caviar,
 And the wild boar's head in its gaudy dress.
 But better than all is the rich dessert,
 The season of large, well-fed repose,
 When calm delight through the system flows,
 And the brain deliciously lies inert.
 Then the rich man sits in his easy chair,
 And dreamily sees his houses and gold
 In long processions of wealth unrolled,
 Like caravans crossing the fields of air.
 Wine and walnuts,
 Walnuts and wine;
 Big grapes frosted with purple bloom;
 Odors floating all over the room
 From ruby claret and leathery Rhine;
 Frozen flasks of the dry Champagne,
 Crystal goblets of flint-like grain
 Flashing the light through a thousand prisms,
 And full of the tawny unctuous chrims
 That ooze from the oily vines of Spain.
 Fleshy clusters of rich bananas,
 Citrons drowning in sirops of amber;
 And, curling cloudily through the chamber,
 Faint blue smoke from the fresh Havanas.

Over the wine the chat goes round—
 English consols and Erie stock;
 The newest invention, a patent lock,
 And how the Paragon Bank's unsound.

Money, money on every tongue;
 How to make it and how to lose it,
 How to keep it and how to use it—
 All the changes are duly rung.

Every guest round that shining board
 Only dreams of dollars and cents,
 Only dreams of the rise in rents,
 Only thinks of his gathering hoard.

And Ormolu at the table sits,
 Sipping with gusto that rich Latour;
 While a vague thanksgiving that he's not poor
 Over his gratified senses flits.

And somehow he sees, in a dreamy way,
 His tenement houses:—He owns a few,
 And capital profits they bring him too;
 For he knows how to make the tenants pay:—

He sees them squalid and black and tall,
 With rotten rafters and touch-wood stair,
 The scant rooms fetid with stagnant air,
 And the plaster membrane that's called a wall.

And he sees the swarms of life that huddle
 In and out and over and thorough,
 Till the buildings look like a human burrow
 Moated about with a loathsome puddle.

Crazy, filthy, and insecure,
 Hastily builded, and cheap and nasty,
 About as strong as fresh-baked pasty,
 But almost too good for vagrant poor.

The neighbors say that they must come down;
From top to bottom each chamber rocks,
As the roaring wind of the Equinox
Blusters fiercely over the town.

And sometimes it seems that the neighbors think
That if a fire should come that way,
What splendid field it would have to play
Through tottering chamber and gaping chink.

And how its serpentine tongue would curl
With fierce, insatiate appetite,
Down the staircase's rotten flight,
And over the roofs in a crimson whirl.

And how the fiery fiend would rifle
Each crackling room of its human treasure;
Drinking blood with a savage pleasure,
And vomiting vapor to blind and stifle.

But what if it did? the tenement houses
Are all insured to their fullest figure—
Appraised and valued with utmost rigor—
And so our friend Ormolu carouses.

Come, just one glass of this Clos Vougeot!
An olive, though, first to give it a savor;
That's a wine of the true grape flavor,
Bottled exactly ten years ago!

See how it shines in amethyst splendor,
Just where the lamp-light strikes it and shivers:
This is the food for our sanguine rivers—
Strong as Milo, as Venus tender!

The wine is praised and the bottle passes,
And Ormolu looks all ripe and glowing;
No black remorse to his heart is flowing
As he gayly drinks from his aerial glasses.

II.

ONE, TWO, THREE, FOUR!

The fire alarm comes loudly tolling,
Over the roofs of the city rolling,
And dying away on the island-shore.

One, two, three, four!

Engines over the pavements leaping;
While lusty tides of the firemen sweeping
Down through the channeled avenues pour

One, two, three, four!

The panting foreman's trumpet bellows,
"Pull her along and jump her fellows!
All your muscle and something more!"

One, two, three, four!

The shrieking crowds of the boys that follow,
The cries of the firemen hoarse and hollow,
Startle the night with a fitful roar.

One, two, three, four!

The red shirts down to their labor settle;
Every fellow is full of mettle,
Muscle, and courage, and something more.

One, two, three, four!

Ormolu hears the fire-bell toll;
It is his district—but, bless your soul!
All is insured, and fires are a bore!

One, two, three, four!

These Burgundy wines make one feel misty,
So here's a bottle of Lagrima Christi,
Fresh from the indolent Naples shore.

The wine is praised, and the bottle passes—
Smoky Vesuvius is its sire—
But Ormolu thinks never of fire,
As he gayly drinks from his aerial glasses.

III.

The tenement buildings are red and flaring,
The narrow street with the crowd is choking,
The opposite houses are hot and smoking,
The windows like blood-shot eyes are glaring.

Golden jets, like fiery fountains,
Over the tall roofs leap and spatter;
Till, struck by the wind, they break and scatter,
While ever the smoke piles up like mountains.

Fire, fire, fire, fire!

Hark to the roar of its hollow laughter,
As it swirls all over each rotten rafter,
Drunk with the heat of its own desire!

See how the jets from the hose-pipes battle
All in vain with the floods so furious;
Hark to those sounds so hollow and curious,
Like mournful lowing of distant cattle!

See how the blinded firemen clamber,
Step by step, up the smoking ladder;
And how the fire grows madder, madder,
As it thrusts them off from that stifling chamber!

See how the crowds that are watching shiver,
As they see in the midst of that tide abhorrent
A black shape flash through the golden torrent,
Like one that drowns in a fiery river!

See that woman at the window flicker,
Holding a child in her hands and shrieking.
Ah! she's gone, even while we're speaking,
And every heart in the crowd grows sicker.

List to that sound that so hollowly rumbles!
The firemen pause, for they know what's brewing;
Then down with a roar, in a crimson ruin,
Ormolu's tenement building tumbles.

Crushed and mangled with beam and girder,
Five corpses lie in those tenement houses;
And Ormolu with his guests carouses,
Guilty, by Heaven, of all that murder!

UNITED STATES CUSTOM-HOUSE AND ASSAY OFFICE, NEW YORK.

MAKING MONEY.

I.—THE ASSAY OFFICE, NEW YORK.

WE do not in these papers undertake—we wish it were in our power to do so—to tell every man how he can “make money.” We simply propose to describe the processes by which our Government, having in its possession a certain amount of the precious metals, puts them into a form which enables them to pass current from hand to hand, without further question, as a measure of value; or, in other words, makes “money” out of bullion. In all civilized, and in most uncivilized countries gold is the chief measure of value. A man does not say his farm is worth so many oxen or sheep, so many bushels of wheat, yards of cloth, or pairs of shoes, but so many pounds or dollars or francs. So the value of an ox, a bushel of wheat, a day’s labor, a book, or a picture, is said to be so many dollars, etc.—a dollar or pound or franc meaning simply a certain known weight of gold. The relative value of all commodities is expressed by comparing them, not directly with each other, but with a definite quantity of gold, which is briefly expressed by the words pound, dollar, franc, etc.

But gold is never found in nature absolutely unmixtured with other substances, and is besides easily adulterated by artificial means. It is therefore of the utmost consequence that this should be purified from mixture, formed into pieces of convenient sizes, and so marked that any one can know just how much the piece contains. All civilized governments undertake to do this, guaranteeing that each piece which bears its stamp shall contain a definite quantity of the precious metal. That is, it coins money. Any Government that debases its coin, by diminishing its weight or increasing the proportion of alloy, is a swindler of the worst stamp, just as a trader who shortens his yard-stick, cuts down his gallon measure, or files away his weights is worse than the one who merely overcharges his customer in price.

This operation of making money is carried on in establishments called “mints.” It involves the two processes of “assaying,” or purifying the metals from mixture, and making them into coins. Our Government has mints at San Francisco and Philadelphia (it formerly had them also at New Orleans, Louisiana; Charlotte, North Carolina; and Dahlonega, Georgia), where both assaying and coinage are carried on. The Assay Office in New York merely purifies the bullion, sending it to Philadelphia to be coined. As by far the greater amount of bullion brought to the Atlantic States is received here, and here also the majority of payments are made, Gothamites think a coining department should be added, being quite unable to see the advantage of sending the bullion to our neighbor city to be coined, and bringing it back here to be paid out. Our friends in the city of "Brotherly Love" have reasons abundantly satisfactory to themselves why things should remain as they are. We do not enter into this question; but propose in this paper to describe, with pen and pencil, the processes of "assaying," as carried on at the Office in New York; and in a subsequent article to describe the process of "coining" at the Mint in Philadelphia. The officers of both establishments have afforded us every facility for the execution of our work; our only difficulty has been to condense within reasonable limits the information imparted to us. If our readers find it half as interesting as we have done, they will join us in thanking them for the courtesy extended to us in our many visits to both establishments.

THE WEIGH-ROOM.

The Assay Office is in Wall Street, adjoining the Custom-house. The front building which appears in our first sketch contains only the offices of the Superintendent and Treasurer, and the Weigh-Room, where bullion is received, the work of assaying being performed in a building in the rear, the only part of which seen from the street is the tall chimney which overtops the neighboring roofs. On the second floor is the office of the Superintendent, Mr. Dunning, who has the general oversight of affairs. Here we apply for permission to make repeated visits to the establishment, for it would not do to allow every one at will to frequent a place where so many millions of dollars are apparently lying loose around. We shall find that this "lying loose" is only apparent, and that he must be a cunning rogue who could appropriate a dollar without detection. Our request is granted, we receive a "pass;" and to enhance the obligation a clerk is appointed to accompany us, who kindly explains every thing, and shows us a thousand things which we might otherwise have overlooked. We descend to the first floor, and look into the office of Mr. Cisco, the Treasurer of the Assay Office, and Assistant Treasurer of the United States. He receives the bullion from depositors, and has the care of it after it is refined. The responsibility of his position is evinced by the fact that he gives bonds in the penal sum of Eight Hundred Thousand Dollars for the performance of his duties, and the manner in which they have been performed for nearly eight years, in that an error of a dollar has never occurred in his accounts. That he is "the right man in the right place" is so fully known that, though an ardent Democrat, he retains his position by the express invitation of the present Republican Administration. In fact, all the responsible positions of the Assay Office were assigned and are held without any regard to political parties. Pity it is that the same principle had not been carried out in all departments of our Government.

Passing along, we first enter the Weigh-Room, where the bullion is received. The most prominent object here are two pairs of scales, inclosed in glazed cases, with sliding doors. These are of capacity sufficient to weigh two thousand ounces at once, and are so delicately poised that they will turn with the hundredth part of an ounce. The bullion is brought in by every conceivable class of persons. The greater part comes through banks and brokers, brought by sturdy porters or jaunty clerks; but much is brought by miners from California or Pike's Peak, and by emigrants from every land. A bearded Californian, fresh from the steamer, will not unfrequently walk into the room, throw off his upper garments, and take from his waist the belt filled with golden scales which he has worn during the whole voyage. The precious metals come in every possible shape. There are the bright bars stamped with the British crown—the value of five thousand dollars, compressed into a brick; there are Napoleons and sovereigns, with the imperial and royal effigies as bright as when they left the mint; doubloons, ducats, and joes, and all the miscellaneous coins of Europe. There is gold dust washed clean in mountain streams, and nuggets, rough but rich, worn into uncouth shapes by the waters of ages. There is plate and jewelry of every kind and form—rings, bracelets, brooches, and chains; vases, dishes, forks, and spoons of gold, silver, and not unfrequently, as subsequent assay shows, of counterfeit metals: these having performed their duty of use or adornment, and now worn out or unfashionable, are sold for their value as metal. The amount of bullion weighed by Mr. Graham, the Treasurer's Clerk, upon these scales, is somewhat startling. The following table shows the value and kinds of the bullion received during the first five months of the present year:

Description.	Gold.	Silver.
Foreign Coins	$17,970,000	$476,000
Foreign Bullion.....	2,870,000	222,000
United States Bullion	10,477,000	132,800
Total Gold	$31,317,000
Old Silver Coins.....		69,700
Silver from Washoe		58,500
Silver Fine Bars, and California		53,000
Total Silver		$1,012,000
Gold, from January to May, 1861.....	$31,317,000
Silver, from January to May, 1861.....		1,012,000
Bullion received in Five Months.....		$32,329,000

Large as are these sums, they give an inadequate idea of the present operations of the office. The amount received during the month of July was more than nine millions; and there is every reason to anticipate that the whole business of the year will exceed one hundred millions. The process of assaying gold requires, as we shall see, the use of a large quantity of silver. The present want is not supplied by the frosted cakes from Mexico, and the bars from Washoe, supplemented by spoons and forks brought from family closets. So the office pays a premium upon silver. This brings in coin to be melted. On one of our visits we saw brought in a bushel or two of American dollars, coined some years since, but as sharp as when they left the mint; they had never been put in circulation, having rested all the while in some bank vault, whence they had been brought by the premium offered.

The bullion having been weighed, the depositor takes a receipt for it. This is beautifully engraved, with a vignette of the American Eagle, printed in crimson, and signed by the Treasurer of the mint. The following, with the exception of the name of the depositor, is a copy of a receipt, which, in this case, happens to be for California gold; the parts printed in Italics are filled out with the pen:

GOLD BULLION RECEIPT.

No. 1912.

Assay Office of the United States,
New York, June 11, 1861.

RECEIVED from John Smith a Deposit of GOLD BULLION for Coin, weighing Eleven Hundred and Twenty-... 97 ounces, the net value thereof to be ascertained and paid to said Depositor, or Order, agreeably to Law.

1120- $\frac{97}{100}$ ozs.

This deposit, which we propose to follow through the Office, happens to be of California gold, as is shown by the receipts which we shall give. If it had been of other bullion the subsequent documents would have borne quite different figures. There are three things in this receipt which are to be noted. First: It bears a number. This indicates its order in the deposits received since the 1st of January preceding. The Government undertakes to receive deposits of bullion, above the weight of six ounces, to assay each separately, and pay for it its actual value. Second: The weight of the deposit is given in ounces and decimals of an ounce. This is the ounce "Troy weight," but we ignore the old denominations of pounds, pennyweights, grains, etc., reckoning only by ounces and decimals of ounces. Third: No value is affixed to the deposit; for to ascertain this is the precise object of the assay. If the deposit is in coin some may be counterfeit, others may be adulterated by cutting out a part of the gold, and filling up the space by base metal; if it is in gold dust, it may be "doctored" by introducing a quantity of copper scales coated with gold; if it is in gold bars, a hole may have been drilled, the space filled up with other metal, the orifice being concealed by remelting; if it is of plate or jewelry, it is sure to be largely alloyed. Nuggets themselves are sometimes counterfeited; not long ago such a nugget, weighing 25 ounces, was brought to the office; on melting, it appeared that it contained no gold at all, but was made of a mixture of metals, galvanized with gold. Probably the rogue who deposited it pledged the certificate somewhere for a small part of its presumed value. In any event the Government lost nothing, for it promised to pay only the value of the gold and silver in the deposit, which happened to be nothing at all. Long practice has made the officers such judges of bullion that from appearance alone they could decide upon its value with great accuracy. But it is not worth while to do so. It is better to give a receipt for the gross weight, for the scientific tests through which each deposit must pass will detect the minutest portion of foreign substance.

The bullion, having been weighed, is placed in copper-lined boxes, with a card stating the number of the deposit, the character—whether bars, grains, or coins—and the weight. The box is securely locked and the number chalked on the lid. This number accompanies it through all its preliminary operations. The boxes of bullion are put upon a railroad at the door of the Weigh-Room, and run across the courtyard to the rear building, and hoisted to the Deposit Melting Room. The visitor is at first surprised at the apparently careless manner in which the metal is treated. Lumps and bars, which he is told are gold, lie about on the floor, to be had for picking them up. But if dishonestly inclined, let him try to pocket a piece and he will learn his error. His surprise will soon be directed to the completeness of the method for saving every particle of gold. The floor is of concrete, covered with an iron grating which allows every particle of dust to sift through. This is cast in sections, so that it can be readily removed, the smooth concrete floor swept, and the sweepings collected. The working garments of the men, the towels, brushes, and brooms which are used, all become impregnated with gold. These are preserved, burned, ground to powder, and every particle of the gold contained in the dust is ultimately recovered.

Arranged around this room, close to the wall, are ten iron furnaces for melting the gold. In these, buried in the red-hot coals, are large crucibles, made of clay and black-lead, which are the best materials for withstanding the intense heat to which they are subjected. In shape they resemble the earthen brown-bread pots of our New England mothers, having, however, a lip from which to pour the metal. The crucible being red-hot, a small handful of borax is thrown in, to cleanse the particles of gold and cause them to unite in one mass. It also lubricates the sides of the crucible, and prevents the metal from adhering, on the same principle that Mary Ann greases the griddle previous to frying the buckwheat cakes. Sometimes as much as eighteen hundred ounces of gold is placed in one crucible. They never mix two deposits, however, and if the deposit is only six ounces, it has a separate melt. When filled the crucible is covered and left for about forty minutes, the operator occasionally skimming the dross and dirt from the top. By this time it is thoroughly heated and mixed, which is important, as the portion taken from it to assay should be a fair representation of the whole. If it were not homogeneous, the assay would make the whole either more or less valuable than it really is. In front of each furnace is a little ledge, upon which any thing can be placed. The metal being in readiness, iron moulds are placed on these ledges. These are called "shoe-moulds," from some fancied resemblance to the sole of a shoe. Each of these is divided into three compartments by partitions not quite as high as the sides of the mould. When the mould is filled these partitions make the cast so thin in their places that it can be easily broken. When the metal has reached the right heat, the melter takes the crucible in a pair of tongs, lifts it from the fire, and pours its contents into these moulds. Remaining but a moment to cool in the mould the bar is taken by a man, with a pair of thickly stuffed canvas mittens, and tipped into an iron basin. The gold is still so soft that two bars touching will adhere. Here the deposit number which was given in the Weigh-Room is stamped on each division of the bar, so that in case it should be broken each part could be identified. After each melt the crucible is scraped out, and its contents added to the mass to be afterward burned, and the ashes ground to powder, in order to extract the gold.

COURT-YARD.

MELTING-ROOM.—POURING OUT THE METAL.

This is called "Deposit melting," its object being to free the metal from impurities and render it homogeneous, so that an assay-slip cut from one of the bars will fairly represent the whole deposit. The fineness of the deposit will be determined by a very delicate analysis performed upon the assay-slip; and the elements required for calculating the value are the weight after melting and the fineness.

We follow our deposit, now in the shape of solid bars, to the Bar Weigh-Room, under charge of the Treasurer's assistant weigh-clerk. Here it is weighed to ascertain the loss in melting. This is an important operation, for upon it all calculations as to the value of the metal are based. It is performed in the presence of Mr.

Kent, the melter and refiner, and constitutes the official delivery of the bullion to him by the Treasurer, in whose custody it has heretofore been. To provide for the security of the treasure while in his charge, he is furnished with a large safety-vault, absolutely proof against fire and burglars.

We have now the net weight of our deposit, as bullion, freed from dirt. But it is not pure gold. It contains a portion of "base metals," as iron, copper, and so forth, and also some silver. If the deposit had been of plate or jewelry, probably half would have been alloy; if of foreign coin, about one-tenth; as it is of California gold, it is probably about one-twentieth. Government undertakes to ascertain the precise amount of gold and silver in our deposit and pay us their worth—the “base metals” being here held of no value. This is done by the delicate process of “assaying,” conducted under the superintendence of Dr. Torrey, the chief Assayer.

OLD CRUCIBLES.

CUPELLATION AND PARTING SILVER.

Two small bits called “assay-slips,” are cut from different parts of the bar of each deposit. These are taken to the laboratory of the Assayer, where they are hammered and rolled into slips so thin that they can be easily cut by scissors. These slips, marked so as to show to what deposit they belong, are given to an Assayer, who has before him, inclosed in a glass case, a pair of scales with weights so delicate that they will indicate the half-millionth part of an ounce; the smallest weight resembling a bit of horse-hair, an eighth of an inch long. The operator cuts from the slip a piece weighing exactly half a gramme (the gramme being a French weight equivalent to about the 30th part of an ounce); to this he adds a gramme of pure silver, and incloses them in a wrapper of lead foil, weighing about ten times as much as both gold and silver. This is rolled into a little ball, and taken to an adjoining room, where it undergoes two operations, one of which removes the base metals, and the other separates the silver from the gold.

The first of these operations is called “cupellation,” and depends upon the principle that base metals, when melted and raised to a high temperature, combine with the oxygen of the air and become oxydized, while gold and silver are not affected. This operation is performed in a “Muffle Furnace,” which contains an oven large enough to hold about a dozen small crucibles, called cupels. These are made of calcined bone-dust, and are about the size of a large pill-box, with a shallow depression to hold the metal. The cupels being heated red-hot, the little ball is dropped into one of them. It melts immediately, forming a bright globule, which boils and spins around. The surface rapidly oxydizes, and the oxyd runs down the sides of the globule, and sinks into the pores of the cupel. Lead forms a very liquid oxyd, which washes away, as it were, the oxyds of the other metals; and is added for this purpose. In about ten minutes the scum disappears and the little globule suddenly brightens up; the cupel is removed from the furnace, and the metal, forming a little button about the size of a buck-shot, is taken-out. This contains only gold and silver; all base metals having disappeared.

This button is hammered and rolled out thin, and then formed into a coil about as large as a pencil; this is called a cornet, and is to be subjected to the second process, for separating the silver from the gold. This is based on the fact that nitric acid will dissolve silver, while it will not act upon gold. But the proportion of silver in ordinary bullion is so small that each particle is surrounded and protected by the gold. The silver was added by the Assayer in order to diffuse the gold, and enable the nitric acid to come at the silver.

The cornet is put into a “mattress,” a vial with a broad base and long neck. Into this is poured about an ounce of diluted nitric acid, which is boiled by placing the vial in a bed of hot sand. Bright red fumes soon arise, showing that the action of the acid upon the silver has begun. In about ten minutes the acid is poured off, and a quantity of less dilution is poured in to dissolve out the last traces of the silver. The silver and nitric acid uniting have formed nitrate of silver; and the remainder of the cornet is pure gold. It is a fragile roll, looking very like the brown tinder left in burning writing paper. This is taken out, washed in distilled water, and melted in a crucible, when it at once resumes its metallic appearance. It is carefully weighed in the operator's delicate scales, the result showing the fineness of the bullion; or how large a portion of it was gold, and how large alloy. The value of an ounce of any fineness being already known, the whole value of the gold in our deposit is readily ascertained.

There was, moreover, some silver contained in our deposit—a small proportion probably, but still of some value—and for this we are to be paid. To ascertain this another half gramme is cut from the assay-slip, but no silver is added to it. It is cupelled to extract the base metals, and being weighed with the cornet of pure gold, the excess in weight shows how much silver there was.

We have spoken of only a single assay; but in fact two are taken from each deposit, by different assistant-assayers. If these agree, they are deemed to be correct. If they differ, a new assay is made by each. If they still differ, it indicates that, in melting, the deposit was not thoroughly mixed, and that one portion of the bar was richer than another. In that case it is re-melted, and the process is gone over again. The process of assaying is a very delicate one, demanding great practical skill, since an error of the hundred-thousandth part of an ounce in the small piece assayed would make a sensible difference when multiplied by the quantity of a large deposit. But such is the acknowledged skill of our assayers, that Dr. Torrey's mark on a bar is never questioned.

To indicate the fineness of gold, we adopt the simple French decimal system. The bullion is supposed to be divided into 1000 parts. If it is pure gold, its fineness is $\frac{1000}{1000}$; that is, 1. If it contains 100 parts alloy, its fineness is $\frac{900}{1000}$; or, in decimals, .900, and so on. The English mint has used a less scientific system. It supposes the bullion to be divided into 24 parts, called carats. If it is pure, it is said to be 24 carats fine. If it contains 2 parts out of 24 of alloy, it is 22 carats fine; and so on. Recently, however, the assayers have been required to make their reports also in decimals; and this system will probably in time wholly supersede the old one.

ASSAY WEIGH-ROOM.

The Assayer fills out a report stating the fineness of the gold, and the amount of silver contained in it. This is sent to the office of the Treasurer, where the necessary calculations are made, and a memorandum is sent to the office of the Superintendent for verification. This memorandum is made out in tabular form, printed in crimson, and signed by the Chief Clerk, in behalf of the Treasurer. The memorandum for our deposit reads as follows:

No. 1912.—Memorandum of GOLD BULLION deposited in the UNITED STATES ASSAY OFFICE, at New York, the 11th day of June, 1861, by John Smith.

DESCRIPTION, California Grain.—WEIGHT, before melting, 1120.97 ounces; after melting, 1120.34 ounces.—FINE-NESS, .923.—VALUE of the Gold, $21,376 20.—VALUE OF SILVER parted from the Gold, $94 40.—DEDUCTIONS for Parting, Coinage, and Fine Bars, $162 90.—NET VALUE $21,307 70.

I certify that the net amount of the above deposit is Twenty-one thousand three hundred and seven $\frac{70}{100}$ Dollars, payable at the U. S. Assay Office, only on presentation of the Receipt, of a corresponding date and number, heretofore issued. } viz. : { In Gold Coins, \$21,213 30.
In Silver Coins, $94 40.

Our deposit, being of California gold, was quite pure. It lost less than half an ounce in melting, and being .923 fine, contained only 77 parts in a thousand of alloy, including the silver.

It was, in fact, worth more than its weight in gold coin, of which our standard is .900; that of British coin being 22 carats, equal to about .916. If our deposit had been in foreign coin, with no counterfeits in it, about one-tenth part would have been alloy; if it had been jewelry or plate, probably it would have contained quite half alloy. As we chose to take our pay in coin, the cost of coinage is charged to us. The deduction would have been less if we had taken fine bars, as is usually done when the gold is wanted for exportation or deposit. The charges are made according to a fixed scale; varying for parting and refining with the character of the deposit; for fine bars it is 6 cents, and for coinage 50 cents, per hundred dollars. In four or five days after making our deposit it is assayed, its value ascertained, and we get our warrant for the payment in coin, for which, however, we must now wait a while. Formerly, when Uncle Sam was "flush," he used to keep a balance of a few millions in the hands of the Treasurer of the Assay Office, so that he could cash the Superintendent's warrants at once. But having met with some losses of late, and being subject to heavy expenses, he finds this inconvenient. In fact, he is "short." So we must wait for our money until the bullion can be sent to Philadelphia and coined. This will take twenty or thirty days. But the hardship is not very great, as we can easily "make a raise," if need be, on our warrant.

Hitherto our deposit has been kept separate from all others. But now that its value has been ascertained, and we have a warrant for the payment, it is considered as the property of the United States; and in the processes of refining is mingled with other deposits, losing its personal identity.

The operation of refining, which Mr. Kent now commences, is a repetition on a large scale of the delicate processes of assaying. The bars are melted in a large crucible, twice their weight in silver being added. The molten mass is dipped up, and flung, with a peculiar jerk, into a cistern of cold water. We have all, for one purpose or another, poured melted lead into water, and noticed the minute fragments into which the metal is divided. The same thing happens to the compound of gold and silver. It is divided into small portions, and looks not unlike a heap of shavings. This process is called "granulating," its object being the same as the rolling out of the assay-slips, to allow every part of the metal to come in contact with the nitric acid, in which it is to be placed to extract the silver.

MELTER AND REFINER'S VAULT.

GRANULATING.

The water is drained off, and the granulated metal is taken to the "Parting Houses."—These are closets with sliding windows, which shut close in order to prevent the fumes from escaping. The bottom is a tank with steam-pipes around it. Here are placed large jars of porcelain, holding about twenty gallons. Into each is put 150 pounds of the metal. The nitric acid, which has been decanted from the carboys in which it is held, is poured in—about ten gallons, properly diluted, to each jar. Six or seven thousand carboys of acid, costing nine dollars each, are used in the course of a year. Great care must be taken in handling it, for it will burn the flesh or clothes of the workmen should it touch them. It will not, however, act upon

POURING OUT ACID.

THE PARTING HOUSE.

India-rubber, and so they wear long gloves made of that material. The water in the tank, and with it the acid in the jars, is kept boiling by means of the steam-pipes for six hours. The fumes, prevented by the closed windows from passing into the room, escape through the tall chimney seen in our first illustration. This vapor presents a brilliant appearance, and many who see it suppose that vast quantities of gold are passing off into the air. The vapor, however, is nothing more valuable than nitrous acid. After boiling for six hours, the acid, or rather the combination of nitric acid and silver, which is nitrate of silver, is drawn off by a gold siphon, worth three thousand dollars, and a stronger dilution of acid poured in. This is boiled for another six hours, when all the silver is supposed to be taken up; it is drawn off, as before, and the gold is left in the jar. The nitrate of silver is now in the form of a dark fluid, looking like a pale greenish ink. We shall meet it again.

The gold, which is in the form of a dark brown powder, resembling Scotch snuff, with no lustre or indication of its metallic character, is yet almost pure—probably .993 fine. It has been by this process purified as high as .995. It still contains a little nitrate of silver mixed with it, to remove which it is placed in a large tub, having at the bottom a strainer composed of layers of muslin and filtering paper. A stream of warm water is poured upon it, which penetrates the mass, washing away the nitrate. In eight or ten hours it is thoroughly cleansed. It is then taken to a hydraulic press. About a peck is placed in a "stave" or mould. A pressure of two hundred tons is applied, which forces out the water through slits left in the stave, and compresses the powder into a solid cake, about twelve inches in diameter and three inches thick. The top and bottom of this cake present a dull yellow "frosted" appearance; but the sides, which have been exposed to friction, shine with metallic lustre. It looks like a fine yellow cheese, by which name it is called. One of these gold "cheeses," however, weighs about sixty pounds, and is worth eighteen or nineteen thousand dollars. Twelve of them are made from the contents of one filter-tub.

INTERIOR OF VAULT.—THE CHEESES.

These cheeses, after having been baked in an oven, heated by steam-pipes, to expel any moisture that may remain, are taken down to the "Fine Melting-Room," broken up, and melted. A little saltpetre and borax is thrown into the crucible, to extract any base metal which may have become mixed. It is turned into iron moulds, smoked with rosin and pitch to prevent adherence; oil is poured on the bar while cooling, to give it a good surface. It comes out in the shape of "fine bars," each weighing about seventeen pounds, and worth some five thousand dollars. These are cooled in a "pickle" of sulphuric acid diluted with water, which removes any oxydation of iron on the surface, and gives them a bright appearance. These bars are about .993 fine.

CASTING FINE BARS.

PRECIPITATING AND PARTING SILVER.

When the moulding is begun a cake of five or six ounces is cast, and one notch is cut in it as a mark; when the last bar is cast another cake is made, and marked with two notches. These are called "assay pieces;" they are stamped with the number of the melt, and assayed, as before explained. Each bar is then weighed separately by the Bar Weigh-Clerk, who calculates its value from the weight and fineness, as reported by the Assayer. The number of the melt, the year of melting, the office where refined, the number of the bar, its weight, fineness, and value, are then stamped on every bar. These are now delivered to the Treasurer, who keeps a record of every one. Thus the bullion, which was delivered to the Melter and Refiner in various shapes, is now converted into "fine bars," refined, assayed, its exact value stamped on each, and is ready to be sent to the Mint at Philadelphia for coinage, or to be exported. For shipments bars are generally used in preference to coin, because they are more convenient to pack, and there is a saving of the expense of coinage.

It will be remembered that two parts of silver were melted with every part of gold. This, dissolved in nitric acid, constituting nitrate of silver, was left at the "Parting House." The recovery of this silver forms one of the most beautiful operations in the Assay Office.

This nitrate, in the form of a greenish fluid, is poured into an immense tank, holding about 3000 gallons, in which has been placed a strong solution of common salt. Salt is a combination of chlorine and soda—its chemical name is chloride of sodium. Four substances are contained in this tank: silver, combined with nitric acid, forming nitrate of silver, and chlorine, combined with soda, forming chloride of sodium. A double chemical action takes place. Nitric acid has a stronger affinity for soda than for silver, and chlorine a stronger affinity for silver than for soda. The consequence is that the acid leaves the silver and unites with the soda, forming nitrate of soda; while the chlorine unites with the silver, forming chloride of silver. The chloride of silver thus formed falls down, or is "precipitated" in soft downy flakes, like falling snow, leaving the nitrate of soda separate. The nitrate of soda is soluble in water, while the chloride of silver is insoluble. When the new combination is complete, the contents of the tank are drawn off into large wooden filters; a stream of hot water is poured in; the soluble nitrate of soda, which also contains all the base metals of the melt, is held to be of no value; it passes off into the sewer and is lost, leaving the insoluble chloride of silver behind in the filter. This, when "sweetened" or washed free from nitric acid, resembles thick white paint, except that the surface, which is exposed to the light, is of a delicate purple. A similar action of light upon the silver-coating of a copper-plate is the basis of the daguerreotype process. About 4000 bushels of salt are used up every year in this process.

GRINDING AND SEPARATING THE DUST.

When thoroughly "sweet," the chloride of silver is transferred from the filter to large leaden vats, in which has been placed a quantity of granulated zinc. Water is added, and another chemical action takes place. The chlorine, having a stronger affinity for zinc than for silver, leaves it, and unites with the zinc, forming chloride of zinc. This being soluble in water, is washed away, not being worth preserving. A little sulphuric acid has been meantime added to destroy any surplus of zinc.

The silver, thus successively freed by purely chemical processes from nitric acid and chlorine, is in the form of a dull grayish powder, looking very like a heap of ashes. It is nevertheless almost pure silver, much finer than coin. This powder is "cheesed" by the hydraulic press, like the gold powder, and is deposited in the Melter's safe, to be melted up into bars, or used again for refining gold.

We have described only the processes of assaying and refining gold. Silver bullion does not, like gold, require to be refined; but after being assayed is sent to the Mint to be coined, unless it is required to be used for refining gold. The process of assay applied to silver is known among chemists as the humid assay. It is a very delicate operation, based upon the principle that a definite weight of a solution of salt, of known strength, added to a definite weight of silver dissolved in nitric acid, will precipitate a definite weight of chloride of silver.

Before leaving the Assay Office we must descend to the basement, and visit the "Sweep Room"—a dirty and disagreeable apartment, but a very important one, nevertheless. Here all the rubbish of the establishment—sweepings of rooms, ashes from the furnace, old crucibles, brooms, brushes, clothes, mittens, and so forth—are treated to extract the gold contained in them. These are first burned to ashes, then reduced to an almost impalpable powder in the "Grinding Mill," under heavy iron rollers weighing 2000 lbs.

This powder is then placed in the "Gold Separator"—a machine invented by Mr. Kent, the Melter and Refiner. The dirt is put into the circular vessel A, where the powder is ground still finer, by heavy iron rollers working under water, which is supplied in a continuous stream. The motion of the rollers keeps the mass in perpetual agitation. The coarser particles of gold sink to the bottom; while the dirt, still containing some gold, being lighter, passes off with the water, through the pipe B into the basin C. At the bottom of this basin is a quantity of quicksilver. The surface of this is kept bright and clean by a couple of paddle-wheels, which just touch it, and also keep the water in motion. Any particle of gold touching the quicksilver is instantly seized, while the water and dirt pass out at the top, through the waste-pipe D. For the right to use this Separator in all the United States Mints Mr. Kent received, by vote of Congress, $20,000; but as the gold saved by it, beyond what was recovered by the old process, amounts to $20,000 a year, the arrangement is a profitable one.

In the processes of melting, assaying, and refining, there is of course some waste, for which the Government makes allowance; but declares that it must not exceed two parts in a thousand of the amount operated upon. That is, unless the loss exceeds this proportion, the Melter and Refiner is deemed to have returned all that he received. The actual loss has always been considerably less. It is now reduced, by careful economy, to one-thirteenth part of the legal allowance, saving to Government in five years, up to December, 1859, $191,151 55.

We have said that the amount of bullion which will pass through the Assay Office during the present year is estimated at one hundred millions of dollars. Let us try to give some general idea of the weight and bulk of the gold required to make up this sum. A cubic inch of fine gold weighs about $10\frac{1}{2}$ ounces, and is worth a trifle less than \$210; a cubic foot weighs about 1454 pounds, and is worth \$362,600. A hundred millions in fine bars will measure about 273 cubic feet, say two and one-seventh cords. If cast into a solid cube, each side would measure about six and a half feet. Our coinage is of "standard gold," the ten-dollar piece weighing 258 grains. A million dollars in coin weighs nearly 4479 pounds Troy, equivalent to about 3685 pounds avoirdupois, or more than one and three-quarter tons. A keg $13\frac{1}{2}$ inches high, 10 inches at the heads, and $11\frac{1}{2}$ at the bilge, will hold about \$50,000 in gold coin. Two thousand such kegs would be required for \$100,000,000. Gold in grains occupies about twice the space that it does when cast into bars. It is said that in California gold dust was for a while sold by the pint, this measure holding 142 ounces, worth \$2500. A hundred millions in California dust would measure 40,000 pints, or 625 bushels. After all, the coin which any depositor would be likely to carry with him makes no very great bulk. Into a box measuring on the inside 10 inches long, 8 wide, and 5 high, \$36,000 in gold coin can be packed. A bag 6 inches by 9 will hold \$5000, leaving room to tie. Silver coin occupies a little more than twenty-five times the bulk of gold coin of the same value.

KENT'S GOLD SEPARATOR.

We have now followed the bullion from the time of its reception in the Weigh-Room until it has been converted into "fine bars." Next month we propose to follow some of these bars to the Mint in Philadelphia, and see them converted into coin of the United States.

The Women of Weinsberg.

(FROM THE GERMAN OF BURGER.)

PRAY tell me now where Weinsberg lies?
 As brave a town as any,
 With goodly store, both chaste and wise,
 Of maids and matrons many:
 And were I doomed to wedded life,
 From Weinsberg should I take my wife!

Its liege, Conrad the Emperor,
 The good town once offended,
 Who quickly mustered troops of war
 And thereupon descended:
 Beleaguering it with foot and horse,
 And pressed it sore without remorse.

But still the valiant town stood out,
 The monarch's wrath inflaming,
 Who sent therein a herald stout,
 With trumpet-blast proclaiming:
 "Ye rebels! as I am a king,
 Your town I'll sack—each man shall swing!"

As thus proclaimed the herald loud
In market and in by-way,
A doleful clamor raised the crowd
By hearth-stone and on highway.
Dear in the leaguered town was food,
But dearer yet was counsel good.

"Oh, woe is me!" the townsfolk call,
"Oh, woe!" responds each pastor:
"Good Lord, have mercy on us all!
Death comes, and sure disaster:
Alack! alack! there is no hope!"—
Already each man feels the rope.

But when the case small hope admits,
In spite of each endeavor,
It often happens woman's wits
The subtlest toils will sever:
For woman's wiles and priestcraft stout
O'er all prevail, as none can doubt.

A wife in wit and virtue rich,
A matron newly mated,
Hit on a brilliant fancy, which
The townsfolk much elated:
And whether you approve or no,
You must applaud her plan also.

At midnight a fair embassy
Forth issued from the city;
And in his camp they bent the knee
To move the monarch's pity:
They pleaded long, nor plead amiss,
But gained no better terms than this:

The women should be free to go,
Their choicest treasures bearing;
But what remained—ay, blood should flow,
Nor youth nor old man sparing:
Their supplications all in vain,
Homeward returned the weeping train.

But lo! when bright the morning beamed,
What think you happened straightway?
A train of noble women streamed
Forth from the nearest gate-way,
Her lord each bearing in a sack,
True as I'm living—pickapack!

Then many a sycophant averred
Their trick should naught avail them;
Quoth Conrad then, "Our royal word
Is pledged, and shall not fail them.
Ho, bravo!" cried he; "bravo, ho!
Would that our spouse were minded so!"

He pardoned all, both great and small,
High revel held at pleasure,
With viol gay, and trumpet bray,
And trod a stately measure:
With maid and matron danced the same,
With peasant wench and noble dame.

Pray tell me now where Weinsberg lies?
In sooth a gallant city,
With store of maids and matrons wise,
And pious, leal, and witty:
And if I'm doomed to nuptial vows,
Faith, I'll from Weinsberg choose my spouse!

ABOUT THE FOX AND FOX-HUNTERS.

"AS cunning as a fox," is one of the oldest and most familiar of all sayings. It is said that there are over one thousand classic fables in which the fox is the prominent character. It is therefore evident that the creature must possess some superior qualifications to thus impress himself upon the popular mind, not as an animal of great merit only, but indeed as a representative of intellectual character. It is but just to say, however, that the fox is but a fair representative of the superior abilities of all animals in their spheres. We know Reynard better than the others, simply because circumstances have brought him more frequently in contact with the human species; for by the chase he has for generations brought his "natural smartness" to bear against the united resources of the dog, of the horse, of man; and in the contest the fox has always displayed abilities that have made it difficult to decide unqualifiedly that he is not entitled to an equal share of honors, in what at first sight would appear to be a most unequal contest.

He is the inhabitant of all the northern and temperate regions of the globe, and though varying in color and size, every where maintains his marked peculiarities of character. His forehead is high and broad; his eyes are so set that he has a wide range of vision; his snout is sharp; his ears erect and pointed; his body is liberally supplied with fur; his tail straight and remarkable for its brush-like appearance. His natural age is twelve years, but as foxes are Ishmaelites by nature and practice, they seldom reach their allotted span of life.

Reynard comes not only from an intelligent family, but also of a race blessed with tough muscles, an exquisite scent, and a heroic spirit under misfortunes. He is unlike the dog in being full of dissimulation and treachery, and has no courage to compare with the wolf. The dog and wolf will associate as friends, but the wolf and dog are sworn enemies of the fox. The gait of the fox is treacherous, and his glance is always sinister, glaring, or stealthy. By deception patiently practiced, he accomplishes his greatest triumphs. He will willingly lie all day concealed among the grass in the vicinity of a pond, waving for long hours the bushy end of his tail, thereby enticing geese and ducks, the over-curious inhabitants of its surface, within his reach. He will seize a bunch of moss between his teeth, launch himself into the stream, and, unsuspected, float among his feathered victims, thus securing his prey. If the ruse is necessary for success, he will affect to be dead, and the hound's sharp teeth, or powder flashed under his sensitive nose, have failed to call forth any evidences of life.

PORTRAIT OF REYNARD.

As a general rule the fox commits his depredations in the night; and if he is fortunate in killing more food than he immediately requires, he hides the surplus in the ground for future use. He is the enemy of the poultry-yard, and all favorite game. He preys voraciously upon all animals weaker than himself, and has been known to tear down young calves and lambs. When hard pressed he will subsist on serpents, toads, moles, and rats, playing with them before killing as would a cat. If living on the sea-coast, he becomes very fond of oysters, crabs, and other shell-fish. Though not a great consumer of grapes, he seems to delight to destroy them, seemingly from wanton mischief. Solomon alludes to "the little foxes that destroy the vines." He is a great observer of localities, and soon becomes familiar with every pathway, rock, tree, or fence, and with the inhabitants of his vicinity. Foxes are exceedingly tender of their young, both parents laboring industriously for their support. If suddenly surprised by dogs, the old ones will conceal their cubs, and by boldly breaking cover, lead their enemies away from their den. The anxious mother has often been seen running before the hounds with a cub in her mouth. As the young increase in size they are taken by the old ones out on predatory excursions; taught to leap, to "double," and to practice the approved methods of stealing. The young fox is not, however, always grateful; for when foxes' holes have been stopped, the parents have been known to fall victims to the appetites of the ravenous brood.

The burrow of the fox is not only remarkable for its happily selected location but also for the great skill shown in its construction. Buffon was so struck by this fact, that he proposed to place the fox among the higher order of quadrupeds. The remarkable saying, "The foxes have holes and the birds have nests," would seem to be an inspired recognition of the comfort and security of the fox's den.

From the natural sagacity of the fox, the strong scent it leaves when hunted, its speed and apparently natural association with the precincts of the farm-yard, its capture by the aid of horses and dogs affords one of the most exciting sports indulged in by man. There seems to be no element of healthful recreation wanting. The time, if favorable, is in the pleasantest season of the year; the scene over hill and dale, and your companions dashing gentlemen. We have been no idle participants in the wild sports of the woods and fields. We have rightfully claimed a share of spoils of all sorts of legitimate game, great and small, and we remember vividly all the pleasant incidents connected therewith; but as time softens yet embellishes the review, it seems to us that the morning meeting of the jolly fox-hunters of all others was the most thoroughly hearty, and the sport that followed the most manly and exciting.

Fox-hunting in America, though less pretentious in details, and less technical than in England, is as enthusiastically pursued in our Middle and Southern States. Certainly we do not pay enormous prices for hounds, nor keep up studs of hunters at prodigious cost, yet our people, when the country permits it, are hunters after a rude but thorough manner; and although we do not ride in white top boots and corduroys, yet we ride to the purpose, and through the hills, rough rocks, broken precipices, quaggy swamps, and fatal quick-sands, we are still eager and stanch hunters. Our horses are doubly trained in the deer and fox hunt, and though they may not be as speedy in passing over an open field, or so well trained in leaping hedges and ditches, still they are more wiry and active than their English rivals. From Maryland to Florida, and further west through Kentucky, Alabama, Mississippi, and Louisiana, fox-hunting contends with deer-hunting as the favorite amusement. In fact, the chase of the fox may be properly regarded as a Southern sport in the United States, as it is never followed on horseback in the North, owing to the rocky and precipitous character of the country, and the unyielding opposition of our sturdy farmers in favorable locations, who would never permit a dozen horses leaping their fences and galloping over their wheat fields. Besides, the red fox, which is more generally found in the North, runs so far before the dogs that he would be seldom seen, and could at his pleasure, under any circumstances, escape in some rocky fissure or impenetrable burrow. In the Southern States, on the contrary, the ground is generally favorable to the amusement, and the planter sustains but little injury from the passing hunt, which, from the instinctive leading of the fox, is confined to the ridges and high dry grounds, and not to the cultivated fields.

The modes of hunting the fox are much alike in all the Southern States. To the sound of the winding horn the neighboring gentry collect at an appointed place, each accompanied by his favorite dogs, and usually by a negro who acts as "whipper in." Mounted on fine horses accustomed to the sport, they send in their hounds to hunt over the selected ground, and wait the start. Thickets on the edges of long cultivated plantations, brier patches, deserted fields covered with bloom-grass, are places where the fox is most likely to have his bed. The trail he has left behind him during his nocturnal rambles being struck, the hounds are encouraged by the voices of their drivers to as great a speed as the devious course it leads them will permit. Once scenting the trail, they follow it along where the fox the previous night has been in search of partridges, meadow-larks, rabbits, and field-mice; presently they trace his footsteps to a log, from which he has jumped upon the neighboring fence, which following a short distance, then leaped a ditch and struck into the borders of a marsh. Through all his crooked and cautious ways the sagacious hounds follow until he is suddenly roused, perchance from a vision of successful barn-yard robberies, by the clamorous cry of the pack. At first the fox makes two or three rapid doublings, and then suddenly flies to cover, perhaps a quarter of a mile off. This possibly for a few moments throws the dogs out, but the moment the chase has continued long enough to get the fox warm, the trail is then followed by the dogs with precision and unerring certainty, and the struggle now becomes exciting. Now the hunters, who have been impatiently waiting, dash in after the "ringing pack." When the woods are open, which is often the case where the custom of annually firing the undergrowth prevails, the horsemen keep up with the hounds, and the fox is frequently in sight. In his efforts to escape, Reynard, after he despairs of his heels, commences his manœuvres to elude his pursuers; he plunges into thickets, doubles on his track, runs into the water, follows a fence top for a hundred yards or more, and then makes a desperate bound to earth so that he may break his trail. At last, fatigued and stiffened by exertion, his enemies seize him, and he dies bravely, defiantly fighting and snapping with his teeth to the last.

THE MEETING.

General Washington, with regard to fox-hunting, was a representative man in his day, and was probably one of the best riders of his time—an accomplishment that gave him dignity and efficiency when he became the commander-in-chief of the Revolutionary army. His favorite horse, after he took up his residence at Mount Vernon, was a splendid iron-gray, approaching to blue, rejoicing in the name of Blenheim. His house, at the time referred to, was the central point, not only from the vicinity, but from Maryland, for gentlemen who were fond of the chase; these friendly visits frequently extending for weeks, and each day made memorable by unbounded hospitality. Washington dressed for a fox-hunt must have been a most splendid specimen of a man, his fine person set off by the true sporting costume of blue coat, scarlet waistcoat, buckskin breeches, boots with yellow tops, silver spurs, velvet cap, and a showy whip handle supporting a long, tapering, but heavy lash. Thus adorned, and accompanied by Hill Lee, his huntsman, at the head of his friends and retainers, at early dawn he took the field, and in the excitement of the chase none rode more gallantly, and no voice more cheerily made the woodlands ring than his. The foxes hunted at this time were the gray species; but there was an exception, a black fox, that Washington frequently hunted, but without success. This animal, the history of which would, no doubt, be curious, would bid defiance to all pursuers, running from ten to twenty miles, distancing both dogs and horses. It was a boast of Washington that his pack, numerous as it was, ran so close that they could be covered with a blanket—an expression that is as suggestive as a volume could be of the nice sense he had of the proprieties of the sport, and what a critical eye and judgment he brought to bear in its enjoyment. Washington's hunting establishment, though not entirely destroyed, was comparatively neglected while he was absent at the head of the army; but on his return home, Lafayette, with a thoughtful appreciation of his old commander's fondness for field-sports, sent him a pack of French hounds of unusual size and speed, which Washington received with the liveliest expressions of delight, and which he used in favorable weather as often as every other day in the week, generally starting before sunrise, and returning home to breakfast, made doubly appreciated by the exercise and excitement in the bracing morning air.

Occasionally the lady visitors of Mount Vernon, mounted on their palfreys, would go out as charming witnesses of the sport; and that they might gratify their wishes without endangering life or limb, Washington caused roads to be cut through various places in the woods, so that by "short cuts" the most eligible places to see the chase could be reached. On these occasions Washington was especially conspicuous; taller and finer mounted than any of his companions, he neither spared himself nor his generous steed, maintaining what seemed to be his inherited place, the lead, and at the death yielding to no man the honor of the brush.

An invitation to a fox-hunt, now, alas! some twenty years ago, was one of the first marked adventures of our Southern life. Our host was a most substantial planter and an accomplished gentleman. Besides possessing the best stud in all the country round, he had a pack of hounds that was unsurpassed in all the valuable qualities of nose and speed. Roused from our bed before the day had fairly dawned, we reached the breakfast room to find it full of guests invited from the neighborhood, and all busily engaged in the agreeable task of discussing a warm and most substantial breakfast, over which the perfume of rich coffee, such as we only meet with in semi-tropical climes, predominated. It took but little observation to foresee that our new associates were all remarkable in their way, some for fine personal appearance, some for their classical and literary attainments, and all for their rough hunting experiences and fine social qualities. The meal dispatched, we proceeded to the lawn in front of the house, where we found a crowd of horses, and what a new-made acquaintance termed a "raft of dogs," the canines at our presence setting up the most unearthly yells, the older members extending their notes until they reached a cadence peculiar to "old salts" who have broken down their voices outbawling "norwesters." The volubility of the dogs soon inflamed the imaginations of the horses, and they bowed their necks, flashed their eyes, and in one or two instances extemporized a dance that would have been applauded in a country circus. The equestrians, meantime, were not silent or idle. Girths, bridle-bits, and saddles were carefully examined; the hunters then one after another mounted, and soon formed in the road a splendid cavalcade.

RIDING TO COVER.

Unaccustomed at that time to much saddle exercise, it was with some feelings of anxiety that we, by the polite attentions of a negro boy who held our stirrup, mounted a tall lithe steed, whose form was only familiar to us among the engravings of the "Derby winners"—which steed, by-the-way, it was claimed had a well-authenticated pedigree, reaching back to the Godolphin Arabian, and who was of course from family pride bound to be in the thickest of the fray, and up to all and singular break-neck performances. Our "seat," however, at the moment was most agreeable, and with proper philosophy we determined to wait the events of the future. As we passed out of the inclosure a daughter of our host—a gay, lively lady, scarcely sixteen—suddenly made her appearance splendidly mounted on a white horse, and kindly announced that we were destined for her escort—a fact that filled us with an immense amount of pleasure, first, that we should have such unexceptionable company, and, last, that it was possible our steed (which by this time had commenced dancing with impatience, and seemed at times on the point of leaving the earth altogether) would not be called upon by rough riding to do any especial credit to his distinguished progenitors.

The morning was fresh and bracing, and once fairly under way the sun broke cheerily through the light floating mists, assuring us of a goodly day. At every advancing step hounds, horses, and riders became more and more animated: the first named were continually reproved by their keepers for undue levity; the impatience of the steeds was restrained by gently bearing on the rein; while the bipeds engaged in animated conversation, which occasionally awakened echoes by creating hearty and oft-repeated laughter.

Our course soon took us from the well-beaten road into the dense forest, which being threaded a while, we finally reached an "old field" full of admirable "brier patches," fallen timber, ravines, and other favorite resorts of game. The dogs now commenced earnestly their work; they wormed themselves into the tangled vegetation: invaded the holes and hollows, and every few moments uttering cries which indicated the nearness to game, the hunters either looking on as quiet spectators, or dashing in among the dogs, giving those idly disposed a touch of the whip and encouraging the industrious with animated cheers.

Our fair companion, who had by this time become intensely interested in the proceedings, finally turned and remarked, "I am sure there has been a fox started;" and the next instant several of the hounds opened in a united exultation. "That's Pet; that's Rashly," said the young lady, clearly noticing distinctions of voice in the general clamor, and whirling her delicate riding-whip in the air as a sign of acknowledgment. The less enthusiastic dogs soon feeling that it was safe to join in, took up the cry. The scent evidently was warm, for the fox was soon run from his lair, and started off, the result of which was that, in a few moments, the surrounding woods, so recently in a humming repose, now rang and vibrated with soul-stirring notes. Our horses, some of whom had become covered with foam from impatience, encouraged by the involuntary whoop of their riders, now dashed in, their splendidly groomed sides flashing in the sun, as if their coats were composed of bronze and satin. The undergrowth was still wet with dew, and Reynard, delicate about wetting his brush, flew first to the open grounds, presenting the hunt to view streaming over the landscape. The dogs, now fairly engaged, attuned their notes with the skill of nature's orchestral arrangements, pouring them out with a rich effulgence that harmonized with and vibrated in the forest depths, and rolled back in rich cadences from the broken lands, they dying away in the distance as softened and dreamy as the notes of the Æolian harp.

Reynard, hard pressed, now buried himself in the dense forest; and hard riders, with strange impunity, flew through the tangled openings between the trees, safely leaped yawning ravines, and dashed on. Others stationed themselves in favorable places, and watched the chase as it passed from time to time in review, and if opportunity occurred gave the pack a cheer of encouragement as they now, like maddened fiends, sweep on their way. The country, fortunately, was not only favorable for the hunt but for the view; the broken ground ran out into the swamp, in a long spur, which we the spectators occupied, the hunt sometimes being on the edge, and sometimes passing in review almost at our feet. Reynard, who seemed all the while to be under the impression that nothing serious was intended, for some half hour amused himself with coursing hither and thither among the switch cane and briers, crossing and recrossing his track, climbing from one sheltering ravine to another, apparently determined not to leave the comfortable quarters he had selected for his retreat. It now became evident that the dogs every moment were closing in on their victim; in fact, the fox must often have been visible to their eyes; but it was not these organs, but the keen scent on the trail.

THE CHASE.

THE DEATH.

which led them so unerringly to the completion of their work. The fox at last felt the necessity of a run for his life, for he mounted the bluff, stopped a moment to breathe the fresh air, and chose his course across the country. The dogs had now gathered in a solid group, and were running with the precision of machinery. In a few moments they crossed the old field, and lost themselves in the blue distance. One or two hunters now came to where we were stationed, and suggested that we should cross the course taken by the fox; and with this idea we started off, a fine horseman in the lead. On we dashed, on pleasantly and swiftly, our fair lady companion gracefully flying over the obstructions in the way of her horse's feet, her face flushed with the excitement of health, and her eyes glowing with unusual beauty and intelligence. It was no trifling matter for me, unaccustomed to such associations and pursuits, to be assured, as we sped along, that we were not to meet with a fox-hunter's death; for at times we fairly flew through the air; but ahead, calm and joyous, rode our fair companion.

We soon came in hearing distance of the dogs, and reining up, the pack, in full cry, passed a little to the left of our course, and in a moment more they dashed by with lightning speed. As they descended from the high ground to where we had stationed ourselves to see them pass, we looked at them in full front, and their wide-extended mouths, their long pendent tongues, misty breath, and strangely-flashing eyes, suggested that they had, by the magic of the chase, been changed from their natural character into flaming fiends. Fearful and courageous as they looked, poor Reynard, whose brush was somewhat lowered, seemed more distressed than he really was by contrast. My fair companion now gave me many hints which were valuable to my inexperience, and with particular animation informed me that "Fanny" and "Rashly" were still in the van, and that she knew they would be first to seize the fox. The struggle that followed was short. The fox once more left the open ground, but the dense forest only served to impede his progress, not to protect him. Our party of observation now galloped toward the point which was destined to witness the termination of the hunt, and ere we reached it Reynard had yielded up his life. The dogs and horses, a few moments before so active, were now standing with nostrils widely opened for breath, their sides heaving, and their bodies covered with foam. The hunters, however, were, if possible, gayer than ever, all talking together, and all relating some extraordinary incident connected with the chase. Our fair Diana was gallantly awarded the brush, the end of which she playfully rubbed across the eyes of her favorite steed, and then handed it to a young gallant who had distinguished himself by his fearless riding. A few words of acknowledgment passed, and the two, accompanied by an old servant, bade us adieu and started homeward, leaving the hunters to the enjoyment of the more boisterous humors of the day.

Our noble host, accomplished in every thing pertaining to his office, had judiciously followed our party with a carefully selected commissariat, which was now located under the wide-spreading branches of a magnificent water-oak, the generous arms of which would have afforded shelter to a regiment of men. Near by gurgled a cool spring, which was considered, we are compelled to say, more useful to cool the wine in than any other purpose; and thus situated we prepared for a forest meal, our appetites and our wits sharpened by exercise and the open air.

To say that we enjoyed the prevailing excitement would be an inexpressive term. There was something positively exhilarating in the sensations constantly created by the novelty of our position. As the dinner was in course of preparation, among other things the hounds, now comparatively quiescent, attracted not only from us, but older and more familiar admirers, a due share of praise and critical observation. Among them we noticed every possible variety of attitude, and a rich fund of speculation was suggested in the exhibition of the various characteristics—for dogs differ in tastes and dispositions as much as the same number of human beings. Pythagoras might possibly have conceived his romantic philosophy of the transmigration of souls by observing the conduct of a pack of hounds. With this idea it did not take us long to decide that an old gray-nosed, scalp-furrowed dog sitting moodily by himself possessed the departed spirit of an old Indian warrior. He certainly possessed the dignity of a sachem, and the furrows about his eyes and mouth gave evidence of a world of hard thinking. In vain impertinent mosquitoes and evil-minded yellow jackets insulted his nostrils: a scarcely perceptible flap of his ear is all the notice he deigns to take, considering the many troubles he has passed through, of such petty annoyances. Look at his benevolent eye as he watches the wantonness of some young hound that is wasting his strength in endeavoring to make up an exciting race with "Frisolous Feather," or provoke a wrestle with another puppy about his own age. In the shade of the old magnolia yonder, in an uneasy attitude, is "Triton." He was thus named, I was told by a classical friend at my elbow, on account of his musical note. He is a fine animal, but unintellectual and ill-natured; foremost in the van his trumpet tongue rings merrily; but he seems to pursue the game with malicious intent, and as the alarmed foe flies before him, he rejoices over the warm scent that promises a death-gripe on the victim's throat. "Triton," in fact, never is other than vicious; but when his work is done, unexcited and cool as a butcher, he surveys his work with eyes as expressionless as lead, though the foreshadowed snarl about his lip illy conceals his teeth. His ancestors, we were informed, came from Cuba. Approach him with kind words and he sneaks away: having performed his duty he prefers to be alone. How unlike is that beautiful creature "Fanny," already alluded to in the notice of the chase. She is all life and animation, kind and companionable with all. In the sociality of her disposition she thrusts herself delicately upon your notice, and a kind word seems absolutely to inspire her with gratitude. Her mischief, too, was paramount; for while we watched her she roused the soul of "Triton" to anger by her pranks, and when he dashed at her she would leap for safety among the group of hunters. Among the outer circle of dogs we observed one rejoicing under the name of "Terror." Indian fashion, he was christened after he had showed his character. He was the bully and rowdy among his kind. He only keeps well up in running; but when the game is to be seized then he puts forth all his strength, gets the first bite, and at the conclusion, if not immediately interfered with, will whip off the surrounding dogs, and alone take charge of the game.

Dinner was finally announced, and reposing Oriental fashion on the soft carpet of grass, or by arranging a first-rate seat with a propped-up saddle, we partook of the various viands, prominent among which were cold chicken and dainty ham sandwiches, most artistically tempered by exquisite claret and sparkling Champagne. Commend us, indeed, to a rural feast with the fox-hunters, particularly if we desire a reminiscence from which to date common events of passing life. The substantial part of the meal discussed, there followed a lively and characteristic gossip, that was as sparkling as the wine. Among the many good things we heard that day, most of which were greatly dependent upon the manner of their relation for half their merit, we presume to give the

STORY OF THE IMPERTURBABLE WITNESS.

"Some years ago," said our narrator, who had a very twinkling eye, and durable red color on the end of his nose, "some legal business caused me to sojourn for a few days in a little neighboring town, which, though now boasting of a numerous population, was at the time of which I speak possessed of but little more than a rude court-house, a tavern, and blacksmith shop. The only active life the place ever witnessed was at 'court term,' and our reminiscences even at this moment are vivid that we found our time any thing but heavy on our hands. The judge who presided upon the bench was a man of superior character; familiar with the world and with the members of the bar; altogether superior to the rude surroundings with which they were associated: the contrast, therefore, between the members of the profession and the permanent residents in the vicinity was necessarily very striking.

"At the time of which I speak, a man by the name of Parker, one of the local dignitaries, had been sued upon an open account which he denied owing, and it rested upon the plaintiff, Glass, to prove the indebtedness.

"A queer sort of genius named Brimlon, who made a precarious living by hunting and doing odd jobs as occasion required, was subpoenaed by Glass as his witness.

"The proceedings of the Court were conducted, as might be supposed, in rather a familiar way; the judge, though a man of great natural firmness, was very little disposed to be very exacting in his demands upon the enforcement of mere forms, and so long as no legal principle was invaded and his dinner hour not interfered with by business, every thing was as cozy and comfortable as possible.

"After a day of more than usual excitement, when there had really been something before the Court which called forth legal acumen in the pleadings, having put the judge up to his metal; in other words, after a hard day's work had been performed, and judge, lawyers, attending jurymen, and witnesses had really become fatigued and hungry, as the judge was on the point of ordering an adjournment of the Court, the landlord of the tavern having openly announced in court that a dinner of fat venison was on the table, at the particular moment Mr. Sharp, Glass's lawyer, rose and said:

"May it please your Honor, my client, Mr. Glass, wishes to prove an account. The only witness in the case is present, if the Court please to hear the testimony, which will but consume a moment.'

"The judge, impatient as he was for the dinner, hesitated for a moment, and consented. The case was called, 'Glass vs. Parker;' the witness Brimlon was put on the stand, the lawyers and spectators stood around hats in hand; the judge in the act of leaving the Court had actually put on his hat, and removed it to hear the testimony which would only 'take a moment.'

"Brimlon, meantime, was duly sworn, and asked in a familiar way what he knew about the disputed account; but instead of promptly answering he stood still, looked severely and reprovingly at the spectators who were bustling about, and finally, by staring all present into silence, the judge absolutely settling back in his chair as if suddenly impressed with the idea that he too must be profoundly attentive. This having been accomplished, Brimlon commenced as follows:

"It was a beautiful evening—I shall never forget that evening. The sun was setting in the west, where there was a very curious cloud, funnel-shaped, with a large head to it, and then sort o' coming down to a little eend—it was, in fact, a rail beautiful evening—'

"When the witness had proceeded thus far, the counsel for the defense, much to the gratification of all present, pettishly exclaimed,

"Mr. Brimlon, we do not wish to know any thing about the "beautiful evening" or any thing of the sort; please tell us what you know about this account—at the same time rudely shoving Parker's bill into the witness's face. At this gross breach of decorum on the part of the lawyer Brimlon showed no resentment, but after remaining silent a minute or more, with increased impressiveness he began:

"It was a beautiful evening—I shall never forget that evening. The sun was setting in the west, where there was a very curious cloud, funnel-shaped, with a large head to it, and then sort o' coming down to a little eend—it was, in fact, a rail beautiful evening, and I thought I mought as well go a huntin', so says I, "Boss"—you know Boss: he is a short-tailed dog with crop ears, and as good a dog as any in the country—so having called up Boss, and found he was all right, I got down my gun (it's about thirty inches in the bar'l), and thought I'd ile the locks, though they work like hair-tiggers; so I iled the locks and started for the stubble-field, owned by old Squire Todman—'

"By this time the symptoms of impatience on the part of the by-standers were openly expressed, and Glass's lawyer, no longer able to restrain himself at the prolixity of his own witness, jumped on his feet and begged the judge to order Brimlon to give a more direct answer to a simple question. The judge thereupon nodded his head to the imperturbable Brimlon, who, having stopped the moment he was interrupted until perfect silence was obtained, began:

"It was a beautiful evening—I shall never forget that evening. The sun was setting in the west, where there was a very curious cloud, funnel-shaped, with a large head to it, and then sort o' coming down to a little eend—it was, in fact, a rail beautiful evening, and I thought I mought as well go a huntin', so says I, "Boss"—you know Boss; he is a short-tailed dog with crop ears, and as good a dog as any in the country—so having called up Boss, and found he was all right, I got down my gun (it's about thirty inches in the bar'l), and thought I'd ile the locks, though they work like hair-tiggers; so I iled the locks and started for the stubble-field, owned by old Squire Todman—the one he was going to build the gin-house on, but didn't—well, after walking 'bout a while, with Boss jest a little ahead, his ears forward, and his tail (what's left of it) a waggin', what should I do but tumble over by catching my foot in some long grass, which acted like a shin hopple—but 'twas no use, and I was going to give up the hunt, when I seed ahead a partridge, just beyond a stump, a pluming himself in the old dry ravine that takes across the road—whereat says I—'

"At this moment the landlord rushed into the court-room and announced that the venison was getting cold (it was a December day), and wanted to know, 'if the Court wouldn't adjourn soon, if he hadn't better put the saddle down by the fire.' At this interruption Brimlon again stopped, rolled his large vacant eyes over on the landlord, and after the restoration of a fearful silence proceeded:

"It was a beautiful evening—I shall never forget that evening. The sun was setting in the west, where there was a very curious cloud, funnel-shaped, with a large head to it, and then sort o' coming down to a little eend—it was, in fact, a rail beautiful evening, and I thought I mought as well go a huntin', so says I, "Boss"—you know Boss; he is a short-tailed dog with crop ears, and as good a dog as any in the country—so having called up Boss, and found he was all right, I got down my gun (it's about thirty inches in the bar'l), and thought I'd ile the locks, though they work like hair-tiggers; so I iled the lock and started for the stubble-field, owned by old Squire Todman—the one he was going to build the gin-house on, but didn't—well, after walking 'bout a while, with Boss jest a little ahead, his ears forward, and his tail (what's left of it) a waggin', what should I do but tumble over by catching my foot in some long grass, which acted like a shin hopple—but 'twas no use, and I was going to give up the hunt, when I seed ahead a partridge, just beyond a stump, a pluming himself in the old dry ravine that takes across the road—whereat says I, Boss, says I, do you see that bird? and I'll be hanged if the dog didn't come to a pint. At this I lied down, and cropt along, sometimes flat and sometimes on my knees, but along I crept, Boss all the while lying low; by-and-by I cum up to the partridge, and if it wasn't after all a piece of red bark I'm blowed! Whereupon I brushed the smashed grass and mud off my knees and elbers, and says I, Boss—'

"The pressure had now become fearful, and there was a spontaneous movement among the crowd, some members of it going so far as to cough and scrape their feet, when the judge, evidently desirous to facilitate proceedings, very courteously leaned forward and begged that the witness would be allowed to tell his story in his own way. Brimlon hereat quietly turned toward the bench, and clearing his voice said:

"'It was a beautiful evening—'

"At the repetition of this statement the judge fell back exhausted, and putting on a severe expression, delivered himself thus:

"'Gentlemen, I beg that you will not interrupt the witness; I ask this as a personal favor. The witness will please go on.' At this hint Brimlon smiled benignly, as if he were conferring a great favor on the bench, the lawyers, and the spectators, and then with a voice sweeter and slower than ever, and amidst a stillness that was to the last degree painful, he proceeded:

"'It was a beautiful evening—I shall never forget that evening. The sun was setting in the west, where there was a very curious cloud, funnel-shaped, with a large head to it, and then sort o' coming down to a little eend—it was, in fact, a rail beautiful evening, and I thought I mought as well go a huntin', so says I, "Boss"—you know Boss; he is a short-tailed dog with crop ears, and as good a dog as any in the country—so having called up Boss, and found he was all right, I got down my gun (it's about thirty inches in the bar'l), and thought I'd ile the locks, though they work like hair-tiggers; so I iled the locks and started for the stubble-field, owned by old Squire Todman—the one he was going to build the gin-house on, but didn't—well, after walking 'bout a while, with Boss jest a little ahead, his ears forward, and his tail (what's left of it) a waggin', what should I do but tumble over by catching my foot in some long grass, which acted like a shin hopple—but 'twas no use, and I was going to give up the hunt, when I seed ahead a partridge, just beyond a stump, a pluming himself in the old dry ravine that takes across the road—whereat says I, Boss, says I, do you see that bird? and I'll be hanged if the dog didn't come to a pint. At this I lied down, and cropt along, sometimes flat and sometimes on my knees, but along I crept, Boss all the while lying low; by-and-by I cum up to the partridge, and if it wasn't after all a piece of red bark I'm blowed! Whereupon I brushed the smashed grass and mud off my knees and elbers, and says I, Boss, if we ain't a passel of darned fools, then your tail's a yard long, if it ain't longer; whereat, I got out of the field in double quick time, and clomb over into the road, and met Parker (turning toward the defendant), who said to me, says he, "What, Brimlon, you out hunting?" And I said, "Not much"—so Parker and I walked up the road, and he said he jest seen Glass, who threatened to sue him for his bill of twenty dollars; that while he didn't deny owing the bill, he didn't like to be sued.'

"The truth was out at last, and the painfully excited crowd fairly shouted with delight—the lawyers at the same time rubbed their hands, and the judge heaved a deep sigh, as if he were suddenly relieved of a fearful responsibility. In the general confusion that followed Brimlon was energetically invited down from the stand by a dozen voices; and to this day it is a marvel among all who heard his testimony how he necessarily connected the beautiful evening, the partridge hunt, and the fact that he heard Parker acknowledge that he owed Glass money on an open account."

The end of the "testimony" having been finally reached, the listeners felt the same relief that was enjoyed by the original hearers; for there was at the conclusion of it a simultaneous movement toward the horses, and a few moments only were now required to turn our faces homeward. After but little riding we came suddenly upon the highway, which pursuing, one volunteer hunter after another left, until our party was narrowed down to our host and his especial guests. Winding pleasantly along, we were joined by a young lady companion who had spent the afternoon at a neighboring plantation, and there awaited her escort. For her sake a brisk gait was adopted, and to reach the end of our journey in the least possible time we took a cut across the fields, a negro riding ahead to "let down the fences or bars," as our route required. Coming to a gate, our host opened and held it to let the party through, the rolling ride of the fox-hunt being now dispensed with. Advantage was taken of this circumstance by the gentlemen, but our fair lady companion gallantly leaped the fence, and landing among the astonished crowd, with a ringing laugh started off at a brisk gallop, at which pace we soon reached our place of destination.

The red fox is supposed to have been imported from England to the eastern shore of Maryland, and to have emigrated across the ice to Virginia in the severe winter of 1779-80, at which time the Chesapeake was frozen over. In 1789 the first red fox we have any record of in the locality was killed in Pennsylvania. A few years previous to this, one of the colonial governors of New York had imported some red foxes from England, which were turned loose on Long Island: it is supposed that the same cold weather that froze over the Chesapeake united Long Island to the main land, and thus enabled the red fox to escape its original locality. The fact, however, is that the fox is a very good swimmer, at least along the shores, as is shown in their "duck hunts," and it is possible that they do not need a bridge of ice to make way from one distant place to another, even if rivers intervene. Very good observers believe that the red fox is a native of the soil; but this does not seem justifiable from the fact that he is only found in districts of country long settled by man. As he works his way southward, driving before him the gray fox, he is never found in the pine-barrens or the solitary wilderness; but in the settled portions of the country, where thickets, brier patches, and old sedge fields are common, which are only to be found where the farmer pursues his calling, the red fox is comparatively abundant.

In reviewing the history of the red and gray fox throughout the entire country, it would seem:

OVER THE FENCE.

that they vary in strength and sagacity in different sections. In Florida the gray fox is thought to be almost worthless for the chase; farther north the same species are very game, and afford most excellent amusement. It is also evident that the red fox of Georgia is a superior animal to his representatives in the Northern States. It is very evident from these facts that the creature is somewhat dependent upon localities for his true development.

How long a fox will run, or the exact speed he will attain to, are questions not easily answered. A red fox in Virginia was started, and by putting fresh packs of hounds on his track, was run over fifty miles, and is then supposed to have escaped. At Muirsham, England, a fox was unkenneled at half past eight o'clock in the morning, and was hard pressed until three o'clock in the afternoon, in which time he ran over sixty miles. The horses in the run finally gave out, and the hunters followed to the death on foot. In February, 1849, a very old fox ran from Stovill's Hill, England, to Dorking Glory, a measured distance of forty-five miles, in less than five hours. It has been asserted, and is believed by experienced hunters, that a pack of superior hounds, led by a fox, have, in the excitement, at times run a mile in sixty seconds, surpassing the best speed of the horse.

A volume might be filled with anecdotes and incidents illustrative of the sagacity of Reynard; a few, taken indiscriminately from the mass, must suffice. A famous fox-hunting region was once thrown into a great state of excitement from the following cause: There was a certain old field of great extent, near the middle of which one could almost any morning start a gray fox. After a chase of an hour or so, just enough to "blow" well the dogs and horses, they would invariably lose the fox at a given spot, near the fence corner of a large plantation, which opened into the heavy forest which partially surrounded this old field. The frequency and certainty of this event happening became well known in the vicinity. Finally, fox-hunters from distant neighborhoods would bring their well-trained packs to have a run after this mysterious animal, in the hope of finding an explanation to the mystery. But, strange as it appeared, all were baffled alike. The interest now became intense, and numbers of experienced hunters made personal and critical examination of the vicinity, but found nothing to justify, or in any way suggest, an explanation. That the fox always escaped at a well-known place, where every thing was in open view, was certain; and that it must have been in some way along the fence, seemed the only possible solution. To test the theory, a large pack was made to follow round the entire inclosure of the fence, but without striking the trail.

The affair now reached a climax of excitement. The reputation of the hunters began to suffer, and the hounds themselves finally showed that their confidence was giving way, for they would not run with the stanch eagerness that formerly characterized them. The fact of their being so often baffled had created the idea that they would never shake poor Reynard again; while many persons grew superstitious that he was a wizard, who could become invisible when he pleased.

At last an enthusiastic hunter, who had great faith in the tangibility of the fox, and was also a believer in natural laws, determined that he would anticipate the arrival of the fox at the fence corner, and see how he managed to escape. Accordingly, when, on the next hunt, he was satisfied the animal was heading for the indicated spot, the hunter reached it by a short cut and posted himself a sentinel. Presently the fox came leisurely along a little in advance of the pack. When he reached the corner the hunter, in almost breathless excitement, noticed the creature deliberately make his way to the top of the fence, and then, as if confident of his safety, walk along, daintily balancing himself with the airs of a tight-rope dancer. On he went until he reached the forest trees in which the hunter was concealed. The fox now became cautious, cast a look behind, and saw that the pack was almost within death-dealing distance. No time was to be lost. Running forward so as to obtain momentum, he came opposite a dead and leaning tree, which stood isolated and inside of the field, within sixteen feet of the fence. This unguarded and prominent object he reached by a bound, confirming his hold by striking his fore-paws beyond a protruding knot; the next instant he ascended to the top, some thirty feet from the ground, and disappeared. The hunter's admiration for the intelligence of the animal made him keep the secret, and for a long time he enjoyed his neighbors' speculations and theories, until another hunter suspected the real cause, found out the secret, and avenged his frequent disappointments by cutting down the tree and capturing the smart fox. The hiding-place had often been noticed, but to leap the distance it stood from the fence was never thought to be possible; but practice, the favorable angle of the trunk, the position of the knot to assist the foothold, formed a combination of favorable circumstances that enabled the cunning creature to overcome what appeared at first sight to be a physical impossibility.

A number of half-grown boys, assisted by a dog, unearthed a fox and apparently killed it. The body was carried home, and thrown carelessly in a corner of the room while the party partook of supper. Reynard, seeing his enemies busily engaged, ventured to reconnoitre, and for this purpose cautiously raised himself on his fore-legs; but deeming it unsafe to do more, resumed his quiescent state. One of the party, who witnessed the movement, but unwilling, under the circumstances, to believe his own eyes, very deliberately passed a piece of lighted paper under the fox's nose; but the animal remained as insensible as a log, and was by universal consent pronounced very dead, much to the mystification of the person who could not resist the idea that he had seen the fox rise on his fore-legs and look about the room. The next morning, however, the animal, bating a slight wound and a soiled coat, was found in good health—his power of deception proving powerful enough to suppress the pain of twenty ordinary deaths.

On one occasion a fox, surprised in a hen-house, simulated death with such exactness that the owner of the slaughtered poultry thought the thief had died from a surfeit, and after kicking the stiffened body rudely about the floor, picked it up by the tail and threw it on the dunghill: a moment afterward master fox gathered up his legs and made good his escape.

A fox had been pursued near Edgefield, South Carolina, but the hounds lost all trace of him invariably upon the side of a hill. A gentleman, determined to solve the mystery, found that the fox after starting would lead the pack a pretty smart race in the neighborhood, get them warm and excited, and would then run to the top of the hill; descending slowly until he reached midway, when he would lie down; meantime the dogs, flushed and eager, would have their natural speed accelerated by the descending grade, and they would almost literally run over as well as past the object of their pursuit, never perceiving that they had lost the trail until they precipitated themselves into the valley below. As soon as this happened the fox would rouse himself, cast a furtive glance behind, to be sure of the position of his enemies, and run away in an opposite direction with the greatest speed.

Just after daylight a gentleman once observed a fox walking very stealthily along the borders of a farm; he looked very anxiously over the wall into the field, and seemed to long very much to get hold of one of the hares feeding in it, which he knew he could not catch by running. After reflecting a short time he seemed to form his plans. He first examined the different gaps in the wall, fixed upon one that seemed to be the most frequented, and then laid down as a cat would at a mouse-hole. He then, with great care and silence, scraped a small hollow in the ground, throwing up a barricade as a kind of screen, meantime, however, keeping up a most cautious examination of the adjoining field. When all this was accomplished he laid himself down in a convenient posture for springing on his prey. When the sun was fairly up the hares began to pass out of the field, but not within reach from his ambush. Presently two came directly toward him; he did not look up; the involuntary motion of his ears showed, however, that he knew of their approach. The hares came through the gap together; with the quickness of lightning he caught one and killed it; but unhappily for his length of days, the observant hunter now fired his gun, and fox and hare lay dead beside each other.

OLLY DOLLY.

I.

A HOT, starry night, whose light is a crescent moon, whose voice is low lapping of surfless waves upon a sandy shore. A long flat line of beach, lost at either end in gloom, the unknown past and future. A little black cabin crouching among sea-worn boulders, its front hoar with the spray-salt, its roof thatched with sea-weed, its frame back-borne by the untiring ocean breeze.

Such is the scene. Here are the actors.

An old man, bowed and warped with years and toil. His lint-white hair falling thin and spiritless upon his shoulders; his horny hands, with fingers crooked and stunted through life-long hardship, pressed upon his face; his attitude one of deep thought, uneasiness, doubt.

A young man, tall, straight, and lithe. His arms lightly folded across his chest; his handsome head, covered only with close-curling chestnut hair, proudly uplifted to the starry sky; his eyes, bright and keen, fixed upon the sleeping sea; one foot advanced toward the shallow sliding waves, as if he said, "Thus far!"

They are Peter Rynders, commonly called "Fishing Pete," and his son Saul. They are fishermen and boatmen, and in summer live principally by the custom of the fashionable hotel and boarding-houses three miles farther down the beach (for this is the coast of New Jersey, and a great resort for pleasure seekers).

In winter the young man has for several years taken service as a sailor in the coasting craft of the region, has tried the revenue service, and is prominent among the crew of a subscription life-boat, who have done more good on that stormy coast than many more famous societies of philanthropists.

While he is gone the old man hibernates; subsists by means of salted fish and drift-wood, and spends the time between dozing, smoking, and studying the almanac. His one other book, a Bible, lies untouched upon the shelf since "Mother Rynders" died, and is regarded by "Fishing Pete" as a sort of fetich, with unbounded and mysterious powers for good or evil, and like gunpowder and edge-tools, best let alone by those unskilled in its use.

And now let us listen to their talk beneath the starlight.

"Fishing Pete" is the first to speak, and his manner is hesitating and ill-assured, like one who feels his ground with trivial remarks before expressing the chief subject of his thoughts.

"Did you have a good sail to-day, Saul?"

"Good enough. I went outside the point, round Duck Ledge, and so back to the landing."

"Them Silsbys are very clever folks, ain't they?"

"I don't know," replied Saul, curtly.

"Why, I mean they're civil spoken to them as works for 'em, and free with their money inter the bargain."

"They're civil to me, so am I to them. They pay me for the use of my boat and my time, and I earn all they give me," returned Saul, in a tone of annoyance.

"Sartain, sartain, that's what I was a saying," rejoined the father, in a soothing tone, for his son's moods were nothing strange to him. "The gal—Vi'let they call her—is a pooty piece, ain't she?" resumed Pete, absently, after a short pause.

"Good Heavens, father!" exclaimed Saul, angrily striding up and down the beach in front of the low rock where the old man crouched. "What are the Silsbys—what is Miss Silsby—to you or to me, and why should we spend our breath in talking about her or them? Let's talk about the stars, or the sea, or that speck of white sail on the sky-line. There's as much chance, and more, of their caring for us, and talking about us back, as there is of those people doing it. Do you suppose they ever spoke or thought of us in all these two summers as any thing more than part of the rigging of the boat—something without which it wouldn't go, and so they must try to keep it in running order with a pleasant word now and then, or a little extra money? Not that ever I took any thing more than my pay—but it's been offered."

"Well, well, boy, I didn't mean no harm. I didn't know you was so sot against 'em. 'Fact, I thought you kind o' liked 'em, you've ben out with 'em so much. But sure 'nough I don't know as we've any call in pertikeler to talk about 'em. There's 'nough else we ken talk about. We might talk 'bout ourselves. There's a lot a man ken say 'bout himself ef so be he's a mind to. Eh, Saul?"

"You ain't lucky to-night, father," returned the son, still gloomily, although he spoke more kindly. "There's nothing but the Silsbys I hadn't rather talk about than about myself. There's nothing in my life, outside or in, that I want either to speak or think of more than I can help."

"Sho! you hadn't oughter say so, boy," replied the father, shuffling his bare feet uneasily in the sand. "What's amiss 'tween you and life?"

"Every thing."

"Every thin'! Well, now, Saul, I think we're pooty tol'ably comf'able. We get good hire fer the boat, and I ken sell all the fish I ketch."

"We earn enough to buy food and clothes from year to year, and we spend it. Where are we better at the year's end than at its beginning? What are we working for, and what's going to be the end of our work?" asked the young man, impatiently.

"Why, I do suppose, Saul," returned Pete, slowly and meditatively, "if so be as folks—that's poor folks like us—can manage to live, that's as much as they ken expect."

"Live! And what's the good of living, if living is the end of life?" queried Saul, bitterly; and without waiting for a reply, strode moodily down the beach.

When he returned he seemed in a calmer mood, and said, pleasantly,

"Well, father, 'most time to turn in if you're going out on the morning tide, isn't it?"

"Yes, yes, I know, Saul; but there's somethin' I want to talk about while I ken. Some-hows I feel a kind o' down-hearted to-night, like as I wasn't a goin' to live long."

"What is it, father; what ails you? You hadn't ought to work so hard. Stay at home to-morrow, and let me go out for the fish. I shall be back time enough to take the party out sailing."

"No, no, boy, it ain't that. I'm hearty enough, as fur as that goes, an' able to do my day's work with any man, leastways of my age.
But somehow I feel by turns as if sunthin' was a goin' to happen."

"Something's always happening, father," said Saul, cheerily. "But I don't believe any thing bad's going to happen to you. Why should you think so?"

"Well, I can't rightly say, Saul, my boy, but I do think so; and—there ain't no use o' beatin' up to wind'ard any longer—I'll just 'bout ship and run afore the wind. I've got sunthin' on my mind as I wants to git off."

"Something on your mind, father?"

"Yes, boy. Sunthin' about you, too."

"About me! What can there be to say of me that should lie heavy on your mind?"

"Well, boy, I donno whether it'll be good news or bad to you—sometimes I reckon one, sometimes t'other; but the fact is, you ain't my son nowadays."

"What! you mean that my mother was false?"

"I donno nothin' 'bout your mother, nor your father nuther. Leastways I'll tell you all I do know. But the fust thing is, you ain't no child of mine nor my woman's."

"Whose then?" asked Saul, breathlessly.

"Hold on, lad, and I'll tell 'ee all I know. It were—lemme see, it were three-an'-twenty year ago come next March, and I were faring home afoot from York, where I'd landed after a v'y'ge I'd made down South in a lumber craft. It was 'bout thirty mile above this that I foun' myself obleeged to lay by a day 'count of the most tre-menjous gale of wind and rain that had been seed in them parts fer many a day. It lasted three days, and the fust two I did manage to beat up somehow; but the third was the beat of all the wind that ever I see, and I wa'n't ashamed to lay to under it in a little fishing hamlet—Clam Cove I b'lieve they called it—over one day and night. That night there was two wracks, one a little above, an' one a little below the town, an' every thin' that had legs in them dozen houses was out looking at one or t'other of 'em."

"As fer the one to the nor'ard I donno nothing 'bout it, what sort of craft she were, nor where she hailed from, nor whether any one was saved; but the one to the s'uth'ard was a middlin'-sized brig, hailin' from the West Injies, and bound for York. She struck on a reef some ways out from shore, and in half an hour she went all to pieces, and arter that most every wave washed up a spar or a timber, or a box or a cask, or the drowned corpse of a feller-creeter.

"There wa'n't but little that could 'a ben done to help 'em, and that little wa'n't done.
What few folks was round seemed to think more o' helpin' theirselves to what was washed ashore than helpin' them poor sailors to get back the breath o' life, s'posin' it could 'a ben done."

"Well, I staid round on the shore all night, an' when it come mornin' I felt so kind o' sick and put out with what I'd seed, that I jest shouldered my bundle an' sot off on my tramp.
I couldn't somehow stomach to eat another meal
o' vittles in the place. I felt as if the cuss o'
God would light on it right away, an' I'd best be out of it. So I went my ways, and hed got mayhap a mile out'n the place, when, as I was coastin' along the land side of a big black rock,
I heerd sunthin' like a groan, an' then the v'ice of a leetle child a cryin'."

"Well, at that I hove to, an' begun to reconn'itre a bit. 'Twa'n't long 'fore I diskivered a poor creeter stowed away under the lee of the rocks, where he'd crawled out'n the surf, though he couldn't get no further."

"He was a dark-complected, middle-aged man, and I know'd by his white hands, and his ring, and his fine clothes, that he was a gen'- leman, though I couldn't make out a word he said, nor he didn't seem to make no hand o' my jaw.
He had a babby—leastways you was about two year old, I should say—"

"Then it was me!" exclaimed Saul.

"Yes, it wor you, and the gen'leman wor your daddy, as I've alluz consaited, fer he seemed mortal fond of you, an' kep' a hugging an' a kissing of you over and over agin; an' then he'd jabber away in his furrin way, an' look at me, an' hold you up toward me well's he could, fer the poor creeter 'd got a mortal hurt on them rocks, an' was a dyin' by inches, as it wor, all the time he talked."

"Oh—father!" groaned Saul.

"An' then he'd h'ist up well's he could, an' look up an' down an' fur an' near, an' then he'd hail some one by the name of Oliver agin an' agin, till he'd lop back agin the rocks with the blood a runnin' out'n his mouth, an' his face all kivered with sweat, though the wind was pipin' up from the nor'ard as cold as Greenland."

"But Oliver didn't answer to the hail. I expect the poor feller 'd gone to Davy Jones afore; an' who he wor, and what the furriner wanted on him, I couldn't make out then nor
now. On'y, arter he'd sung out the last time, an' 'fore his stren'th was a leavin' of him, he looked up to me so earnest like, it seemed 's if there wa'n't no need o' words to say what he meant, an' he pintoed to you, an' then he pintoed up an' down the beach, an' says, very solemn,

"'Oliver, Oliver!' An' by that I know'd he meant that ef so be as I could overhaul this

Oliver I was to give you up to him, so I wags my head, and I says in my turn,

"‘Yes, Oliver, Oliver!’ and I pints all abroad, and then I pints to you, an’ he wagged his head, an’ seemed to feel easier.

"‘But arter layin’ back a while an’ restin’, he seemed to git oneasy agin, an’ arter a deal o’ tryin’ he got his han’ inter one of his pockets an’ lugs out a money puss. He tried agin an’ agin to open it, but he couldn’, an’ finally I up an’ did it fer him; but I didn’ look inside, on’y ondid it, an’ give it back.

"‘He jabbered sunthin’ that I s’pose was the same as thank’ee, an’ then he poured out what money there was inter my han’, and made signs I was to pocket it. I tuck it, but on’y hild it, and says ‘Oliver’ agin, an’ pints to you, meanin’ I should give it up to that ere shipmate ‘long o’ you. But the furriner shook his head kind o’ impatient, an’ made signs that give me to understand that Oliver had a deal o’ money with him wheresomever he mout be, and that all he’d got was yourn by rights. An’ then he pinto to his rings an’ to his watch with a goold chain, and signed that I was to take them fer you. So I tuck ‘em all, an’ put ‘em in the puss, an’ pinto to you, and gives him to know I consaited them things as yourn.

"‘He looked satisfied then, an’ tuck to his prayers, an’ ‘fore he’d done o’ them, his head fell back, an’ he was gone.”

"‘Dead!’

"‘Yes, lad, dead.”

"‘Well—go on.”

"‘Ay, ay, lad, though there ain’t much more to tell. The poor gen’leman was dead, and that pesky Oliver wa’n’t now’eres to be seen; so I scooped a hole in the sand under the lee o’ that big rock, an’ kivered up your daddy in it. Then I tuck you, all wrapped up as you wor in a shawl, and got under way agin fer home. I know’d Sally ‘u’d be glad to see you, fer we’d never had a young one, an’ it’s woman’s nater to hanker arter ‘em; so I pushed along, on’y stoppin’ onst to feed you with some biscuit an’ grog, that sent you fast asleep, till just at nightfall I sighted the cabin. As I’d reckoned, the old ‘oman was tickled to death with sech a harnsome babby to keep her company whiles I was away, an’ ‘twas she give you the name o’ Saul.”

"‘Didn’t my father give me any name—or himself?”

"‘He mout ‘a told it all twicest over in his lingo, and I not ‘a ben a word the wiser. I didn’ hear no name but Oliver amongst it, an’ I wanted to call you that, but the ‘ooman wouldn’ hear to it. I consaited she was afeard it mout be the means of your being claimed away from her.”

"‘She was the kindest of women; no mother could have been more tender,” said Saul, musingly. “But your idea was the best, old man. You too—you have been a father to me; you have stood in his place who lies below that lonely rock. How can I show my gratitude, old friend? Forgive my peevish temper, my discontent; you see now how it was. This life is not the one I ought to lead, and I could not content myself. But how is it to be changed to the right one? Did you never hear of the person, my father called Oliver?”

"‘No, I never did, lad. To be sure I never tried. Sally was glad to keep you, and so was I; and nothin’ never took me to that place agin, an’ so I never went.”

"‘But I will—to-morrow.”

"‘I sha’n’t gainsay that. You’re yer own master now, my boy; but you an’ me alluz be good friends—eh, Saul?”

"‘More—more than friends. You shall be my father still, and I will be a better son than ever I was yet!” exclaimed the younger man, wringing the hand of his elder with affectionate cordiality; but still there was a something come between them—a new relation felt by each, though not confessed by either even to himself. The reputed son had suddenly become elevated above the reputed father by the consciousness on either side that Saul was fitted both by nature and birth for a position very different from any to which “Fishing Pete” could possibly aspire.

There was thus a sort of deference on the part of the elder man, a slight shade of condescension on that of the younger, mingled with the sincere affection existing between them in all their future intercourse.

After a while Pete silently rose and went into the cabin, where, having struck a light, he rummaged for some time in an old sea-chest, containing the wardrobe of the deceased Mrs. Rynders. From this he at last produced, and silently placed in the hands of Saul, who had followed him, a small mahogany box, with the key attached.

The young man hastily opened it. Within lay various little trinkets and bits of finery, the former property of Rynders’s wife. But under these Saul soon perceived a small parcel, done up in white paper and rudely sealed. Without was scrawled in an illiterate hand the one word, “Saul.”

A look at the old man sufficed to confirm the brief assurance thus given, and Saul hastily tore open the packet.

Within lay a faded purse of crimson velvet, clasped with gold, and showing, in embroidery of gold thread upon its sides, a heraldic device.

Merely glancing at this, which the young man, in his ignorance of such matters, supposed to be a mere ornament, he hastily opened the purse, and poured out its contents upon his hand. These were an infant’s necklace, curiously combined of coral and gold beads, fastened by a gold clasp, showing the same arms as the purse; and two rings, one a large and magnificent diamond, the other a seal ring of agate, beautifully engraved with the familiar device.

"‘Them was on his hand, and the beads was round your neck,” said Pete, quietly.

"‘On his hand!” repeated Saul, softly, as he looked at the rings with eyes full of tears.

"‘Yes. Then there was the watch and chain.

I kep' them fer years, Saul, boy, an' should 'a kep' 'em till now; but you know the hard winter, when you was ten year old, an' I wor laid up three months with the rheumatiz fever? Then it wor sold."

"Right, father. You could do no less. I am glad, though, you kept the rings he wore, and this necklace. What does this thing mean on the catch? It's just like the picture on the ring; and here again it's worked on the purse."

"That's wot they call a frock—no, a coat-o'-arms. All the big bugs over in England have 'em pictered out on their kerridges and on their silver-ware. I seed lots on 'em when I went to Liverpool in the Sairy Ann, fifteen year ago come next July."

"That proves again that he was a gentleman," said Saul to himself, while his face flushed with gratification.

"In course he was, an' so be you, Saul—a gentleman born, leastways—if only we could prove it out."

"With God's help I will prove it, old man—prove it by behaving like a gentleman, at least," said Saul, proudly, as, gathering up his treasures, he carried them away with him to the little loft where he had always slept.

The next morning "Fishing Pete," rising before the dawn, that he might take advantage of the morning tide for his fishing, left the cabin some hours before Saul appeared. Nor was the young man sorry to be thus prevented from meeting his reputed father.

The more he became accustomed to his new ideas of birth and parentage, the more distasteful grew his former life and all connected with it. Between him and Pete there had always been much kindness and indulgence on the one side, filial respect and obedience on the other; but as for great affection, sympathy, or community of feeling, these were rendered impossible by the very opposite natures of the two men; and already Saul had determined that, although Pete's welfare should always be his first care, it would be best for both that in future they should live apart.

Still the young man could not but feel that this determination, however wise, savored of ingratitude to the kind old friend who had protected his infancy, and through whom, indeed, had arisen all his new hopes and schemes; and he was well pleased with an opportunity of arranging his thoughts in solitude before encountering the unconscious object of them.

At twelve Pete had not returned; and Saul, after placing his new treasures in safety, left the cabin and set out for the little wharf near the hotel, where lay his boat, and where he expected to meet Mr. Silsby, his wife, and daughter—a family from New York, who had now for two years summered in this place, and being very fond of the water, had employed Saul as a boatman many scores of times. Wealthy, well-born, and aristocratic, it was true enough, as the young man had bitterly assured his father, that they had never in their thoughts separated the handsome young man from the boat whose perfect management they had so often admired; or if Violet Silsby had noticed that his dark eyes were wonderfully soft, when at times they met her blue ones, and that his dark hair curled most becomingly around a smooth, white forehead, or that his proud lips and scornful brows seemed ill-suited to his rank, she kept these thoughts most strictly within her own breast, and would probably, had they been brought out and exhibited to her, have most strenuously denied ever having met them before.

It so chanced, however, that when Saul appeared at the wharf the young lady was sauntering on the sands near by, and presently came toward him to inquire the nature of a rare shell she had just picked up.

Saul told her all about it, and then suggested that, as the sun was so hot, she had better sit down in the shade of the sail he had just hoisted, while waiting for her parents.

Miss Silsby complied with the advice, smiling a little haughtily at its freedom. Still, it is very pleasant to the proudest woman to feel herself "taken care of" by an individual of the other sex, who is not at all disagreeable to her, and Violet sat down meekly in the designated spot, and watched Saul as he completed some little arrangements in the forward part of the boat.

"We sha'n't have much more boating this season, I am afraid," said she, at length; "papa's business takes him home very early this year."

"I was going to tell Mr. Silsby when he came down," said Saul, pausing and looking at the young lady, "that I shall not be able to take him out again—perhaps never."

"Why shall you not?" asked Violet, in surprise.

"I am going away from here. I shall start to-morrow, or to-night," said Saul, abruptly.

"But you will be here again next summer?" inquired Miss Silsby; "my father thinks there is no one can manage a boat like you."

"Yes, I can do that well enough; perhaps, though, I can learn to do something else. I am going to try, at all events."

"What, for instance?"

"I don't know. I suppose, Miss Silsby, you can't imagine me away from my boat; I'm to you like the crabs, and the mussels, and the pebbles—part of the sea-shore," returned Saul, with an attempt at a smile.

"I have never seen you away from the sea-shore, to be sure, Mr. Rynders," said Miss Silsby, a little coldly.

"If you ever should see me in another place, and hear me called by another name than Rynders," began Saul, in an agitated voice—but just then Miss Silsby's handkerchief quietly dropped over the stern, and she exclaimed,

"Oh, my handkerchief! See, Mr. Rynders, can't you reach it with an oar? Thank you! Dear, how wet it is! I must go to the house and get another, and see where papa and mamma are that they don't come."

"Stop, Miss Silsby, if you please," said the young boatman, in a manner colder and prouder than any that Violet had ever encountered—"I am going to the house to tell Mr. Silsby that I am ready for his orders, and if you choose to send for a handkerchief, I think you may trust me to deliver the message correctly and bring the property honestly."

"Honestly!" exclaimed Violet, with a laugh; but the young boatman was already gone.

"Hurt in his sensibilities, eh?" soliloquized she, looking after him. "I'm sorry, but really he looked so very much embarrassed I didn't know what might come next. What a figure, and how finely he walks! Oh, if Van Courtlandt only had his face and form, and I might as well add, courage, and coolness, and spirit, and manliness; or if this poor Rynders had Van Courtlandt's rank, and birth, and fortune—"

Violet didn't finish her sentence, but fell into a fit of bitter musing upon the one subject where she and her indulgent parents disagreed—her acceptance of the wealthy Mr. Van Courtlandt.

In about ten minutes Mr. and Mrs. Silsby appeared, preceded by Saul, who, as he stood aside to allow them to enter the boat, said, briefly,

"I delivered your message, Miss Silsby."

"Thank you, Mr. Rynders," said Violet, kindly; but although Saul was obliged to sit close beside her in order to steer the boat, he neither looked at her nor vouchsafed more than the briefest answers to her various flattering references to his skill and experience in maritime matters: and even when she wanted to steer, and so prettily appealed to the young boatman for instruction, it was given, and the rudder placed in her hand, or from time to time resumed, as the exigencies of the boat required, all with the same formal respect and cold civility characterizing his conduct to her haughty mother.

Only as they disembarked, and Saul handed Violet from the boat after her father and mother, his fingers slightly closed around hers, his dark eyes met her blue ones as he said, in a low tone,

"Good-by, then, Miss Silsby, forever."

"Good-by, till we meet again, Mr. Rynders," said Violet, as she hastily withdrew her hand and followed her father and mother to the house, vexed to feel the blood burning in her cheeks, vexed to think she had spoken even that word of encouragement, most vexed of all to think that she should see Saul Rynders no more.

II.

On returning to the cabin Saul was somewhat surprised to find that Pete had not reached home. But as it was no very unusual thing for the old fisherman to stay out all day, and even into the night, the young man was not at all alarmed, and, after writing on a slip of paper that he should not be back for some days, he put it in a conspicuous situation, took a hasty lunch of such food as the house afforded, and set out upon his contemplated journey.

Four-and-twenty hours after find Saul seated in the porch of the little public house of Clam Cove, busily engaged in talk with a white-headed gossiping old patriarch, who was glad to exchange whatever information he might possess interesting to the young traveler for a mug of the landlord's honest old cider.

"Yes, yes," said he, "I mind that wrack well enow. It were a powerful hard blow, sure that night, and ourn wern't the on'y place 'longshore w're the folks was the richer fer that night's work. Times ain't as they used to was. That's—w'y, that's a'most five-an'-twenty year ago, that are."

"But the people—wasn't one saved out of the brig?" asked Saul, almost pleadingly.

"Nary one, young man, 'less it wor—fac' I donno but it wor out'n that wrack ole Dolly come here."

"Dolly? That's a woman's name," said Saul, with an accent of disappointment.

"Yes, Dolly's a woman's name sure enough, but this air Dolly wa'n't a woman for all that," retorted the old fellow with a wheezing chuckle. "It wor a nigger man."

"Named Dolly?"

"Yes, leastways that's wot he got to be called. He wor a furriner you see, come from the West Injies, and couldn' talk no English, an' w'en we tried to git at his name he called it Olly Dolly as near's we could make out. So Olly Dolly it wor, till in the course o' time it got cut down to Dolly, an' then Dolly it wor till the day of his death."

"Dead! Is he dead?"

"In course he is, young man. He worn't no chicken w'en he come here, an' that's five-an'-twenty year ago I tell you. He died much as ten year ago, Dolly did."

"Where did he live?"

"Off there in the pine barrens, 'bout a mild. There was a hut then sot up by the tar-makers, an' he lived in that, an' worked by spells fer them. Arter they left these parts he used to scratch along how he could, come down here an' do little jobs o' work onst in a while, but mostly he'd go hazin' up an' down shore, a talkin' to hisself an' peekin' roun' into all the holes an' corners among the rocks. He alluz acted like a man that's lost summat as was better nor gold to him, that poor nig did."

"And didn't he ever tell what?"

"How do you suppose he wor a goin' fer to tell, w'en he couldn' talk no English, young man?" asked the patriarch, indignantly.

"But didn't he learn English?" asked Saul.

"Nothin' to signify. He wor a queer chap—didn't seem to care nothin' fer nobody—didn't come amongst folks enough to larn if he'd ever so good a mind to, an' I alluz mistrusted he didn't want to larn. He couldn't abear to be talked to much even by signals, an' ef so be any one sot out to converse wi' him, he'd scuttle off to the beach, faster'n ever you see a turkle make tracks w'en the tide wor goin' out. Another curus thin' about him wor this: the tide, yer know, will by times bring up the bones of drowned men, an' lay 'em on the beach, jest as a dog brings up a stick out'n the water an' puts it at his master's feet. Well, from the fust day I riccolect Dolly till the day he died, he wor alluz on the look-out for them bones, an' w'en he foun' 'em, he'd wrap 'em up in cloth or in paper or in sea-weed, jest as he could get it, an' kirry 'em to a hole he'd dug in the grave-yard up yonder. Fust an' last, he must 'a buried bushels on 'em, an' wot he did it for, is more nor he ever told to livin' man. We sot it down fin'ly that he wor crazed."

"Most likely he had friends in the brig that brought him here, and thinking they were drowned, he gathered all the bones he found, hoping theirs were among them. Good old man!" said Saul, softly, for the devotion of the faithful creature, whom he had already decided to have been his father's servant, touched the heart of the young man.

"Mabbe so, mabbe so; but I rather consait he was cracked, an' couldn't a told wot he did it for ef he'd a ben asked," rejoined the obstinate narrator.

"Can you tell me the bearings of the hut where he lived? I should like to see it. I had friends myself in that brig, and if Dolly had lived he could most likely have told me about them. At any rate, I should like to see where he lived."

"Well, young man, that's wot I call romantic, I mus say," replied the patriarch, with a contemptuous smile. "But ef you've a mind to walk a good mild fer the sake o' looking at the four walls and a ruff of an old nigger cabin, w'y it's easy enuf findin' the way. You've on'y to keep that 'ere road till you come to a ole cart track leadin' off to the right inter the woods, an' arter you've kep that a w'ile you'll come to a clearin' of an acre or so an' the cabin sot right in the middle on't."

"Thank you, grandsire. I believe I'll goright along. There's time enough before sunset."

"Much as ever, an' you'd better see that you don't git caught there arter sundown," called the old man earnestly, as the traveler stepped off the porch, and began to move toward the woods.

"Why so?" asked he, turning and looking back with some curiosity.

"Well, there's curus things ben seen by times in them woods; and there's them as says old Dolly comes back reg'lar every night, an' sets on his door-stone, from dusk till daylight, a waitin' an' a watchin', jest as he use to wait an' watch when he was alive."

"I only wish he'd come while I am there. I believe I'll stop all night and see if he won't," returned Saul, half in jest and half in earnest, as he walked briskly away.

The day was a hot one, the pine-woods close and sultry; but Saul, his mind preoccupied with the maze of new ideas, hopes, and aspirations that had so suddenly enveloped him, hurried along, paying only so much heed to the outer world as enabled him to find the way, and arrived at the lonely clearing while the sun was yet an hour high.

The little cabin looked indeed desolate enough. The door hanging by the upper hinge stood half open, the window shutters had been torn from their hinges by some mischievous marauder, leaving the apertures they had closed staring blankly, like the empty eye-sockets of a blind man. Such humble furniture as had served old Dolly's need still remained, it is true, but in such a state of decay and confusion as made the place more desolate than empty space.

Saul stood for a while leaning his arms upon the edge of a window space, examining the interior. Then pushing open the gaping door, he entered and seated himself on the rude bench beside the hearth, where probably the old negro had sat and watched away many a lonely winter hour during his weary waiting years.

A lizard glided from the hearth, where he had basked in the sun shining through the roof all day, and disappeared in the chinks of the chimney.

Saul watched him, half wondering if so was not embodied old Dolly's spirit still watching over the trust committed to him by his dead master—still waiting for that master or his child to relieve him of it; for Saul had, after much reflection, concluded that the African, being either a slave or free servant of his father, had accompanied him from one of the West Indian Islands—perhaps Hayti—during the revolution by which the blacks of that island freed themselves, and slaughtered the white inhabitants. That for secrecy or safety the funds which were to support them in exile were confided to the charge of a negro, and that he would probably, in prospect of shipwreck, have secured his charge about his person, and thus bring it safely ashore. In the garrulous old fisherman's account of Dolly's subsequent life the young man thought to perceive not only the uneasy longing of an attached dependent, separated from the master whom he loved, but an earnest desire to restore to its rightful owner the wealth of which he was custodian. His obstinate choice of a lonely and companionless life, too, so peculiar in a negro, was attributed by Saul to the possession of an important secret, of which he was determined neither to be beguiled nor surprised.

The question of identity alone remained, and this to the young boatman's mind was sufficiently proved by the time, the coincidence of the old man's story with that of "Fishing Pete," and the extreme probability that the whimsical title of Olly Dolly was a corruption of Oliver—the name on which his father had in his dying hour so earnestly and repeatedly called.

It was therefore not merely a sentimental journey of Saul's into the sultry pine-woods that August afternoon; he had strong hopes of finding in or about the deserted cabin some hidden deposit left by the old servant, which should not only give him proof as to his name and parentage, but supply him with means of resuming the position whence he did not doubt accident had depressed him.

Sanguine as his hopes had been, Saul's first sensation on examining the interior of the cabin was one of bitter disappointment. Certainly nothing could look less like a treasure-house.

The walls, made of pine slabs nailed upon a frame of small timbers, were unfinished within, as was the low roof—evidently no hiding-place could be found there. The floor was a few boards loosely laid upon the sandy earth.

The chimney, naked and unplastered, was but of the thickness of a single brick; the hearth, that was of brick also (probably brought from a distance by the tar-makers): it was possible that something might be hidden beneath it.

A few moments sufficed for the active young man to remove the bricks, and, seizing an old shovel standing in the corner of the hut, he commenced digging.

The sun went down, and thick, sultry gloom gathered in the murky woods, and crowded into the lonely cabin. Still Saul dug on, until he had excavated nearly the whole interior of the place, and could no longer pile at the sides the sand he dug out of the middle. Still, with obstinate zeal he wrought until the dusk had become dark, and he could no longer have seen the treasure had he chanced upon it. Then reluctantly he rested, and scrambled out of the pit, now nearly as deep as he was tall.

As he did so, the shifting sand slid out from beneath the chimney, and after a momentary pause the unsupported structure gave way, and came rattling down, a confused mass of bricks, mortar, and rubbish, filling the air with dust, and nearly overwhelming Saul.

Almost before it had fallen, however, he was back among the ruins, groping in the rubbish, vainly hoping to discover what he sought in the confusion. Nothing rewarded his search, and the darkness deepened into night. With a weary sigh Saul left the hut, and stretching himself upon the warm sand without the door, laid his head upon his arm, and, soothed by the murmurs of the night-breeze in the pines, fell immediately to sleep.

Exhausted by the heat and his active exertions through the day, his rest for several hours was profound and dreamless. But after midnight the active mind of the young man resumed its supremacy, and the stars, watching him, might read in the changing hues and shadows of his upturned face, that though the body slept, the soul had waked its handmaidens Memory and Fancy, who at her bidding rehearsed, in living pictures, what had been, and what yet might be.

The dreamer saw his father stretched upon the cold sea-sand, bruised and dying. He saw himself an infant, and yet intelligently conscious of what passed. Suddenly, peering about among the rocks, appeared the stooping figure of an aged negro, whom he, the infant, recognized as Oliver, but who remained apparently invisible to his father and to Pete. Neither did Oliver appear to see the group beneath the rock, though he passed close beside and before them, and so out of sight, sighing wearily as still he searched among the rocks.

Then the scene suddenly changed, and he found himself approaching the lonely cabin in the pine-woods.

The intense light of a full moon rendered every object visible in its minutest detail, and by it he perceived the same old negro, sitting cross-legged upon his own door-stone, hugging close to his breast a packet of uncertain shape and size, whose safety he seemed to guard with jealous care.

As Saul in his dream advanced into the clearing, he was perceived by the negro, who starting to his feet with frantic demonstrations of delight, held out his packet at arm's-length toward the young man, speaking rapidly the while in an unknown tongue.

Springing forward to receive it, Saul awoke, and started to his feet.

The young moon had set, but the stars were bright and thick in the clear heaven. The low night-wind sobbed and moaned among the pines, bearing in its voice the lament of each imprisoned Dryad. Around the little clearing stood the forest and the shadows, a dense wall of darkness. In its midst the lonely and deserted hut, inhabited but by the memory of that faithful servant whose life of self-abnegation and watchful fidelity carried him above his kind, and placed him on a level with those generous brutes to whom man in his arrogance denies a soul, though he owes to them, again and again, the preservation of his own life.

Saul looked anxiously about him. More than we have told he could not see, and lying again upon the sand, now damp with night-dews, he composed himself to sleep.

Again he dreamed. Again he saw the hut in the woods beneath a brilliant moon; and as he looked old Oliver, tottering, feeble, dying, crawled from the house, and looking once wildly around at sky and woods and earth, as if with his latest powers summoning the master who had given him a trust to again receive it, he sank upon the sand, and with his head and arms reclined upon the door-stone, slept or died. Irresistibly Saul found himself drawn toward the prostrate body, until, standing close beside it, he saw that, clasped in the dead arms, and pillowing the dead face, lay the mysterious packet. He tried gently to withdraw it; but the dead man waked, and with a hollow cry snatched at it, and Saul awoke.

Trembling, and bathed in sweat, he sat upright, and looked toward the house, fancying, so strong was the illusion, that he should indeed perceive the corpse of Oliver.

By the starlight he could plainly distinguish the vacant door-stone, and a new thought suddenly shot athwart his mind.

"The door-stone!" said Saul, rising and going toward it. By the faint light, and by the touch, he found it a large irregular block of granite, such as he had noticed upon the shore about the little hamlet, and indeed it had probably been brought from thence by the builders of the cabin. It was not set in masonry, simply laid before the door; it could easily be removed and replaced by the exertions of a powerful man. Altogether it was a very probable hiding-place for the treasure of which Oliver had charge; and till the first dawn should give him light for his search, Saul paced impatiently up and down the little area, the blood tingling in his strong arms, his eyes fixed now on the dim outline of the rock, now on the eastern sky.

One hour passed, then another, and then a low bird-chirp heralded the dawn; the stars grew pale and faint, trembled, and disappeared; a gray light began to chase the shadows from beneath the pines, and Saul eagerly commenced his labor.

The first point was to remove the door-stone, and this the young man found a far more formidable labor than he had anticipated. In fact, it was only by the resolute exertion of all his young lion-strength that he could raise the stone even a few inches; and when he had it securely propped in that position, and paused for breath, he was half-inclined to abandon the attempt as useless, for if he found the task thus arduous, what must it have been to the aged and infirm negro?

"Possible or impossible, I'll look at least," muttered Saul, doggedly, as he wiped his brow and recommenced his labor; but the sun had risen before, aided by lever and props, the young man had raised the rock to a perpendicular position, and then with a vigorous shove laid it reversed upon the earth.

To extricate the shovel from the débris of the chimney was another half hour's work, and then Saul commenced digging the little spot of earth uncovered by the stone.

With rapid motion one shovelful of earth after another was thrown out until the little area had been excavated to a depth of several feet. Still no discovery, and with a bitter malediction Saul threw down his shovel, and struck his clenched hand upon his brow.

Even in that, his first moment of despair, the eyes of the young man fell upon a small corner of sail-cloth projecting from the side of the pit he had formed, about half-way between its top and bottom.

Drawing a quick, sobbing breath, he fell upon it, and with his bare hands scraped and dug away the sand around it, muttering as he did so,

"Fool! I might have known he couldn't move that great rock. He dug down close beside it, as I might have done an hour ago. Now!"

The package—a square parcel neatly enveloped in sail-cloth, tied securely with many feet of small rope—was in his grasp; and climbing out of the pit, Saul sat down upon the sand, turning his prize over and over in his hands with that dim sense of disappointment, the ever-constant companion of fruition.

"Perhaps it's nothing valuable after all," thought he, and laid it aside upon the grass while he filled up the hole he had just digged, unwilling that his researches should be surmised by the inhabitants of the village.

With the door-stone he did not attempt to meddle, nor with the ruins within; and after replacing the earth last thrown out, and smoothing its surface, he resumed the coat he had laid aside, and was ready to depart.

"Now we will see," said Saul, lifting the neglected packet from the earth and carrying it with him to a seat within the edge of the wood, the work probably of Oliver's hands.

Deliberately untying every one of the many knots, Saul slowly unwound the cord, and carefully coiled it upon the ground beside him, then as slowly lifted fold after fold of the sail-cloth. The last was raised, and showed, first, an inner envelope of oiled silk closely tied, which, being unfolded, disclosed a large bag of crimson velvet, the sides embroidered with the same device already seen upon the purse, the clasp, and the ring, the top closely gathered and sealed with wax, bearing the same impression. Thoroughly roused from his apathy, Saul cut and tore away the wax, severed the string, and with cold and trembling hands poured the contents of the bag upon the sand beside him.

Saul had never read about Aladdin's cave; had never vexed his fancy with impossible visions of wealth; had, in fact, never educated himself to that point of expectation beneath which all reality must fail; so that the treasure-heap from whose surfaces the rays of sunlight now flashed back into his eyes overwhelmed him as a glittering impossibility.

It was not till he had timidly raised the costly gems, the diamonds, rubies, emeralds, and sapphires, and examined the varied forms of their setting; had recognized these as bracelets, those as pins or rings or necklaces, such in form as he had seen worn by the ladies at the hotel; till he had filled his hands with unset gems, even more radiant than those clasped in gold; till he had heaped up in a separate mass more golden doubloons than he had ever possessed pennies, that the young fisherman began to realize his wealth.

Then indeed joy mounted to his brain, and he grew delirious with delight. Throwing himself upon the sand, he laughed, he cried, he gathered his treasure in one sparkling heap, and laid his cheek lovingly upon it; then flinging handfuls of rarest gems into the clear air, he laughed aloud to see them drop around him, making the morning brighter with their flashing radiance.

Then, prompted by a new fear, he gathered them again, looking greedily far and wide, lest one should have strayed from its fellows.

Yet do not think this was a sordid love of wealth—a vulgar desire for riches and self-aggrandizement, on the part of our poor Saul! Listen to him:

"Here is station, here is happiness, here is Violet!" whispers he, as he hoards his gems with anxious care.

About to replace the treasure in the velvet bag, Saul discovered a folded parchment adhering to its inner surface. Withdrawing it, he hastily opened, and with some difficulty read its contents after this wise :

"I, Count Diego d'Olivarez, hidalgo and noble of Spain, lately emigrated to the island of San Domingo, having been warned by my attached and faithful slave, Oliver, that an extensive insurrection was contemplated by the blacks in every portion of the island, have resolved to fly to the States of America, carrying with me my only child, Enrico, an infant of two years ; Oliver, my body servant ; and that large part of my wealth brought by me from Spain in gold and gems, and not yet converted into real estate.

"I transcribe this paper into the English, French, and Spanish tongues, that if Fate or Disease should prevent my establishing my child securely in a new home, whatever Christian who may find this may be enabled to fulfill my most solemn bequests.

"I give to my son Enrico (who, besides pronouncing his name in an intelligible manner, wears ever upon his neck a curious chain bearing upon its clasp the arms of Olivarez), firstly, the property inclosed with this paper ; secondly, my estates and hereditary castle in Spain, left by me in charge of my good cousin, Don Carlos d'Olivarez, of Salamanca, who I doubt not will prove a true and faithful steward of my son's interest, should I be unable to return with him to Spain.

"I also charge my son—and, through him, whatever stranger may assume his guardianship—to see that the slave Oliver receives his immediate freedom, and through life so much of my property as shall be needed to maintain him in comfort ; and I recommend his happiness to my son's consideration.

"Warned by Oliver that the hour of flight is at hand, I end this memorandum by signing myself, by the grace of God, DIEGO, COUNT D'OLIVAREZ."

"Count d'Olivarez !" murmured Saul, as he carefully refolded the paper. "Yes, the old slave no doubt called himself Oliver d'Olivarez, and from that they made the absurd name of Olly Dolly, borne by him to his death. Poor slave ! unhappy father !"

A few hours after Saul left the pine-woods, bearing with him the parcel carefully enveloped as he had found it in sail-cloth ; and avoiding the hamlet of Clam Cove, commenced his long walk homeward.

He had determined to see Pete again, and without confiding wholly in his discretion, to tell him some portion of his discovery, placing in his hands so much of his gold as should make the old man comfortable for life.

It was after midnight when Saul approached his former home, and he was considerably surprised at seeing the windows of the lower room dimly lighted, as he knew that old Pete was in the habit of sleeping and waking with the sun.

Raising the latch he stepped quietly in, and then staggered back against the wall, shocked to his inmost soul.

Stretched in his rude coffin, upon a table in the centre of the room, lay the kind old man who had fathered the orphan Count of Olivarez with rude but watchful care. Dead ; and Saul had not been there to give him one poor good-bye ! Dead ; and the many impatient words, the many rebellious and contemptuous thoughts that had of latter years crept out from the young man's heart, and built a wall of separation between them, came crowding back, bringing their labor in their hands, until that heart was fit to burst ; and Saul, leaning his stately head upon the poor pine-coffin, wept as those weep who learn for the first time the bitterness of "Nevermore."

III.

"Not go ! Certainly you must go, my dear. It will be by far the finest party of the season, I have no doubt. Mrs. Dubuque makes a point of outdoing every one else in her entertainments, and always contrives to find a lion or two for attractions. To-night it's this fascinating Spanish Count ; Mrs. Herkimer was here yesterday morning, and told me all about him. He was brought up in this country—at school, I believe ; or his father was an émigré ; at any rate, he talks English as well as you do, and isn't a bit queer and foreign in his ways—only with that somewhat stately and ceremonious politeness one looks for in a Spaniard. And so he's been for the last two years in Spain, looking after his estates. There's been some trouble about them—a lawsuit, I believe, or something. However, it's all right now ; and he's got a castle and a splendid estate there in Spain, and no one knows how much money besides ; but he's left all and come back here, people do say, to find a wife."

"Why didn't he go to Constantinople ? 'Tisn't quite so much trouble to buy them there," murmured Violet Silsby.

"Pshaw ! my dear, you're absolutely getting misanthropic—no surer sign of old maidism than that ! And now you're absolutely off with Van Courtlandt, you may be sure Mary Seaver won't give him up if you cry your eyes out."

"She's entirely welcome ; and my eyes are very safe," interposed Violet, a little peevishly.

"I dare say, my dear ; but people will talk. It was only yesterday that Mrs. Herkimer hinted to me that people thought you were considerably disappointed about him after all."

"Insolence !"

"The way of the world, Violet ! A girl can't be the belle you have been—and may still be, if you choose—without making enemies. But it really is getting time to look about one a little. You are three-and-twenty on your next birthday, Violet."

"I know it, Ma'am."

"Well, at five-and-twenty a girl is at the first corner toward old maidenhood."

"You frighten me, mamma ! What's to be done ?" cried Violet, arching her dark eyebrows and drawing down the corners of her pretty mouth.

"I'm glad you begin to see the matter properly, my dear," said Mrs. Silsby, who never took a joke. The first thing to be done is to go to Mrs. Dubuque's to-night. There you'll see this Count d'Olivarez, and—"

"I must go and talk to Fanny about my dress this very moment !" cried Violet, escaping from the room.

So skillfully did Mrs. Silsby manage her little scheme that before she, her husband, and daughter had been half an hour in Mrs. Dubuque's crowded drawing-rooms, Mr. Silsby had been introduced to the Spanish Count, and had, in turn, presented him to his wife and Violet.

The young nobleman bowed profoundly, spoke a few polite sentences to Mrs. Silsby, and then, offering his hand to the younger lady, requested her to join him in the waltz just commenced. In speaking her acceptance Violet raised her eyes—they met those of the stranger. Trembling slightly and turning a shade paler than her wont, she stepped forward and laid her hand in his.

Time is not hours or minutes. A life was lived before Enrico D'Olivarez and Violet Silsby paused at the open doors of the conservatory.

"Will you look at the flowers?" asked the Count, quietly.

Violet could not answer, but she laid her hand upon his proffered arm.

They walked slowly down the fragrant alley, and paused before a marble Psyche, shading the light from the face of sleeping Love.

"I was going to ask," commenced the Count, abruptly, "if, should you meet me in another scene, and wearing another name than that of Rynders, you would deign to remember me. I see that you do."

"I remember—I have been expecting you. You know I bid you only an au revoir when we parted last," murmured the self-possessed Miss Silsby, vainly struggling for composure.

"Those few words changed my destiny," said the Count, still stately and composed, though the fervor of his mood began to kindle his dark eyes, and glow beneath the olive of his cheek. "Had they remained unspoken I had not been here."

He paused, but Violet was mute.

"It was not needed then—your abrupt repulse," began the Count again, his voice deepening as he spoke; "I, the poor boatman, was too proud to tell my master's daughter that I loved her. It was not needed."

"Forgive the mistake; I did not know you then," murmured Violet. Don Enrico bowed profoundly, but continued, without direct reply:

"But now, lady, now that I am in very truth a noble of Spain, with an unblemished name and a sufficient fortune in my hand—now that my castle beside the Guadalquivir waits for its mistress as my heart has waited through these many years—now, Violet, I may say what no power could then have made me say—I love you."

Violet's lips moved, but no words came; she raised her eyes to those of her lover and placed her hand in his.

"Why, Violet, child, what's this?" cried Mrs. Silsby, bustling into her daughter's boudoir late in the ensuing day.

"What, mamma?" asked Violet, tremulously.

"Why, your father tells me that Count D'Olivarez has been with him half the morning, and that he has absolutely offered for you, and says that he has hopes of your consent. What does it all mean?"

"Why, mamma," returned the daughter, meekly, "I was so terrified by what you was saying yesterday about five-and-twenty, you know, that I thought it best to be married out of hand; and as Count D'Olivarez seemed quite ready to accept me—"

"Don't tell me, Violet Silsby, that you asked the man to marry you!" exclaimed the indignant matron.

"No, mamma; but he asked me, and I said yes," replied her daughter.

And Mrs. Silsby never knew that she had frequently met the Count D'Olivarez as Saul Rynders the boatman; for Mr. Silsby had learned that it was not always best to tell his wife every thing, and Violet could not bear to diminish, in ever so slight a degree, her mother's satisfaction in her daughter's splendid marriage.

"Shall not you miss Violet terribly?" asked Mrs. Herkimer, at the wedding breakfast.

"Yes," replied Mrs. Silsby, straightening herself up; "but the Count and Countess D'Olivarez are unable longer to be absent from their estates in Spain."

NIGHT REVELERS.

"Joyful be those Who breathe in the rosy light."

SCHILLER.

HOW few behold or estimate the beauties of the night! Day, with its multitudinous sounds and enlivening rays of lightsome beauty, seems all-sufficient for the joys of man in his existence. The astronomer, indeed, in his aerial tower, looks abroad upon an infinity which lifts him far above our common mundane sphere; and gazing on the wonders of heaven, earth looks insignificant—a world of reflected light too low for him to ponder over.

Others, weary with the toils of the day, find Night a loving mother, soothing and comforting them to rest, spreading her arms around them to give them strength for the toils of the morrow. But others again look upon night as a time when Nature displays her greatest wonders; that time which the Maker of all things has adorned with His most marvelous works. Day has nothing comparable with the loveliness, the inexhaustible beauty which the stars and the moon look down upon. The sweetest, brightest, most charming flowers unfold themselves in darkness, throwing out their exquisite perfumes upon the night, lading it so heavily that it falls in sweet vapor to the earth. The birds that sing the sweetest are all night-watchers, telling their tales of love or joy to the stars and the flowers. The rarest and most beautiful animals of the forest and the desert are roamers and revelers under the dark curtain of night. In the insect world the intimation is borne out in all its fullness and beauty. The night insects far surpass those of the day in every concomitant of beauty, and many of them are never seen until the earth is shrouded in her dark mantle. How beneficent in the All-seeing Creator to make the night equal in the light of beauty with the day! That which might chill and frighten man from its sombreness and density is found, when his eyes become accustomed to the gloom, as radiant in its own light and beauty as the garish day he loves so well. That "Which from beauty takes its dress,

And serene through time and season,
Stands for aye in loveliness," must to the observant eye and reflecting mind bring visions of ecstatic delight.

Then, again, there is a feeling of mystery, of awe, which, argue as we may, will cling to this beauty of night. We can not refrain from asking ourselves if it is not alone for the solace and admiration of the host of invisible beings that so much loveliness is on the wing, is blooming around.

Man—too weary to see, to feel, to enjoy—seeks his repose; and none but the sad and lonely, those watchers whose destiny it is to find day and night the same, who ask

"With such emotion
How the night so lonesome is,"

have it given to them to behold all that walketh and flieth abroad in the beauty of the night. And from them oftentimes the comfort and the repose which sorrow or sickness forbid are evolved to render the anguish of existence at least more tolerable. The happy can always sleep, but wakefulness is the companion of sorrow; and what utter darkness it would be to those if night had no light of beauty, no tale of wonder and loveliness to unfold!

"Thus it fell upon a night
When there was naught but starry light,"

I looked out through the darkness down upon the glancing waters; over the hills whose brows were drawn sharp against the starry sky; where rocks piled upon each other looked like masses of density which no light of moss or lichen could irradiate. The dark hemlocks hung upon their sides, unrelieved by gayer trees; the grass itself gave forth no shimmer of blade or spear as it waved with the soft night air, and darkness seemed almost sensible to the touch.

But I looked nearer, and there was light and sound. The insect world was all alive. Musical voices were full of love or joy or greeting. The buzz or drone of the beetle was in the air; the long swell and flap of the night-moth was heavy as it passed by; the brisk flight and dash of the dragon-fly glanced over the shimmering of the swiftly-running river. But, above all,

"Like wingèd stars the fire-flies flash and dance
Pale in the open moonshine, but each one
Under the dark trees seems a little sun—
A meteor tamed—a fix'd star gone astray
From the silver regions of the Milky-way."

Night's mantle was radiant with these glowing gems. I tried to count them, but a blaze here hid another there, and they appeared to multiply as the hours grew older. How wonderful it all was! how marvelously mysterious this beauty of the solemn night! Man and his various voices and noises were stilled, and yet such a world of sounds breaking in waves upon the golden shore of Silence! I gazed and listened, and wandered away in thought to that land beyond the stars; and then the sight dwelling upon those glancing lights brought me to earth again, and the works of His hands were more marvelous in their reality than all that imagination had been conjuring up during these lonely hours.

Let me now, for your amusement, recall the results of a night's meditation, enhanced by many others of study and watchfulness; and if in after-times it should be your lot to be a watcher of the night, these few facts may show you the beauty and the mystery which will be your silent companions; that you may welcome them and know them, and feel that the hours of darkness, if used aright, will bear fruit of an abundant harvest, which will add more light to the light of the day, illuminating life itself with visions of truth and wisdom.

There probably has been no insect which has "exercised" the minds of entomologists and others so much as the fire-fly, or lightning-bug, as it is called. But we must understand which we are discussing in the outset. There are many insects that have luminous properties at different stages of their existence; but I do not propose to describe any of them except the beetle—the lightning-bug of our familiar intercourse during the pleasant summer months. The far-famed European Lampyrus noctilucus—"Glow-worm"—whose light has illuminated the pages of so many of the poets in metaphor and strophe, we do not possess; but we have varieties among the mountainous parts of the Middle States quite as bright and radiant.

We have before us now the "Fire-fly"—the Elater communis noctilucus—"Universal Fire-Beetle." This is no fly but a beetle, belonging to the order Coleoptera, the family Elateridae, the genus Pyrophorus. It differs from many luminous insects, the light being constant in both sexes. This beetle belongs entirely to all plants of the melon, gourd, cucumber, and squash family; in a word, the whole class of Cucurbitacæ have them in attendance in every stage. You must not conclude that you see the same "fire-fly" every season. I have satisfied myself that they remain different periods—some two, three, and four years—in the larva state. The Elater communis is so called by me, not that it is common, but because it is universal, appearing at times, alternately, at the extreme east, west, and south, two years intervening in its appearing. It is in dry seasons a tolerably sized, plain, brilliantly-lighted beetle. The foundation color is a tawny yellow, but so dotted and lined with a greenish black that it is eventually a dark beetle. The thorax is a piece of horn yellow; and doubled around the edges, between the two pieces of horn on the under side, is a singular vine-like pattern resembling leaves, tendrils, and branches, which is very pretty under the magnifier, but too minute to be represented. I have never seen this peculiarity in any other. The two white spots are firm, strong, opaque, pinkish shaded horn; the whole of the thorax is a mass of tile-like projections, from each of which springs a long transparent yellow hair. The part of this thorax under the shield is a horny substance with black tubercles. This is the result dissection proves when freshly performed. The opinion entertained that light is thrown through these is, in all I have dissected, simply impossible; but light thrown from them by reflection is the truth of the matter. I can not answer for the cucujo of Cuba. I have never taken the time to dissect this variety; as it is so similar to the Communis, I feel assured I should find no difference.

But the cause of the light: It is thought to be a most mysterious existence. Some have supposed it to be phosphorus; others "a chemical electricity;" some that it is really fire-heat. But these are all conjectures. I have devoted much time to the plants on which they feed, which, upon analysis, produce much sulphur in root, leaf, flower, and fruit. This family of plants draws from the earth this chemical affinity so powerfully that, unless renewed by manure, two years exhaust the soil where any of them are grown. We may conclude that the food these insects exist upon, through the chemical preparation of the digestion, yields a mucus which is sulphuric in all its properties. The light in the abdomen commences where the second stomach ends, having four or six long tubes running from the gullet to the extremity of the body. They have at the sockets of the wing-covers two holes, each covered with a small horny plate, which lift up when the wings are expanded, and the air by their motion passes into the body through these tubes, and the oxygen of the air coming in contact with this sulphuric gas causes the illumination which is so vivid to the eye.

Let us bear in mind that all bodies become visible only by reflecting the rays of light. Therefore to comprehend this phenomenon we must conceive that the rays of light proceed in all directions from every visible point of its body: thus we have the illumination of the whole light of the abdomen reflected from every part of its body; the yellow horny edge round the thorax, the pinkish elevated spots on the same, the hundreds of yellow transparent hairs, the opaque yellow elytra or wing-covers, all reflecting the vivid light thrown off by the expansion of the wings from the last segments of the body. Then again the under-wings are large and expansive, resembling a thin piece of black silk, so very unreflecting that to represent one on paper you would simply see a large blot. Near the sockets the nervures and several cells become somewhat lighter. These dense wings, being extended on either side of the abdomen, prevent the rays of light from escaping, and cause the brilliant starry scintillations which reach our eyes. Of course there must be many internal arrangements of the insect during life helping to increase or diminish this light, which cease to exist the instant the activity of life, is gone. You can convince yourself of all which is here stated by obtaining the beetles and feeding them. In seven days the light can not be illuminated if fed on apple, pear, cake, or other food; then again give them the cucumber, squash, or melon, and it returns, but never so bright as in the open air—that under the glass being soon exhausted of its illuminating properties. If you cut the under-wings close, you will have no illumination, but the sulphuric light of the mucus remains even until they have been dead some time.

When arranging this paper I reduced a specimen seven years dead to ashes; the mucus, now dried to solid particles, was as bright as when in life, and the ashes yielded not only sulphur in residuum, but an exhalation, as if it had been alive a second before.

To keep them in health it is not sufficient for you to feed them on their natural food—they must have a constant supply of fresh air; their digestion can not go on without it—they soon exhaust all under a glass and die of surfeit. You can remedy this in a great measure by rinsing a glass jar with water four or five times a day and turning it over them wet. They will require much less food and will live longer.

The female beetle has an ovipositor of three pieces—the tube in the centre, and a bristle on either side to protect it. With this ovipositor, if she comes out late in the season, she deposits her eggs in the earth; if sufficiently early, in the cups of the flowers, where the larvæ are hatched early, and descend to the earth during the day, coming out at night to feed. They are, when in motion, a slender tawny worm, with a dark head and tail—strong powerful jaws, six legs, and a pro-leg under the last segment. When at rest, they are short, thick, and cylindrical. They devour the roots, leaves, and flowers. Toward winter they descend into the earth quite deep, and repose coiled up until their food is ready in the spring. When about to transform, it descends two or three inches, and by the action of its body it forms a small cell, very smooth interiorly and exteriorly, where it turns into a light-brown chrysalis, covered on some of its parts with a very thin transparent skin, which is thrown off when the beetle ascends to the surface. The imago, as I have said, is a dark beetle, but it becomes very sombre as it grows old. The jaws are very strong, and appear to work cross-wise as with the cross bills (Loxia) of birds. The ridges made in the edge of the food prove this, as they never eat from the centre of a thing like other beetles.

The Elater rosata—"Rosy Lightning Beetle"—is the fire-beetle of 1857 throughout the States of New York, New Jersey, Connecticut, and in some parts of Upper Georgia. It might have been found in the other States, but I did not ascertain it as a fact. I have not seen it since. The thorax is very transparent at the edges, with lines running down to the centre—the two spots are large, very pink, opaque horn, offering the same results under dissection as the Communis. The outside wings are very dark, the terminal edges yellow, legs and antennæ yellowish. They were not so brilliant as the former, and became very scarce in September.

The Elater minimus—"the Smallest Lightning Beetle"—belongs to the subgenus Phausis, having twelve joints in the antennæ. They were very numerous in 1854 in Massachusetts, particularly around Mount Holyoke. It was found under the leaves of the melon beds in my garden. The light it threw out was but a spark, very brilliant and rapid—then a pause, sometimes of ten minutes, and it would be seen many yards from its original location. Placed under a glass, it would not scintillate more than once or twice in an hour. The beetle was very dark, and the spots on the thorax were of black horn, which show, in this instance, that they are not placed there for transmitting light any more than those on the others. This beetle disappeared entirely by the end of August. The larvæ lived in the buds of the vines—their habits and transformation were similar in every respect to the first.

The famous Cucujo of Cuba is inferior to our beetles in beauty and light. After a storm coming from that quarter they are seen in numbers in Florida and Georgia. They are said to feed in the larva state upon the sugar-cane. In the imago state, so far as I have tried them, they prefer the melon and squash. They would not live for me over two days if fed on sugar-cane, whereas they existed for weeks on the other food. There are a number of very pretty stories in print, both in prose and poetry, about the wonderful uses to which the light of these beetles has been applied. Southey says:

“By that light did Madoc first Behold the features of his lovely bride;”

which could not have been flattered, and must have been of a bright greenish hue, that on the Mexican complexion must have been positively demoniac. Then, again, the natives go to the tops of the hills and call out “Cucujo, cucujo!” beating a pan, which brings them, when they are secured and taken to their huts, where they devour mosquitoes, gnats, etc.—a herbivorous beetle becoming carnivorous for the occasion. Again, they frightened Sir Thomas Cavendish and Sir Robert Dudley, on attempting to land somewhere in the West Indies, to that degree they took to their ships, supposing the Spaniards, bearing torches, were coming through the woods upon them. They must have thought, upon reflection, that the torch-bearers were very low of stature, as these beetles seldom fly in a direct line more than three feet above the ground. It is said that they have saved many lives, lighting wanderers through the forests. Experience has taught me that it is a very hazardous experiment to follow fire-beetles. They would soon precipitate a person into a river, a marsh, or a swamp. At early dawn they wing their way to the uplands, where they hide in warm, dry places during the day, and make, almost in a direct low line, for damp or marshy places, rivers, or wells, as soon as evening closes in. As for reading by their light, it can be done, but it is a most dangerous experiment, and would eventually end in ruining the eyesight of the individual. This is all on these beetles which my space will allow. It is a pity to attempt to do away with such pretty fables, which have been repeated by every author writing on this subject for the last century; but it would be a great error on my part, thinking and knowing them to be unsubstantiated by facts, not to state that which I consider strictly and honestly true. There are more than seventy varieties known on this continent, and they certainly add much to the beauty and mystery of our exquisite starry summer evenings.

The Scarabæus tityus of Linnæus has half a dozen synonyms. I think it desirable to sustain the name given by the first describer of an insect, as it saves the student a vast deal of research. This is decidedly our largest and handsomest beetle. Many in South America, such as the Hercules and others, excel it in size, but not in the delicacy of its shades. It is two inches long exclusive of the horns, and in some specimens these want very little of being an inch long. They are more than an inch wide across the centre of the abdomen. It is of a beautiful bluish-green color, with brown spots over the wing-cases. The abdomen and eyes are of a light brown; the legs and the tips of the horns are a blue-black; the feet of some of them are green. This occurs when they are newly winged. They lose their finest shades after death. Nothing can equal in splendor these creatures scrambling over the trunk of an old fig-tree, toward evening, with the last glow of day glancing along their brilliant wings. The female is smaller than the male, unarmed, but equally gay and beautiful.

Their habitat is the interior of decayed old fruit trees, particularly the fig. The female deposits her eggs in the rich mould of the decayed wood, and on this the larva feeds two years before it comes to maturity. When ready to transform it makes a cell in the mould, gathering on the outside sticks, stems, and shreds of withered leaves. It changes into a very light brown chrysalis. They are found north as far as Philadelphia. Some varieties are said to be brown, with the spots green; but the beetle of this description which I saw was not the Tityus. Having the horns ringed at their sockets, and several other scientific differences, induced me to think they were not the same, but circumstances prevented me at the time from ascertaining this as a certainty. It is very harmless and docile, and can be made a very pleasant pet in a room, with a silken thread tied around its jaws to prevent it from hiding away in dark corners. Give it a fresh bouquet to travel over for food every night, and it will live a year or more.

The Scarabæus maritimus—“Beetle of the Sea-shore”—is as dark and sombre as its confrère is brilliant and gay. It is very black all over—no shading except where the light falls upon the punctured ridges of the wing-covers. It is two inches long and more than an inch wide. It is found on the lonely sea-coast of the long reach of this continent, as far north as Nantucket, and as far south as the reefs of Florida, wherever the sea casts up the wreck of timber. There it is their mission to be eating, drilling with holes, and reducing to dust the hulls of ships and boats which the mighty sea has rejected. The keel of an old boat was torn up in one of the coves near Newport, Rhode Island, a few years ago; it was the home of hundreds of the larvæ of this beetle. It was so reduced in solidity by these little creatures that the once heavy wood felt like cork to the touch, and crumbled in the fingers. The larva feeds on the wood, and forms out of its mould and particles of its texture a pupa-case, in which it turns into a black, elaborately-marked chrysalis. The larvæ of this family are very soft whitish grubs, with a dark horny head and tail. The three or four last segments are large and heavy, which causes them to repose with their heads and tails nearly meeting; and in moving the six feet have to drag these last heavy segments, as it grows old reclining on the side. This beetle travels very fast over the sand of the sea-side; and where the line of the highest waves come they can be seen delving with their strong claws until they are entirely covered up. Here they remain until the sea has gone down, and up they scramble and rush away to the fresh sea-weed thrown up by the ocean. Probably some eggs or gelatinous qualities of the sea-weed may constitute their food.

The Lucanus capreolus—the "Roe-buck Beetle" of Linnæus—has also a host of synonyms; but we will content ourselves with this cognomen. The horns, or jaws, are not notched or "antlered," as those of the stag-beetle of Europe; nevertheless it is a very fine, active, interesting creature, with its immense jaws, denominated horns, tossing up as it runs nimbly over the trunks of old trees. It measures an inch and a half, exclusive of the jaws. The specimens of the North are not as large as those of the Middle and Southern States. It is of a dark mahogany brown color, allowing the light to pass through, which takes away its sombreness. The legs and jaws are darker in color. The male is smooth, but the female has her head and thorax rough with punctures; her jaws are much smaller and more toothed than those of the male; she is likewise much less in size. She deposits her eggs on the bark of trees—oak, apple, willow, or poplar, she is indifferent which—very near the roots. When hatched, the larva works in beneath the bark into the solid wood of the tree, not eating in runs, but reducing all around it into saw-dust. This work continues six years. You may conjecture what mischief several of them can do to a fine tree in this space of time. The grub resembles that of the Scarabæus very closely. It is, however, of a lighter color, and does not appear so shriveled and crinkled into wrinkles as that of the former. When ready to transform it gathers up shreds of wood and saw-dust, rolling and gluing the whole together into an oval pupa, when it changes into a yellowish-white chrysalis; the whole insect being inclosed in a kind of shroud of a filmy texture, as if spun by a spider for the occasion. It is a mystery how it is manufactured, but it is evidently a skin under the covering of the grub which is only exhibited when this is cast off. When ready to come forth it bursts this covering, then the pupa-case, and forces its way through the passage which it had made in the larva state, and emerges to the warm July sun, for the first and the last time, to dry and expand all its parts. After this "first appearance on the boards" in daylight, it never comes forth until after nightfall during the remainder of its existence. You would conclude that the food consumed must be immense which those huge jaws require; but here you would be in error. These jaws do not eat. Like the antlers of the stag they are simply ornamental and graceful, adding to the charming variety the woods exhibit, enhancing them to those who love them and their many denizens. They are very delicate eaters, and are graciously provided with small brushes attached to their mouths, with which they gather up the pollen of buds and flowers for their delicate repasts.

The Omaloplia roscidus—the "Dewy Omaloplia"—is a pretty little beetle belonging to Fabricius's genus Melolantha; sub-genus Phyllophaga—"leaf-eater." It is quite a rare beetle, feeding upon any of the rosaceæ family of plants, but principally on the apple and wild-cherry tree. It is of a light-brown color; when seen in different lights it changes to a rose, pale green, or purplish hue. It has a quantity of silky hairs on the thorax, abdomen, and legs. It feeds only on the leaves. The mother beetle deposits her eggs at the roots of the tree or sapling; when hatched they work down, devouring the young roots and fibres, keeping the tree in that sickly, decaying state which you may have observed in newly-planted orchards. The grub is white, with a dark-brown head and black dots down the back. It is at least three years in the larva state, doing a great deal of injury to the tree it is near and the turf around it. When full grown it is the thickness of a quill. When ready to transform it descends into the earth nearly a foot deep, then rolls itself until a smooth, neat cell is made, which on the exterior is covered with clods and lumps of earth. It is then changed into a pale yellowish chrysalis, its wings, antennæ, and legs wrapped each separately in a thin filmy substance. It bursts this skin a week or more before it works its way to the surface in a perfect state. They are rarely found as far North as New Jersey, but can be seen almost every season in the Middle and Southern States. It is called the "Dewy Beetle," from its always having the silky texture of its body wet, or moist, as if with dew. It is strictly a night rover.

The Crioceris solanum—"Potato Beetle"—belongs to any of the Solanaceæ family of plants; but is more constantly found on the sweet potato vine, in the Middle and Southern States. They are allied very closely to the family of the Capricorn Beetles, the genus Criocerididæ. The principal distinctive mark it has is the pinched look of the thorax. This beetle does not appear regularly every year, which is a singularity unaccounted for, unless the larvæ remain in the ground over two seasons. The head, thorax, antennæ, legs, and abdomen are of a bright metallic green; the wing-cases of a dark dull green deeply punctured. It devours the leaves and buds of the potato vine. The larva is very singular in some of its arrangements. The mother beetle glues her eggs in patches to the leaves; in two or three weeks they are hatched. The grub is yellowish, with a dark head and spots down the segments. It is short, cylindrical, and very thick in the centre. It eats traveling backward, never advancing; every movement is retrograding. It has the vent on the top of the last segment, through which it throws up its excrement, which by the aid of the segments of its body it moves forward to the head. As it increases, when it becomes dry or too heavy, it shakes itself violently, tumbling the load off only to be renewed. The skin of this grub is peculiarly thin, and feeding so exposed to the rays of the moon or stars and the heavy dews, it would soon be chilled and unable to perform its task, besides the danger of exposure to night-birds and other prowlers, which its covering, odd as it is, remedies in a measure. They are sometimes seen eating by daylight, if the vines are thick and the weather cloudy. Its mission seems to be to reduce the over-luxuriance of this prolific family of plants; and here again we see, even in the loathsome act of this little creature, how beautifully it is adapted by the Divine Architect to the situation and duties it has to fill and perform. When ready to transform it descends into the earth, rolling a nice smooth cell, like a pod of some kind of seed, lying very near the surface if not on it. Here it remains the winter months, coming forth as early in spring as its food is ready. It is said to be very injurious to the tobacco plant; but those sent to me as committing so much mischief belonged to the Halticæ, or "Flea Beetle," as they are familiarly called.

The Anobium lignosus—"Wood Beetle." If to have the power of creating a sensation of any kind in a world like ours be desirable, no one, or any thing, has enjoyed it to its absolute fullness as this same small beetle and its confrères have done. Sir Thomas Brown, in his "Vulgar Errors," considers it of "great importance;" and adds, "that a man who could eradicate this error from the minds of the people would save from many a cold sweat the meticulous hands of nurses and grandmothers"—and he might have added, of fathers and grandfathers; for superstition belongs alike to both sexes. There are few people above the feeling of being annoyed (to use the mildest term) when they hear, even if they do not believe—

"The solemn death-watch clicks the hour of death."

Dean Swift tried what ridicule would do on the subject. He concludes:

"A kettle of scalding hot water injected
Infallibly cures the timber affected;
The omen is broken, the danger is over,
The maggot will die and the sick will recover."

But it will take a force unknown at the present time to physiological science to eradicate the feeling of terror and apprehension felt by almost every one on hearing this small insect. I confess myself to have been very much annoyed at times by coming in contact with this strange nuisance; but I was cured by an over-application. I went to pay a visit to a friend in the country. The first night I fancied I should have gone mad before morning. The walls of the bedroom were papered, and from them beat, as it were, a thousand watches—tick, tick, tick! Turn which way I would, cover my head under the bed-clothes to suffocation, every pulse in my body had an answering tick, tick, tick. But at last the welcome morning dawned, and early I was down in the library—even here every book, on shelf above shelf, was riotous with tick, tick, tick! At the breakfast table, beneath the plates, cups, and dishes beat the hateful sound. In the parlor, the withdrawing-room, the kitchen, nothing but tick, tick. The house was a huge clock, with thousands of pendulums ticking from morning until night. I was careful not to allow my great discomfort to annoy others. I argued, what they could tolerate surely I could; and in a few days habit had rendered the fearful, dreaded ticking a positive necessity. I make the remedy known for the benefit of others. You must understand I am describing the beetle, not the "wood louse," the Atropos pulsatorius. This is a member of a different family—the Neuroptera. This beetle belongs to Linnæus's genus Ptinus—subgenus Anobium. There are many varieties of this beetle possessing the faculty of making this click, but none so continuous as this. It is found all over the country, and is the loudest, although the beetle is very small. It is always found in the larva state in the wood-work of houses, particularly if old or decayed. Old tables, chairs, shelves, every thing will in time become possessed by them. They are likewise ruinous to books, collections of plants, and insects; pictures, and framed engravings—drilling holes and runs through them with their strong jaws. The mother beetle deposits her eggs in a decayed spot, and when hatched they eat in runs through every part where they are located. In the perfect state they are very fond of eating the paste with which paper is put on. When ready to go into a chrysalis state, a pupa-case is made in one of the runs composed of debris and silk, in which it changes to a pale-brown chrysalis, coming out in a few weeks as a brownish-black beetle, deeply punctured on its wing-cases. Many opinions have been given by authors about the manner in which the tick, or click, is made. Some say they strike their heads violently, others their jaws, against the wood. Then again it is done by the segments of the body; and again by their wing-covers. Examine it, and you notice that the head is small, and concealed very nearly by the thorax. There are two small elevations on the back part of the head, and several horny ridges on the under part of the thorax. The head is kept leisurely and regularly moving under the thorax, from right to left, and back. "Tick!" the projections scrape coming forward;

"tick!" returning. So the head moves to and fro like a pendulum, thus—tick, tick—tick, tick—tick, tick—fifteen, sixteen, sometimes twenty strokes; then it pauses for an answer. It is simply a love call. If the companion is near by, it is answered immediately. Then the first renews his tick; and so it progresses. If there are many around, and they have obtained a universal footing in a house, you may hear what I did that terrible night. This is all that can truly be said about the tick of the beetle. It is caused by the projections of the head drawn against the ridges of the thorax. But the superstition attending it is universal. Every nation entertains it, as some of the family of beetles who possess this propensity are found in every part of the world. There are ten varieties known in England, and as many more in this country; and if any one took time and patience they might soon be doubled, as this family has met hitherto with very little attention.

I can not refrain—as I have shown you some of the giants of this order—from placing before you two microscopic members. They belong to the club moss, which covers the rocks by the banks of rivers and in damp places, throwing off such superb rays of green to commingle with the browns and the grays of their locality.

The Sphærosoma splendidus—"Splendid Spherical Beetle"—is most gorgeous, being of a rich rosy hue, scintillating over a ground color of pearly green.

The Melasoma ruber—"Red Melasoma"—is of a most exquisite ruby red, with dark feet, legs, and antennæ. Their food must be the small fronds and rootlets of this pretty moss. In September, if you will carefully take up a patch and examine it with a magnifying glass, you will be amazed to see the variety of charming, exquisitely bright inhabitants it has. These two are very beautiful, but I can tell you no more, for I could with difficulty find either unaided by the glass; so the larvæ and their habits must be inscrutable except from analogy, as there are varieties of the same quite large, and whose economy has been well investigated.

MODERN AUSTRIA.

ON the 1st of March, 1792, Leopold of Austria, a shameless libertine, died, hurried to his grave by profligacy. His son, Francis II., twenty-two years of age, ascended the throne. The French Revolution was then in the dawn of its earlier successes. The Queen of France, Marie Antoinette, was aunt to the young emperor. One of the first acts of the Austrian monarch was to demand of France that the old Bourbon régime should be restored, with all its antiquated usages of despotism. To enforce this demand a large army was marshaled. France indignantly rejected the insolent message, and prepared for defense.

Austria, in alliance with Prussia and England, sent an army of 150,000 men in its march upon Paris. The Duke of Brunswick was placed in command. He issued a manifesto ordering the French immediately to restore Louis XVI. to his throne, and to punish all those who had advocated constitutional liberty. He also threatened to hang every Frenchman who should lift an arm against him, and to sack and destroy every city where he should encounter any opposition.

France was roused to frenzy. The King, who was conspiring with the allies, was dethroned, imprisoned, and finally executed. The aristocrats, who were prepared with concealed weapons to join the invaders, were massacred. The people having thus protected themselves from an assault in the rear, rushed en masse upon the foe, and drove them, broken, bleeding, and breathless, from the kingdom.

Still Austria, dominant in Italy, continued the assault along the Alps. A young and almost unknown general, Napoleon Bonaparte, was intrusted with the command of the French troops on the Italian frontier. His movement was like the sweep of the whirlwind. The Austrians, driven from Piedmont, Sardinia, Lombardy, fled from Italy. The French pursued them over rivers, plains, mountain ranges, pelting them with artillery, and charging them with cavalry, until the pursuers arrived within sight of the steeples of Vienna.

The Austrian capital was now in consternation. The King and his court fled like deer to the wilds of Hungary, at the same time dispatching emissaries to Napoleon imploring peace. It was all France wanted. The treaty of Campo-Formio was the result—a treaty which strengthened France against aggression, by extending her boundaries to the Rhine, and which wrested several provinces in Italy from Austrian despotism, and combined them in the Cisalpine Republic.

Scarcely a year passed away ere Austria entered into another coalition against France. Napoleon was in Egypt. Austria poured her troops into Italy, crushed the infant Republic, and, with immense armies upon the Alps and the Rhine, commenced anew—in coalition with Russia, Turkey, and England—her march upon France. Napoleon suddenly returned. Secretly collecting an army at Dijon, he crossed the Alps, and fell, like the lightning's bolt, upon the Austrians at Marengo, and drove them, utterly routed, from Italy.

Soon after, in a stormy night of December, 1800, General Moreau, with 60,000 Frenchmen, met 70,000 Austrians in the forest of Hohenlinden. A terrible battle ensued. The Austrians, having lost 25,000 in killed, wounded, and prisoners, and 100 pieces of artillery, commenced a precipitate retreat. Moreau pursued them, with incessant assaults upon their rear-guard, until his solid columns were within thirty miles of Vienna. In dismay the Emperor Francis again implored peace. "It is for that alone that we are fighting," Moreau replied. The treaty of Luneville was the result. Again Austria recognized the Rhine as the boundary of France, and acknowledged the independence of the infant Republics in Italy, consenting that they should adopt such form of government as they preferred.

Four years passed away, when again, in 1805, Austria entered into another coalition against the republican empire of France. In secret treaty with England, Russia, and Sweden, and without any declaration of war, Austria, in combined force with the allies, 500,000 strong, was again on the march for Paris. Napoleon was at that time at Boulogne preparing to assail his implacable British foes on their own island.

Twenty thousand carriages were immediately called into requisition, and with almost the speed of the wind his grand army of 200,000 men was transported from the Channel to the Rhine. In twenty days an Austrian army of 80,000 men was annihilated at Ulm. Without allowing his foes an hour to recover, Napoleon pressed on to Vienna, sweeping the valley of the Danube like a torrent; and in forty days from the time he left Boulogne his army was encamped in the squares of the Austrian capital, and Napoleon was occupying the palaces of the Emperor.

In fourteen days more Napoleon encountered the Austrians and Russians, more than one hundred miles north of Vienna, on the field of Austerlitz. The Emperors Alexander and Francis were at the head of their respective troops. It was the first of December, 1805. In one brief, terrific tempest of war the allied army was destroyed. Alexander, with his shattered bands, retreated toward Russia. The Emperor Francis, having nowhere to retreat to, was hopelessly ruined. Thus humiliated, he sought an interview with his conqueror. The two Emperors met at a camp-fire on the side of a bleak hill, where they were slightly sheltered by a wind-mill.

"I receive you," said Napoleon, "in the only palace I have inhabited for the last two months."

"You have made such good use of that habitation," Francis happily replied, "that it should be agreeable to you."

England wishing to strike Napoleon in the back, had beguiled Austria into this coalition. Francis, exasperated by disaster, opened the interview by saying,

"The English are a nation of shop-keepers. To secure for themselves the commerce of the world they are willing to set the Continent in flames. I hate them."

While in this frame of mind a treaty of peace was easily formed, known in history as the Treaty of Presburg.

Scarcely had the French army, by easy marches, returned to Paris, when the British Government formed a new coalition, in the autumn of 1806, with Russia and Prussia, against France. This led to the world-renowned campaigns of Jena, Auerstadt, and Eylau. Austria had been recently so severely humiliated that she did not venture to join the coalition. But when the French army was in winter-quarters, far away on the banks of the Vistula, Austria thought it a favorable opportunity to rise, unite with the allies, and assail the French in their rear. Napoleon was prepared for this treachery, and had an army of 100,000 men all marshaled to meet the danger. Through Talleyrand, he said, with wonderful frankness, to the Austrian Emperor:

"France understands perfectly the intentions of Austria. To save Austria from calamity, I express myself with frankness. France is abundantly prepared to meet any force Austria can raise against her. If the Emperor wishes to send officers to ascertain our strength, we engage to show them the dépôts, the camps of reserve, and the divisions on the march. They shall see that, independently of the 100,000 French already in Germany, a second army of 100,000 men is preparing to cross the Rhine, to check any hostile movement on the part of Vienna.

Austria, intimidated, took counsel of discretion, and sullenly marched back into her barracks. Two years passed away, when again, in 1807, this great despotism thought that another favorable opportunity was presented to strike French republicanism. Napoleon was involved in the Spanish war, and the strength of his army was on the other side of the Pyrenees. As of old, secretly the Austrian Court formed a treaty with England, and, without any declaration of war, put her immense army upon the move for Paris. As Napoleon received the dispatches containing this information he said,

"It seems that the waters of oblivion flow past Vienna. They have forgotten the lessons of experience. They want new ones. They shall have them. And this time they shall be terrible. I do not desire war. I have no interest in it."

"Napoleon," says Thiers, "was sincere, and spake the truth in asserting that he did not desire war, but that he would wage it tremendously if forced into the conflict."

Two hundred thousand troops crossed the Inn and entered Bavaria, the ally of France. Three hundred thousand were in the rear, soon to follow. Napoleon plunged upon the foe at Eckmühl, and scattered them, torn, bleeding, and in the wildest rout. Again he overtook them at Ratisbon, and chastised them with a dripping sword. The whole disordered host fled tumultuously in fugitive bands down the Danube to Vienna. The French impetuously pursued, and seized the capital, after throwing into it three thousand shells. Then, driving the humiliated foe over the fields of Essling and Aspern, Austria was again humiliated, chastised, and brought upon her knees imploring peace upon the bloody field of Wagram. The French marshals were assembled in the camp of the Emperor to consider the proposals for an armistice. There was division in council.

"Austria," said the one party, "is the irreconcilable enemy of the popular government in France. Unless deprived of the power of again injuring us, she will never cease to violate the most solemn treaties whenever there is a prospect of advantage. It is indispensable to put an end to these coalitions by dividing Austria, which is the centre of them all."

"Should Prince Charles," the other party replied, "retreat to the Bohemian mountains, Russia and Prussia will send their troops to join the alliance. A great and final conflict is evidently approaching between the despotisms of the North and the free institutions of the South. It is of the utmost importance to conciliate Austria, that she may be detached from the coalition."

Napoleon listened thoughtfully, and then said, "Gentlemen, enough blood has been shed, I accept the armistice."

The Emperor Francis resorted to every species of trickery to prolong negotiations, hoping for efficient aid from the English, who had landed in great strength at the mouth of the Scheldt, and were marching to his rescue. At length the treaty was signed, on the 14th of October, 1809. It was the fourth treaty Austria had made with France within sixteen years. In this treaty, which Napoleon negotiated while occupying the palaces of Vienna, the frontiers of Bavaria were strengthened and extended, so that this ally of France might not again be defenselessly exposed to Austrian invasion. Saxony, another of the allies of France, was also strengthened by an accession of a million and a half to her population. The republican kingdom of Italy also received important additions of territory, that it might present a more impregnable front to its despotic and gigantic neighbor. France increased the power of her allies, but added not a rood to her own domain.

"When compared," says Lockhart, "with the signal triumphs of the campaign of Wagram, the terms on which Napoleon signed the peace were universally looked upon as remarkable for moderation."

Soon after this Austria became allied to France by the marriage of Maria Louisa, daughter of the Emperor Francis, to Napoleon. It was supposed that this measure of state policy would secure the peace of Europe by preventing any further acts of hostility on the part of Austria. The divorce of Josephine was the great mistake, and, in the sight of God, the great sin of Napoleon's life. Savary, the Duke of Rovigo, who was a confidential agent in the transaction, says:

"Nothing could be more true than that the sacrifice of the object of his affections was the most painful that Napoleon experienced throughout his life. A feeling of personal ambition was supposed to be the mainspring of all his actions. This was a very mistaken impression. The Emperor had no children. He dismissed the idea of appointing Eugene his heir, because he had nearer relations, and it would have given rise to dissensions, which it was his principal object to avoid. He also considered the necessity in which he was placed of forming an alliance sufficiently powerful, in order that, in the event of his system being at any time threatened, that alliance might be a resting point, and save it from total ruin. He likewise hoped that it would be the means of putting an end to that series of wars, of which he was desirous, above all things, of avoiding a recurrence. These were the motives which determined him to break a union so long contracted. He wished it less for himself than for the purpose of interesting a powerful state in the maintenance of the order of things established in France."

On the 11th of May, 1810, this marriage was solemnized in Vienna, the Archduke Charles, brother of the Emperor Francis, standing as proxy for Napoleon. But for the support which this alliance seemed to give the disastrous campaign of Russia would not have been undertaken. But little more than two years elapsed after the marriage ere a French army of nearly half a million was buried beneath the snows of the North. Despotic Europe again sprang to arms to crush free institutions in France, and to re-instate the dynasty of the Bourbons. Austria, regardless of the matrimonial alliance, eagerly raised an army of 200,000 men, and, with the ringing of bells, the explosion of artillery, the flight of rockets, and all other demonstrations of public rejoicing, on the 12th of August, 1813, united with the allies. Napoleon, with 260,000 men, on the banks of the Elbe, was surrounded by 500,000 of his foes, and on the fatal fields of Dresden and Leipsic, overwhelmed with numbers, fell.

The victors cautiously pursued their still formidable foe, leading the Bourbons behind their guns, and finally took possession of Paris, and reared again the old feudal kingdom of France. Napoleon was sent to Elba. Maria Louisa, with her son, taken captive by her father, was conducted by a guard of soldiers to Vienna. The sublime drama of the "Hundred Days" soon ensued, followed by the disaster of Waterloo. Napoleon was entombed in the glooms of St. Helena, and despotism was re-established all over Europe.

The victorious despots met in Congress at Vienna, in September, 1814, to divide the spoil. There were present at this Congress the Emperors of Austria and Russia, the Kings of Prussia, Denmark, Bavaria, and Wurtemberg, and also a large number of princes and dukes. The Pope was represented by Cardinal Consalvi. England sent as her representatives Lord Castlereagh, the Duke of Wellington, Lords Cathcart, Clancarty, and Stuart. The Bourbons of France were represented by Prince Talleyrand, and several others of the most illustrious of the ancienne noblesse. Embassadors from Spain, Portugal, and Sweden were also admitted to the deliberations. Prince Metternich, who has justly been styled "the incarnation of Austrian despotism," presided.

The result of the long deliberations was summed up in one hundred and twenty-one articles, which were signed on the 9th of June, 1815. Austria received vast accessions of strength. The constitutional kingdoms of Italy were annihilated, and the woe-stricken Italians, bound hand and foot, were surrendered again to their former masters. Austria received again under her despotic sway Venetia, Lombardy, Tuscany, Modena, Parma, and various other minor States. Naples, with her constitutional monarchy trampled in the dust, was restored, re-enslaved, to the infamous Ferdinand, who had married an Austrian princess, and was but a vassal of the Austrian Emperor. Austria constructed Venetia and Lombardy into a kingdom, over which she placed one of her archdukes as viceroy. The remaining States which fell to her lot she parceled out among her dukes and princes. Thus the repose of the slave plantation was again spread over Europe. In reference to the acts of this Congress of the Allies the British Quarterly says:

"The treaties of Vienna, though the most desperate efforts have been made by the English diplomatists to embalm them as monuments of political wisdom, are fast becoming as dead as those of Westphalia. In fact, they should be got under ground with all possible dispatch; for no compacts so worthless, so wicked, so utterly subversive of the rights of humanity, are to be found in the annals of nations."

The affairs of Europe being thus settled, Austria remained comparatively quiet, with occasional outbreaks but no memorable change, until the year 1836. On the 8th of March of this year the Emperor Francis died. Regarding his throne as the great bulwark of absolutism, he ever manifested the most relentless hostility to constitutional freedom. It is reported that when his physician, Baron Stifft, in a congratulatory address upon his health, remarked, "There is nothing, Sire, like a good physical constitution," the Emperor nervously interrupted him, exclaiming, "What do you say? Let me never hear that word again. Say my robust health—strong bodily system. I have no constitution, and I never will have one."

The death of Francis produced no change in the national policy. Ferdinand I. succeeded him, and with an unrelenting hand governed his vast and discordant realms.

In 1820 there was a brief but desperate attempt by the Italians to throw off the yoke of Austrian servitude. We have not space to enlarge upon this undertaking, memorable as it was in scenes of heroic and tragic interest. Aristocratic Europe, enthroned in absolute power by the Congress of Vienna, looked approvingly on while Austria with trampling squadrons rode down all opposition and reinstated her iron sway. To secure this result the "Holy Allies," Austria, Russia, and Prussia, met at Laybach. The British people were in such strong sympathy with the enslaved Italians that the Government did not dare to join the "Holy Allies." But still Lord Castlereagh, in the name of the British Cabinet, sent a dispatch to the Congress, expressive of sympathy, and stating that though England wished to remain neutral, she admitted that this rising of the people justified the interposition of the northern monarchs.

An army of 150,000 allied troops was immediately upon the march. Ferdinand of Naples, who had fled his throne, returned to his kingdom in the rear of the invading army. The patriots were shot, or hanged, or sent to the galleys. A few bloody and despairing conflicts ended the strife. The same armies which six years before had crushed popular liberty in France, replacing the old Bourbons upon the throne, now again trailed the banners of freedom in the dust, and re-established another branch of the Bourbons upon the throne of Naples.

On the 12th of May, 1820, Ferdinand, the execrable tyrant, re-entered his kingdom. Several months were vigorously devoted to confiscations, executions, and banishments. The Neapolitans were disarmed, and their fortresses garrisoned by Austrian troops. An army of sixty thousand Austrians, including seven thousand cavalry, supported by a tax upon the Neapolitans, remained in occupation of the kingdom. Austria then turned to Piedmont, and with a merciless hand perpetrated the same atrocity there. For the ten succeeding years the silence and repose of the dungeon brooded over Italy.

In the revolution of 1830 in France, the despotism of the throne was merely modified by the expulsion of the elder and effete branch of the Bourbons, and the adoption of the younger and more vigorous, in the person of Louis Philippe. This slight movement in behalf of freedom, agitated enslaved Italy from the Alps to Calabria. But Austrian armies were encamped upon her plains and intrenched in her fortresses, and they crushed the movement with an iron hand.

Eighteen years then passed away, during which Italy was held by Austrian despotism, manacled hand and foot.

"Austria," says Count Cavour, "is an Old Man of the Mountain seated upon the shoulders of Italy day and night—an incubus—a terror—an intolerable burden. Italy, gagged and blinded, totters along with this horrible old man astride her neck, goading her to desolation and yet guiding all her movements."

In the year 1848 there was another revolution in Paris, which overthrew Louis Philippe and introduced to France, first the Republic, and then the Empire under Louis Napoleon. This memorable revolution, overthrowing a despotism wielded for the benefit of the aristocracy, and introducing in its stead a government almost equally absolute, but which consecrated its absolutism to the maintenance of the cause of the people, shook Austria like an earthquake through all her conglomerated and diversified realms. The significance of this revolution in France has not been popularly understood in the United States. It has been regarded as merely a change of masters, France exchanging the despotism of the Bourbons for a despotism, equally relentless, of Louis Napoleon.

Instead of this it was a radical change of administration, overthrowing the reign of aristocratic privilege and introducing the reign of republican equality. The people, conscious that nothing less than dictatorial power could maintain their cause against the nobles, aided as they were by the sympathies of all aristocratic Europe, wisely and willingly placed that power in the hands of their illustrious champion, Louis Napoleon. In the present state of France, it is probable that no government can stand which is not upheld by the energies of essentially a dictatorship. The people have only to choose between a despotism upholding the assumptions of the aristocracy and a despotism maintaining popular rights. Of course they choose the latter.

Thus the Empire, in France, was re-established by the masses of the people. They drove aristocratic absolutism from the throne, and placed Louis Napoleon, the representative of democracy, upon it. With sagacity seldom if ever surpassed, Louis Napoleon has proved himself equal to the trust. Had his government been less decisive, long ago popular rights would have been trampled in the mire. Under his sway France has taken her position at the head of all the European monarchies.

A revolution of so marked a character of course agitated Europe to its centre. The Austrian provinces in Italy struck for freedom. Austria had spread the net-work of her diplomacy over the whole of Italy, occupying the territory, garrisoning the fortresses, overawing the councils, and dictating the policy. The net revenue forwarded from Italy to her Austrian master at Vienna, in the year 1847, was twenty millions of dollars. And this was in addition to the enormous expense of her troops quartered upon the Italians to hold them in subjection, and all the voluptuous extravagance of the vice-regal courts. The land-tax amounted to twenty-five per cent. on the gross receipts.

The late Count Cavour speaks in the following terms of the character of the occupation of Italy by the Austrians: "The Austrians are not established, but merely encamped, in these provinces. All houses, from the humblest cottage to the most sumptuous palace, are closed against the agents of that government. In the public places, the theatres, the cafés, and in the streets, there is a complete line of separation between them and the native inhabitants, and any one would say that it is a country invaded by an enemy's army, rendered the more odious by its insolence and its arrogance."

It is true that there were some Italians satisfied with this degrading servitude. "I don't care an orange peel," said a fat Neapolitan to Mr. About, "for politics. I take for granted we have got a villainous government, for all the world says so. But my grandfather made twenty thousand ducats by a shop. My father doubled this capital, and I have bought an estate which brings me in six per cent. for my money. I feed well four times a day. I have a good digestion, and I weigh over two hundred pounds, and at supper, over my third glass of Capri, who can blame me if I hiccup out, Vive le Roi?"

"A hog," continues his commentator, "that was passing under the window, gave a grunt of approbation."

By the treaty of Vienna Sardinia had been constituted nominally an independent kingdom, embracing the Island of Sardinia and the continental provinces of Piedmont, Savoy, and Nice. This feeble kingdom, overshadowed by Austria, was not permitted to retain the free institutions it had enjoyed as a part of the kingdom of Italy, but was forced to adopt the despotic rule which the Court of Vienna and the re-established Bourbons had imposed upon it. The revolution in France roused the enthusiasm of the friends of freedom all over Europe. Venice and Lombardy rose en masse to drive out their detested Austrian masters. Sardinia, hoping that her hour had come to escape from thrall-dom, marched to the aid of her Italian brethren.

The Austrians were soon driven out of Lombardy and across the Mincio. Hungary then sprung to arms against the tyrant. The doom of the hoary despotism seemed to be sealed. But the sympathies of all the courts of Europe, excepting the newly-established empire in France, were hostile to these peoples struggling for constitutional rights. Even the British Government was, as ever, with the dynasties, and not with the people. In reference to this struggle the Edinburgh Review says:

"It is utterly repugnant to the first principles of our own policy, and to every page in our own history, to lend encouragement to the separation of nationalities from other empires, which we fiercely resist when it threatens to dismember our own."

Thus frowned upon by England and all despotic Europe, and invaded anew by the disciplined armies which Austria poured down into the plains of Lombardy through all the passes of the Tyrolean Alps, Italy was again subdued. Radetsky, in command of the imperial forces, with tiger-like ferocity desolated the land with fire and sword. Sardinia was compelled to make a humiliating peace, and Venice and Lombardy, bound hand and foot, were punished as slaves are punished who are baffled in an attempt at insurrection.

It was in this conflict that the city of Brescia was stormed by the infamous Haynau. The following is a literal translation of his summons to the city, issued March 1, 1849:

"I am here, at the head of my troops, to summon the town to surrender immediately and without conditions. If this is not done by mid-day, and if all the barricades are not entirely removed, the town will be taken by assault, and delivered up to all the horrors of devastation. All the issues of the town will be occupied by my soldiers, and longer resistance will entail certain destruction. Breschians, you know me. I will keep my word."

The doomed city defended itself with the heroism of despair. There were 30,000 inhabitants within the walls. Gray-headed men, and even women and children, united in the common defense. A merciless bombardment continued for ten days, till the streets were clogged with the dead, and the whole city seemed crumbled into ruins. Haynau was half delirious with rage. In his report, he says :

"When I saw that a great number of our men had already fallen, and that neither the ceaseless rain of bombs nor the general assault abated the fury of the inhabitants, who obstinately defended themselves, I had recourse to the last resources of war, ordering that no prisoners should be made, that all should be butchered, and that the houses which resisted should be given to the flames and leveled to the ground."

The town was sacked, in the most terrible sense of the term. The ferocious Austrian troops rushed into every house which was left standing. Flames and blood reigned every where. Women, and even young girls in the schools, were violated and then murdered. After all resistance had ceased one-fourth of the population were massacred. The most illustrious citizens, men and women, were put to death with cruel tortures, and their bodies were thrown into heaps outside of the walls, until fear of pestilence compelled the Austrians to bury them. Many young girls were reserved as a part of the plunder, and were sold to the brutal soldiery. During three days this traffic went on, and Austrian officers were seen countenancing these proceedings. Men were shot dozens at a time, and noble women were stripped and whipped to death.

Such was the tragedy of Breschia. Haynau was assigned to the Governorship of Hungary as his reward for this fiend-like energy.

The conflict in Hungary, and around the very throne of the Austrian Emperor, demands more particular notice. The intelligence of the revolution in Paris reached Vienna on the 1st of March, 1848. The city was thrown into intense excitement. The professors of the university, followed by two thousand students and an immense concourse of citizens, crowded the palace with a petition praying for "reform tempered by wisdom." The measures they urged were religious liberty, freedom of the press, and a Legislature which should represent the people.

Metternich, terrified by the uprising, fled in disguise to London. Ferdinand, equally terrified, promised all the patriots asked. The ministry was changed, a national guard organized, and Austria seemed on the eve of regeneration. The patriots did not desire a republic, but merely a constitutional monarchy. Gratified with the seeming compliance of the Emperor, the people rallied around him with enthusiasm.

Intelligence of these events reached Presburg, the capital of Hungary, when the Diet of that kingdom was in session. The Diet sent Kossuth, accompanied by one hundred and fifty Hungarian gentlemen, to Vienna, imploring for Hungary a Legislature of their own, with freedom of religion and of the press. Immense crowds in the streets of Vienna greeted this delegation with shouts of "Long live Kossuth!" The panic-stricken Emperor yielded to their demands. All aristocratic privileges were abolished in Hungary; and the peasants, who for ages had been held in feudal servitude, were set free by an act of universal emancipation. This sudden transition of many millions of the Slavonic races from slavery to freedom was not accompanied by any lawless violence.

While Ferdinand was, with an assumed air of content, making these forced concessions, he was treacherously preparing to strike the patriots a fatal blow. An Austrian army was dispatched to Prague, which army for forty-eight hours bombarded the wretched city, leaving it a gory pile of smouldering ruins. The cry of agony which rose from Prague thrilled upon the ear of Germany, and roused such a burst of indignation that Ferdinand fled in disguise to Innspruck, a strong fortress in the Tyrol, three hundred miles southeast from Vienna.

The flight of the Emperor created fearful excitement, for it was a proclamation of war against the people. The Imperial army, under aristocratic leaders, commenced the work of vengeance in Hungary. The sky was illumined at night by the flames of burning villages, and obscured by day by the smoke of the vast conflagrations. The Emperor, supported by a powerful army, returned to Vienna. The Hungarians rallied around Kossuth as their leader. In September, 1848, an Austrian army of 30,000 men entered Hungary. Kossuth raised 100,000 to repel them. After many bloody battles the tide of victory turned so decidedly in favor of the Hungarians that the patriots in Vienna were encouraged again to rise; and this they did with a spirit so fearless and determined that the monarchy was again laid prostrate at the feet of the people.

The Emperor, as cowardly as he was treacherous, dismissed his aristocratic ministry and appointed a popular one in its stead, recalled his proclamations against Hungary, withdrew his army, and issued a decree of amnesty for all political offenses. Thus disarming suspicion, again he fled. Gathering his army around him, again he commenced his march upon Vienna.

From the steeples of the city the terrified inhabitants soon beheld sixty thousand troops—infantry, artillery, and cavalry—approaching to wreak merciless vengeance. In despair the whole population sprung to arms. On the morning of the 20th of October the bombardment commenced. All the day and all the night the terrific storm continued. The city was now on fire in twenty places. The streets were clogged with the mangled bodies of the dead. The exhausted survivors were compelled to capitulate. The Emperor with his mercenary troops took military possession of the city, and the old despotism, cemented in the blood of the people, was reconstructed.

Ferdinand was now weary of his thorny crown, and having no son of his own, abdicated, December 2, 1848, in favor of his nephew Francis-Joseph, a young man eighteen years of age. The youthful Emperor, to conciliate his people, promised them a liberal constitution—a promise which he had no intention of fulfilling. Hungary was willing to acknowledge the Emperor as its sovereign, but demanded a Legislature of its own. This kingdom, larger in territory than England and Ireland united, contained a population of 13,000,000. Francis-Joseph threw the Hungarian commissioners into prison, abolished their constitution, and dissolved their Legislature. The proud army, which had so terribly chastised Vienna, was sent to inflict the same doom upon Pesth, then the capital of Hungary.

One of the most awful of civil wars now desolated this unhappy kingdom. Month after month the battle raged. The heroic Hungarians were gradually gaining ground and driving back their invaders when Francis-Joseph appealed to Russia for help. An army of 162,000 men was immediately dispatched by Nicholas to crush the patriots of Hungary. Even the British Government, through Lord Palmerston, sanctioned this intervention of Russia, assuming that the Hungarians were subjects in revolt against their lawful sovereign. The two most powerful despotisms on the globe were now combined against Hungary. The clarion voice of Kossuth rang throughout the land. An army of 140,000 men was speedily in the field, and on the 14th of April, 1849, Hungary issued her declaration of independence. The allied army, 240,000 strong, commenced its ravages of the doomed land.

A series of bloody and disastrous battles ensued, in which the Hungarians, though they fought with courage never surpassed, were overpowered by numbers. Treason also was enlisted in aid of the despots. Georgey, one of the Hungarian generals, animated by the spirit of Benedict Arnold, surrendered, unconditionally, his whole army of 30,000 men, with one hundred and forty pieces of artillery, to the Russians. Hungary was again a shackled slave at the feet of her conquerors. Confiscations, imprisonments, and executions ensued, which extorted a wail of anguish which thrilled upon the ears of Christendom.

Kossuth, accompanied by about five thousand Hungarians, escaped into Turkey. After a brief residence there, being nobly protected by the Sultan from their foes, many of them secured a passage to England, and thence to America; and now they are scattered widely over the world, the martyrs of liberty. Kossuth, after pleading in America the cause of his country in strains of eloquence never surpassed, returned to England, where he remains the idol of every generous heart, awaiting the dawn of a brighter day.

Nicholas having thus aided Austria, was indignant that the Emperor refused to come to his aid when he was struggling against England, France, and Turkey at Sebastopol. The young Emperor Alexander is at the present moment on far more friendly terms with Louis Napoleon than with Francis-Joseph.

For some years the kingdom of Sardinia has been making gradual but decisive advances in the path of constitutional liberty. It was the only State in Italy which maintained even the semblance of independence. This kingdom enjoyed a representative Legislature, with freedom of conscience and comparative liberty of the press. Anxiously Austria watched the influence of constitutional liberty in Sardinia, fully conscious that free institutions there incessantly approached his despotism, and would finally lead his enthralled subjects to revolt. Cautiously he prepared for war with Sardinia, that that kingdom might be brought under despotic sway.

The Emperor commenced his menace by multiplying his military resources, strengthening his fortifications, and assembling large masses of troops on the Sardinian frontier. Victor Emanuel took the alarm, and began also to arm. Francis-Joseph, wishing to "pick a quarrel," sent an insolent demand to Ferdinand to disband the corps he was raising and place his army on a peace footing. Sardinia, though conscious that in a struggle with Austria she was but a babe in the grasp of a giant, refused, with dignity replying,

"Austria, which increases its army on our frontiers, and threatens to invade our territory, because liberty here reigns with order, because the cries of suffering of oppressed Italy here find a hearing—Austria dares to intimate to us, armed only in self-defense, that we are to lay down our arms and put ourselves in her power."

In this hour of peril Sardinia applied to Louis Napoleon for help. The republican Emperor of France, conscious that Sardinia was the only kingdom in Europe to whom France could look for alliance should the despots of Europe again combine against the rights of the French people to choose their own form of government, informed Austria, through his ambassador at Vienna, in diplomatic phrase, that he could not look with indifference upon the invasion of Sardinia by Austrian troops. Regardless of this announcement, Austria crossed the Ticino with an army of two hundred and fifty thousand men, and commenced her march for Turin.

Louis Napoleon, with the energy of his illustrious uncle, almost in an hour had two hundred thousand men on the march to help the Sardinians. On the 10th of May, 1859, he, in person, left Paris, and embarking at Marseilles, landed at Genoa on the 12th.

"Austria," said Louis Napoleon in the manifesto which he issued on this occasion, "in invading the territory of the King of Sardinia, our ally, declares war against us. She thus violates treaties and justice, and violates our frontiers. Sardinia having accepted the condition which ought to have insured peace, one asks what can be the reason of this sudden invasion? Is it that Austria has brought matters to this extremity that she must either rule up to the Alps, or Italy must be free to the shores of the Adriatic? for in this country every corner of territory which remains independent endangers her power.

"France has shown her hatred of anarchy. She has been pleased to give me a power strong enough to reduce into nonentity the abettors of disorder, and the incorrigible members of those old factions whom one incessantly sees confederating with our enemies; but she has not, for all that, abdicated her task of civilization. Her natural allies have always been those who desire the improvement of the human race, and when she draws the sword it is not to dominate, but to liberate. The object of this war, then, is to restore Italy to herself, not to impose upon her a change of masters; and we shall then have upon our frontiers a friendly people who will owe to us their independence."

No language can describe the enthusiasm with which Louis Napoleon was received at Genoa. He, without an hour's delay, placed himself at the head of the army and took the conduct of the campaign. On the 20th of May, eight days after his landing, the advance corps of the French and Sardinian army, by rapid marches, was brought to face the foe. It was veteran against veteran, and the battle was fiercely fought; but the eagles of France triumphed, and the Austrians were driven back with great slaughter.

Again, on the 30th, large divisions of the two armies encountered each other at Palestro, and the Austrians again met with a bloody repulse. The Austrians made another stand, with all their concentrated force, upon the field of Magenta, their line of battle extending for nearly thirty miles. The French and Sardinians, led by the Emperor of France, assailed them with skill and courage which nothing could resist. It was the 4th of June. In that battle forty thousand were left upon the field dead or wounded. The broken battalions of the Austrians fled, mangled, bleeding, and despairing, to their renowned quadrilateral of fortresses in Venetia. The French overtook them in their flight and again chastised them severely at Solferino. The remnant escaped to the fortresses, where they were received by powerful reserves, and where they were abundantly provided with all the materials for the most desperate defense. Louis Napoleon, to the surprise of all Europe, proposed peace, and the war was closed by the treaty of Villafranca, which recognized the entire independence of Sardinia.

Why did not Louis Napoleon, flushed with victory, drive the Austrians out of Italy? For the following reasons: 1. His engineers assured him that, though the fortresses of the quadrilateral could be taken, it would require the sacrifice of the lives of at least fifty thousand French soldiers, and more than that number of Austrians must also perish. As Louis Napoleon rode over the gory fields of Magenta and Solferino, he was overwhelmed in view of the misery which met his eye. His heart recoiled from the purchase of the fortresses at so fearful a price. 2. All despotic Europe, including the British Government, was in sympathy with the Austrians, and both Prussia and England threatened to send their armies against France, should Louis Napoleon push his victory any further. Thus Louis Napoleon was compelled to stop, or embroil all Europe in a war, the result of which might be to crush every vestige of constitutional liberty from the Continent.

The peril of despotic Europe was indeed great. The people of Parma, Modena, and Tuscany had driven out their Austrian rulers, and thrown themselves under the protection of Victor Emanuel. From all the States of Italy young men were rushing to the Sardinian standards. The Hungarians were again grasping their arms, elated with hope, and even the Poles were dreaming that the hour for their deliverance had at length arrived.

Had England co-operated with France, or even withheld her menace, Austria might have been driven out of Italy, and Hungary might again have been free. There is something heart-rending in Kossuth's imploring cry that England would not interfere in behalf of Austria.

"I love," exclaims the noble Hungarian, "my fatherland more than myself—more than any thing on earth! And, inspired by this love, I ask one boon—only one boon from England—and that is, that she should not support Austria. England has not interfered for liberty; let her not interfere for the worst of despotisms—that of Austria!"

The Cabinet of St. James to this appeal turned a deaf ear, and Venetia and Hungary were left to gnaw their chains. The treaty of Villafranca was, however, a magnificent achievement for Italy, and paved the way for its subsequent strides of grandeur. Austria was compelled to consent that Lombardy, Tuscany, Parma, and Modena should attach themselves to the Sardinian kingdom: thus adding immensely to its population, wealth, and power, and making it the efficient nucleus for regenerated and united Italy.

These events have greatly alarmed despotic Europe, and the despots are combining to arrest the spread of light and liberty. The wonderful success of Garibaldi, in emancipating Sicily and Naples, and thus forming, by their annexation to Sardinia, a united Italy containing 20,000,000 of people, is the great political marvel of the age.

Austria is now driven from all the States of Italy excepting Venetia. There can be no question that the Venetians will soon strike for freedom and annexation to their Italian brethren. The Austrian troops will be poured into the territory. Italy will rush to the rescue. Hungary, now waiting for this movement, will again rise and demand independence. Russia and Prussia will join Austria. France will march to the help of the Italians. Such doubtless will be the next move in this great game of the nations. What will the British Government do? If we can judge from the past, it is certain that it will have no word of sympathy to utter for those who are struggling through blood and woe for constitutional liberty. But it is to be hoped that the warm hearts of the British people will restrain the Government from joining the ranks of the despots.

WHEN THOU SLEEPEST.

WHEN thou sleepest, lulled in night,
 Art thou lost in vacancy?
 Does no silent inward light,
 Softly breaking, fall on thee?
 Does no dream on quiet wing
 Float a moment mid that ray,
 Touch some answering mental string,
 Wake a note and pass away?

When thou watchest, as the hours
 Mute and blind are speeding on,
 O'er that rayless path, where lowers
 Muffled midnight, black and lone;
 Comes there nothing hovering near,
 Thought or half reality,
 Whispering marvels in thine ear,
 Every word a mystery,

Chanting low an ancient lay,
 Every plaintive note a spell,
 Clearing memory's clouds away,
 Showing scenes thy heart loves well?
 Songs forgot, in childhood sung,
 Airs in youth beloved and known,
 Whispered by that airy tongue,
 Once again are made thine own.

Be it dream in haunted sleep,
 Be it thought in vigil lone,
 Drink'st thou not a rapture deep
 From the feeling, 'tis thine own?
 All thine own; thou need'st not tell
 What bright form thy slumber blest;
 All thine own; remember well
 Night and shade were round thy rest.

Nothing looked upon thy bed
 Save the lonely watch-light's gleam;
 Not a whisper, not a tread
 Scared thy spirit's glorious dream.
 Sometimes, when the midnight gale
 Breathed a moan and then was still,
 Seemed the spell of thought to fail,
 Checked by one ecstatic thrill;

Felt as all external things,
 Robed in moonlight, smote thine eye;
 Then thy spirit's waiting wings
 Quivered, trembled, spread to fly;
 Then th' aspirer wildly swelling
 Looked, where mid transcendancy
 Star to star was mutely telling
 Heaven's resolve and fate's decree.

Oh! it longed for holier fire
 Than this spark in earthly shrine;
 Oh! it soared, and higher, higher,
 Sought to reach a home divine.
 Hopeless quest! soon weak and weary
 Flagged the pinion, drooped the plume,
 And again in sadness dreary
 Came the baffled wanderer home.

And again it turned for soothing
 To th' unfinished, broken dream;
 While, the ruffled current smoothing,
 Thought rolled on her startled stream.
 I have felt this cherished feeling,
 Sweet and known to none but me;
 Still I felt it nightly healing
 Each dark day's despondency.

CHARLOTTE BRONTË.

CAUSE AND EFFECT.

“DEAR me! There is Janie crying again. What in the world is the matter now?”

And Mrs. Russell laid aside her work, with a look and gesture of extreme irritation, and went out into the hall to see what had happened. A child's loud crying rang up from below stairs, mingled with the harsh tones of an unmitigated Irish voice, scolding and soothing by turns.

“Sure an' it serves ye jist right, an' why don't ye mind me when I spake to ye? Ain't I jist after tellin' ye to kape away from the lobster? Come along in till I wrap up your finger now, an' stop cryin' that way, I tell ye. It's no good to raise the land about it.”

“Rosy!” Mrs. Russell put her lips to the speaking-tube in the hall, and called sharply. “Tell Janie to come up to me directly. What in the world is all this noise about?”

“It's jist the lobster's snapped at her finger, ma'am,” Rosy shouted back in answer. “I told her not to middle with it, but she wouldn't pay no attintion to me.”

“Troublesome, disobedient child!” Mrs. Russell exclaimed under her breath, her lips tightening and her brow darkening with vexation, as she leaned over the baluster waiting for the lagging steps of the little culprit. “What does all this mean?” she said, sternly, as the child, still sobbing and wringing her wounded finger, came wearily up the stairs. “Why don't you mind when you are spoken to, and what are you doing in the kitchen at all? I am not sorry for you in the least; I am glad you are hurt, and I hope you always will be whenever you are doing what you ought not to do.”

“You're never sorry—you never care what happens to me!” sobbed the child, bitterly. “You pity Fred when he cries, but you only scold me, and you don't love me a bit, that you don't.”

“Because you are such a naughty little girl,” said the mother, angrily. “So disobedient, and so fretful. How can I love you when you are always crying and cross, or else doing some disobedient thing?”

“Freddy cries too,” persisted the child; “but you love him.”

“Don't speak to me in that way again; I will not allow it,” said Mrs. Russell, sternly. “Freddy is a baby; it's a very different thing his crying. As for you, you will be loved when you deserve it by trying to be good. Now you only deserve punishment; so go into that little room and stay there until I give you leave to come out.”

A burst of heart-broken sobs, and “Oh, mamma! please don't shut me up—I will be good!” followed the harsh command; but the mother was too irritated to have any pity for the poor little pleader, and without a single comforting word or promise, to help her bear her punishment, she was put into the little room and there left alone to sob and cry herself to sleep if she pleased.

Mrs. Russell went back into her own room, seated herself in her sewing-chair by the open window, and took up again the work which she had laid down. It was a pretty little muslin frock, evidently intended for Janie, by the size, and, judging from what was already done, evidently going to be an elaborate affair. The skirt was covered with flounces, or rather ruffles, of a pretty robe-pattern; the waist and sleeves were a combination of puffs and frills; all extremely pretty and graceful, but involving a wonderful outlay of time and trouble, as any experienced eye could see at a glance. Mrs. Russell was hardly in the humor to go on with work requiring so much care. Her hands trembled, her head throbbed, her whole frame quivered with suppressed excitement; so that she put the flounced skirt out of her nervous fingers presently, and took up a little linen chemise-yoke, which lay, ready stamped and traced for embroidery, in the work-basket beside her.

This proved hardly more quieting, however: still the tremulous hands refused to guide the needle with their usual swift skill; still the brow darkened at some inward recollection, and half-uttered sentences, broken off before they passed her lips, attested her mental restlessness. Every thing was quiet about her now; little Freddy was taking his morning nap in the crib not far from her chair; and Janie's smothered sobs had sunk into silence by this time. But some way they seemed to smite still upon the mother's heart, although her ear could no longer distinguish them.

It was a relief when a ring at the door-bell announced a visitor, and she listened eagerly for the sound of the voice, hoping it might be some favorite among her acquaintance, whose lively conversation would put her into a better humor with herself. Nor was she disappointed: the sweet, clear voice asking "Is Mrs. Russell at home?" was one dear and familiar, although a year had passed since she had heard it; and Mrs. Russell sprang to the stairs and ran down to greet the new-comer with an eager,

"Why, Emily! Emily Somers! is it really you? How glad I am to see you!"

"But not half so glad as I am to see you," was the warm response. "If you had lived among strangers a whole year, Louise, as I have, you would know how to be glad at the sight of an old friend. But where are the children?—Freddy, who was nothing but a kitten when I went away—I suppose he can almost walk by this time! and Janie, my special little darling—I want to see them both. Mayn't I come up stairs? I'm going to stay all the morning with you, and I like the nursery a great deal better than the parlor."

"You always did," Mrs. Russell answered, laughing, as she led the way up stairs again. "Freddy's asleep, though, so we'll have to talk softly if we sit here."

"What a picture he is!" Mrs. Somers exclaimed, as she bent over the crib and watched the rosy boy in his deep slumber. "But after all, Louise, he is not so pretty as Janie was. Where is she now? I am impatient to see her again."

"Janie is asleep, too, I believe," Mrs. Russell answered, and the worried look, dispelled for a while, came back to her face. "If you must know, Emily, Janie is not so good a child as she was a year ago, and I am obliged to punish her very often of late. She is in the little back-room now—I had to put her there for disobedience, and I suppose she has cried herself to sleep."

"Poor little Janie!" said Mrs. Somers, pityingly. "That's too bad, when I thought I should make her so happy to-day. I have got a basketful of presents for her here, and I told every child that I knew in Chicago what a good little darling Janie Russell was. Louise, I won't believe she is so naughty as you say—she can't have changed so much in a year!"

"I wish I couldn't believe it, myself," Mrs. Russell sighed. "If there is one thing above another that I like, it is to see a child cheerful and childlike. But Janie has a fretful, whining way with her that puts me out of all patience. Every little disappointment, every little accident, every little contradiction—things that a good-tempered child would hardly notice—she either cries over, or else puts on such a sullen, scowling, unlovely face that I almost hate her, for the minute. I declare, Emily, I have been tempted sometimes to wish that I had never brought her into the world, for I am afraid that she will never be any thing but a misery to herself and to every one around her."

Mrs. Russell's cheeks were glowing and her eyes luminous with the excitement suppressed all the morning, but finding vent in words at last. Her friend looked into the flushed face, and listened to the passionate language with a very grave and pained expression.

"How sorry I am to hear all this!" she exclaimed, with genuine sympathy. "But dear Louise, is it quite impossible to make a change? Janie is such a mere child—only six years old! The fault can not be very deeply rooted yet."

"It is the habit of her life at any rate," was the answer. "So much so that I believe it is her natural disposition. Before Freddy was born she was the only child, you know, and naturally was more indulged than she can be now. That prevented our noticing her unlovely disposition: when she had her own way in every thing, and some one always at hand to amuse her, there was no opportunity to display her temper. But now, of course, neither I nor the nurse can devote so much time and attention to her as before; and the consequence is that she has developed the most fretful, complaining, jealous disposition! Oh, you can't think, Emily, what a trial she has grown to be to me."

"Have you ever sent her to school?" asked Mrs. Somers.

"Yes. Early in the spring I sent her to a little day-school in the neighborhood; but I took her out after the first month. There were some very ill-bred children in the school, and Janie was quick to learn all the evil they were so ready to teach her."

"Then you give her lessons at home, I suppose?" pursued Mrs. Somers.

"No, indeed; I can't spare the time."

"How does she occupy herself all day, then?"

"Fretting and teasing me; those are her main occupations, I believe."

Mrs. Somers smiled: "I don't wonder!" she exclaimed.

"Louise, I beg your pardon; but really, if the child has nothing to do—no lessons, no companions, no occupation of any kind—how can she help fretting? I am sure, if I were in her place, I should fret myself to death!"

"It's absurd to put yourself in comparison with her," said Mrs. Russell, with some irritation. "Of course a woman needs employment; but how do other children occupy themselves? Why, they play, and amuse themselves with a thousand trifles, nobody knows what. But Janie has no play in her. She clings to some one else always, and wants every amusement prepared especially for her, without an idea of seeking it for herself."

"There is a reason for that, Louise. Up to the time of Freddy's birth she had a nurse, whose chief business was to provide entertainment for her: and you yourself found time to spend a great many hours in reading to her, telling her stories, and otherwise interesting her. Now she is suddenly thrown upon her own resources, without ever having had them cultivated; told that she is old enough now to amuse herself, and yet has never been taught how. I think it is hardly reasonable to expect a cheerful and self-dependent child from such a training."

Mrs. Russell colored and was silent, for she could not deny the truth of her friend's reasoning. Emily Somers went on kindly but fearlessly. She was one of those rare people who can speak a truth hard for other people to hear, in a way so honest, frank, and kind, that no offense can be taken; and Mrs. Russell listened to her with no vexation in her heart, only a wish that she herself were as clear-headed, sweet-tempered, and pure-hearted as her friend.

"I used to think before I went away that you were spoiling Janie," said Mrs. Somers. "You gave yourself up to her so much, and indulged her to her own hurt sometimes—in the one point of reading to her, especially. It was pretty to see her precocious interest and her wonderful memory; to have her listen by the hour to books that older children could not understand a word of, and to hear her repeat Casabianca, and The Caldon Low, and The Battle of Blenheim, and dear knows how many more of the same sort, Louise!—before her baby lips could fairly shape the syllables. But I could not help thinking many a time that all that was doing her harm, exciting her brain unnaturally, and unfitting her for healthy childish enjoyments. I was glad when I knew that another child was coming, so that there would be less time to spend on Janie in this way."

"And yet you were just now blaming me for not giving her lessons at home," interposed Mrs. Russell.

"Oh, but that is quite different. There is no unwholesome excitement about the slow, uphill work of learning to read and spell—not the slightest danger that she will be so absorbed in it as to grow nervous and morbid, as she did under the influence of all those stories and poems. No! what Janie needs—what every child needs, and especially those who have been tampered with (pardon the expression, Louise!) until they have grown morbid—is a regular and judicious alternation of exercise, amusement, and something like work. Janie is old enough now to have her little thimble and sit beside you with a basket of scraps to sew: she is old enough to have a slate and pencil, and draw little pictures, and do little sums: she is old enough to learn to read, and to find rivers and towns on a map, and to make pot-hooks and hangers with a lead-pencil. But of course she can do none of these things unless some one kindly, patiently, perseveringly teaches her; and the question is, Louise, whether a mother's time would not be better spent in doing this than in making pretty flounced frocks, and embroidering dear little chemisettes to decorate the little body, while the soul goes undressed."

Mrs. Russell looked up without a word, but her lips quivered, and her eyes were full of tears. Emily Somers met them with her own bright, steady gaze.

"Dear Louise, am I very unkind?" she asked. "You know I don't mean to be; but do please tell me, for curiosity's sake, how long you have been at work upon this little furbelow. It would take me a week to make such a thing!"

"It has kept me busy for two days," Mrs. Russell answered, smiling through her tears; "and it will hardly get finished short of another day. But, Emily, the frock is a piece of economy, after all. I bought for myself a fine organ-dy, which was offered me for half its value, because the robe-pattern was old-fashioned. The muslin was extremely pretty, and there was plenty to make a full dress without using the flounces at all. So I bought it and made it up; but it seemed a pity to waste all those yards of flouncing and trimming, really—now wasn't it? So I thought I could contrive a dress for Janie. And you must allow that nothing could be prettier, Emily. This delicate green is just the color for her 'amber-blond' complexion, and she will look like a picture in it."

"Very like a fashion-plate," said Emily, with a smile; "but that isn't the kind of picture I fancy most, Louise, specially for children."

"Now don't be provoking," Mrs. Russell exclaimed, half playfully, half in earnest. "I insist that the frock is an economy, for I could not have made any other use of the flounces, and it would have been a shame to waste them."

"Did Janie really need another dress?" asked

Mrs. Somers quietly, glancing at a basket of freshly-ironed clothes which Rosy had just brought up, and on top of which lay several tucked and embroidered, and otherwise ornamented white dresses.

"No;" Mrs. Russell answered, hesitating a little: "she did not exactly need it, to be sure. She has plenty of white frocks; but then she had nothing very nice in colors, and one gets tired of white, worn so constantly."

"Hardly, when they are so daintily made as Janie's tucked cambrics," Mrs. Somers said, pleasantly. "I never like any thing in colors half so well for children, and never feel so much like a lady myself as when I have on a white wrapper. But I was thinking chiefly of the time and patience it must have cost, and wondering whether Janie was not more than usually aggravating during the time you were at work upon this."

"That she has been!" was the emphatic response. "She was punished three times yesterday; and to-day—poor little thing! I was so vexed with her that I never even looked at her finger to see if it was really hurt."

"What was the trouble to-day? Tell me about it," Mrs. Somers said; and Mrs. Russell proceeded to give her the history of the morning's performance.

She was surprised, and ashamed too, it must be confessed, when she related it, to see how slight a ground she had for so much vexation, and how unnecessarily harsh she had been with the child.

"Oh, Louise, how could you!" Emily Somers exclaimed, at more than one point of the narrative; and at last, when it was finished, she said, energetically,

"Louise, upon my word, if I had known you were treating my godchild in this fashion, I should have made a special journey from Chicago on purpose to give you a scolding. I declare you are perfectly cruel with her!"

"For the elegant Mrs. Somers that speech has a redundancy of expletives," said Mrs. Russell, laughing.

"Don't make a jest of it, Louise; I do not feel like laughing:" and Emily Somers's face and tone were very earnest indeed. "Do you know you are taking just the course to alienate your child's affection and confidence entirely? And some day you may repent of it as bitterly as I once had to repent for unnecessary harshness to a child."

"You?" Mrs. Russell looked incredulous. "I don't believe you were ever harsh with any body, Emily—at least without the best of reasons."

Any one would have thought her words justified who looked into Mrs. Somers's fair, thoughtful face. The clear, truth-telling eyes whose first glance startled you with their loveliness, whose next compelled you to a perfect faith in their owner, the delicate mouth with its almost childlike sweetness of expression, the whole contour and impression of her countenance, gave one the consciousness of a thoroughly well-balanced mind, a truly loving and unselfish spirit. There was a certain patient quietness, a certain subdued resignation visible at times when her face was in repose, which might have told a story of past struggle and conquest to a close observer. But Mrs. Russell had never seen her in any other circumstances, and knew but little of her earlier history.

"I have never told you much about myself, Louise, have I?" Emily said, after a little silence. "I have a great mind to give you a leaf out of my book of experience now."

"I wish you would—though I suppose it will be by way of warning for myself."

"Yes. I should not give myself the pain of putting the story into words for the first time in my life otherwise. It is because I do think you are growing too severe with Janie that I am willing to tell you what an awful lesson I once had for the same error. You know I am older than you, Louise."

"Indeed! no one would think so," Mrs. Russell exclaimed, quickly.

"It is true, though, and I have had at least five years more experience as a wife and mother. I was married too young entirely, and ought to have been under a mother's care myself, at the time when I was nursing my own baby. But I did not know that. I was full of self-confidence and innumerable theories, and my poor little Marian's brief life was robbed of half its brightness on account of them. One of them was that a child should be taught self-dependence and self-control from its earliest consciousness. So I used to make her lie in her cradle awake for an hour or two every day; and the consequence was, that she got a cast in her eyes before she was three months old, from lifting her little hands and looking at them so long in one position."

"Freddy used to do so," interposed Mrs. Russell. "But the doctor warned me of the danger in time to save his eyes."

"I was too self-willed to take advice or warning in those days," Mrs. Somers continued; "and resented the least interference with any of my rules. My husband's mother was one of our family; and though we were heartily fond of each other, and the best of friends in every thing else, there was a continual disagreement between us about the management of the child. It grew more decided as Marian grew older, and I had more room for the exercise of my theories. She thought me cruelly strict—I thought her unwisely, ruinously indulgent; and there were constantly recurring disputes whenever Marian was reproofed, or punished, or restrained in any way that her grandmother did not approve for her darling. She told me more than once that I should kill her by my cruelty to my own child—that her life was made wretched by the sight of it! I resented such speeches bitterly then, and thought myself shamefully insulted; but there came a time when I was forced to remember them—God knows with what anguish of self-reproach!

"One day, when Marian was about four years old, I sent her out to play on the sidewalk before the house. She did not want to go, for, thanks to my training, she had very little play in her, as you say about Janie. But according to my maxim of instant obedience, I would not listen to a word of objection from her, and the little thing went out in silence to do as I told her. Not many minutes after I heard a sudden scream from the street, then a succession of loud, sobbing cries. I leaned out of the window to see what was the matter, but Marian was out of sight. Her grandmother hurried in from her room, hearing the cries, and was about to rush out into the street to find the child. But I stopped her peremptorily:

"It is not your place, mother, to do any such thing. Anne, do you go and bring Miss Marian in directly, and tell her to stop that crying instantly, or I will punish her when she comes in."

"The servant hurried off to do my bidding, and mother turned to me with a face full of passionate reproach.

"How can the child stop crying at your word?" she exclaimed. "How do you know that she is not dreadfully hurt some way? It is a cruel shame, Emily, the way you treat her. You have no feeling for your own child."

"It is extremely kind and becoming in you to tell me so," I answered, scornfully.

"I can't help it. It is true. You have no feeling for her or for me, or you wouldn't act as you do. It will put me in my grave yet, I know." And the poor old lady fairly sobbed in her excitement and sense of injury. But I was perfectly indifferent to her distress; such scenes had grown common, and I only answered, coldly,

"It is absurd to talk in that way, mother. You know very well—Marian knows it, too—that I never allow her to scream so, especially in the street. I shall certainly punish her for it when she comes in."

"I looked out of the window as I spoke, and saw Anne coming toward the house with Marian in her arms, still crying in that loud, bitter way. The sight irritated me excessively, I can hardly tell why. I cried out, angrily, 'Get down at once, Marian; put her down, Anne, and let her walk.' And the girl, afraid to disobey, set her down upon the pavement, causing a louder burst of sobs from the child.

"This was more than her grandmother could bear. She rushed out of the room, down stairs, and into the street; caught Marian in her arms, old, and feeble as she was, and brought her so all the way up to the nursery. I came toward her and took her away, saying, sternly,

"Stop this crying directly, Marian, and tell me what is the matter. Do you hear me?"

"Her mouth is full of blood; she can't tell you," said her grandmother, excitedly. "You'd better do something for her instead of scolding her. She may be almost killed for all you know or care, either, I do believe!"

"She had a stick in her mouth, and fell down," said Anne. "It's stuck somewhere, and made her bleed."

"Foolish child!" I exclaimed, angrily. "How often have I told you never to run with any thing in your mouth? And how often have I told you, too, that you shall not scream so, no matter how you are hurt? I don't pity you the least in the world. You are only punished rightly for your disobedience."

"Scolding her all the time, saying such harsh things to her as should not be said to any one in pain—least of all to a poor little frightened, nervous child—I washed her face, sponged the blood out of her mouth, and changed her soiled slip for a clean one. Then I took her, still without a soothing word, and laid her into her crib.

"This is to punish you for being so naughty," I said. "You shall lie here all the morning now, and if you cry I shall come and whip you."

"Her grandmother knew too well that it would be useless to remonstrate; she only said, reproachfully, 'You'll be sorry for all this some day, Emily; and when you've buried as many children as I have, maybe you'll learn to have a little pity for them.' And so she went to her room, and cried—with the pitiful tears of old age—all the rest of the day. Poor little Marian soon sobbed herself to sleep, and I was left alone in outward quiet, but with a sea of stormy passion swelling and rising within me.

"It is too much," I said to myself. "I can not bear any longer this perpetual interference with my authority, these insulting speeches about my cruelty to my own child! How dare she say such things to me? Any other woman would have told her husband long ago, and had a stop put to it in the beginning."

"You can imagine, Louise, what a happy household we were that day. Mother did not come out of her room again, and Marian slept heavily till late in the afternoon. When she waked up at last her eyes were dull and swollen, her face flushed darkly, and her skin dry and hot with fever. I saw that she was ill, and I longed to take her on my knees and kiss and comfort her when she turned her heavy eyes so wistfully toward me. But I was possessed by a bitter and perverse spirit which would not let me yield to any tender impulse, and I would not say a single loving word to my little sick child. She slipped down from her crib presently, and asked me if she might go to her grandmother, but I answered, coldly,

"No. Go down stairs to Anne, and tell her to give you some luncheon."

"I don't want any luncheon, mamma. Can't I stay with you?"

"No. Do as I tell you." And I hardened my heart against her little pleading voice, and sent her away from me. Anne, the nurse, was far more tender to her. She held her on her lap, and rocked and soothed her until her father came home. Then she took her to him, for by this time her fever had increased so that the girl was frightened. Her father was alarmed at once: he was always quick to apprehend danger on very slight grounds where Marian was concerned; so that his anxiety did not make much impression upon me. However, I took the child into my own care at last, and applied such simple remedies as I thought she needed. But nothing cooled the burning fever, or soothed the soreness in her throat of which she complained; and he insisted finally upon going for the doctor. The doctor was out when he got there, and for some reason or other, he either did not get my husband's message, or was not able to attend to it, until the next morning. Marian lay in a sort of stupor all night. I did not sleep at all myself, or leave her for a moment; for I had grown anxious at last, and, as you may imagine, was not wholly free from self-reproach with regard to her. I would willingly have lavished caresses upon her then, or done any thing to give her pleasure; but she never spoke to me, or looked at me, or seemed to know me all night long. And, oh! Louisa—I can not go on with this story—she never did know me again! My child died the next day without a word for me, without a kiss—”

Emily Somers covered her face with her hands, and the sobs which had choked her utterance so long found vent at last in a passion of tears. Louise clung to her, weeping as bitterly; for every word of the simple, pitiful tale had gone home to her heart, recalling so many similar scenes, and her soul was humbled to the dust in contrite thankfulness for her own escape from a punishment at least equally well deserved. But there was nothing said between them; no words were needed where heart spoke to heart in such fullness of sympathy.

Mrs. Somers looked up again presently; the brief agony was mastered, in its outward expression at least, and her face was sweet in the faint smile that shone through her tears.

“The doctor did not come till morning, I told you before,” she went on, “and then it was too late to help her. Indeed it was doubtful, he said, whether he could have done any good if he had been called in the beginning. It was a case of suppressed scarlatina, for which there is seldom any remedy. I told him about her fall, and the hurt in her mouth: they might have aggravated her disease somewhat, he said, but could not have caused it. Her languor and unwillingness to go out to play were indications that it had already begun before she left the house. It was small comfort to know that, and to remember that I had forced her to go out, against her will, just when she was hovering on the brink of a fatal malady.

“Well, you will think my punishment was bitter enough, Louise, but the cup was not filled up yet. My child was buried on Tuesday, and her grandmother came from her grave and went straight to bed. She was old and feeble, and the grief and excitement which she had undergone proved too much for her wasted strength. When the next Tuesday came there was another grave beside Marian's, and the child and her grandmother lay at rest together, never more to suffer pain or sorrow through my unkindness. She said every tender and pitying thing that could be thought of before she died; but the fullness of her forgiveness only added to the burden of my self-reproach.

“Picture it, Louise, and wonder if you can that I spoke so earnestly about Janie. I could not withhold my warning while I saw you in danger of even the possibility of a retribution like mine.”

“Mamma! mamma!” A little pleading voice stole out from the back room, and Mrs. Russell sprang to answer it with an eagerness that made her friend smile.

“Have you had a nap, Janie? Let me see your finger now,” she said, cheerfully, sitting down on the bed where the little girl still lay.

“It doesn't hurt. Mamma, do you love me now?” and Janie, with a sudden spring, had thrown her arms round her mother's neck, and hidden her little tear-stained face upon her shoulder. The mother clasped her close:

“To be sure I love you, my darling; I always love you. It is only because I love you so dearly, and want you always to be good, that I punish you when you are naughty.”

“I won't be naughty any more, mamma. Indeed I will try to be good.”

“Then there will be two people happy all day and all the time. Guess who?”

“I know—both of us!” and the child began to smile.

“Yes, and now guess something else. Who has come to see you that you used to know, and love dearly, a year ago?”

Emily Somers had no reason to pity the bright-faced, eager child who came out of the back-room a few minutes after. She did not always see the fruit of the good seed which she strove so earnestly to “sow by all waters;” but in this case it sprang up and ripened before her eyes.

Mrs. Russell did nothing by halves, and from that very day a new system of training was begun with her little daughter. Janie had fewer embroidered skirts and chemisettes, fewer tucked white cambrics, and braided aprons, and flounced dresses; indeed I am afraid the muslin robe never did get finished, after all, in spite of its economy!

One thing is certain, though; Mrs. Russell found time enough to teach Janie regularly every day, and to reward her for good lessons with the story or poem which was not now an excitement but a relaxation for her mind. She showed her how to manage a needle and thimble, and interested herself largely in the manufacture of doll's clothes. She bought her a little rake and trowel, and gave her a corner of the yard to dig up and plant seeds in. She hunted up an old scrap-book, and a lot of illustrated newspapers; and Janie soon had a picture-gallery of her own. In short, she discovered that occupation is as necessary for a child as a woman; and supplying it judiciously, she found that Janie's fretfulness, and her own temptations to anger and undue severity, were alike dispelled in a marvelous way.

If it is needful to make an apology for wearying the reader with so insignificant a story, let its justification be found in the fact, trite it may be but awfully important, that a mother's mistakes in the early training of her children involve consequences of evil which no human mind can estimate. And if the simple sketch should suggest even to one mother the true cause for ill effects that she mourns over in her children, it will have fulfilled its mission, and stand in need of no further excuses.

THE GAME OF CHESS.

WELL, you are happy. I have found content.
I will not think of all she might have lent
By her kind love and presence to my life.
The time is past for that—she is your wife.
My dream is over now, so wild and sweet—
It was at best a dear, delicious cheat.

I can sit calmly by and see her look,
As we two play, steal slyly from her book,
And rest with deep devotion on your face.
And I with cold indifference can trace
Your likeness in her child, and even take
The darling up and kiss him for her sake.

The Past with me is dead. No vain regret
Remains to make me wish I could forget.
I wonder much if she has told you all!
Ah, let me think: 'twas in the early Fall.
I fancy, woman-wise, she deems it best,
For you and me, to let the matter rest.

The leaves were gold and russet, and the skies
As tender as the softened light in eyes
Where Love holds court. We wandered down the lane,
Your wife and I—she then was Florence Vane—
To where a stile abruptly stops the way:
We had been there before that very day.

The sun was sloping westward, and his beams
Broke through the trees in orange-colored gleams;
Flecking the path, and painting, as with fire,
The village roofs and slender, tapering spire;
And fringed with gold her Quaker hat, that made
Across her brow a line of pearly shade.

She stood and looked upon the scene; and I Stood with her. Field and woods and sky
Were all aglow—the clouds burned crimson fires—
The scented winds woke love-impassioned lyres
Within the groves—meanwhile the drowsy herd
Went slowly home, yet spoke we not a word.

The weary robin with his bleeding breast
Flew by to nestle in his downy nest;
And all the landscape faded to the sight,
Leaving the creek a winding streak of light;
And, glimmering through the pallid mists afar,
Serene and splendid rose the Evening Star.

Something—perhaps the spirit of the hour—
Made me a little bold, and gave me power
Unusual over language; then I took
The hand you hold, and sought her downcast look.
I could not tell if most she frowned or blushed,
But when she spoke all other sounds were hushed.

Why tell her answer? Let it all suffice
 To learn the sequel in her married life.
 You have my queen! That comes of careless play,
 And idle thought of that Autumnal day.
 "An evil wind"—I prove the proverb true—
 In losing her I've fairly mated you.

The game is mine. The game of Life as well.
 I would not change my lot now since the spell
 That held me fast is broken. You may see
 A bliss in wedlock all unknown to me.
 And yet that well-remembered smile makes vain
 This boasted coldness, and recalls my pain.

THE ANGEL-SISTER.

"ALMOST a woman!" says Mrs. Wayland glancing after her daughter, who was leaving the room. And then she sighed; and her eyes looked dreamily inward; and she sat very still, like one asleep.

Almost a woman! Yes; Lucy's slender form had sprung up rapidly in the past year, and her limbs and bust had rounded into beautiful symmetry.

What was in the mother's thoughts that she sighed? Did she fear for the woman's life of her darling? Had her own experiences been so sad that she could not look with sunny hope into the future of her child? Not that. The sigh had another meaning. Always she saw, moving beside Lucy, another form, growing as she grew, and reaching with her toward the sweet ripeness of womanhood; and the sigh was for that form, because to all but herself it was invisible. Just five years before that form of a twin-sister vanished from her home and was seen not there again.

"If Mary had not died!" Ah, did she ever look at Lucy that these words came not to shadow her feelings? "If Mary had not died," followed like a spectre, the sentence: "Almost a woman!"

"What a loss to poor Lucy!" So ran her thoughts, as she sat very still, like one asleep under the pressure of feeling. "Mary would have been every thing to her. Sister, companion, friend, counselor, comforter. Now she must go forth in life alone. No sister to stand by her side and make her strength double in trial; for that she will have in full measure. It comes to all."

"How differently she would have developed," went on the mother, in her thoughts, "if Mary had not died! There was just enough of dissimilarity in their characters to give life, action, and harmony to both. Mary was quieter and graver; she would have matured faster; all the better for Lucy. Ah, it was a loss that must ever be felt as irreparable. Why do such things happen? It is of Providence, they say, and for the best. I can not see it." And Mrs. Wayland sighed heavily.

"Dear, angel Mary!" she went on. "How the light faded when your life went out! How the music ceased when your voice grew silent! I can never see it to be right; never, never. Poor Lucy! I wonder sometimes that she can be so gay of heart. If she comprehended her loss as I comprehend it, she would hardly smile again. The time will come when her heart will cry out in its loneliness, pain, or sorrow—"Oh my sister! Why were you taken from me?"

As she thus mused and murmured, the Angel of Sleep laid her soft touch on the mother's heavy eyelids, and her spirit went away into the land of dreams. It was with her now as of old. Side by side walked her twin children through the sunny chambers of her home, and their blending voices made music for her heart all the day long. Swiftly the years went by. Up from blossomy girlhood they passed to ripe young womanhood; and then came wooers to win them away from her, and bear them off to other homes. Mary went first, and to a far distance. A thousand miles were stretched between them. Then Lucy laid her hand, lovingly and trustingly, into the hand of one who promised to make all her life rich with blessing. She did not, like Mary, go afar off, but kept near her old home.

The years came and went, bringing their burdens of care and their lessons of disappointment. Lucy had a large share of these, and under the burdens she bent wearily and often in pain.

"If Mary were only here! If I could listen to her voice! If I could lean my head upon her as of old!"

How often she said this sadly and tearfully. But Mary was far away sighing over her own depressing cares, or fainting amidst her trials. Nor, if distance had been removed, would the presence of Mary have given either strength or comfort, for she stood in need of both for herself. They might have wept together, and there would have been a sad pleasure in this; but in suffering both had grown selfish, and asked, but had nothing to give.

Then a deeper trouble came to Lucy. Death stole silently into her home at evening after the sun went down, and when the morning broke one whose life-pulses had taken their beat from her own was not. Bowing down her head, she refused to be comforted.

"Oh, if Mary were only here!" said the mother, as she went, almost in despair, from the chamber where Lucy sat in marble-like stillness. "If Mary were only here! Her voice would find its way to her heart; her words would come to her in consolation."

A letter was placed in her hands. It was from Mary. She opened it and read:

"DEAR MOTHER,—Baby is dead, and my heart is broken! Will you not come to me?"

"Only a dream!" said a soft, low voice, musically.

The mother looked up and saw before her a woman, whose calm face and loving eyes made her think of the eyes and face of an angel. A deep peace fell upon her spirit.

"Only a dream of what might have been, if Mary were not in heaven!"

A thrill of pleasure ran through the heart of Mrs. Wayland, and she lifted her soul in thankfulness. "Baby is dead, and my heart is broken!" No, no. That piercing cry would never come from her lips.

And now the old life goes on, but with a change that, while it is wonderful, excites no feeling of wonder in the mind of Mrs. Wayland. In thought she had always seen the dead twin-sister moving beside the living twin-sister, like a shadowy phantom. Now she was near her like a living presence, full of life and tender love, yet visible to no mortal eyes but the mother's. Sleeping or waking, she was always near to Lucy, but nearest in sleep, and most watchful. Her influence over her was almost imperceptible, but certain as the influence of dew and sunshine upon the earth. Mrs. Wayland noted it from day to day in pious thankfulness.

"God has not separated them," she said, "but made of one a guardian angel to the other. How passion and selfishness, after darkening the fair horizon of her mind for a little season, pass away like threatening clouds under the influence of right thoughts and gentle affections, which glide into her mind and heart from the soul of her angel-sister! Dear Mary! Oh, if I could take you into my arms! If I could hold you to my bosom, what infinite joy would be mine! When Lucy weeps, what loving sympathy softens all your heavenly countenance, and how closely you draw near to her! When she is tempted, your lips approach her ears with words of strength and assurance. I see daily the wonder-working power of your presence over her. Not dead and absent! Oh no. But living and present; present in greater power, and for higher good, than is possible in any mortal nearness."

And so life went on from day to day, and from year to year, the angel-sister always intimately present, and visible only to the mother's eyes. Then Lucy went out from her home a bride, and in the years that followed came trials and sorrows such as had never shadowed her heart even dimly in imagination; such trials and sorrows as come to all in some degree. Yet never, in all these years, was Mary afar off, but always intimately near; with aid in trial, strength in weakness, and comfort when the heart was bowed down, and the eyes wet with tears. It was wonderful to see how, like the influence of some magic spell, the presence of Mary, unseen and unknown, would change the thoughts and feelings of Lucy, and bring her mind from darkness into light. Often at these times Lucy would lift her eyes upward, and murmur some words from the Book of books, the memory of which her angel-sister had uncovered.

Once, overcome with weariness, Lucy had fallen asleep with her baby in her arms. Mary was always most watchful over her, as we have said, in sleep. So now she drew closer, and her eyes did not wander a moment from the faces of the babe and its mother. Soon there came a shade of concern in the calm face of the angel-watcher, as if danger were approaching; but she did not look up nor around. Now, with a feeling of terror, Mrs. Wayland saw a hideous serpent come stealing in through the open door. She could not move nor cry out, but sat powerless, as in a frightful nightmare. Gradually it approached the unconscious sleepers, its head erect and its venomous eyes glaring in fiery eagerness. Then the guardian's lips bent down to the ears of Lucy and awakened her with a dream. She sprang up with a cry, clasping, as she did so, her baby to her bosom. The danger was past. She did not even know that there had been danger, for the serpent, the instant she moved, glanced from the room like lightning.

At another time Lucy was riding with her husband along a road that lay upon the brink of a precipice. The slightest forgetfulness or want of care in driving might prove fatal. Just as they were approaching a narrow point where the wheels must come within a few inches of the unguarded edge, Mrs. Wayland noticed a dark, shadowy form close to Lucy's husband, whispering in his ear, and gaining his attention. His hand, in forgetfulness, let the reins fall loose, and the carriage wavered from the arrowy line in which it had been moving. But the angel saw the fiend, who fled at a glance from her glittering eyes, and, on his guard again in an instant, the driver passed the dangerous place in safety.

"Thank God for such wonderful care!" said Mrs. Wayland, in her heart. Thus Lucy was protected through the mediation of her sister, as well as strengthened and comforted.

At last the trouble of all troubles for a mother's heart came. A little one, that had become as a part of her life, came down with its tender feet to the brink of Death's river. Was there no eye to pity, and no hand to save? Lucy was wild with fear and anguish, and in the bitterness of her suffering prayed for the life of her child. In all these hours of pain the angel-sister stood bending over her—now with a hand on her throbbing temples, now with her head drawn lovingly against her bosom, and now breathing into her ears precious truths for consolation.

That all this was not in vain the mother saw; for calmer states would supervene, and periods of deep tranquillity follow upon wild excitement.

At last the shadowy curtain fell on the brief drama of that young child's life, and for a time Lucy refused to be comforted, shutting her ears to all the words of healing that friends, seen and unseen, could offer. She called God cruel for taking her babe.

The day which dawned on that night of sorrow, when the baby went up to heaven, passed heavily away, and still the stricken mother turned herself from all who tried to lift her thoughts toward the eternal mansions. Darkness fell upon nature again, and in the stillness that followed Lucy slept. Mrs. Wayland, to whose eyes the form of Mary was always visible, now saw her weaving a dream for the inner eyes of the sleeper. It was to her as a representation. First appeared to the sorrowing mother a green bank, dotted over with flowers. Around the foot a pleasant stream twined its clear waters like a silver cord. Next appeared children on the bank with garlands of flowers, sporting with each other. They were the happiest children she had ever looked upon. As she gazed she heard music, and the words of singers:

"He leadeth them beside still waters."

"And this is heaven!" said the mother, in her dream.

"Yes," said a beautiful maiden, in shining white garments, coming to her side. "This is heaven; and these are the little ones whom the loving Father of us all has translated from a world of sorrow and pain to this world of blessedness."

"I have lost a child!" The sorrowing mother spoke eagerly. "A little while ago I looked my last look on his dying face. Oh, is my child here? My precious child!"

"Come," said the maiden. The scene changed. They were in a beautiful apartment, the walls of which were of gold and all precious stones, that shone resplendently. Soft, silvery curtains, floating in the perfumed air, hung over and around a bed of downy softness. Sitting by this bed, and bending over it in an attitude of loving care, bent another maiden of wondrous beauty. The mother drew near. A babe was lying on the bed; her own lost darling; she knew him at a glance!

"You have come for him?" said the maiden, looking up into the mother's face.

"Yes," she answered. "I can not part with my baby. I must have him back again."

An expression of regret dimmed the angel brightness of the maiden's countenance. But she bent over the child, and lifting him gently, laid her lips upon his forehead with a kiss of the tenderest love. Then placing him in the mother's arms, she said,

"Take him back to sorrow, to suffering, and to pain. But oh, guard him from the evil that will gather around his way in life, and see that through no fault of yours he miss the way to these heavenly mansions."

The mother clasped her baby to her heart in a wild pressure of joy, and then handing him back, said,

"No—no—no! That is too fearful to think of! Thanks to God he is safe—safe!"

And Lucy awoke.

"Yes, thank God he is safe!" trembled on her lips as consciousness grew clear.

"Mother, dear!" It was the soft, girlish voice of Lucy. Mrs. Wayland started from her dream, and looked at her in bewilderment for some moments.

"You have been asleep," said Lucy.

"Yes, love; but I am awake now."

She meant more than her words conveyed to Lucy, as the reader may believe. "If Mary had not died!" never again parted her lips in murmuring rebellion against that wise and good Providence without which not a sparrow falls.

ORLEY FARM.

BY ANTHONY TROLLOPE.—ILLUSTRATED BY J. E. MILLAIS.

CHAPTER XXV.

MR. FURNIVAL AGAIN AT HIS CHAMBERS.

THE Christmas doings at the Cleeve were not very gay. There was no visitor there, except Lady Mason, and it was known that she was in trouble. It must not, however, be supposed that she constantly bewailed herself while there, or made her friends miserable by a succession of hysterical tears. By no means. She made an effort to be serene, and the effort was successful—as such efforts usually are. On the morning of Christmas-day they duly attended church, and Lady Mason was seen by all Hamworth sitting in the Cleeve pew. In no way could the baronet's friendship have been shown more plainly than in this, nor could a more significant mark of intimacy have been given; all which Sir Peregrine well understood. The people of Hamworth had chosen to talk scandal about Lady Mason, but he, at any rate, would show how little attention he paid to the falsehoods that there were circulated. So he stood by her at the pew door as she entered, with as much deference as though she had been a duchess; and the people of Hamworth, looking on, wondered which would be right, Mr. Dockwrath or Sir Peregrine.

After dinner Sir Peregrine gave a toast. "Lady Mason, we will drink the health of the absent boys. God bless them! I hope they are enjoying themselves."

"God bless them!" said Mrs. Orme, putting her handkerchief to her eyes.

"God bless them both!" said Lady Mason, also putting her handkerchief to her eyes. Then the ladies left the room, and that was the extent of their special festivity. "Robert," said Sir Peregrine immediately afterward to his butler, "let them have what port-wine they want in the servants' hall—within measure."

"Yes, Sir Peregrine."

"And, Robert, I shall not want you again."

"Thank you, Sir Peregrine."

From all which it may be imagined that the Christmas doings at the Cleeve were chiefly maintained below stairs.

"I do hope they are happy," said Mrs. Orme, when the two ladies were together in the drawing-room. "They have a very nice party at Noningsby."

"Your boy will be happy, I'm sure," said Lady Mason.

"And why not Lucius also?"

It was sweet in Lady Mason's ear to hear her son called by his Christian name. All these increasing signs of interest and intimacy were sweet, but especially any which signified some favor shown to her son. "This trouble weighs heavy on him," she replied. "It is only natural that he should feel it."

"Papa does not seem to think much of it," said Mrs. Orme. "If I were you, I would strive to forget it."

"I do strive," said the other; and then she took the hand which Mrs. Orme had stretched out to her, and that lady got up and kissed her.

"Dearest friend," said Mrs. Orme, "if we can comfort you we will." And then they sobbed in each other's arms.

In the mean time Sir Peregrine was sitting alone, thinking. He sat thinking, with his glass of claret untouched by his side, and with the biscuit which he had taken lying untouched upon the table. As he sat he had raised one leg upon the other, placing his foot on his knee, and he held it there with his hand upon his instep. And so he sat without moving for some quarter of an hour, trying to use all his mind on the subject which occupied it. At last he roused himself, almost with a start, and leaving his chair, walked three or four times the length of the room. "Why should I not?" at last he said to himself, stopping suddenly and placing his hand upon the table. "Why should I not, if it pleases me? It shall not injure him—nor her." And then he walked again. "But I will ask Edith," he said, still speaking to himself. "If she says that she disapproves of it, I will not do it." And then he left the room, while the wine still remained untasted on the table.

On the day following Christmas Mr. Furnival went up to town, and Mr. Round, junior—Mat Round, as he was called in the profession—came to him at his chambers. A promise had been made to the barrister by Round and Crook that no active steps should be taken against Lady Mason on the part of Joseph Mason of Groby, without notice being given to Mr. Furnival. And this visit by appointment was made in consequence of that promise.

"You see," says Matthew Round, when that visit was nearly brought to a close, "that we are pressed very hard to go on with this, and if we do not, somebody else will."

"Nevertheless, if I were you, I should decline," said Mr. Furnival.

"You're looking to your client, not to ours, Sir," said the attorney. "The fact is that the whole case is very queer. It was proved on the last trial that Bolster and Kenneby were witnesses to a deed on the 14th of July, and that was all that was proved. Now we can prove that they were on that day witnesses to another deed. Were they witnesses to two?"

"Why should they not be?"

"That is for us to see. We have written to them both to come up to us, and in order that we might be quite on the square I thought it right to tell you."

"Thank you; yes; I can not complain of you. And what form do you think that your proceedings will take?"

"Joseph Mason talks of indicting her for—forgery," said the attorney, pausing a moment before he dared to pronounce the dread word.

"Indict her for forgery!" said Furnival, with a start. And yet the idea was one which had been for some days present to his mind's eye.

"I do not say so," said Round. "I have as yet seen none of the witnesses myself. If they are prepared to prove that they did sign two separate documents on that day, the thing must pass off." It was clear to Mr. Furnival that even Mr. Round, junior, would be glad that it should pass off. And then he also sat thinking. Might it not be probable that, with a little judicious exercise of their memory, those two witnesses would remember that they had signed two documents; or, at any rate, looking to the lapse of the time, that they might be induced to forget altogether whether they had signed one, two, or three? Or even if they could be mystified so that nothing could be proved, it would still be well with his client. Indeed, no magistrate would commit such a person as Lady Mason, especially after so long an interval, and no grand jury would find a bill against her, except upon evidence that was clear, well-defined, and almost indubitable. If any point of doubt could be shown, she might be brought off without a trial, if only she would be true to herself. At the former trial there was the existing codicil, and the fact also that the two surviving reputed witnesses would not deny their signatures. These signatures—if they were genuine signatures—had been attached with all proper formality, and the form used went to state that the testator had signed the instrument in the presence of them all, they all being present together at the same time. The survivors had both asserted that when they did affix their names the three were then present, as was also Sir Joseph; but there had been a terrible doubt even then as to the identity of the document; and a doubt also as to there having been any signature made by one of the reputed witnesses—by that one, namely, who at the time of that trial was dead. Now another document was forthcoming, purporting to have been witnessed, on the same day, by these two surviving witnesses! If that document were genuine, and if these two survivors should be clear that they had written their names but once on that 14th of July, in such case could it be possible to quash further public inquiry? The criminal prosecution might not be possible as a first proceeding, but if the estate were recovered at common law, would not the criminal prosecution follow as a matter of course? And then Mr. Furnival thought it all over again and again.

If this document were genuine—this new document which the man Dockwrath stated that he had found—this deed of separation of partnership which purported to have been executed on that 14th of July! That was now the one important question. If it were genuine! And why should there not be as strong a question of the honesty of that document as of the other? Mr. Furnival well knew that no fraudulent deed would be forged and produced without a motive; and that if he impugned this deed he must show the motive. Motive enough there was, no doubt. Mason might have had it forged in order to get the property, or Dockwrath to gratify his revenge. But in such case it would be a forgery of the present day. There could have been no motive for such a forgery twenty years ago. The paper, the writing, the attested signature of Martock, the other party to it, would prove that it had not been got up and manufactured now. Dockwrath would not dare to bring forward such a forgery as that. There was no hope of any such result.

But might not he, Furnival, if the matter were pushed before a jury, make them think that the two documents stood balanced against each other? and that Lady Mason's respectability, her long possession, together with the vile malignity of her antagonists, gave the greater probability of honesty to the disputed codicil? Mr. Furnival did think that he might induce a jury to acquit her; but he terribly feared that he might not be able to induce the world to acquit her also. As he thought of all the case, he seemed to put himself apart from the world at large. He did not question himself as to his own belief, but seemed to feel that it would suffice for him if he could so bring it about that her other friends should think her innocent. It would by no means suffice for him to secure for her son the property, and for her a simple acquittal. It was not that he dreaded the idea of thinking her guilty himself; perhaps he did so think her now—he half thought her so, at any rate; but he greatly dreaded the idea of others thinking so. It might be well to buy up Dockwrath, if it were possible. If it were possible! But then it was not possible that he himself could have a hand in such a matter. Could Crabwitz do it? No; he thought not. And then, at this moment, he was not certain that he could depend on Crabwitz.

And why should he trouble himself in this way? Mr. Furnival was a man loyal to his friends at heart. Had Lady Mason been a man, and had he pulled that man through great difficulties in early life, he would have been loyally desirous of carrying him through the same or similar difficulties at any after period. In that cause which he had once battled he was always ready to do battle, without reference to any professional consideration of triumph or profit. It was to this feeling of loyalty that he had owed much of his success in life. And in such a case as this it may be supposed that that feeling would be strong. But then such a feeling presumed a case in which he could sympathize—in which he could believe. Would it be well that he should allow himself to feel the same interest in this case, to maintain respecting it the same personal anxiety, if he ceased to believe in it? He did ask himself the question, and he finally answered it in the affirmative. He had beaten Joseph Mason once in a good stand-up fight; and having done so, having thus made the matter his own, it was necessary to his comfort that he should beat him again, if another fight were to be fought. Lady Mason was his client, and all the associations of his life taught him to be true to her as such.

And as we are thus searching into his innermost heart we must say more than this. Mrs. Furnival perhaps had no sufficient grounds for those terrible fears of hers; but nevertheless the mistress of Orley Farm was very comely in the eyes of the lawyer. Her eyes, when full of tears, were very bright; and her hand, as it lay in his, was very soft. He laid out for himself no scheme of wickedness with reference to her; he purposely entertained no thoughts which he knew to be wrong; but, nevertheless, he did feel that he liked to have her by him, that he liked to be her adviser and friend, that he liked to wipe the tears from those eyes—not by a material handkerchief from his pocket, but by immaterial manly sympathy from his bosom; and that he liked also to feel the pressure of that hand. Mrs. Furnival had become solid, and heavy, and red; and though he himself was solid, and heavy, and red also—more so, indeed, in proportion, than his poor wife; for his redness, as I have said before, had almost reached a purple hue; nevertheless his eye loved to look upon the beauty of a lovely woman, his ear loved to hear the tone of her voice, and his hand loved to meet the soft ripeness of her touch. It was very wrong that it should have been so, but the case is not without a parallel.

And therefore he made up his mind that he would not desert Lady Mason. He would not desert her; but how would he set about the fighting that would be necessary in her behalf? He was well aware of this, that if he fought at all he must fight now. It would not do to let the matter go on till she should be summoned to defend herself. Steps which might now be available would be altogether unavailable in two or three months' time—would be so, perhaps, if he allowed two or three weeks to pass idly by him. Mr. Round, luckily, was not disposed to hurry his proceedings; nor, as far as he was concerned, was there any bitterness of antagonism. But with both Mason and Dockwraith there would be hot haste, and hotter malice. From those who were really her enemies she could expect no quarter.

He was to return on that evening to Noningsby, and on the following day he would go over to The Cleeve. He knew that Lady Mason was staying there; but his object in making that visit would not be merely that he might see her, but also that he might speak to Sir Peregrine, and learn how far the baronet was inclined to support his neighbor in her coming tribulation. He would soon be able to ascertain what Sir Peregrine really thought—whether he suspected the possibility of any guilt—and he would ascertain also what was the general feeling in the neighborhood of Hamworth. It would be a great thing if he could spread abroad a conviction that she was an injured woman. It would be a great thing even if he could make it known that the great people of the neighborhood so thought. The jurymen of Alston would be mortal men; and it might be possible that they should be imbued with a favorable bias on the subject before they assembled in their box for its consideration.

He wished that he knew the truth in the matter; or rather, he wished he could know whether or no she were innocent, without knowing whether or no she were guilty. The fight in his hands would be conducted on terms so much more glorious if he could feel sure of her innocence. But then if he attempted that, and she were not innocent, all might be sacrificed by the audacity of his proceedings. He could not venture that, unless he was sure of his ground. For a moment or two he thought that he would ask her the question. He said to himself that he could forgive the fault. That it had been repented ere this he did not doubt, and it would be sweet to say to her that it was very grievous, but that yet it might be forgiven. It would be sweet to feel that she was in his hands, and that he would treat her with mercy and kindness. But then a hundred other thoughts forbade him to think more of this. If she had been guilty—if she declared her guilt to him—would not restitution be necessary? In that case her son must know it, and all the world must know it. Such a confession would be incompatible with that innocence before the world which it was necessary that she should maintain. Moreover, he must be able to proclaim aloud his belief in her innocence; and how could he do that, knowing her to be guilty—knowing that she also knew that he had such knowledge? It was impossible that he should ask any such question, or admit of any such confidence.

It would be necessary, if the case did come to a trial, that she should employ some attorney. The matter must come into the barrister's hands in the usual way, through a solicitor's house, and it would be well that the person employed should have a firm faith in his client. What could he say—he, as a barrister—if the attorney suggested to him that the lady might possibly be guilty? As he thought of all these things he almost dreaded the difficulties before him.

He rang the bell for Crabwitz—the peculiar bell which Crabwitz was bound to answer—having first of all gone through a little ceremony with his check-book. Crabwitz entered, still sulky in his demeanor, for as yet the old anger had not been appeased, and it was still a doubtful matter in the clerk's mind whether or no it might not be better for him to seek a master who would better appreciate his services. A more lucrative position it might be difficult for him to find; but money is not every thing, as Crabwitz said to himself more than once.

"Crabwitz," said Mr. Furnival, looking with a pleasant face at his clerk, "I am leaving town this evening, and I shall be absent for the next ten days. If you like you can go away for a holiday."

"It's rather late in the season now, Sir," said Crabwitz, gloomily, as though he were determined not to be pleased.

"It is a little late, as you say; but I really could not manage it earlier. Come, Crabwitz, you and I should not quarrel. Your work has been a little hard, but then so has mine also."

"I fancy you like it, Sir."

"Ha! ha! Like it, indeed! But so do you like it—in its way. Come, Crabwitz, you have been an excellent servant to me; and I don't think that, on the whole, I have been a bad master to you."

"I am making no complaint, Sir."

"But you're cross because I've kept you in town a little too long. Come, Crabwitz, you must forget all that. You have worked very hard this year past. Here is a check for fifty pounds. Get out of town for a fortnight or so, and amuse yourself."

"I'm sure I'm very much obliged, Sir," said Crabwitz, putting out his hand and taking the check. He felt that his master had got the better of him, and he was still a little melancholy on that account. He would have valued his grievance at that moment almost more than the fifty pounds, especially as by the acceptance of it he surrendered all right to complain for some considerable time to come.

"By-the-by, Crabwitz," said Mr. Furnival, as the clerk was about to leave the room.

"Yes, Sir," said Crabwitz.

"You have never chanced to hear of an attorney named Dockwraith, I suppose?"

"What! in London, Mr. Furnival?"

"No; I fancy he has no place of business in town. He lives I know at Hamworth."

"It's he you mean, Sir, that is meddling in this affair of Lady Mason's."

"What! you have heard of that; have you?"

"Oh! yes, Sir. It's being a good deal talked about in the profession. Messrs. Round and Crook's leading young man was up here with me the other day, and he did say a good deal about it. He's a very decent young man, considering his position, is Smart."

"And he knows Dockwrath, does he?"

"Well, Sir, I can't say that he knows much of the man; but Dockwrath has been at their place of business pretty constant of late, and he and Mr. Matthew seem thick enough together."

"Oh! they do, do they?"

"So Smart tells me. I don't know how it is myself, Sir. I don't suppose this Dockwrath is a very—"

"No, no; exactly. I dare say not. You've never seen him yourself, Crabwitz?"

"Who, Sir? I, Sir? No, Sir, I've never set eyes on the man, Sir. From all I hear it's not very likely he should come here; and I'm sure it is not at all likely that I should go to him."

Mr. Furnival sat thinking a while, and the clerk stood waiting opposite to him, leaning with both his hands upon the table. "You don't know any one in the neighborhood of Hamworth, I suppose?" Mr. Furnival said at last.

"Who, Sir? I, Sir? Not a soul, Sir. I never was there in my life."

"I'll tell you why I ask. I strongly suspect that that man Dockwrath is at some very foul play." And then he told to his clerk so much of the whole story of Lady Mason and her affairs as he chose that he should know. "It is plain enough that he may give Lady Mason a great deal of annoyance," he ended by saying.

"There's no doubting that, Sir," said Crabwitz. "And, to tell the truth, I believe his mind is made up to do it."

"You don't think that any thing could be done by seeing him? Of course Lady Mason has got nothing to compromise. Her son's estate is as safe as my hat; but—"

"The people at Round's think it isn't quite so safe, Sir."

"Then the people at Round's know nothing about it. But Lady Mason is so averse to legal proceedings that it would be worth her while to have matters settled. You understand?"

"Yes, Sir; I understand. Would not an attorney be the best person, Sir?"

"Not just at present, Crabwitz. Lady Mason is a very dear friend of mine—"

"Yes, Sir; we know that," said Crabwitz.

"If you could make any pretense for running down to Hamworth—change of air, you know, for a week or so. It's a beautiful country; just the place you like. And you might find out whether any thing could be done, eh?"

Mr. Crabwitz was well aware, from the first, that he did not get fifty pounds for nothing.

CHAPTER XXVI.

"WHY SHOULD I NOT?"

A DAY or two after his conversation with Crabwitz, as described in the last chapter, Mr. Furnival was driven up to the door of Sir Peregrine Orme's house in a Hamworth fly. He had come over by train from Alston on purpose to see the baronet, whom he found seated in his library. At that very moment he was again asking himself those questions which he had before asked as he was walking up and down his own dining-room. "Why should I not?" he said to himself—"unless, indeed, it will make her unhappy." And then the barrister was shown into his room, muffled up to his eyes in his winter clothing.

Sir Peregrine and Mr. Furnival were well known to each other, and had always met as friends. They had been interested on the same side in the first Orley Farm Case, and possessed a topic of sympathy in their mutual dislike to Joseph Mason of Groby Park. Sir Peregrine therefore was courteous, and when he learned the subject on which he was to be consulted he became almost more than courteous.

"Oh! yes; she's staying here, Mr. Furnival. Would you like to see her?"

"Before I leave I shall be glad to see her, Sir Peregrine; but if I am justified in regarding you as specially her friend, it may perhaps be well that I should first have some conversation with you." Sir Peregrine in answer to this declared that Mr. Furnival certainly would be so justified; that he did regard himself as Lady Mason's special friend, and that he was ready to hear any thing that the barrister might have to say to him.

Many of the points of this case have already been named so often, and will, I fear, be necessarily named so often again, that I will spare the repetition when it is possible. Mr. Furnival on this occasion told Sir Peregrine—not all that he had heard, but all that he thought it necessary to tell, and soon became fully aware that in the baronet's mind there was not the slightest shadow of suspicion that Lady Mason could have been in any way to blame. He, the baronet, was thoroughly convinced that Mr. Mason was the great sinner in this matter, and that he was prepared to harass an innocent and excellent lady from motives of disappointed cupidity and long-sustained malice, which made him seem in Sir Peregrine's eyes a being almost too vile for humanity. And of Dockwrath he thought almost as badly—only that Dockwrath was below the level of his thinking. Of Lady Mason he spoke as an excellent and beautiful woman driven to misery by unworthy persecution; and so spoke with an enthusiasm that was surprising to Mr. Furnival. It was very manifest that she would not want for friendly countenance, if friendly countenance could carry her through her difficulties.

There was no suspicion against Lady Mason in the mind of Sir Peregrine, and Mr. Furnival

"WHY SHOULD I NOT?"

was careful not to arouse any such feeling. When he found that the baronet spoke of her as being altogether pure and good, he also spoke of her in the same tone; but in doing so his game was very difficult. "Let him do his worst, Mr. Furnival," said Sir Peregrine; "and let her remain tranquil; that is my advice to Lady Mason. It is not possible that he can really injure her."

"It is possible that he can do nothing—very probable that he can do nothing; but nevertheless, Sir Peregrine—"

"I would have no dealing with him or his. I would utterly disregard them. If he, or they, or any of them choose to take steps to annoy her, let her attorney manage that in the usual way. I am no lawyer myself, Mr. Furnival, but that I think is the manner in which things of this kind should be arranged. I do not know whether they have still the power of disputing the will, but if so, let them do it."

Gradually, by very slow degrees, Mr. Furnival made Sir Peregrine understand that the legal doings now threatened were not of that nature; that Mr. Mason did not now talk of proceeding at law for the recovery of the property, but for the punishment of his father's widow as a criminal; and at last the dreadful word "forgery" dropped from his lips.

"Who dares to make such a charge as that?" demanded the baronet, while fire literally flashed from his eyes in his anger. And when he was told that Mr. Mason did make such a charge he called him "a mean, unmanly dastard." "I do not believe that he would dare to make it against a man," said Sir Peregrine.

But there was the fact of the charge—the fact that it had been placed in the hands of respectable attorneys, with instructions to them to press it on—and the fact also that the evidence by which that charge was to be supported possessed at any rate a primâ facie appearance of strength. All this it was necessary to explain to Sir Peregrine, as it would also be necessary to explain it to Lady Mason.

"Am I to understand, then, that you also think—?" began Sir Peregrine.

"You are not to understand that I think any thing injurious to the lady; but I do fear that she is in a position of much jeopardy, and that great care will be necessary."

"Good Heavens! Do you mean to say that an innocent person can under such circumstances be in danger in this country?"

"An innocent person, Sir Peregrine, may be in danger of very great annoyance, and also of very great delay in proving that innocence. Innocent people have died under the weight of such charges. We must remember that she is a woman, and therefore weaker than you or I."

"Yes, yes; but still—. You do not say that you think she can be in any real danger?" It seemed, from the tone of the old man's voice, as though he were almost angry with Mr. Furnival for supposing that such could be the case. "And you intend to tell her all this?" he asked.

"I fear that, as her friend, neither you nor I will be warranted in keeping her altogether in the dark. Think what her feelings would be if she were summoned before a magistrate without any preparation!"

"No magistrate would listen to such a charge," said Sir Peregrine.

"In that he must be guided by the evidence."

"I would sooner throw up my commission than lend myself in any way to a proceeding so iniquitous."

This was all very well, and the existence of such a feeling showed great generosity, and perhaps also poetic chivalry on the part of Sir

Peregrine Orme; but it was not the way of the world, and so Mr. Furnival was obliged to explain. Magistrates would listen to the charge—would be forced to listen to the charge—if the evidence were apparently sound. A refusal on the part of a magistrate to do so would not be an act of friendship to Lady Mason, as Mr. Furnival endeavored to explain. "And you wish to see her?" Sir Peregrine asked at last.

"I think she should be told; but as she is in your house, I will, of course, do nothing in which you do not concur." Upon which Sir Peregrine rang the bell and desired the servant to take his compliments to Lady Mason and beg her attendance in the library if it were quite convenient. "Tell her," said Sir Peregrine, "that Mr. Furnival is here."

When the message was given to her she was seated with Mrs. Orme, and at the moment she summoned strength to say that she would obey the invitation, without displaying any special emotion while the servant was in the room; but when the door was shut, her friend looked at her and saw that she was as pale as death. She was pale and her limbs quivered, and that look of agony, which now so often marked her face, was settled on her brow. Mrs. Orme had never yet seen her with such manifest signs of suffering as she wore at this instant.

"I suppose I must go to them," she said, slowly rising from her seat; and it seemed to Mrs. Orme that she was forced to hold by the table to support herself.

"Mr. Furnival is a friend, is he not?"

"Oh yes! a kind friend, but—"

"They shall come in here if you like it better, dear."

"Oh no! I will go to them. It would not do that I should seem so weak. What must you think of me to see me so?"

"I do not wonder at it, dear," said Mrs. Orme, coming round to her; "such cruelty would kill me. I wonder at your strength rather than your weakness." And then she kissed her. What was there about the woman that had made all those fond of her that came near her?

Mrs. Orme walked with her across the hall, and left her only at the library door. There she pressed her hand and again kissed her, and then Lady Mason turned the handle of the door and entered the room. Mr. Furnival, when he looked at her, was startled by the pallor of her face, but nevertheless he thought that she had never looked so beautiful. "Dear Lady Mason," said he, "I hope you are well."

Sir Peregrine advanced to her and handed her over to his own arm-chair. Had she been a queen in distress she could not have been treated with more gentle deference. But she never seemed to count upon this, or in any way to assume it as her right. I should accuse her of what I regard as a sin against all good taste were I to say that she was humble in her demeanor; but there was a soft meekness about her, an air of feminine dependence, a proneness to lean and almost to cling as she leaned, which might have been felt as irresistible by any man. She was a woman to know in her deep sorrow rather than in her joy and happiness; one with whom one would love to weep rather than to rejoice. And, indeed, the present was a time with her for weeping, not for rejoicing.

Sir Peregrine looked as though he were her father as he took her hand, and the barrister immediately comforted himself with the remembrance of the baronet's great age. It was natural, too, that Lady Mason should hang on him in his own house. So Mr. Furnival contented himself at the first moment with touching her hand and hoping that she was well. She answered hardly a word to either of them, but she attempted to smile as she sat down, and murmured something about the trouble she was giving them.

"Mr. Furnival thinks it best that you should be made aware of the steps which are being taken by Mr. Mason of Groby Park," began Sir Peregrine. "I am no lawyer myself, and therefore of course I can not put my advice against his."

"I am sure that both of you will tell me for the best," she said.

"In such a matter as this it is right that you should be guided by him. That he is as firmly your friend as I am there can be no doubt."

"I believe Lady Mason trusts me in that," said the lawyer.

"Indeed I do; I would trust you both in any thing," she said.

"And there can be no doubt that he must be able to direct you for the best. I say so much at the first, because I myself so thoroughly despise that man in Yorkshire—I am so convinced that any thing which his malice may prompt him to do must be futile, that I could not myself have thought it needful to pain you by what must now be said."

This was a dreadful commencement, but she bore it, and even was relieved by it. Indeed, no tale that Mr. Furnival could have to tell after such an exordium would be so bad as that which she had feared as the possible result of his visit. He might have come there to let her know that she was at once to be carried away—immediately to be taken to her trial—perhaps to be locked up in jail. In her ignorance of the law she could only imagine what might or might not happen to her at any moment, and therefore the words which Sir Peregrine had spoken relieved her rather than added to her fears.

And then Mr. Furnival began his tale, and gradually put before her the facts of the matter. This he did with a choice of language and a delicacy of phraseology which were admirable, for he made her clearly understand the nature of the accusation which was brought against her without using any word which was in itself harsh in its bearing. He said nothing about fraud, or forgery, or false evidence, but he made it manifest to her that Joseph Mason had now instructed his lawyer to institute a criminal proceeding against her for having forged a codicil to her husband's will.

"I must bear it as best I may," she said. "May the Lord give me strength to bear it!"

"It is terrible to think of," said Sir Peregrine; "but nobody can doubt how it will end. You are not to suppose that Mr. Furnival intends to express any doubt as to your ultimate triumph. What we fear for you is the pain you must endure before this triumph comes."

Ah, if that were all! As the baronet finished speaking she looked furtively into the lawyer's face to see how far the meaning of these smooth words would be supported by what she might read there. Would he also think that a final triumph did certainly await her? Sir Peregrine's real opinion was easily to be learned, either from his countenance or from his words; but it was not so with Mr. Furnival. In Mr. Furnival's face, and from Mr. Furnival's words, could be learned only that which Mr. Furnival wished to declare. He saw that glance, and fully understood it; and he knew instinctively, on the spur of the moment, that he must now either assure her by a lie, or break down all her hopes by the truth. That final triumph was not certain to her—was very far from certain! Should he now be honest to his friend, or dishonest? One great object with him was to secure the support which Sir Peregrine could give by his weight in the county; and therefore, as Sir Peregrine was present, it was needful that he should be dishonest. Arguing thus he looked the lie, and Lady Mason derived more comfort from that look than from all Sir Peregrine's words.

And then those various details were explained to her which Mr. Furnival understood that Mr. Dockwrath had picked up. They went into that matter of the partnership deed, and questions were asked as to the man Kenneby and the woman Bolster. They might both, Lady Mason said, have been witnesses to half a dozen deeds on that same day, for aught she knew to the contrary. She had been present with Sir Joseph, as far as she could now remember, during the whole of that morning, "in and out, Sir Peregrine, as you can understand." Sir Peregrine said that he did understand perfectly. She did know that Mr. Usbech had been there for many hours that day, probably from ten to two or three, and no doubt therefore much business was transacted. She herself remembered nothing but the affair of the will; but then that was natural, seeing that there was no other affair in which she had specially interested herself.

"No doubt these people did witness both the deeds," said Sir Peregrine. "For myself, I can not conceive how that wretched man can be so silly as to spend his money on such a case as this."

"He would do any thing for revenge," said Mr. Furnival.

And then Lady Mason was allowed to go back to the drawing-room, and what remained to be said was said between the two gentlemen alone. Sir Peregrine was very anxious that his own attorneys should be employed, and he named Messrs. Slow and Bideawhile, than whom there were no more respectable men in the whole profession. But then Mr. Furnival feared that they were too respectable. They might look at the matter in so straightforward a light as to fancy their client really guilty; and what might happen then? Old Slow would not conceal the truth for all the baronets in England—no, nor for all the pretty women. The touch of Lady Mason's hand and the tear in her eye would be nothing to old Slow. Mr. Furnival, therefore, was obliged to explain that Slow and Bideawhile did not undertake that sort of business.

"But I should wish it to be taken up through them. There must be some expenditure, Mr. Furnival, and I should prefer that they should arrange about that."

Mr. Furnival made no further immediate objection, and consented at last to have an interview with one of the firm on the subject, provided, of course, that that member of the firm came to him at his chambers. And then he took his leave. Nothing positive had been done, or even settled to be done, on this morning; but the persons most interested in the matter had been made to understand that the affair was taking an absolute palpable substance, and that steps must be taken—indeed, would be taken almost immediately. Mr. Furnival, as he left the house, resolved to employ the attorneys whom he might think best adapted for the purpose. He would settle that matter with Slow and Bideawhile afterward.

And then, as he returned to Noningsby, he wondered at his persistence in the matter. He believed that his client had been guilty; he believed that this codicil was no real instrument made by Sir Joseph Mason. And so believing, would it not be better for him to wash his hands of the whole affair? Others did not think so, and would it not be better that such others should be her advisers? Was he not taking up for himself endless trouble and annoyance that could have no useful purpose? So he argued with himself, and yet by the time that he had reached Noningsby he had determined that he would stand by Lady Mason to the last. He hated that man Mason, as he declared to himself when providing himself with reasons for his resolve, and regarded his bitter, malicious justice as more criminal than any crime of which Lady Mason might have been guilty. And then as he leaned back in the railway carriage he still saw her pale face before him, still heard the soft tone of her voice, and was still melted by the tear in her eye. Young man, young friend of mine, who art now filled to the overflowing of thy brain with poetry, with chivalry, and love, thou seest seated opposite to thee there that grim old man, with long snuffy nose, with sharp piercing eyes, with scanty frizzled hairs. He is rich and cross, has been three times married, and has often quarreled with his children. He is fond of his wine, and snores dreadfully after dinner. To thy seeming he is a dry, withered stick, from which all the sap of sentiment has been squeezed by the rubbing and friction of years. Poetry, the feeling if not the words of poetry—is he not dead to it, even as the pavement is dead over which his wheels trundle? Oh, my young friend! thou art ignorant in this—as in most other things. He may not twitter of sentiment, as thou doest; nor may I trundle my hoop along the high road, as do the little boys. The fitness of things forbids it. But that old man's heart is as soft as thine, if thou couldst but read it. The body dries up and withers away, and the bones grow old; the brain, too, becomes decrepit, as do the sight, the hearing, and the soul. But the heart that is tender once remains tender to the last.

Lady Mason, when she left the library, walked across the hall toward the drawing-room, and then she paused. She would fain remain alone for a while if it were possible, and therefore she turned aside into a small breakfast parlor, which was used every morning, but which was rarely visited afterward during the day. Here she sat, leaving the door slightly open, so that she might know when Mr. Furnival left the baronet. Here she sat for a full hour, waiting—waiting—waiting. There was no sofa or lounging-chair in the room, reclining in which she could remain there half sleeping, sitting comfortably at her ease; but she placed herself near the table, and leaning there with her face upon her hand, she waited patiently till Mr. Furnival had gone. That her mind was full of thoughts I need hardly say, but yet the hour seemed very long to her. At last she heard the library door open, she heard Sir Peregrine's voice as he stood in the hall and shook hands with his departing visitor, she heard the sound of the wheels as the fly moved upon the gravel, and then she heard Sir Peregrine again shut the library door behind him.

She did not immediately get up from her chair; she still waited a while, perhaps for another period of ten minutes, and then she noiselessly left the room, and moving quickly and silently across the hall she knocked at Sir Peregrine's door. This she did so gently that at first no answer was made to her. Then she knocked again, hardly louder but with a repeated rap, and Sir Peregrine summoned her to come in. "May I trouble you once more—for one moment?" she said.

"Certainly, certainly; it is no trouble. I am glad that you are here in the house at this time, that you may see me at any moment that you may wish."

"I do not know why you should be so good to me."

"Because you are in great grief, in undeserved grief, because— Lady Mason, my services are at your command. I will act for you as I would for a—daughter."

"You hear now of what it is that they accuse me."

"Yes," he said; "I do hear:" and as he spoke he came round so that he was standing near to her, but with his back to the fire-place. "I do hear, and I blush to think that there is a man in England, holding the position of a county magistrate, who can so forget all that is due to honesty, to humanity, and to self-respect."

"You do not then think that I have been guilty of this thing?"

"Guilty—I think you guilty! No, nor does he think so. It is impossible that he should think so. I am no more sure of my own innocence than of yours;" and as he spoke he took both her hands and looked into her face, and his eyes also were full of tears. "You may be sure of this, that neither I nor Edith will ever think you guilty."

"Dearest Edith!" she said; she had never before called Sir Peregrine's daughter-in-law by her Christian name, and as she now did so she almost felt that she had sinned. But Sir Peregrine took it in good part. "She is dearest," he said; "and be sure of this, that she will be true to you through it all."

And so they stood for a while without further speech. He still held both her hands, and the tears still stood in his eyes. Her eyes were turned to the ground, and from them the tears were running fast. At first they ran silently, without audible sobbing, and Sir Peregrine, with his own old eyes full of salt water, hardly knew that she was weeping. But gradually the drops fell upon his hand, one by one at first, and then faster and faster; and soon there came a low sob, a sob all but suppressed, but which at last forced itself forth, and then her head fell upon his shoulder. "My dear," he said, himself hardly able to speak; "my poor dear, my ill-used dear!" and as she withdrew one hand from his that she might press a handkerchief to her face, his vacant arm passed itself round her waist. "My poor, ill-used dear!" he said again, as he pressed her to his old heart, and leaning over her he kissed her lips.

So she stood for some few seconds, feeling that she was pressed close by the feeble pressure of his arm, and then she gradually sank through from his embrace, and fell upon her knees at his feet. She knelt at his feet, supporting herself with one arm upon the table, and with the other hand she still held his hand over which her head was bowed. "My friend," she said, still sobbing, and sobbing loudly now; "my friend, that God has sent me in my trouble." And then, with words that were wholly inaudible, she murmured some prayer on his behalf.

"I am better now," she said, raising herself quickly to her feet when a few seconds had passed. "I am better now," and she stood erect before him. "By God's mercy I will endure it; I think I can endure it now."

"If I can lighten the load—"

"You have lightened it—of half its weight; but, Sir Peregrine, I will leave this—"

"Leave this! go away from The Cleeve!"

"Yes; I will not destroy the comfort of your home by the wretchedness of my position. I will not—"

"Lady Mason, my house is altogether at your service. If you will be led by me in this matter, you will not leave it till this cloud shall have passed by you. You will be better to be alone now;" and then, before she could answer him further, he led her to the door. She felt that it was better for her to be alone, and she hastened up the stairs to her own chamber.

"And why should I not?" said Sir Peregrine to himself, as he again walked the length of the library.

CHAPTER XXVII.

COMMERCE.

LUCIUS MASON was still staying at Noningsby when Mr. Furnival made his visit to Sir Peregrine, and on that afternoon he received a note from his mother. Indeed, there were three notes passed between them on that afternoon, for he wrote an answer to his mother, and then received a reply to that answer. Lady Mason told him that she did not intend to return home to the Farm quite immediately, and explained that her reason for not doing so was the necessity that she should have assistance and advice at this period of her trouble. She did not say that she misdoubted the wisdom of her son's counsels; but it appeared to him that she intended to signify to him that she did so, and he answered her in words that were sore and almost bitter. "I am sorry," he said, "that you and I can not agree about a matter that is of such vital concern to both of us; but as it is so, we can only act as each thinks best, you for yourself, and I for myself. I am sure, however, that you will believe that my only object is your happiness and your fair name, which is dearer to me than any thing else in the world." In answer to this, she had written again immediately, filling her letter with sweet words of motherly love, telling him that she was sure, quite sure, of his affection and kind spirit, and excusing herself for not putting the matter altogether in his hands by saying that she was forced to lean on those who had supported her from the beginning—through that former trial which had taken place when he, Lucius, was yet a baby. "And, dearest Lucius, you must not be angry with me," she went on to say; "I am suffering much under this cruel persecution, but my sufferings would be more than doubled if my own boy quarreled with me." Lucius, when he received this, flung up his head. "Quarrel with her!" he said to himself; "nothing on earth would make me quarrel with her; but I can not say that that is right which I think to be wrong." His feelings were good and honest, and kindly, too, in their way; but tenderness of heart was not his weakness. I should wrong him if I were to say that he was hard-hearted, but he flattered himself that he was just-hearted, which sometimes is nearly the same—as had been the case with his father before him, and was now the case with his half-brother Joseph.

The day after this was his last at Noningsby. He had told Lady Staveley that he intended to go, and though she had pressed his further stay, remarking that none of the young people intended to move till after twelfth-night, nevertheless he persisted. With the young people of the house themselves he had not much advanced himself; and altogether he did not find himself thoroughly happy in the judge's house. They were more thoughtless than he—as he thought; they did not understand him, and therefore he would leave them. Besides, there was a great day of hunting coming on, at which every body was to take a part, and as he did not hunt that gave him another reason for going. "They have nothing to do but amuse themselves," he said to himself; "but I have a man's work before me, and a man's misfortunes. I will go home and face both."

In all this there was much of conceit, much of pride, much of deficient education—deficiency in that special branch of education which England has imparted to the best of her sons, but which is now becoming out of fashion. He had never learned to measure himself against others—I do not mean his knowledge or his book-acquirements, but the everyday conduct of his life—and to perceive that that which is insignificant in others must be insignificant in himself also. To those around him at Noningsby his extensive reading respecting the Iapetidæ recommended him not at all, nor did his agricultural ambitions; not even to Felix Graham, as a companion, though Felix Graham could see further into his character than did the others. He was not such as they were. He had not the unpretentious, self-controlling humor, perfectly free from all conceit, which was common to them. Life did not come easy to him, and the effort which he was ever making was always visible. All men should ever be making efforts, no doubt; but those efforts should not be conspicuous. But yet Lucius Mason was not a bad fellow, and young Staveley showed much want of discernment when he called him empty-headed and selfish. Those epithets were by no means applicable to him. That he was not empty-headed is certain; and he was moreover capable of a great self-sacrifice.

That his talents and good qualities were appreciated by one person in the house, seemed evident to Lady Staveley and the other married ladies of the party. Miss Furnival, as they all thought, had not found him empty-headed. And, indeed, it may be doubted whether Lady Staveley would have pressed his stay at Noningsby had Miss Furnival been less gracious. Dear Lady Staveley was always living in a fever lest her only son, the light of her eyes, should fall irrevocably in love with some lady that was by no means good enough for him. Revocably in love he was daily falling; but some day he would go too deep, and the waters would close over his well-loved head. Now in her dear old favoring eyes Sophia Furnival was by no means good enough, and it had been quite clear that Augustus had become thoroughly lost in his attempts to bring about a match between Felix Graham and the barrister's daughter. In preparing the bath for his friend he had himself fallen bodily into the water. He was always at Miss Furnival's side as long as Miss Furnival would permit it. But it seemed to Lady Staveley that Miss Furnival, luckily, was quite as fond of having Lucius Mason at her side; that of the two she perhaps preferred Lucius Mason. That her taste and judgment should be so bad was wonderful to Lady Staveley; but this depravity, though wonderful, was useful, and therefore Lucius Mason might have been welcome to remain at Noningsby.

It may, however, be possible that Miss Furnival knew what she was doing quite as well as Lady Staveley could know for her. In the first place, she may possibly have thought it indiscreet to admit Mr. Staveley's attentions with too much freedom. She may have doubted their sincerity, or feared to give offense to the family, or Mr. Mason may in her sight have been the preferable suitor. That his gifts of intellect were at any rate equal to those of the other there can be no doubt. Then his gifts of fortune were already his own, and, for aught that Miss Furnival knew, might be equal to any that would ever appertain to the other gentleman. That Lady Staveley should think her swan better looking than Lady Mason's goose was very natural; but then Lady Mason would no doubt have regarded the two birds in an exactly opposite light. It is only fair to conceive that Miss Furnival was a better judge than either of them.

On the evening before his departure the whole party had been playing commerce; for the rule of the house during these holidays was this, that all the amusements brought into vogue were to be adapted to the children. If the grown-up people could adapt themselves to them, so much the better for them; if not, so much the worse; they must in such case provide for themselves. On the whole, the grown-up people seemed to live nearly as jovial a life as did the children. Whether the judge himself was specially fond of commerce I can not say; but he persisted in putting in the whole pool, and played through the entire game, rigidly fighting for the same pool on behalf of a very small grandchild, who sat during the whole time on his knee. There are those who call cards the devil's books, but we will presume that the judge was of a different way of thinking.

On this special evening Sophia had been sitting next to Augustus—a young man can always arrange these matters in his own house—but had nevertheless lost all her lives early in the game. "I will not have any cheating to-night," she had said to her neighbor; "I will take my chance, and if I die, I die. One can die but once."

And so she had died, three times indeed instead of once only, and had left the table. Lucius Mason also had died. He generally did die the first, having no aptitude for a collection of kings or aces, and so they two came together over the fire in the second drawing-room, far away from the card-players. There was nothing at all remarkable in this, as Mr. Furnival and one or two others who did not play commerce were also there; but nevertheless they were separated from those of the party who were most inclined to criticise their conduct.

"So you are leaving to-morrow, Mr. Mason," said Sophia.

"Yes. I go home to-morrow after breakfast; to my own house, where for some weeks to come I shall be absolutely alone."

"Your mother is staying at The Cleeve, I think."

"Yes—and intends remaining there as she tells me. I wish with all my heart she were at Orley Farm."

"Papa saw her yesterday. He went over to The Cleeve on purpose to see her; and this morning he has been talking to me about her. I can not tell you how I grieve for her."

"It is very sad; very sad. But I wish she were in her own house. Under the circumstances as they now are, I think it would be better for her to be there than elsewhere. Her name has been disgraced—"

"No, Mr. Mason; not disgraced."

"Yes; disgraced. Mark you, I do not say that she has been disgraced; and pray do not suppose it possible that I should think so. But a great opprobrium has been thrown on her name, and it would be better, I think, that she should remain at home till she has cast it off from her. Even for myself, I feel it almost wrong to be here; nor would I have come had I known when I did come as much as I do know now."

"But no one can for a moment think that your mother has done any thing that she should not have done."

"Then why do so many people talk of her as though she had committed a great crime? Miss Furnival, I know that she is innocent. I know it as surely as I know the fact of my own existence—"

"And we all feel the same thing."

"But if you were in my place—if it were your father whose name was so bandied about in people's mouths, you would think that it behooved him to do nothing, to go nowhere, till he had forced the world to confess his innocence. And this is ten times stronger with regard to a woman. I have given my mother my counsel, and I regret to say that she differs from me."

"Why do you not speak to papa?"

"I did once. I went to him at his chambers, and he rebuked me."

"Rebuked you, Mr. Mason! He did not do that intentionally I am sure. I have heard him say that you are an excellent son."

"But nevertheless he did rebuke me. He considered that I was traveling beyond my own concerns in wishing to interfere for the protection of my mother's name. He said that I should leave it to such people as the Staveleys and the Ormes to guard her from ignominy and disgrace."

"Oh, he did not mean that!"

"But to me it seems that it should be a son's first duty. They are talking of trouble and of cost. I would give every hour I have in the day, and every shilling I own in the world to save her from one week of such suffering as she now endures; but it cuts me to the heart when she tells me that because she is suffering, therefore she must separate herself from me. I think it would be better for her, Miss Furnival, to be staying at home with me than to be at The Cleeve."

"The kindness of Mrs. Orme must be a great support to her."

"And why should not my kindness be a support to her—or rather my affection? We know from whom all these scandals come. My desire is to meet that man in a court of law and thrust these falsehoods down his throat."

"Ah! but you are a man."

"And therefore I would take the burden from her shoulders. But no; she will not trust to me. The truth, Miss Furnival, is this, that she has not yet learned to think of me as a man. To her I am still the boy for whom she is bound to provide, not the son who should bear for her all her cares. As it is I feel that I do not dare again to trouble her with my advice."

"Grandmamma is dead," shouted out a shrill small voice from the card-table. "Oh, grandmamma, do have one of my lives. Look! I've got three," said another.

"Thank you, my dears; but the natural term of my existence has come, and I will not rebel against fate."

"Oh, grandmamma—we'll let you have another grace."

"By no means, Charley. Indeed I am not clear that I am entitled to Christian burial as it is."

"A case of felo de se, I rather think," said her son. "About this time of the night suicide does become common among the elders. Unfortunately for me, the pistol that I have been snapping at my own head for the last half hour always hangs fire."

There was not much of love-making in the conversation which had taken place between young Mason and Sophia; not much at least up to this point; but a confidence had been established, and before he left her he did say a word or two that was more tender in its nature. "You must not be in dudgeon with me," he said, "for speaking to you of all this. Hitherto I have kept it all to myself, and perhaps I should still have done so."

"Oh no; do not say that."

"I am in great grief. It is dreadful to me to hear these things said, and as yet I have found no sympathy."

"I can assure you, Mr. Mason, that I do sympathize with you most sincerely. I only wish my sympathy could be of more value."

"It will be invaluable," he said, not looking at her, but fixing his eyes upon the fire, "if it be given with constancy from the first to the last of this sad affair."

"It shall be so given," said Miss Furnival, also looking at the fire.

"It will be tolerably long, and men will say cruel things of us. I can foresee this, that it will be very hard to prove to the world with certainty that there is no foundation whatever for these charges. If those who are now most friendly to us turn away from us—"

"I will never turn away from you, Mr. Mason."

"Then give me your hand on that, and remember that such a promise in my ears means much." He in his excitement had forgotten that there were others in the room who might be looking at them, and that there was a long vista open upon them direct from all the eyes at the card-table; but she did not forget it. Miss Furnival could be very enthusiastic, but she was one of those who in her enthusiasm rarely forgot any thing. Nevertheless, after a moment's pause, she gave him her hand. "There it is," she said; "and you may be sure of this, that with me also such a promise does mean something. And now I will say good-night." And so, having received the pressure of her hand, she left him.

"I will get you your candle," he said, and so he did.

"Good-night, papa," she said, kissing her father. And then, with a slight muttered word to Lady Staveley, she withdrew, having sacrificed the remainder of that evening for the sake of acceding to Mr. Mason's request respecting her pledge. It could not be accounted strange that she should give her hand to the gentleman with whom she was immediately talking as she bade him good-night.

"And now grandpapa is dead too," said Marian, "and there's nobody left but us three."

"And we'll divide," said Fanny Sebright; and so the game of commerce was brought to an end.

CHAPTER XXVIII.

MONKTON GRANGE.

DURING these days Peregrine Orme—though he was in love up to his very chin, seriously in love, acknowledging this matter to himself openly, pulling his hair in the retirement of his bedroom, and resolving that he would do that which he had hitherto in life always been successful in doing—ask, namely, boldly for that he wanted sorely—Peregrine Orme, I say, though he was in this condition, did not in these days neglect his hunting. A proper attendance upon the proceedings of the H. H. was the only duty which he had hitherto undertaken in return for all that his grandfather had done for him, and I have no doubt that he conceived that he was doing a duty in going hither and thither about the county to their most distant meets. At this period of the present season it happened that Noningsby was more central to the proceedings of the hunt than The Cleeve, and therefore he was enabled to think that he was remaining away from home chiefly on business. On one point, however, he had stoutly come to a resolution. That question should be asked of Madeline Staveley before he returned to his grandfather's house.

And now had arrived a special hunting morning—special, because the meet was in some degree a show meet, appropriate for ladies, at a comfortable distance from Noningsby, and affording a chance of amusement to those who sat in carriages as well as to those on horseback. Monkton Grange was the well-known name of the place—a name perhaps dearer to the ladies than to the gentlemen of the country, seeing that show meets do not always give the best sport. Monkton Grange is an old farm-house, now hardly used as such, having been left, as regards the habitation, in the hands of a head laborer; but it still possesses the marks of ancient respectability and even of grandeur. It is approached from the high road by a long double avenue of elms, which still stand in all their glory. The road itself has become narrow, and the space between the side row of trees is covered by soft turf, up which those coming to the meet love to gallop, trying the fresh metal of their horses. And the old house itself is surrounded by a moat, dry indeed now for the most part, but nevertheless an evident moat, deep and well preserved, with a bridge over it which Fancy tells us must once have been a draw-bridge. It is here, in front of the bridge, that the old hounds sit upon their haunches, resting quietly round the horses of the huntsmen, while the young dogs move about, and would wander if the whips allowed them—one of the fairest sights to my eyes that this fair country of ours can show. And here the sportsmen and ladies congregate by degrees, men from a distance in dog-carts generally arriving first, as being less able to calculate the time with accuracy. There is room here too in the open space for carriages, and there is one spot on which always stands old Lord Alston's chariot with the four posters; an ancient sportsman he, who still comes to some few favorite meets; and though Alston Court is but eight miles from the Grange, the post-horses always look as though they had been made to do their best, for his lordship likes to move fast even in his old age. He is a tall thin man, bent much with age, and apparently too weak for much walking; he is dressed from head to foot in a sportsman's garb, with a broad, stiffly-starched colored handkerchief tied rigidly round his neck. One would say that old as he is he has sacrificed in no way to comfort. It is with difficulty that he gets into his saddle, his servant holding his rein and stirrup, and giving him

MONKTON GRANGE.

perhaps some other slight assistance; but when he is there, there he will remain all day, and when his old blood warms he will gallop along the road with as much hot fervor as his grandson. An old friend he of Sir Peregrine's. "And why is not your grandfather here to-day?" he said on this occasion to young Orme. "Tell him from me that if he fails us in this way, I shall think he is getting old." Lord Alston was in truth five years older than Sir Peregrine, but Sir Peregrine at this time was thinking of other things.

And then a very tidy little modern carriage bustled up the road, a brougham made for a pair of horses, which was well known to all hunting men in these parts. It was very unpretending in its color and harness; but no vehicle more appropriate to its purpose ever carried two thorough-going sportsmen day after day about the country. In this as it pulled up under the head tree of the avenue were seated the two Miss Tristrams. The two Miss Tristrams were well known to the Hamworth Hunt—I will not merely say as fearless riders—of most girls who hunt as much can be said as that; but they were judicious horsewomen; they knew when to ride hard, and when hard riding, as regarded any necessary for the hunt, would be absolutely thrown away. They might be seen for half the day moving about the roads as leisurely, or standing as quietly at the covert's side as might the seniors of the field. But when the time for riding did come, when the hounds were really running—when other young ladies had begun to go home—then the Miss Tristrams were always there; there or thereabouts, as their admirers would warmly boast.

Nor did they commence their day's work as did other girls who came out on hunting mornings. With most such it is clear to see that the object is pretty much the same here as in the ball-room. "Spectatum veniunt; veniunt spectentur ut ipsæ," as it is proper, natural, and desirable that they should do. By that word "spectatum" I would wish to signify something more than the mere use of the eyes. Perhaps an occasional word dropped here and there into the ears of a cavalier may be included in it; and the "spectentur" also may include a word so received. But the Miss Tristrams came for hunting. Perhaps there might be a slight shade of affectation in the manner by which they would appear to come for that and that only. They would talk of nothing else, at any rate, during the earlier portion of the day, when many listeners were by. They were also well instructed as to the country to be drawn, and usually had a word of import to say to the huntsman. They were good-looking, fair-haired girls, short in size, with bright gray eyes, and a short decisive mode of speaking. It must not be imagined that they were altogether indifferent to such matters as are dear to the hearts of other girls. They were not careless as to admiration, and if report spoke truth of them were willing enough to establish themselves in the world; but all their doings of that kind had a reference to their favorite amusement, and they would as soon have thought of flirting with men who did not hunt as some other girls would with men who did not dance.

I do not know that this kind of life had been altogether successful with them, or that their father had been right to permit it. He himself had formerly been a hunting man, but he had become fat and lazy, and the thing had dropped away from him. Occasionally he did come out with them, and when he did not do so some other senior of the field would have them nominally under charge; but practically they were as independent when going across the country as the young men who accompanied them. I have expressed a doubt whether this life was successful with them, and indeed such doubt was expressed by many of their neighbors. It had been said of each of them for the last three years that she was engaged, now to this man, and then to that other; but neither this man nor that other had yet made good the assertion, and now people were beginning to say that no man was engaged to either of them. Hunting young ladies are very popular in the hunting-field; I know no place in which girls receive more worship and attention; but I am not sure but they may carry their enthusiasm too far for their own interests, let their horsemanship be as perfect as it may be.

The two girls on this occasion sat in their carriage till the groom brought up their horses, and then it was wonderful to see with what ease they placed themselves in their saddles. On such occasions they admitted no aid from the gentlemen around them, but each stepping for an instant on a servant's hand, settled herself in a moment on horseback. Nothing could be more perfect than the whole thing, but the wonder was that Mr. Tristram should have allowed it.

The party from Noningsby consisted of six or seven on horseback, besides those in the carriage. Among the former there were the two young ladies, Miss Furnival and Miss Staveley, and our friends Felix Graham, Augustus Staveley, and Peregrine Orme. Felix Graham was not by custom a hunting man, as he possessed neither time nor money for such a pursuit; but to-day he was mounted on his friend Staveley's second horse, having expressed his determination to ride him as long as they two, the man and the horse, could remain together.

"I give you fair warning," Felix had said, "if I do not spare my own neck, you can not expect me to spare your horse's legs."

"You may do your worst," Staveley had answered. "If you give him his head, and let him have his own way, he won't come to grief, whatever you may do."

On their road to Monkton Grange, which was but three miles from Noningsby, Peregrine Orme had ridden by the side of Miss Staveley, thinking more of her than of the affairs of the hunt, prominent as they were generally in his thoughts. How should he do it, and when, and in what way should he commence the deed? He had an idea that it might be better for him if he could engender some closer intimacy between himself and Madeline before he absolutely asked the fatal question; but the closer intimacy did not seem to produce itself readily. He had, in truth, known Madeline Staveley for many years, almost since they were children together; but lately, during these Christmas holidays especially, there had not been between them that close conversational alliance which so often facilitates such an overture as that which Peregrine was now desirous of making. And, worse again, he had seen that there was such close conversational alliance between Madeline and Felix Graham. He did not on that account dislike the young barrister, or call him, even within his own breast, a snob or an ass. He knew well that he was neither the one nor the other; but he knew as well that he could be no fit match for Miss Staveley, and, to tell the truth, he did not suspect that either Graham or Miss Staveley would think of such a thing. It was not jealousy that tormented him, so much as a diffidence in his own resources. He made small attempts which did not succeed, and therefore he determined that he would at once make a grand attempt. He would create himself an opportunity before he left Noningsby, and would do it even to-day on horseback, if he could find sufficient opportunity. In taking a determined step like that, he knew that he would not lack the courage.

"Do you mean to ride to-day?" he said to Madeline, as they were approaching the bottom of the Grange avenue. For the last half mile he had been thinking what he would say to her, and thinking in vain; and now, at the last moment, he could summon no words to his assistance more potent for his purpose than these.

"If you mean by riding, Mr. Orme, going across the fields with you and the Miss Tristrams, certainly not. I should come to grief, as you call it, at the first ditch."

"And that is just what I shall do," said Felix Graham, who was at her other side.

"Then, if you take my advice, you'll remain with us in the wood, and act as squire of dames. What on earth would Marian do if aught but good was to befall you?"

"Dear Marian! She gave me a special commission to bring her the fox's tail. Foxes' tails are just like ladies."

"Thank you, Mr. Graham. I've heard you make some pretty compliments, and that is about the prettiest."

"A faint heart will never win either the one or the other, Miss Staveley."

"Oh, ah, yes. That will do very well. Under these circumstances I will accept the comparison."

All of which very innocent conversation was overheard by Peregrine Orme, riding on the other side of Miss Staveley's horse. And why not? Neither Graham nor Miss Staveley had any objection. But how was it that he could not join in and take his share in it? He had made one little attempt at conversation, and that having failed, he remained perfectly silent till they reached the large circle at the head of the avenue. "It's no use, this sort of thing," he said to himself. "I must do it at a blow if I do it at all;" and then he rode away to the master of the hounds.

As our party arrived at the open space the Miss Tristrams were stepping out of their carriage, and they came up to shake hands with Miss Staveley.

"I am so glad to see you," said the eldest; "it is so nice to have some ladies out besides ourselves."

"Do keep up with us," said the second. "It's a very open country about here, and any body can ride it." And then Miss Furnival was introduced to them. "Does your horse jump, Miss Furnival?"

"I really do not know," said Sophia; "but I sincerely trust that if he does, he will refrain to-day."

"Don't say so," said the eldest sportswoman. "If you'll only begin it will come as easy to you as going along the road;" and then, not being able to spare more of these idle moments, they both went off to their horses, walking as though their habits were no impediments to them, and in half a minute they were seated.

"What is Harriet on to-day?" asked Staveley of a constant member of the hunt. Now Harriet was the eldest Miss Tristram.

"A little brown mare she got last week. That was a terrible brush we had on Friday. You weren't out, I think. We killed in the open, just at the edge of Rotherham Common. Harriet was one of the few that was up, and I don't think the chestnut horse will be the better of it this season."

"That was the horse she got from Griggs?"

"Yes; she gave a hundred and fifty for him; and I'm told he was as nearly done on Friday as any animal you ever put your eyes on. They say Harriet cried when she got home." Now the gentleman who was talking about Harriet on this occasion was one with whom she would no more have sat down to table than with her own groom.

But though Harriet may have cried when she got home on that fatal Friday evening, she was full of the triumph of the hunt on this morning. It is not often that the hounds run into a fox and absolutely surround and kill him on the open ground, and when this is done after a severe run there are seldom many there to see it. If a man can fairly take a fox's brush on such an occasion as that, let him do it; otherwise let him leave it to the huntsman. On the occasion in question it seems that Harriet Tristram might have done so, and some one coming second to her had been gallant enough to do it for her.

"Oh, my lord, you should have been out on Friday," she said to Lord Alston. "We had the prettiest thing I ever saw."

"A great deal too pretty for me, my dear."

"Oh, you who know the roads so well would certainly have been up. I suppose it was thirteen miles from Cobbleton's Bushes to Rotherham Common."

"Not much less, indeed," said his lordship, unwilling to diminish the lady's triumph. Had a gentleman made the boast his lordship would have demonstrated that it was hardly more than eleven.

"I timed it accurately from the moment he went away," said the lady, "and it was exactly fifty-seven minutes. The first part of it was awfully fast. Then we had a little check at Moseley Bottom. But for that, nobody could have lived through it. I never shall forget how deep it was coming up from there to Cringleton. I saw two men get off to ease their horses up the deep bit of plow; and I would have done so too, only my horse would not have stood for me to get up."

"I hope he was none the worse for it," said the sporting character who had been telling Staveley just now how she had cried when she got home that night.

"To tell the truth, I fear it has done him no good. He would not feed, you know, that night at all."

"And broke out into cold sweats," said the gentleman.

"Exactly," said the lady, not quite liking it, but still enduring with patience.

"Rather groggy on his pins the next morning?" suggested her friend.

"Very groggy," said Harriet, regarding the word as one belonging to fair sporting phraseology.

"And inclined to go very much on the points of his toes. I know all about it, Miss Tristram, as well as though I'd seen him."

"There's nothing but rest for it, I suppose."

"Rest and regular exercise—that's the chief thing; and I should give him a mash as often as three times a week. He'll be all right again in three or four weeks—that is if he's sound, you know."

"Oh, as sound as a bell," said Miss Tristram.

"He'll never be the same horse on a road though," said the sporting gentleman, shaking his head and whispering to Staveley.

And now the time had come at which they were to move. They always met at eleven; and at ten minutes past, to the moment, Jacob the huntsman would summons the old hounds from off their haunches. "I believe we may be moving, Jacob," said Mr. Williams, the master.

"The time be up," said Jacob, looking at a ponderous time-keeper that might with truth be called a hunting-watch; and then they all moved slowly away back from the Grange, down a farm-road which led to Monkton Wood, distant from the old house perhaps a quarter of a mile.

"May we go as far as the wood?" said Miss Furnival to Augustus. "Without being made to ride over hedges, I mean."

"Oh, dear, yes; and ride about the wood half the day. It will be an hour and a half before a fox will break—even if he ever breaks."

"Dear me! how tired you will be of us. Now do say something pretty, Mr. Staveley."

"It's not my métier. We shall be tired, not of you, but of the thing. Galloping up and down the same cuts in the wood for an hour and a half is not exciting; nor does it improve the matter much if we stand still, as one should do by rights."

"That would be very slow."

"You need not be afraid. They never do here. Every body will be rushing about as though the very world depended on their galloping."

"I'm so glad; that's just what I like."

"Every body except Lord Alston, Miss Tristram, and the other old stagers. They will husband their horses, and come out as fresh at two o'clock as though they were only just out. There is nothing so valuable as experience in hunting."

"Do you think it nice seeing a young lady with so much hunting knowledge?"

"Now you want me to talk slander, but I won't do it. I admire the Miss Tristrams exceedingly, and especially Julia."

"And which is Julia?"

"The youngest; that one riding by herself."

"And why don't you go and express your admiration?"

"Ah me! why don't we all express the admiration that we feel, and pour sweet praises into the ears of the lady that excites it? Because we are cowards, Miss Furnival, and are afraid even of such a weak thing as a woman."

"Dear me! I should hardly have thought that you would suffer from such terror as that."

"Because you don't quite know me, Miss Furnival."

"And Miss Julia Tristram is the lady that has excited it?"

"If it be not she, it is some other fair votary of Diana at present riding into Monkton Wood."

"Ah, now you are giving me a riddle to guess, and I never guess riddles. I won't even try at it. But they all seem to be stopping."

"Yes, they are putting the hounds into covert. Now if you want to show yourself a good sportsman, look at your watch. You see that Julia Tristram has got hers in her hand."

"What's that for?"

"To time the hounds; to see how long they'll be before they find. It's very pretty work in a small gorse, but in a great wood like this I don't care much for being so accurate. But for Heaven's sake don't tell Julia Tristram; I should not have a chance if she thought I was so slack."

And now the hounds were scattering themselves in the wood, and the party rode up the centre roadway toward a great circular opening in the middle of it. Here it was the recognized practice of the horsemen to stand, and those who properly did their duty would stand there; but very many lingered at the gate, knowing that there was but one other exit from the wood, without overcoming the difficulty of a very intricate and dangerous fence.

"There be a gap, baint there?" said one farmer to another, as they were entering.

"Yes, there be a gap, and young Grubbles broke his 'orse's back a getting over of it last year," said the second farmer.

"Did he though?" said the first; and so they both remained at the gate.

And others, a numerous body, including most of the ladies, galloped up and down the crossways, because the master of the hounds and the huntsman did so. "D—— those fellows riding up and down after me wherever I go," said the master. "I believe they think I'm to be hunted." This seemed to be said more especially to Miss Tristram, who was always in the master's confidence; and I fear that the fellows alluded to included Miss Furnival and Miss Staveley.

And then there came the sharp, eager sound of a hound's voice; a single, sharp, happy opening bark, and Harriet Tristram was the first to declare that the game was found. "Just five minutes and twenty seconds, my lord," said Julia Tristram to Lord Alston. "That's not bad in a large wood like this."

"Uncommonly good," said his lordship. "And when are we to get out of it?"

"They'll be here for the next hour, I'm afraid," said the lady, not moving her horse from the place where she stood, though many of the more impetuous of the men were already rushing away to the gates. "I have seen a fox go away from here without resting a minute; but that was later in the season, at the end of February. Foxes are away from home then." All which observations showed a wonderfully acute sporting observation on the part of Miss Tristram.

And then the music of the dogs became fast and frequent, as they drove the brute across and along from one part of the large wood to another. Sure there is no sound like it for filling a man's heart with an eager desire to be at work. What may be the trumpet in battle I do not know, but I can imagine that it has the same effect. And now a few of them were standing on that wide circular piece of grass, when a sound the most exciting of them all reached their ears. "He's away!" shouted a whip from a corner of the wood. The good-natured beast, though as yet it was hardly past Christmas-time, had consented to bless at once so many anxious sportsmen, and had left the back of the covert with the full pack at his heels.

"There is no gate that way, Miss Tristram," said a gentleman.

"There's a double ditch and bank that will do as well," said she, and away she went directly after the hounds, regardless altogether of the gates. Peregrine Orme and Felix Graham, who were with her, followed close upon her track.

ERNST II. OF SAXE-COBURG-GOTHA.

NOW that the smoke of the 35,000 shots has cleared away, the guests have departed, the oak-wreath withered, the banners rolled up for the next time, and the first National Convention of German Riflemen declared to be a great success, we may already begin to calculate its direct results. In the popular estimation it stands for more than it really is, and, therefore, is more than it seems.

Mere expertness with the rifle is a simple art, and the various corps of shooters might develop their skill to an equal extent without leaving home. But the éclat given to that skill by a public trial at which all Germany looks on—the wide renown, the rich rewards which await the victors—tend directly to make these volunteer associations popular, and to greatly increase their number and efficiency. Again, behind this consideration lies the idea of making the German people strong for their own defense, of bringing them together from the remotest states, and promoting a spirit of unity, a harmony of interests and of aims, in spite of political divisions. Not in vain has the lesson of Italy been studied here. The people at last understand that they must be a PEOPLE, divided by no provincial jealousies, animated by no narrow aims, before Germany can be the one powerful consolidated Empire, which is their political dream.

In the Convention at Gotha, as well as in the Singers' Festival, to be held in Nuremberg (and at which 5000 participants are already announced), this is the deep, underlying idea. The National-Verein (National-Association), which was established in 1859, and already numbers between twenty and thirty thousand members, has for its object the union of all the scattered elements of Progress in an organized body, which shall work for the same end. After long wanderings hither and thither; after many a chase of ignes fatui through the swamps of Red Republicanism, Communism, and Socialism, the Liberal Party in Germany has at last found its rational and proper path. There is no longer a Republican, but a wise, enlightened National Party, against whose growing strength the Reaction is beaten back on every side.

We left our summer quarters in the neighboring Thuringian Forest, and hastened to Gotha on the day previous to the festival, for the purpose of witnessing the arrival of rifle-corps from abroad. The little city had been excited for weeks in advance with the fear that she would not be able to hold all her guests. She resolved, at least, that they should be worthily entertained, and her citizens (with the exception of the nobility, who, for the most part, stood sullenly aloof) spared neither pains nor expense. Hundreds of houses were opened for the strangers, flags were made, wreaths woven, triumphal arches built, and prizes, by scores, contributed for the victors. Silver goblets came from Duke Ernst II., and the Duchess, Prince Albert, the Crown Prince and Princess of Prussia, and the Free Cities; rifles and revolvers, sets of silver spoons, cases of wine, gold watches, embroidered gun-belts and game-bags, meerschaum pipes, cigars, port-folios, cushions, books, and statuettes; and even the children's schools in the neighborhood brought together their pfennings to buy some trifle which should represent their interest in the festival.

From afar, over the trees, the old banner of the German Empire—black, red, and gold, in horizontal bars—waved a welcome as we approached. It is not ten years since these colors were prohibited in almost every part of Germany. As we entered the suburbs the colors of Saxony (green and white) and Thuringia (red and white) floated from every house, subordinate, however, to the all-embracing national flag. The streets leading to the railroad station, whence came the sound of music, were crowded with riflemen, hurrying down to receive the expected deputations. Presently we hear the yelling of two locomotives, which come slowly up the grade from the direction of Weimar, drawing twelve cars. We make for an arbor overlooking the main avenue, through which the strangers must march. Trumpets blow, the people rush past, the thunders rattle—out goes the sunshine, and down comes the rain! We huddle together in the leafy house, which affords but slight protection against the driving sheets. But in half an hour the sun follows, and a double rainbow, complete and magnificent, arches above the Seeberg. The trumpets blow again; the target-men, in scarlet caps and shirts, tramp by with the luggage; the fiacres, garlanded with flowers, succeed, and then the riflemen with their escort, cheerfully keeping step on the muddy road. The banners and the crowds of spectators are their only welcome. There is no shouting, no waving of hats. The Germans have not yet learned that. They have been kept silent so long that they have not recovered the full use of their voices.

In the morning we set out betimes for the market-square in the centre of the city, where the procession was to form. We had the honor of escorting Fräulein Hildegarde, in her oak wreath and scarf of red, black, and gold. From under the linden boughs of the park two similarly attired maidens sprang out to meet us, and the three formed a vanguard, before which the crowd fell back and made us a passage. The market-square lies on the northern side of the steep hill crowned by the castle of Friedenstein. Approaching it from the top, we looked down as into an arena, filled with waving flags and moving masses of men, and sprinkled all over with glittering points of color. The gray old council-hall, in the centre, thrust a flag from every window, and shook its pendent wreaths of oak-leaves in the wind. The fountain was hidden in a pyramid of birchen boughs, and daring young peasants clung to every coign of vantage offered by its layers of basins. In the middle of an open space, kept clear by gens d'armes, the chief marshal was riding to and fro, while his aids stationed the various deputations of riflemen at their posts, ready to fall in at the proper time. The crowd, thousands in number, looked on in silence.

We descended into the square, broke through the guarded space, and took leave of our maidens at the door of the council-hall, where ninety-seven others were waiting for them. On all sides waved the flags of the various German States: the black and white of Prussia; the blue and silver of Bavaria; the red and yellow of Baden; the fortress, in a red field, of Hamburg; the Saxon and Thuringian colors; the tricolor of Schleswig-Holstein; the cross of Switzerland; and, over all—the symbol of strength and unity—the red, black, and gold. Every house was hung with garlands, principally of the German oak, looped up with knots of roses, and disposed in a great variety of forms, but in every instance with excellent taste. The general effect was exceedingly beautiful. The streets through which the procession was to pass were decorated in the same manner. Occasionally the wreaths were of fir, with gilded cones as pendants, or with rosettes of forget-me-nots and harebells. Even in these details there was a national significance. You may be sure, whenever a German is sufficiently advanced to express himself by means of outward symbols, he always puts an idea behind them.

We followed the path of the procession to the outskirts of the city, where hospitable windows had been offered to us. A short distance beyond were the shooting-hall and target-stands, around which a court of show-booths had already sprung up. The square gate-way was composed of the shields of German States, set in feathery frames of fir, while on either side two lofty masts, spirally wreathed to the summit, lifted high in air their crowns of banners. From the centre of the arch floated the colors of the German empire.

'Boom! went the cannon from the castle, announcing that the procession had started. All the church bells began to chime—a circumstance whereat the few reactionists in Gotha were deeply shocked. The road was already lined with expectant crowds, who filled the banks on either side, while the central space was kept clear by mounted gens d'armes. Somewhat in advance of the procession came Duke Ernst, driving a span of black-maned duns, and with such a skillful hand that we doubt not but many of the strangers supposed he was the coachman.

A blast of trumpets, a stretching of the necks of the crowd, an increasing murmur, and the procession comes! It is a double display, for the Turners of Thuringia hold their convention in Gotha at the same time, and have joined their forces to those of the riflemen. The former first appear, preceded by music, and graced by the presence of a second hundred of maidens in white, with wreath of white flowers and rose-colored scarfs. Then comes the corps of Turners. Ah! here is some sign of life, but not from the spectators: they are simply silent and curious. The various deputations greet the ladies of our party with genuine cheers—mild, indeed, but well-meant. Handkerchiefs flourish acknowledgment. Students in velvet caps wave their swords, banners dip, and the trumpets blow a fanfaron, as they pass. Young, gallant fellows in gray linen, they can do something else besides spring bars and climb ladders hand over hand.

We count the maidens, who seem to be portioned off as angelic escorts to the standard-bearers until the hundredth is reached. Now the riflemen! The band plays "Schleswig-Holstein, sea-surrounded," as they pass the tri-colored flag. Company after company of riflemen appear, in plain gray or blue fatigue uniform, but preceded by officers in astonishing costume. Who are these in green and gold, with such plumed chapeaux, such excessive epaulets, such length of sword? Generals? field-m Marshals? you ask. By no means, my friend: they are not even soldiers. It is pleasant to know that the vanity of seeing one's self "in full regimentals" is not confined to militia officers. Some of the banners, however, tattered and riddled in former wars, told a different story. Decidedly the best-looking corps in the entire procession were the Coburg Turners, in their blue flannel shirts and linen trousers. They were armed with rifle, sword-bayonet, and revolver, and commanded by an ex-captain of Garibaldi's Sicilian army, whom the Duke had summoned from Switzerland for the purpose of giving them a military organization and discipline.

The presence of the two hundred maidens was the most pleasing feature of the display—to the eye, at least. The flowing lines of the white robes, the soft gleam of the colored scarfs, and the bright flush of the girlish faces, wound like a thread of grace and beauty through the long files of the men. Here, again, we recognized the artistic sense, if not the direct arrangement of an artist. Another lesson of the festival was afforded by the perfect order preserved by the spectators, thousands of whom were peasants from the surrounding country. The very freedom which was allowed was in itself a guarantee of order—a fact which some continental governments are slow to learn.

After the procession had passed we descended from our windows and followed in the rear, designing to enter the inclosure in season to hear the Duke's address of welcome, and the song "The German Tricolor," to which he had composed the music. The standard-bearers formed a double line from the triumphal gate-way to the portico of the hall, upon which the Duke stood, surrounded by the officers of the Convention. His speech occupied about five minutes in delivery. After referring to that new direction of the popular ideas which had called forth the festival, he said, in a firm, decided tone, "Strength and skill shall to-day unite in emulation for prizes, in order that the individual, elevated by the consciousness of his own value, may become more valuable to the entire people. The chief aim of these mutual endeavors should be the protection of the great German Fatherland, and the preservation of its honor. With such feelings let us reach to one another the fraternal hand!" Many of the riflemen from abroad, who were accustomed to see their own rulers surrounded by the rigid ceremonials of the German courts, were astonished at the manly simplicity for which Ernst II. is distinguished. "Why," said one of them, "it's really comical to see your Duke!" "Why so?" we asked—not knowing that "comical," in his dialect, expressed the highest measure of admiration. "You see," he said, "I once had the honor of standing before our king.

Ah, ha! bow down and be silent: don't you recognize the divinity? But here—he's a man, like ourselves: yes, actually a human being! He walks, and talks, and lets the sun shine without his permission!"

The shooting, which was to continue four days, immediately commenced. There were, in all, thirteen hundred riflemen present, representing every German State, with the exception of Austria. At the commencement there were twenty targets, but the pressure for a chance to shoot was so great that ten more were subsequently added. The shooting-stand was a spacious pavilion, erected for the purpose, on the western side of which were twenty stalls, numbered to correspond with the targets. The latter were also named in the order of rank: the first, to which the highest prizes were attached, being "Germany;" the second, "Duke Ernst;" the third, "Thüringia;" and the fourth, "Schleswig-Holstein." Afterward came the German rivers, and then the representative men; among whom Humboldt, Fichte, and Arndt had a place. The distance was four hundred feet for ten of the targets, and two hundred and fifty feet for the remainder. The manner of shooting was divided into three classes, so arranged that each class should apply to both distances: 1st, shooting "with free hand," without rest or aid of any kind; 2d, with the use of the diopter, or sight-gauge; and 3d, with rests, and all other appliances, at will. Thus, the rifleman who combined the first-class with the greatest distance, and hit the centre oftenest in proportion to the number of shots, would be entitled to the highest prizes. These technical arrangements were a great worry to the committee, who were obliged to take into consideration the diversity of habits and preferences among the riflemen.

The cracking of rifles became more and more frequent, and soon rattled, in scattering volleys, from one end of the pavilion to the other. We were interested in noticing the arrangement of the targets. Each was double, turning upon a pivot midway between the two, so that when one was up the other was down, and concealed from sight in a pit, in which the attendant sat. His duty was, whenever a shot was fired, to turn the axle, bringing the target down to note the shot with the same movement which elevated the other for a fresh one. The shots were carefully registered, and the record sent back to the pavilion from time to time, in a bag attached to a traveling rope. It is a lucky circumstance that none of the attendants were wounded during the festival. Once, indeed, there was a slight alarm. One of the targets having failed to revolve, the firing was suspended and the pit examined, when the man was found lying sound asleep at the bottom, with an empty beer-mug beside him! It is no less an illustration of the care and method native to the German character, that, although 35,000 shots in all were fired, no accident of any kind occurred.

The ambition of the riflemen was stimulated by the silver gleam of the prizes, arranged for show in a little temple adjoining the main hall. The front pediment of this temple, painted by Professor Schneider, illustrated the (just now more than ever) popular legend of the slumbering Barbarossa. The old emperor sits in the vaults of the Kyffhäuser, with his red beard grown to his feet, while the ravens fly around his head. So long as they continue to fly the enchantment binds him; the hour of his awakening has not yet come. But on either side, in the lower caverns, the mountain-gnomes are busy, forging swords, casting bullets, and hammering the locks of guns. Barbarossa symbolizes the German unity. We should have represented him, however, if not in the act of awakening, as at least starting in his sleep. To complete the allegory, one of the ravens should be double-headed, with yellow wings; the second wearing the papal tiara, and with the keys of St. Peter in his claws; and the third with a spiked helmet, representing, not Prussia, but that combination of pride and stubbornness which distinguishes the military caste in Germany.

The Turners had a grand performance in the afternoon, a ball at the theatre in the evening, and an excursion to the mountains on the following day. The riflemen also had their ball, but on both occasions there was a departure from the usual order. The theatre was open on all sides, to every one who chose to enter. There were no door-keepers, no managers; and from the back of the stage to the top of the gallery the space was crowded to suffocation with a mixed multitude, varying in costume from the most elegant ball-toilet to the shabby dress of the street-loafer. To be sure this feature made it a Volksfest in the true sense of the word, but at the expense of the guests for whose pleasure the ball was given.

Thus, from morning till night, for four days, the rifles cracked, the old lindens shook in blasts of music, the noisy booths proclaimed their attractions, and the beer-barrels were emptied. At the close of the festival, De Leuw, of Düsseldorf, was declared to be the first shot, and Dörner, of Nuremberg, the second. Besides the contributed prizes, four hundred in number, there were additional prizes in money, and the lucky first dozen of sharp-shooters received several hundred thalers apiece, together with their silver goblets and spoons.

Not the least circumstance which has contributed to the success of the shooting-match is the fact that the party possesses a leader who not only enjoys an unbounded popularity among the masses, but, being himself a reigning Prince, is at once a guarantee of its character for his fellow-rulers, and a shield for itself against their forcible opposition. This leader is Ernst II., Duke of Saxe-Coburg-Gotha, whom we best know in America as the elder brother of Prince Albert of England, while in Germany the latter is best known as the younger brother of the Duke. The Reactionists—especially the Junkerthum, or Squirearchy, as the reactionary nobility are called—charge Ernst II. with being a demagogue; with heading the popular movement merely for the sake of gratifying a hollow ambition: but they can not deny that his course has been thoroughly consistent from the beginning, and that he remained true to the cause, in spite of the earnest remonstrances of his royal relatives, at a time when it seemed to be utterly crushed. If he is simply cunning, and not sincere, as they affirm, it is that nobler cunning which foresees the inevitable course of events, and rides on the top wave of the flood which it can not stay.

Certainly since the Schleswig-Holstein war, in which he commanded the battery at Eckernfiord, whereby the Danish frigate Christian VIII. was destroyed, no German Prince has been so popular with the people as Ernst II. During the last two years this popularity has taken a much wider and deeper significance. In 1859 he not only welcomed the establishment of the National-Verein, but when the Free City of Frankfort refused to allow its members to meet in convention there, invited them at once to Coburg. A month ago the Legislative Assembly of the Duchy, at his recommendation, concluded a military convention with Prussia, whereby the useless little army of the State is consolidated into that of the greater power—a practical step toward unity. And now, by his indefatigable labors as President of the Convention of Riflemen, by his plain, cordial bearing, his conciliatory patience and kindness in adjusting disputes and jealousies among the guests, and, more than all, by his earnest, patriotic utterances, he has sprung to a height of popularity which might make giddy a head less clear and cool than his.

On the last day of the Convention, when the members assembled in the hall, the Duke made a short address, recommending the formation of a permanent union of volunteer rifle-corps throughout all Germany, not only for the purpose of uniting upon normal regulations in regard to the exercises, but also to arm and discipline the young men, so that they may finally constitute a reserve for the regular army. "The time to create a sensation by words alone," said he, "is past. The people demand action, for the sake of their strength and unity. I hear of dangers which threaten our Fatherland; but a people is beyond danger as soon as it is truly united, truly strong." The proposal was unanimously adopted. A plain-spoken doubter, however, during the day, ventured to approach the Duke and to say: "Your Highness, your words were noble and patriotic; but will you stand by them?" The Duke answered, good-humoredly clapping the speaker on the shoulder, "My friend, all that I have heretofore promised I have performed: I think you may safely confide in me this time."

I had recently the honor of a long personal interview with Ernst II., from which I came away with a most agreeable impression of his character and talents. I had previously been presented to him during the visit of Prince Albert to Gotha, three years ago, and was then struck by his free, off-hand, animated demeanor, which offered a marked contrast to the somewhat reserved and haughty bearing of his younger brother. On my way through Coburg to the Franconian Switzerland a month ago, I expressed a wish, through a friend in the Ministry, to wait upon him at the castle of Callenberg, near that city—his residence in the early summer. The permission was at once given, and with a cordiality which relieved me from any fear of intrusion.

On alighting from the train at the Coburg station, I was accosted by a personage in a white cravat, who, after satisfying himself as to my identity, announced, "His Highness expects you to dinner, at the Callenberg, at seven o'clock this evening." Then, probably suspecting that an American might be unfamiliar with the requirements of costume, he added, in a whisper, "You only need a black cravat and a dress-coat." I satisfied his mind on that score, and we proceeded together to the hotel. He took the further precaution of ordering the carriage, in order that I might be punctual; but I was already aware that punctuality is a necessary virtue of princes.

The evening was delicious, and the drive of three miles was a cheerful ante-chamber, through which to enter pleasant society. (There are few European courts which can be thus designated.) The old fortress of Coburg, where Luther wrote, "Our Lord, He is a Tower of Strength," stood golden in the sun, and long shadows lay across the meadows of Rosenau. A mild breeze, hay-scented, blew over the hills, and frosted the poplars with the silver of their upturned leaves.

The Duke's valet, a stout African, met me at the entrance, and conducted me to an upper terrace—a lovely, shaded spot, planted with flowers in rococo patterns, with a fountain in the centre. The castle completely covers the sharp summit of the mountain, and is visible far and wide. I was about entering, when I was confronted by a tall, stately gentleman, who bowed with appropriate gravity. One of the lackeys, seeing that I did not recognize him, introduced him, with ready tact, as "The Oberhofmarschall (Chamberlain) von —." This personage courteously conducted me around the terrace and pointed out the beauties of the landscape. I had been upon the Callenberg years before, but had never seen it in the splendor of summer.

There is scarcely a more exquisite situation in Germany. It differs from Reinhardtsbrunn as a mountain differs from a valley, depending more on the natural characteristics of the view than on the artistic development of Nature. It is high enough to command a wide and grand panorama, yet not so high as to lose the sentiment and expression of the different features. Each angle of the parapet gives you a new landscape. There is, first, the valley of Coburg, crowned by its hill and fortress; then a broad mountain of dark firs, all else shut out from view; then a vision of England—hedge-row trees, green lawns, clumps of oak, and water; and, finally, a rich plain, stretching away to the west, where the volcanic peaks of the Gleichberge rise against the sky. The trees on the hill itself are superb, and the castle on the summit so thoroughly harmonizes with the scenery that it seems the natural crowning expression of the whole.

Presently the Duke's Adjutant, Herr von Reuter, arrived, in company with his wife and sister, to all of whom I was presented in due form. The Adjutant was a slight, gentlemanly person, with an air of refinement and intelligence; the ladies handsome and graceful, and simply, but very elegantly, dressed. Scarcely had we exchanged a few commonplaces, when the Duke and Duchess came out upon the terrace. The Chamberlain immediately presented me to the latter. She was the Princess Alexandrina, of Baden, a sister of the reigning Grand-Duke. Of medium height, a full rather than plump figure, with blonde hair, blue eyes, and a quiet, almost retiring, simplicity of manner. I could readily understand the affectionate regard in which she is held by the people. Her kindness of heart is evident to any one who looks on her face.

The Duke then advanced and addressed me very cordially. He has but a slight family resemblance to Prince Albert, than whom he appears younger, although two years older. His features are not so regularly chiseled as those of his brother, who is certainly one of the handsomest men in Europe, but far more animated and expressive. He is about five feet ten inches in height, slender, but perfectly symmetrical, and quick and elastic in his movements. His face is a fine oval, the forehead expansive at the temples, and the eyes a clear, splendid hazel. His nose is rather long, but not prominent, the lips firm and sharply cut, while a mustache and short, pointed beard increase their character of decision. It is a medieval rather than a modern head—such as might have belonged to that Ernst who was carried off by the robber-knight, Kunz von Kaufungen, and who was his own ancestor in a direct line. He is passionately fond of hunting, riding, driving, and all other out-door diversions, of which taste his tanned face and hands gave evidence.

He took me off to the parapet and began to comment on the landscape; but in a few minutes dinner was announced, and we rejoined the company. The etiquette observed was very simple. The Duke and Duchess took the lead, I, as a stranger, following—in advance of the ladies, to my surprise—and the Chamberlain brought up the rear. The princely pair were first served, of course, but this was the only formality observed. There was a free, unrestrained flow of conversation, in which all took part, and the subject was naturally varied, without waiting for the Ruler to give the cue. The Duke, it is true, was the leader, not from his position, but from natural right. I can not judge of the depth, but I can testify to the great extent of his acquirements. He has, at least, the mental qualities of attraction and assimilation, which are not the least important concomitants of genius. With an admirable memory and a vital interest in every field of knowledge, there are few subjects upon which he can not converse brilliantly. Quick, animated, sparkling, he provokes the electricity of those with whom he comes in contact. His greatest aversion, I should think, would be a dull person. Perhaps this is the reason why there is so little love lost between him and the nobility. He would rather talk with an intelligent burgher than a stupid baron.

The Duke has talents which, if he were not a duke, might have made him eminent in various ways. He is the author of a work on the Schleswig-Holstein war, and the composer of five operas, two of which—"Santa Chiara" and "Diane de Solanges"—have attained a certain popularity. I have never had an opportunity of hearing either. As an amateur player he is said to be admirable. Yet, with all these brilliant qualities, he is steady, prudent, and clear-headed—ambitious, no doubt, but intelligently so. It is no damage to his future that his enemies are nobles and princes, and his friends the people.

After dinner, which lasted about an hour, we went upon the terrace for coffee and cigars. The Duke called my attention to a small but thrifty specimen of the Sequoia, or California tree, and inquired particularly about the soil in which it grew, the temperature it could endure, etc., as he was anxious to acclimate it completely. He then invited me to a corner of the parapet, looking down on the loveliest woods, where our conversation soon became entirely frank and unreserved. He expressed his political views without the least reticence, and thereby instituted—what he probably desired—a similar frankness on my part. In fact, I ceased to remember that I was addressing a reigning Prince, and he had the full advantage of such forgetfulness. I have not the right to repeat this conversation, but I will venture to give one remark in evidence. In speaking of a certain crowned head, the Duke said: "He has one rare quality. He hears, patiently, views which are directly opposed to his own, turns them over in his mind, and, if he finds them good, adopts them, frankly acknowledging that he was wrong." "An admirable quality!" said I: "it would be a blessing to Europe if all her rulers possessed it." To which he assented most heartily.

In regard to our American difficulties, he expressed himself as earnestly as I could have desired. He doubted, however, whether the Confederates would hold the field, after ascertaining the immense force which the Federal Government could bring against them. I explained that resistance, even against such odds, was but a part of that enormous Southern vanity which did not seem to be appreciated by European spectators of the struggle; but the Duke evidently disbelieved in a vanity so at variance with common sense. Whether his views are right will soon be tested.

At ten o'clock there was a movement of departure. The Duke shook hands with a friendly "au revoir!" and I followed the Chamberlain, Adjutant, and ladies to the carriages. Independently of the interest connected with the principal personage, I had passed, socially, a most delightful evening, and returned to Coburg with the agreeable conviction that some Princes can be men as well. It is possible that in the future developments of German history Ernst II. of Saxe-Coburg-Gotha will occupy an important place, and my readers will then thank me for having made them, to this extent, acquainted with him.

MRS. STIRLING'S RECEPTION.

"When thou makest a dinner, or a supper, call not thy friends, nor thy brethren, neither thy kinsmen, nor thy rich neighbors."

"AND so we are really settled in our own house! It seems too good to be true, doesn't it?"

As John Stirling's pretty wife was speaking, she let down the soft, heavy-falling brocatelle curtains of the handsome room, half parlor, half library, where she sat with her husband; turned on a little more gas, so that the Italian peasant girl and the dark, bright Spanish woman, on the alabaster shade of the drop-light, might display their beauties yet more glowingly; and then seated herself in a cozy little easy-chair, beside the lounge, where her husband lay stretched out in the enjoyment of the masculine comforts of evening ease and household sovereignty. Taking up a dainty bit of bright-colored knitting, she went on:

"It was very nice, to be sure, boarding at mother's, but it was a sort of vacant life after all. This is so much better. I have something to do now."

John Stirling smiled.

"And something to govern. After all, I believe it is the love of power that makes you women so delight in homes of your own. I don't doubt, gentle as you seem, that your servants find you as austere as the Great Mogul."

"I declare, John, you are too bad. I never scold, and I'm sure every thing has gone on so nicely since we have been here—"

"A whole week, Nellie, and all the brooms new. But don't look sober. I have every confidence in your ability to keep the wheels moving."

She sat silent a while, until her husband began to want to hear her voice again, and rallied her for her abstraction.

"What is it, little one? You seem in a brown study about something. Remember I'm your prime minister, and must know all the state secrets and cares of government."

"I was only wondering, John, whether you would see a certain matter as I do. Do you realize how many parties we went to while we were at mother's? There were the Hurlbuts asked us three times, and the Graysons twice, and you know we went every where."

John Stirling knew that very well. Somewhat reserved of nature save to those of his own household, and not fond of general society, going to a continual round of parties had been one of the sacrifices he had made, during the first winter of his marriage, to please his gay little wife. The idea crossed his mind, as she spoke, that she too had wearied of so much excitement, and was going to propose, for the future, a quieter life.

"Yes," he answered, "I know we went out a great deal, but I thought you liked it."

"Yes, I liked it," she said, with a little embarrassment, for her woman's intuition divined the course his thoughts had taken. "I was only thinking, John, that, having accepted so many invitations, every one would say we were very mean if we did not give at least one large party in return. It would be just the best time now, don't you see? Every thing we have is so fresh and new—our drawing-rooms are really elegant! I should so like to gather our friends round us, and give a sort of house-warming!"

"That's a primitive, comfortable-sounding term, Nellie. How much would this friendly little affair cost us?"

"Oh, I've thought that all over. We should have to ask every one we knew. It wouldn't do to slight any. Besides, the more the merrier, you know. We could have Smith get up the supper and furnish the decorations. His bill would be about three hundred and fifty—say fifty more for music; and a new dress for me."

"Five hundred dollars, eh, Nellie?"

"Yes, I am sure I could make five hundred do it handsomely. I could send out the invitations for week after next."

"Well, dear, you must let me dream over it. I really didn't know receptions were such expensive affairs. Five hundred dollars for one evening's entertainment; and the prospect of a hard winter, and so much suffering among the poor! Well, I'll tell you in the morning. If I can make up my mind that it is right, you shall have the party."

The rest of the evening was a little constrained. The young wife, seeing that her husband did not care to talk about the reception any more just then, struggled bravely to avoid the subject, and inasmuch as it held possession of all her thoughts, was rather an absent-minded companion.

That night, after his wife was quietly asleep beside him, John Stirling spent an hour of not untroubled thought. Unlike Nellie, he had been brought up in a quiet country home, where five hundred dollars would have been thought a by no means inadequate provision for the support of the whole family during an entire year. Was it right, could it be right, to spend it all upon one evening's entertainment?—for the sake, too, of people who would be in nowise benefited thereby—whose choicest pleasures were so common that they had already palled upon their senses? But then, as his wife had suggested, they had been out so much—would not this drawing back from a return of civilities look very mean?—and John Stirling shrank, with all the pride of a sensitive man, from the least imputation of meanness. They were not rich. True, his capital was his own, and his business was good, but he had not felt that he could afford to spend more than three thousand a year on home expenses, and here was five hundred extra, upon which he had not counted, coming at once. Surely he could not dare, for such a cause, to stint his contributions for the relief of the suffering? Could he afford it without? Nellie, the indulged child of wealthy parents, knew nothing of such anxious thoughts; she only heard their result in the morning. Before he gave her his good-by kiss, he said, in a tone a little more sober than he meant it should be,

"Well, dear, you shall have your party. You can begin making your arrangements at once. Here is a hundred dollars for the feminine adornments; I will pay Smith and the music afterward."

That was all. John Stirling had a sunny, unselfish temper, and when he had made up his mind to grant his wife the indulgence she craved, it would not have been like him to spoil her pleasure by any indications of dissatisfaction.

Still, as I have hinted, her intuitions were strong, and her nature sensitive and impressible, and she had a certain sense of having persuaded her husband somewhat against his own wishes that rather disinclined her to commence her preparations. It was nearly eleven o'clock before she dressed herself for her shopping expedition. She was just tying the strings of her elegant fall hat when she heard a ring at the door, and presently a servant came in with the information that a little child, who had brought home some sewing, wanted to see her.

Mrs. Stirling was motherly by instinct, and her heart warmed at once to the shy little creature who came timidly in. It was a girl not more than seven years old—quite too young, Mrs. Stirling thought, to be trusted alone in the streets; but then she herself had been brought up under the successive rule of nursery-maid and governess.

She took the bundle from the child's hand, and said, with the same bright, kind smile which had wiled John Stirling's bachelor heart away,

"Where did you come from, and how did you find the way here alone, you poor little thing?"

"Sister Anne sent me, ma'am. She had done your embroidery, and she thought if she could get the money for it, to pay Mr. Jenkins, maybe he would let us stay in the room till she got a little better."

"She is sick, then?"

"Yes'm. She didn't feel well enough to come. It has been hard getting along all summer, for the ladies she works for were most all out of town, and some of them owing her; and I s'pose the worry and the not having much to eat did it, ma'am."

Mrs. Stirling leaned toward the little creature and looked at her more closely. Could it be hunger, she thought, that made those blue eyes look so large, and the skin so transparent? Was this little thing actually suffering for bread, and she going to spend five hundred dollars in one evening, feasting those who never felt a want even of dainties? She knew now what thoughts had been in her husband's mind when he spoke of the suffering among the poor. She said, pleasantly,

"Well, child, you must have some luncheon, and then I will go with you to see your sister. I had better speak to her about the work."

"Isn't it right? Can't you pay her?" The child gave a start of alarm, and spoke with the premature womanliness and the natural apprehension of misfortune which are among the saddest fruits of poverty.

Mrs. Stirling relieved her with ready sympathy.

"Yes indeed, the work is all right. It's done beautifully; but I want to see your sister about some more, and perhaps I can do her good."

It would have made the kind lady's heart ache could she have seen the eagerness with which the half-famished child devoured the lunch which was set before her in the kitchen.

In a few moments they were ready to start. Mrs. Stirling had replaced her velvet mantle by a Scotch shawl, her French hat by a simple straw; and with a basket in her hand, containing a few dainties with which she hoped to tempt the sick girl's palate, she followed the child across the city toward C—— Street—a locality hitherto terra incognita to her.

In a half-dilapidated wooden house, in a narrow court, she found the object of her search. She went up two flights of stairs, and entered a back room lighted by one window. The atmosphere struck her, in spite of her warm attire, with a sudden chill. Evidently the sun never came there. The dampness on the walls, the general aspect of gloom and cheerlessness, was only relieved by an air of scrupulous neatness, which pervaded every thing. Mrs. Stirling had already noticed this quality in the attire of the child, which, though cheap and poor and patched, was as immaculate in its cleanliness as her own.

At the window, attempting to sew, the older sister sat, but she was evidently very ill. Every now and then a spasm of coughing seized her, which compelled her to lay down her work, and clasp both hands on her side, while the paleness of her thin cheek flushed into hectic. Mrs. Stirling had not seen her before since spring—the work returned that morning having been sent to her by a servant. She went up to her and sat down in a chair which stood near.

"Your sister said you were sick, and so I came to see if I could be of use to you," she said, in gentle tones, which of themselves carried a certain comfort with them. "You have changed terribly since spring. I must hear all about it; but I want you should eat what I have brought you—here are some wine-jelly, and a bit of cold chicken—they will do you good."

The poor girl looked at the viands with the involuntary greediness of hunger. Then she blushed deeply, and said in a low voice,

"I am very grateful, Madame, but if you please, I will wait until you leave me. Allow me at present to attend to you."

"No indeed!" Mrs. Stirling spoke in her pretty, absolute fashion. "I am not going yet. I want to talk with you a while, and I shall not do so until you have taken something to strengthen you. Little Jane has lunched already."

So the gay, bright lady sat and waited, feeling, in the new prospect of being actively useful, a genuine glow of delight. When the girl had finished her generous meal, and taken up her work again, Mrs. Stirling began to talk to her.

"Is this consumption, Anne?" she asked, gently. "Your cough alarms me."

"No, ma'am, I am very sure it is nothing of the kind yet. There is no consumption in our family. My father was a country minister, and had a strong and healthy constitution. He died young, but it was from a violent fever, caught in attendance on a sick stranger. I think it was grief which made my mother follow him in three months. She had always been delicate though not sickly, and she lacked the strength it requires to live and suffer. It is seven years since she died, on the very day little Jane was born."

"How old were you then?"

"Fifteen, and there were no living children between us two."

"And have you supported yourself and her ever since?"

"Oh no! My father's books and furniture sold for enough to keep us some time; and my aunt, who lived here, brought us to Boston. We both lived with her. She took care of Jane, and I worked in a shop, and earned enough to buy our clothes and help Aunt Martha with the living. It is only since she died, three years ago, that I have been all alone with Jenny."

"You came out of the shop, then?"

"Yes, because I could not have Jenny there with me, and she had no one else to see to her; and indeed I have made more money since, I have embroidered so much."

"But surely you have suffered more than usual this summer?"

"Oh yes, ma'am. The ladies I work for are mostly out of town in the summer always, and so winters I try to save something to help us through. But last winter was so hard that I had not as much work as usual, and this summer we have not been very well off. I had to give up the comfortable room I used to have, because I could not earn enough to pay for it, and I suppose the dampness here has not just agreed with me."

She tried to smile, but the tears came instead. Mrs. Stirling took her hand with a comforting pressure.

"Don't cry. Better times are coming to you now. I am sure I can influence you a good deal more work. You shall have enough to do, and we must see that you move out of this damp, unhealthy place."

Sister Anne smiled sadly.

"The landlord has seen to that, Madame. I can only stay here three days longer. He wants to let the room to a tenant who will pay more; and I have been troubled for fear I should not be able to go out and find another place."

"Well, you must not feel anxious. Just leave that till to-morrow. Then, if you are not able to go, I will find a place for you. It can not be a difficult matter to find one as good as this. At any rate, to-morrow you shall see me again; and in the mean time the pay for the work little Jane brought home will make you comfortable."

So saying, she put into the girl's hand twice the customary price for the embroidery she had done, and without waiting for the thanks which trembled on Anne Hadly's pale lips, she went out of the room, down the stairs, and returned home after this her first charity visit.

On the way she stopped but once, and that was not to look into any of the windows gay with autumn goods, or to exchange her hundred-dollar note on the Suffolk Bank for silks or satins. She only went in for a moment to a neat, respectable-looking house on Myrtle Street, and then hurried home.

She met her husband, when he came to his five o'clock dinner, with a beaming smile. The meal was well cooked and neatly served; the wife opposite him was young and fair; and when John Stirling rose from the table and went with her into their cozy evening-room, it is no wonder he said to himself that this being in one's own home wasn't so bad a thing after all.

"What is it, Nellie?" he asked, after a while, in answer to a questioning, hesitating look in his wife's eyes. She drew nearer to him.

"You are sure, John, you can spare me that five hundred dollars without doing any injustice to yourself or your business—without putting aside any rightful claims?"

"I hope, Nellie, if I had not thought so, I should not have given it to you, much as I love to please you."

"Then what," she spoke hesitatingly, "what if I wanted very much indeed to use it for something else?"

"I don't understand what you can possibly mean."

For answer she detailed to him the events of the day. When she was through, she said:

"It seems so hard, John, for that poor girl, a minister's daughter too, to be suffering for food; and living, or rather dying by inches, in that miserable, damp, unhealthy place. I can see how, with a hundred dollars, I could make her so comfortable. I stopped in at Nurse Smead's, on my way home to-day, and I found that she had a nice, bright, good-sized room, where the sun lies half the day, which she would let for seventy dollars a year. There is a stove in it already, and a carpet on the floor, and thirty dollars more would supply it with every thing needed for comfort. Now if I could pay the rent of that room a year in advance for Anne Hadly, and fit it up neatly, what a fine start it would be for her! It would give her such a rest—such freedom from care! She would have time to get well. She is very skillful with her needle, and with the work she could easily do she could live so nicely, and Jenny could go to school. I have it all planned; and there, with your permission, goes the hundred dollars in my pocket."

John Stirling looked at his wife, and it seemed to him, with the generous, unselfish light illumining it, her face was as the face of an angel. But he did not say so then. He answered, in the tone of one raising an objection,

"But what would you wear to the party, Nellie? I should not like you to look shabby."

"Trust me for that. I can wear my wedding dress. It is such a rich, heavy white silk, and it is not soiled at all. With a little different arrangement of the trimmings it will be as handsome as any thing I should get. But are you quite set upon giving the party, John?"

"Are not you, dear?"

"I was."

There was a pause of a few moments, in which Nellie tied and untied the tassels of her little silk apron several times. Then she looked up, an eager light shining through the mist which had somehow gathered before her eyes.

"I suppose there are many people in the city, John, just as worthy as Anne Hadly, and needing help just as much?"

"Without doubt, Nellie; plenty of worse cases, especially now that winter is coming on."

"Could you help me to find them?"

"I think I could. Some case of destitution, which he can not afford to relieve, makes a business man's heart ache almost every day."

"Then four hundred dollars extra, which you would not have given otherwise will do a good deal, won't it?"

"Yes, a great deal. It is a large sum."

"Yes, it is a large sum, as you said last night, John, to be spent on a single evening's entertainment for those who do not need it, but not large when we compare it with the wants of those who suffer. John, I have no wish to give that party. Will you take the money for doing good?"

"But those who have invited us, Nellie? The Hurlbuts, the Graysons—all your many friends? One wouldn't like to be thought mean."

"We can ask them all, a few at a time—all those we care for. Your ordinary housekeeping allowance is liberal enough for that. If that does not please them, after all, John"—and the little woman hid her face on her husband's shoulder, for she was one who seldom uttered her deepest thoughts, or mentioned, even to him, the emotions which she held most sacred—"if they should not approve it, it matters so much more what He thinks who told us to invite to our feasts the poor, the maimed, the blind. I have been blind till to-day, John. I don't care for large parties any more."

"You shall do as your own heart has counseled you, Nellie. The money shall be at your disposal to-morrow. We will give our reception to the guests whom God himself chose for us."

He said no more just then, but Nellie Stirling had unconsciously gained in that hour a new and holier hold on the heart of her husband. He had loved the gay, half-spoiled girl—what word expresses what he felt for the noble, self-sacrificing woman whom that day had revealed to him?

Anne Hadly's heart was lightened next day of a weary burden, and she was as grateful for Mrs. Stirling's delicacy as for her aid.

"It is not a gift to you," the lady said, as she explained the arrangements she had made. "You are to help yourself the same as before. I only want to offer my tribute to your father's memory—your father who lost his life in ministering to an unknown penitent. For the sake of that Christian man, who, like his Master, counted not his life dear unto him, if thereby he might save some, you must accept it."

Need I say how many sad hearts came to John and Ellen Stirling's feast that winter and were comforted—how many hungry mouths were filled—how many fires were kindled in cheerless rooms? Was the sacrifice of giving up one evening, brilliant with lights, odorous with flowers, jocund with music, gay with dance and song, too great? Let the day of everlasting reckoning declare!

THE ADVENTURES OF PHILIP.

BY W. M. THACKERAY.

CHAPTER XXI.

TREATS OF DANCING, DINING, DYING.

OLD school-boys remember how, when pious Æneas was compelled by painful circumstances to quit his country, he and his select band of Trojans founded a new Troy, where they landed; raising temples to the Trojan gods; building streets with Trojan names; and endeavoring, to the utmost of their power, to recall their beloved native place. In like manner, British Trojans and French Trojans take their Troy every where. Algiers I have only seen from the sea; but New Orleans and Leicester Square I have visited; and have seen a quaint old France still lingering on the banks of the Mississippi; a dingy modern France round that great Globe of Mr. Wyld's, which they say is coming to an end. There are French cafés, billiards, estaminets, waiters, markers, poor Frenchmen, and rich Frenchmen, in a new Paris—shabby and dirty, it is true, but offering the emigrant the dominoes, the chopine, the petite-verre of the patrie. And do not British Trojans, who emigrate to the continent of Europe, take their Troy with them? You all know the quarters of Paris which swarm with us Trojans. From Peace Street to the Arch of the Star are collected thousands of refugees from our Ilium. Under the arcades of the Rue de Rivoli you meet, at certain hours, as many of our Trojans as of the natives. In the Trojan inns of Meurice, the Louvre, etc., we swarm. We have numerous Anglo-Trojan doctors and apothecaries, who give us the dear pills and doses of Pergamus. We go to Mrs. Guerre or kind Mrs. Colombin, and can purchase the sandwiches of Troy, the pale ale and sherry of Troy, and the dear, dear muffins of home. We live for years, never speaking any language but our native Trojan; except to our servants, whom we instruct in the Trojan way of preparing toast for breakfast; Trojan bread-sauce for fowls and partridges; Trojan corned beef, etc. We have temples where we worship according to the Trojan rites. A kindly sight is that which one beholds of a Sunday in the Elysian fields and the St. Honoré quarter, of processions of English grown people and children, stalwart, red-cheeked, marching to their churches, their gilded prayer-books in hand, to sing in a stranger's land the sacred songs of their Zion. I am sure there are many English in Paris who never speak to any native above the rank of a waiter or shopman. Not long since I was listening to a Frenchman at Folkestone, speaking English to the waiters and acting as interpreter for his party. He spoke pretty well and very quickly. He was irresistibly comical. I wonder how we maintained our gravity. And you and I, my dear friend, when we speak French? I dare say we are just as absurd. As absurd? And why not? Don't you be discouraged, young fellow. Courage, mon jeune ami! Remember, Trojans have a conquering way with them. When Æneas landed at Carthage, I dare say he spoke Carthaginian with a ridiculous Trojan accent; but for all that poor Dido fell desperately in love with him. Take example by the son of Anchises, my boy. Never mind the grammar or the pronunciation, but tackle the lady and speak your mind to her as best you can.

This is the plan which the Vicomte de Loisy used to adopt. He was following a cours of English according to the celebrated méthode Jobson. The cours assembled twice a week; and the vicomte, with laudable assiduity, went to all English parties to which he could gain an introduction, for the purpose of acquiring the English language, and marrying une Anglaise. This industrious young man even went au Temple on Sundays for the purpose of familiarizing himself with the English language; and as he sat under Doctor Murrough Macmanus of T. C. D., a very eloquent preacher at Paris in those days, the vicomte acquired a very fine pronunciation. Attached to the cause of unfortunate monarchy all over the world, the vicomte had fought in the Spanish earliest armies. He waltzed well; and madame thought his cross looked nice at her parties. Will it be believed that Mrs. General Baynes took this gentleman into special favor; talked with him at soirée after soirée; never laughed at his English; encouraged her girl to waltz with him (which he did to perfection, whereas poor Clive was but a hulking and clumsy performer); and showed him the greatest favor, until one day, on going into Mrs. Bonus's, the house agent (who lets lodgings, and sells British pickles, tea, sherry, and the like), she found the vicomte occupying a stool as clerk in Mr. Bonus's establishment, where for twelve hundred francs a year he gave his invaluable services during the day! Mrs. Baynes took poor madame severely to task for admitting such a man to her assemblies. Madame was astonished. Monsieur was a gentleman of ancient family who had met with misfortunes. He was earning his maintenance. To sit in a bureau was not a dishonor. Knowing that boutique meant shop and garçon meant boy, Mrs. Baynes made use of the words boutique garçon the next time she saw the vicomte. The little man wept tears of rage and mortification. There was a very painful scene, at which, thank Mercy, poor Charlotte thought, Philip was not present. Were it not for the general's cheveux blancs (by which phrase the vicomte very kindly designated General Baynes's chestnut top-knot) the vicomte would have had reason from him. "Charming miss," he said to Charlotte, "your respectable papa is safe from my sword! Madame, your mamma has addressed me words which I qualify not. But you—you are too 'andsome, too good, to despise a poor soldier, a poor gentleman!" I have heard the vicomte still dances at boarding-houses, and is still in pursuit of an Anglaise. He must be a wooer now almost as elderly as the good general whose scalp he respected.

Mrs. Baynes was, to be sure, a heavy weight to bear for poor madame, but her lean shoulders were accustomed to many a burden; and if the general's wife was quarrelsome and odious, he, as madame said, was as soft as a mutton; and Charlotte's pretty face and manners were the admiration of all. The yellow Miss Bolderos, those hapless elderly orphans left in pawn, might bite their lips with envy, but they never could make them as red as Miss Charlotte's smiling mouth. To the honor of Madame Smolensk be it said that never by word or hint did she cause those unhappy young ladies any needless pain. She never stinted them of any meal. No full-priced pensioner of madame's could have breakfast, luncheon, dinners served more regularly. The day after their mother's flight that good Madame Smolensk took early cups of tea to the girls' rooms with her own hands, and I believe helped to do the hair of one of them, and otherwise to soothe them in their misfortune. They could not keep their secret. It must be owned that Mrs. Baynes never lost an opportunity of deploring their situation and acquainting all new-comers with their mother's flight and transgression. But she was good-natured to the captives in her grim way, and admired madame's forbearance regarding them. The two old officers were now especially polite to the poor things, and the general rapped one of his boys over the knuckles for saying to Miss Brenda, "If your uncle is a lord, why doesn't he give you any money?" "And these girls used to hold their heads above mine, and their mother used to give herself such airs!" cried Mrs. Baynes. "And Eliza Baynes used to flatter those poor girls and their mother, and fancy they were going to make a woman of fashion of her!" said Mrs. Bunch. "We all have our weaknesses. Lords are not yours, my dear. Faith, I don't think you know one," says stout little Colonel Bunch. "I wouldn't pay a duchess such court as Eliza paid that woman!" cried Emma; and she made sarcastic inquiries of the general, whether Eliza had heard from her friend the Honorable Mrs. Boldero? But for all this Mrs. Bunch pitied the young ladies, and I believe gave them a little supply of coin from her private purse. A word as to their private history. Their mamma became the terror of boarding-housekeepers: and the poor girls practiced their duets all over Europe. Mrs. Boldero's noble nephew, the present Strongitharm (as a friend who knows the fashionable world informs me), was victimized by his own uncle, and a most painful affair occurred between them at a game at "blind hookey." The Honorable Mrs. Boldero is living in the precincts of Holyrood; one of her daughters is happily married to a minister, and the other to an apothecary who was called in to attend her in quinsy. So I am inclined to think that phrase about "select" boarding-houses is a mere complimentary term, and as for the strictest references being given and required, I certainly should not lay out extra money for printing that expression in my advertisement were I going to set up an establishment myself.

Old college friends of Philip's visited Paris from time to time, and rejoiced in carrying him off to Borel's or the Trois Frères, and hospitably treating him who had been so hospitable in his time. Yes, thanks be to Heaven, there are good Samaritans in pretty large numbers in this world, and hands ready enough to succor a man in misfortune. I could name two or three gentlemen who drive about in chariots and look at people's tongues and write queer figures and queer Latin on note-paper, who occultly made a purse containing some seven or ten score fees, and sent them out to Dr. Firmin in his banishment. The poor wretch had behaved as ill as might be, but he was without a penny or a friend. I dare say Dr. Goodenough, among other philanthropists, put his hands into his pocket. Having heartily disliked and mistrusted Firmin in prosperity, in adversity he melted toward the poor fugitive wretch: he even could believe that Firmin had some skill in his profession, and in his practice was not quite a quack.

Philip's old college and school cronies laughed at hearing that, now his ruin was complete, he was thinking about marriage. Such a plan was of a piece with Mr. Firmin's known prudence and foresight. But they made an objection to his proposed union which had struck us at home previously. Papa-in-law was well enough, or at least inoffensive: but ah, ye powers! what a mother-in-law was poor Phil laying up for his future days! Two or three of our mutual companions made this remark on returning to work and chambers after their autumn holiday. We never had too much charity for Mrs. Baynes; and what Philip told us about her did not serve to increase our regard.

About Christmas Mr. Firmin's own affairs brought him on a brief visit to London. We were not jealous that he took up his quarters with his little friend of Thornhaugh Street, who was contented that he should dine with us, provided she could have the pleasure of housing him under her kind shelter. High and mighty people as we were—for under what humble roofs does not Vanity hold her sway?—we, who knew Mrs. Brandon's virtues, and were aware of her early story, would have condescended to receive her into our society; but it was the little lady herself who had her pride, and held aloof. "My parents did not give me the education you have had, ma'am," Caroline said to my wife. "My place is not here, I know very well; unless you should be took ill, and then, ma'am, you'll see that I will be glad enough to come. Philip can come and see me; and a blessing it is to me to set eyes on him. But I shouldn't be happy in your drawing-room, nor you in having me. The dear children look surprised at my way of talking; and no wonder: and they laugh sometimes to one another, God bless 'em! I don't mind. My education was not cared for. I scarce had any schooling but what I taught myself. My pa hadn't the means of learning me much: and it is too late to go to school at forty odd. I've got all his stockings and things darned; and his linen, poor fellow! beautiful: I wish they kep it as nice in France, where he is! You'll give my love to the young lady, won't you, ma'am? and, oh! it's a blessing to me to hear how good and gentle she is! He has a high temper, Philip have; but them he likes can easy manage him. You have been his best kind friends; and so will she be, I trust; and they may be happy, though they're poor. But they've time to get rich, haven't they? And it's not the richest that's the happiest, that I can see in many a fine house where Nurse Brandon goes and has her eyes open, though she don't say much, you know." In this way Nurse Brandon would prattle on to us when she came to see us. She would share our meal, always thanking by name the servant who helped her. She insisted on calling our children "Miss" and "Master," and I think those young satirists did not laugh often or unkindly at her peculiarities. I know they were told that Nurse Brandon was very good; and that she took care of her father in his old age; and that she had passed through very great griefs and trials; and that she had nursed Uncle Philip when he had been very ill indeed, and when many people would have been afraid to come near him; and that her life was spent in tending the sick, and in doing good to her neighbor.

One day during Philip's stay with us we happen to read in the paper Lord Ringwood's arrival in London. My lord had a grand town-house of his own which he did not always inhabit. He liked the cheerfulness of a hotel better. Ringwood House was too large and too dismal. He did not care to eat a solitary mutton-chop in a great dining-room surrounded by ghostly images of dead Ringwoods—his dead son, a boy who had died in his boyhood; his dead brother attired in the uniform of his day (in which picture there was no little resemblance to Philip Firmin, the colonel's grandson); Lord Ringwood's dead self, finally, as he appeared still a young man, when Lawrence painted him, and when he was the companion of the Regent and his friends. "Ah! that's the fellow I least like to look at," the old man would say, scowling at the picture, and breaking out into the old-fashioned oaths which garnished many conversations in his young days. "That fellow could ride all day; and sleep all night, or go without sleep as he chose; and drink his four bottles, and never have a headache; and break his collar-bone, and see the fox killed three hours after. That was once a man, as old Marlborough said, looking at his own picture. Now my doctor's my master; my doctor and the infernal gout over him. I live upon pap and puddens, like a baby; only I've shed all my teeth, hang 'em! If I drink three glasses of sherry, my butler threatens me. You young fellow, who haven't two-pence in your pocket, by George, I would like to change with you! Only you wouldn't, hang you, you wouldn't! Why, I don't believe Todhunter would change with me: would you, Todhunter?—and you're about as fond of a great man as any fellow I ever knew. Don't tell me. You are, Sir! Why, when I walked with you on Ryde sands one day, I said to that fellow, 'Todhunter, don't you think I could order the sea to stand still?' I did. And you had never heard of King Canute, hanged if you had—and never read any book except the Stud-book and Mrs. Glass's Cookery, hanged if you did." Such remarks and conversations of his relative has Philip reported to me. Two or three men about town had very good imitations of this toothless, growling, blasphemous old cynic. He was splendid and penurious; violent and easily led; surrounded by flatterers and utterly lonely. He had old-world notions, which I believe have passed out of the manners of great folks now. He thought it beneath him to travel by railway, and his post-chaise was one of the last on the road. The tide rolled on in spite of this old Canute, and has long since rolled over him and his post-chaise. Why, almost all his imitators are actually dead; and only this year, when old Jack Mummery gave an imitation of him at Bays's (where Jack's mimicry used to be received with shouts of laughter but a few years since), there was a dismal silence in the coffee-room, except from two or three young men at a near table, who said, "What is the old fool mumbling and swearing at now? An imitation of Lord Ringwood, and who was he?" So our names pass away, and are forgotten: and the tallest statues, do not the sands of time accumulate and overwhelm them? I have not forgotten my lord, any more than I have forgotten the cock of my school, about whom, perhaps, you don't care to hear. I see my lord's bald head, and hooked beak, and bushy eyebrows, and tall velvet collar, and brass buttons, and great black mouth, and trembling hand, and trembling parasites round him, and I can hear his voice, and great oaths, and laughter. You parasites of to-day are bowing to other great people; and this great one, who was alive only yesterday, is as dead as George IV. or Nebuchadnezzar.

Well, we happen to read that Philip's noble relative, Lord Ringwood, has arrived at — hotel, while Philip is staying with us: and I own that I counsel my friend to go and wait upon his lordship. He had been very kind at Paris: he had evidently taken a liking to Philip. Firmin ought to go and see him. Who knows? Lord Ringwood might be inclined to do something for his brother's grandson.

This was just the point, which any one who knew Philip should have hesitated to urge upon him. To try and make him bow and smile on a great man with a view to future favors, was to demand the impossible from Firmin. The king's men may lead the king's horses to the water, but the king himself can't make them drink. I own that I came back to the subject, and urged it repeatedly on my friend. "I have been," said Philip, sulkily. "I have left a card upon him. If he wants me, he can send to No. 120 Queen Square, Westminster, my present hotel. But if you think he will give me any thing beyond a dinner, I tell you you are mistaken."

We dined that day with Philip's employer, worthy Mr. Mugford, of the Pall Mall Gazette, who was profuse in his hospitalities, and especially gracious to Philip. Mugford was pleased with Firmin's letters; and you may be sure that severer critics did not contradict their friend's good-natured patron. We drove to the suburban villa at Hampstead, and steaming odors of soup, mutton, onions, rushed out into the hall to give us welcome, and to warn us of the good cheer in store for the party. This was not one of Mugford's days for countermanding side-dishes, I promise you. Men in black with noble white cotton gloves were in waiting to receive us, and Mrs. Mugford, in a rich blue satin and feathers, a profusion of flounces, laces, marabouts, jewels, and eau-de-Cologne, rose to welcome us from a stately sofa, where she sat surrounded by her children. These, too, were in brilliant dresses, with shining new-combed hair. The ladies, of course, instantly began to talk about their children, and my wife's unfeigned admiration for Mrs. Mugford's last baby I think won that worthy lady's good-will at once. I made some remark regarding one of the boys as being the picture of his father, which was not lucky. I don't know why, but I have it from her husband's own admission, that Mrs. Mugford always thinks I am "chaffing" her. One of the boys frankly informed me there was goose for dinner; and when a cheerful cloop was heard from a neighboring room, told me that was pa drawing the corks. Why should Mrs. Mugford reprove the outspoken child, and say, "James, hold your tongue; do now?" Better wine than was poured forth when those corks were drawn, never flowed from bottle.—I say, I never saw better wine nor more bottles. If ever a table may be said to have groaned, that expression might with justice be applied to Mugford's mahogany. Talbot Twysden would have feasted forty people with the meal here provided for eight by our most hospitable entertainer. Though Mugford's editor was present, who thinks himself a very fine fellow, I assure you, but whose name I am not at liberty to divulge, all the honors of the entertainment were for the Paris Correspondent, who was specially requested to take Mrs. M. to dinner. As an earl's grand-nephew, and a lord's great-grandson, of course we felt that this place of honor was Firmin's right. How Mrs. Mugford pressed him to eat! She carved—I am very glad she would not let Philip carve for her, for he might have sent the goose into her lap—she carved, I say, and I really think she gave him more stuffing than to any of us, but that may have been mere envy on my part. Allusions to Lord Ringwood were repeatedly made during dinner. "Lord R. has come to town, Mr. F., I perceive," says Mugford, winking. "You've been to see him, of course?" Mr. Firmin glared at me very fiercely; he had to own he had been to call on Lord Ringwood. Mugford led the conversation to the noble lord so frequently that Philip madly kicked my shins under the table. I don't know how many times I had to suffer from that foot which in its time had trampled on so many persons: a kick for each time Lord Ringwood's name, houses, parks, properties, were mentioned, was a frightful allowance. Mrs. Mugford would say, "May I assist you to a little pheasant, Mr. Firmin? I dare say they are not as good as Lord Ringwood's" (a kick from Philip), or Mugford would exclaim, "Mr. F., try that 'ock! Lord Ringwood hasn't better wine than that." (Dreadful punishment upon my tibia under the table.) "John! Two 'ocks, me and Mr. Firmin. Join us, Mr. P.," and so forth. And after dinner to the ladies—as my wife, who betrayed their mysteries, informed me—Mrs. Mugford's conversation was incessant regarding the Ringwood family and Firmin's relationship to that noble house. The meeting of the old lord and Firmin in Paris was discussed with immense interest. His lordship called him Philip most affable! he was very fond of Mr. Firmin. A little bird had told Mrs. Mugford that somebody else was very fond of Mr. Firmin. She hoped it would be a match, and that his lordship would do the handsome thing by his nephew. What? My wife wondered that Mrs. Mugford should know about Philip's affairs? (and wonder indeed she did.) A little bird had told Mrs. M.—a friend of both ladies, that dear, good little nurse Brandon, who was engaged—and here the conversation went off into mysteries which I certainly shall not reveal. Suffice it that Mrs. Mugford was one of Mrs. Brandon's best, kindest, and most constant patrons—or might I be permitted to say matrons?—and had received a most favorable report of us from the little nurse. And here Mrs. Pendennis gave a verbatim report not only of our hostess's speech, but of her manner and accent. "Yes, ma'am," says Mrs. Mugford to Mrs. Pendennis, "our friend Mrs. B. has told me of a certain gentleman whose name shall be nameless. His manner is cold, not to say 'aughty. He seems to be laughing at people sometimes—don't say No; I saw him once or twice at dinner, both him and Mr. Firmin. But he is a true friend, Mrs. Brandon says he is. And when you know him, his heart is good." Is it? Amen. A distinguished writer has composed, in not very late days, a comedy of which the cheerful moral is, that we are "not so bad as we seem." Aren't we? Amen, again. Give us thy hearty hand, Iago! Tartuffe, how the world has been mistaken in you! Macbeth! put that little affair of the murder out of your mind. It was a momentary weakness; and who is not weak at times? Blifil, a more maligned man than you does not exist! O humanity! how we have been mistaken in you! Let us expunge the vulgar expression "miserable sinners" out of all prayer-books; open the port-holes of all hulks; break the chains of all convicts; and unlock the boxes of all spoons.

As we discussed Mr. Mugford's entertainment on our return home, I improved the occasion with Philip; I pointed out the reasonableness of the hopes which he might entertain of help from his wealthy kinsman, and actually forced him to promise to wait upon my lord the next day. Now, when Philip Firmin did a thing against his will, he did it with a bad grace. When he is not pleased, he does not pretend to be happy; and when he is sulky, Mr. Firmin is a very disagreeable companion. Though he never once reproached me afterward with what happened, I own that I have had cruel twinges of conscience since. If I had not sent him on that dutiful visit to his grand-uncle, what occurred might never, perhaps, have occurred at all. I acted for the best, and that I aver, however I may grieve for the consequences which ensued when the poor fellow followed my advice.

If Philip held aloof from Lord Ringwood in London, you may be sure Philip's dear cousins were in waiting on his lordship, and never lost an opportunity of showing their respectful sympathy. Was Lord Ringwood ailing? Mr. Twysden, or Mrs. Twysden, or the dear girls, or Ringwood, their brother, were daily in his lordship's ante-chamber, asking for news of his health. They bent down respectfully before Lord Ringwood's major-domo. They would have given him money, as they always averred, only what sum could they give to such a man as Rudge? They actually offered to bribe Mr. Rudge with their wine, over which he made horrible faces. They fawned and smiled before him always. I should like to have seen that calm Mrs. Twysden, that serene, high-bred woman, who would cut her dearest friend if misfortune befell her, or the world turned its back—I should like to have seen, and can see her in my mind's eye, simpering, and coaxing, and wheedling this footman. She made cheap presents to Mr. Rudge: she smiled on him and asked after his health. And of course Talbot Twysden flattered him too in Talbot's jolly way. It was a wink, and nod, and a hearty how do you do?—and (after due inquiries made and answered about his lordship) it would be, "Rudge! I think my housekeeper has a good glass of port-wine in her room, if you happen to be passing that way, and my lord don't want you!" And with a grave courtesy, I can fancy Mr. Rudge bowing to Mr. and Mrs. Twysden, and thanking them, and descending to Mrs. Blenkinsop's skinny room where the port-wine is ready—and if Mr. Rudge and Mrs. Blenkinsop are confidential, I can fancy their talking over the characters and peculiarities of the folks up stairs. Servants sometimes actually do; and if master and mistress are humbugs, these wretched menials sometimes find them out.

Now, no duke could be more lordly and condescending in his bearing than Mr. Philip Firmin toward the menial throng. In those days, when he had money in his pockets, he gave Mr.

Rudge out of his plenty; and the man remembered his generosity when he was poor; and declared—in a select society, and in the company of the relative of a person from whom I have the information—declared in the presence of Captain Gann at the Admiral B—ng Club in fact, that Mr. Heff was always a swell; but since he was done, he, Rudge, “was blest if that young chap warn’t a greater swell than hever.” And Rudge actually liked this poor young fellow better than the family in Walpole Street, whom Mr. R. pronounced to be “a shabby lot.” And in fact it was Rudge as well as myself who advised that Philip should see his lordship.

When at length Philip paid his second visit, Mr. Rudge said, “My lord will see you, Sir, I think. He has been speaking of you. He’s very unwell. He’s going to have a fit of the gout, I think. I’ll tell him you are here.” And coming back to Philip, after a brief disappearance, and with rather a scared face, he repeated the permission to enter, and again cautioned him, saying, that “my lord was very queer.”

In fact, as we learned afterward, through the channel previously indicated, my lord, when he heard that Philip had called, cried, “He has, has he. Hang him, send him in;” using, I am constrained to say, in place of the monosyllable “hang,” a much stronger expression.

“Oh, it’s you, is it?” says my lord. “You have been in London ever so long. Twysden told me of you yesterday.”

“I have called before, Sir,” said Philip, very quietly.

“I wonder you have the face to call at all, Sir!” cries the old man, glaring at Philip. His lordship’s countenance was of a gamboge color; his noble eyes were blood-shot and starting; his voice, always very harsh and strident, was now specially unpleasant; and from the crater of his mouth shot loud exploding oaths.

“Face! my lord?” says Philip, still very meek.

“Yes, if you call that a face which is covered over with hair like a baboon!” growled my lord, showing his tusks. “Twysden was here last night, and tells me some pretty news about you.”

Philip blushed; he knew what the news most likely would be.

“Twysden says that now you are a pauper, by George, and living by breaking stones in the street—you have been such an infernal, driveling, hanged fool, as to engage yourself to another pauper!”

Poor Philip turned white from red, and spoke slowly; “I beg your pardon, my lord, you said?”

“I said you were a hanged fool, Sir!” roared the old man; “can’t you hear?”

“I believe I am a member of your family, my lord,” says Philip, rising up. In a quarrel, he would sometimes lose his temper, and speak out his mind; or sometimes, and then he was most dangerous, he would be especially calm and Grandisonian.

“Some hanged adventurer, thinking you were to get money from me, has hooked you for his daughter, has he?”

“I have engaged myself to a young lady, and I am the poorer of the two,” says Philip.

“She thinks you will get money from me,” continues his lordship.

“Does she? I never did!” replied Philip.

“By Heaven, you sha’n’t, unless you give up this rubbish.”

“I sha’n’t give her up, Sir, and I shall do without the money,” said Mr. Firmin, very boldly.

“Go to Tartarus!” screamed the old man.

On which Philip told us, “I said, ‘Seniores priores,’ my lord,” and turned on my heel. So you see if he was going to leave me something, and he nearly said he was, that chance is passed now, and I have made a pretty morning’s work. And a pretty morning’s work it was: and it was I who had set him upon it! My brave Philip not only did not rebuke me for having sent him on this errand, but took the blame of the business on himself. “Since I have been engaged,” he said, “I am growing dreadfully avaricious, and am almost as sordid about money as those Twysdens. I cringed to that old man: I crawled before his gouty feet. Well, I could crawl from here to Saint James’s Palace to get some money for my little Charlotte.” Philip cringe and crawl! If there were no posture-masters more supple than Philip Firmin, kotooing would be a lost art, like the Menuet de la Cour. But fear not, ye great! Men’s backs were made to bend, and the race of parasites is still in good repute.

When our friend told us how his brief interview with Lord Ringwood had begun and ended, I think those who counseled Philip to wait upon his grand-uncle felt rather ashamed of their worldly wisdom and the advice which they had given. We ought to have known our Huron sufficiently to be aware that it was a dangerous experiment to set him bowing in lords’ ante-chambers. Were not his elbows sure to break some courtly china, his feet to trample and tear some lace train? So all the good we had done was to occasion a quarrel between him and his patron. Lord Ringwood avowed that he had intended to leave Philip money; and by thrusting the poor fellow into the old nobleman’s sick chamber we had occasioned a quarrel between the relatives, who parted with mutual threats and anger. “Oh, dear me!” I groaned in connubial colloquies. “Let us get him away. He will be boxing Mugford’s ears next, and telling Mrs. Mugford that she is vulgar and a bore. He was eager to get back to his work, or rather to his lady-love, at Paris. We did not try to detain him. For fear of further accidents we were rather anxious that he should be gone. Crest-fallen and sad, I accompanied him to the Boulogne boat. He paid for his place in the second cabin, and stoutly bade us adieu. A rough night: a wet slippery deck: a crowd of frowzy fellow-passengers: and poor Philip in the midst of them in a thin cloak, his yellow hair and beard blowing about: I see the steamer now, and left her with I know not what feelings of contrition and shame. Why had I sent Philip to call upon that savage, overbearing old patron of his? Why compelled him to that bootless act of submission? Lord Ringwood's brutalities were matters of common notoriety. A wicked, dissolute, cynical old man: and we must try to make friends with this mammon of unrighteousness, and set poor Philip to bow before him and flatter him! Ah, mea culpa, mea culpa! The wind blew hard that winter night, and many tiles and chimney-pots blew down: and as I thought of poor Philip tossing in the frowzy second-cabin, I rolled about my own bed very uneasily.

A QUARREL.

I looked into Bays's club the day after, and there fell on both the Twysdens. The parasite of a father was clinging to the button of a great man when I entered: the little reptile of a son came to the club in Captain Woolcombe's brougham, and in that distinguished mulatto officer's company. They looked at me in a peculiar way. I was sure they did. Talbot Twysden, pouring his loud, braggart talk in the ear of poor Lord Lepel, eyed me with a glance of triumph, and talked and swaggered so that I should hear. Ringwood Twysden and Woolcombe, drinking absinthe to whet their noble appetites, exchanged glances and grins. Woolcombe's eyes were of the color of the absinthe he swallowed. I did not see that Twysden tore off one of Lord Lepel's buttons, but that nobleman, with a scared countenance, moved away rapidly from his little persecutor. "Hang him, throw him over, and come to me!" I heard the generous Twysden say. "I expect Ringwood and one or two more." At this proposition, Lord Lepel, in a tremulous way, muttered that he could not break his engagement, and fled out of the club.

Twysden's dinners, the polite reader has been previously informed, were notorious; and he constantly bragged of having the company of Lord Ringwood. Now it so happened that on this very evening Lord Ringwood, with three of his followers, henchmen, or led captains, dined at Bays's club, being determined to see a pantomime in which a very pretty young Columbine figured: and some one in the house joked with his lordship, and said, "Why, you are going to dine with Talbot Twysden. He said, just now, that he expected you."

"Did he?" said his lordship. "Then Talbot Twysden told a hang'd lie!" And little Tom Eaves, my informant, remembered these remarkable words, because of a circumstance which now almost immediately followed.

A very few days after Philip's departure, our friend, the Little Sister, came to us at our breakfast-table, wearing an expression of much trouble and sadness on her kind little face; the causes of which sorrow she explained to us, as soon as our children had gone away to their school-room. Among Mrs. Brandon's friends, and one of her father's constant companions, was the worthy Mr. Ridley, father of the celebrated painter of that name, who was himself of much too honorable and noble a nature to be ashamed of his humble paternal origin. Companionship between father and son could not be very close or intimate; especially as in the younger Ridley's boyhood his father, who knew nothing of the fine arts, had looked upon the child as a sickly, half-witted creature, who would be to his parents but a grief and a burden. But when J. J. Ridley, Esq., began to attain eminence in his profession, his father's eyes were opened; in place of neglect and contempt, he looked up to his boy with a sincere, naïve admiration, and often, with tears, has narrated the pride and pleasure which he felt on the day when he waited on John James at his master's, Lord Todmorden's table. Ridley senior now felt that he had been unkind and unjust to his boy in the latter's early days, and with a very touching humility the old man acknowledged his previous injustice, and tried to atone for it by present respect and affection.

Though fondness for his son, and delight in the company of Captain Gann, often drew Mr. Ridley to Thornhaugh Street, and to the Admiral Byng Club, of which both were leading members, Ridley senior belonged to other clubs at the West End, where Lord Todmorden's butler consorted with the confidential butlers of others of the nobility; and I am informed that in those clubs Ridley continued to be called "Todmorden" long after his connection with that venerable nobleman had ceased. He continued to be called Lord Todmorden, in fact, just as Lord Popinjoy is still called by his old friends Popinjoy, though his father is dead, and Popinjoy, as every body knows, is at present Earl of Pintado.

At one of these clubs of their order Lord Todmorden's man was in the constant habit of meeting Lord Ringwood's man when their lordships (master and man) were in town. These gentlemen had a regard for each other; and when they met communicated to each other their views of society, and their opinions of the characters of the various noble lords and influential commoners whom they served. Mr. Rudge knew every thing about Philip Firmin's affairs, about the Doctor's flight, about Philip's generous behavior. "Generous! I call it admiral!" old Ridley remarked, while narrating this trait of our friend's, and his present position. And Rudge contrasted Philip's manly behavior with the conduct of some sneaks which he would not name them, but which they were always speaking ill of the poor young fellow behind his back, and sneaking up to my lord, and greater skinflints and meaner humbugs never were: and there was no accounting for tastes, but he, Rudge, would not marry his daughter to a black man.

Now, that day when Mr. Firmin went to see my Lord Ringwood was one of my lord's very worst days, when it was almost as dangerous to go near him as to approach a Bengal tiger. When he is going to have a fit of gout his lordship (Mr. Rudge remarked) was hawful. He curse and swear, he do, at every body; even the clergy or the ladies—all's one. On that very day when Mr. Firmin called he had said to Mr. Twysden, "Get out, and don't come slandering, and backbiting, and bullying that poor devil of a boy any more. It's blackguardly, by George, Sir—it's blackguardly." And Twysden came out with his tail between his legs, and he says to me—"Rudge," says he, "my lord's uncommon bad to-day." Well. He hadn't been gone an hour when pore Philip comes, bad luck to him; and my lord, who had just heard from Twysden all about that young woman—that party at Paris, Mrs. Brandon—and it is about as great a piece of folly as ever I heard tell of—my lord turns upon the pore young fellar, and call him names worse than Twysden. But Mr. Firmin ain't that sort of man, he isn't. He won't suffer any man to call him names; and I suppose he gave my lord his own back again, for I heard my lord swear at him tremendous, I did, with my own ears. When my lord has the gout flying about I told you he is awful. When he takes his colchicum he's worse. Now we have got a party at Whipham at Christmas, and at Whipham we must be. And he took his colchicum night before last, and to-day he was in such a tremendous rage of swearing, cursing, and blowing up every body that it was as if he was red-hot. And when Twysden and Mrs. Twysden called that day (if you kick that fellar out at the hall-door, I'm blest if he won't come smirkin' down the chimney)—and he wouldn't see any of them. And he bawled out after me, "If Firmin comes kick him down stairs—do you hear?" with ever so many oaths and curses against the poor fellow, while he vowed he would never see his hanged impudent face again. But this wasn't all, Ridley. He sent for Bradgate, his lawyer, that very day. He had back his will, which I signed myself as one of the witnesses—me and Wilcox, the master of the hotel—and I know he had left Firmin something in it. Take my word for it. To that poor young fellow he means mischief. A full report of this conversation Mr. Ridley gave to his little friend Mrs. Brandon, knowing the interest which Mrs. Brandon took in the young gentleman; and with these unpleasant news Mrs. Brandon came off to advise with those who—the good nurse was pleased to say—were Philip's best friends in the world. We wished we could give the Little Sister comfort: but all the world knew what a man Lord Ringwood was—how arbitrary, how revengeful, how cruel.

I knew Mr. Bradgate, the lawyer, with whom I had business, and called upon him, more anxious to speak about Philip's affairs than my own. I suppose I was too eager in coming to my point, for Bradgate saw the meaning of my questions, and declined to answer them. "My client and I are not the dearest friends in the world," Bradgate said; "but I must keep his counsel, and must not tell you whether Mr. Firmin's name is down in his lordship's will or not. How should I know? He may have altered his will. He may have left Firmin money; he may have left him none. I hope young Firmin does not count on a legacy. That's all. He may be disappointed if he does. Why, you may hope for a legacy from Lord Ringwood, and you may be disappointed. I know scores of people who do hope for something, and who won't get a penny." And this was all the reply I could get at that time from the oracular little lawyer.

I told my wife, as of course every dutiful man tells every thing to every dutiful wife: but, though Bradgate discouraged us, there was somehow a lurking hope still that the old nobleman would provide for our friend. Then Philip would marry Charlotte. Then he would earn ever so much more money by his newspaper. Then he would be happy ever after. My wife counts eggs not only before they are hatched but before they are laid. Never was such an obstinate hopefulness of character. I, on the other hand, take a rational and despondent view of things; and if they turn out better than I expect, as sometimes they will, I affably own that I have been mistaken.

But an early day came when Mr. Bradgate was no longer needful, or when he thought himself released from the obligations of silence with regard to his noble client. It was two days before Christmas, and I took my accustomed afternoon saunter to Bays's, where other habitués of the club were assembled. There was no little buzzing and excitement among the frequenters of the place. Talbot Twysden always arrived at Bays's at ten minutes past four, and scuffled for the evening paper, as if its contents were matter of great importance to Talbot. He would hold men's buttons, and discourse to them the leading article out of that paper with an astounding emphasis and gravity. On this day, some ten minutes after his accustomed hour, he reached the club. Other gentlemen were engaged in perusing the evening journal. The lamps on the tables lighted up the bald heads, the gray heads, dyed heads, and the wigs of many assembled fogies—murmurs went about the room. "Very sudden." "Gout in the stomach." "Dined here only four days ago." "Looked very well." "Very well? No! Never saw a fellow look worse in my life." "Yellow as a guinea." "Couldn't eat." "Swore dreadfully at the waiters, and at Tom Eaves who dined with him." "Seventy-six, I see.—Born in the same year with the Duke of York." "Forty thousand a year." "Forty? fifty-eight thousand three hundred, I tell you. Always been a saving man." "Title goes to his cousin, Sir John Ringwood; not a member here—member of Boodle's." "Not the earldom—the barony." "Hated each other furiously. Very violent temper, the old fellow was. Never got over the Reform Bill, they used to say." "Wonder whether he'll leave any thing to old bow wow Twys—" Here enters Talbot Twysden, Esq. "Ha, Colonel! How are you? What's the news to-night? Kept late at my office, making up accounts. Going down to Whipham to-morrow to pass Christmas with my wife's uncle—Ringwood, you know. Always go down to Whipham at Christmas. Keeps the pheasants for us—no longer a hunting man myself. Lost my nerve, by George."

While the braggart little creature indulged in this pompous talk he did not see the significant looks which were fixed upon him, or if he remarked them was perhaps pleased by the attention which he excited. Bays's had long echoed with Twysden's account of Ringwood, the pheasants, his own loss of nerve in hunting, and the sum which their family would inherit at the death of their noble relative.

"I think I have heard you say Sir John Ringwood inherits after your relative?" asked Mr. Hookham.

"Yes; the barony—only the barony. The earldom goes to my lord and his heirs, Hookham. Why shouldn't he marry again? I often say to him, 'Ringwood, why don't you marry, if it's only to disappoint that Whig fellow, Sir John? You are fresh and hale, Ringwood. You may live twenty years, five-and-twenty years. If you leave your niece and my children any thing, we're not in a hurry to inherit,' I say; 'why don't you marry?'"

"Ah! Twysden, he's past marrying," groans Mr. Hookham.

"Not at all. Sober man now. Stout man. Immense powerful man. Healthy man, but for gout. I often say to him, 'Ringwood!' I say—"

"Oh, for mercy's sake, stop this!" groans old Mr. Tremlett, who always begins to shudder at the sound of poor Twysden's voice. "Tell him, somebody."

"Haven't you heard, Twysden? Haven't you seen? Don't you know?" asks Mr. Hookham, solemnly.

"Heard, seen, known—what?" cries the other.

"An accident has happened to Lord Ringwood. Look at the paper. Here it is." And Twysden pulls out his great gold eye-glasses, holds the paper as far as his little arm will reach, and—and merciful Powers!— But I will not venture to depict the agony on that noble face. Like Timanthes, the painter, I hide this Agamemnon with a veil. I cast the Globe newspaper over him. Illabatur orbis; and let imagination depict our Twysden under the ruins.

What Twysden read in the Globe was a mere curt paragraph; but in next morning's Times there was one of those obituary notices to which noblemen of eminence must submit from the mysterious necrographer engaged by that paper.

CHAPTER XXII.

PULVIS ET UMBRA SUMUS.

THE first and only Earl of Ringwood has submitted to the fate which peers and commoners are alike destined to undergo. Hastening to his magnificent seat of Whipham Market, where he proposed to entertain an illustrious Christmas party, his lordship left London scarcely recovered from an attack of gout to which he has been for many years a martyr. The disease must have flown to his stomach, and suddenly mastered him. At Turreys Regum, thirty miles from his own princely habitation, where he had been accustomed to dine on his almost royal progresses to his home, he was already in a state of dreadful suffering, to which his attendants did not pay the attention which his condition ought to have excited; for when laboring under this most painful malady his outcries were loud, and his language and demeanor exceedingly violent. He angrily refused to send for medical aid at Turreys, and insisted on continuing his journey homeward. He was one of the old school, who never would enter a railway (though his fortune was greatly increased by the passage of the railway through his property); and his own horses always met him at Popper's Tavern, an obscure hamlet, seventeen miles from his princely seat. He made no sign on arriving at Popper's, and spoke no word, to the now serious alarm of his servants. When they came to light his carriage-lamps, and look into his post-chaise, the lord of many thousand acres, and, according to report, of immense wealth, was dead. The journey from Turreys had been the last stage of a long, a prosperous, and if not a famous, at least a notorious and magnificent career.

"The late John George Earl and Baron Ringwood and Viscount Cinquars entered into public life at the dangerous period before the French Revolution; and commenced his career as the friend and companion of the Prince of Wales. When his Royal Highness seceded from the Whig party, Lord Ringwood also joined the Tory side of politicians, and an earldom was the price of his fidelity. But on the elevation of Lord Steyne to a marquissate, Lord Ringwood quarreled for a while with his royal patron and friend, deeming his own services unjustly slighted as a like dignity was not conferred on himself. On several occasions he gave his vote against Government, and caused his nominees in the House of Commons to vote with the Whigs. He never was reconciled to his late Majesty George IV., of whom he was in the habit of speaking with characteristic bluntness. The approach of the Reform Bill, however, threw this nobleman definitively on the Tory side, of which he has ever since remained, if not an eloquent at least a violent supporter. He was said to be a liberal landlord, so long as his tenants did not thwart him in his views. His only son died early; and his lordship, according to report, has long been on ill terms with his kinsman and successor, Sir John Ringwood, of Appleshaw, Baronet, at present Baron Ringwood. The barony has been in this ancient family since the reign of George I., when Sir John Ringwood was ennobled, and Sir Francis, his brother, a Baron of the Exchequer, was advanced to the dignity of Baronet by the first of our Hanoverian sovereigns."

This was the article which my wife and I read on the morning of Christmas eve, as our children were decking lamps and looking-glasses with holly and red berries for the approaching festival. I had dispatched a hurried note, containing the news, to Philip on the night previous. We were painfully anxious about his fate now, when a few days would decide it. Again my business or curiosity took me to see Mr. Bradgate the lawyer. He was in possession of the news of course. He was not averse to talk about it. The death of his client unsealed the lawyer's lips partially; and I must say Bradgate spoke in a manner not flattering to his noble deceased client. The brutalities of the late nobleman had been very hard to bear. On occasion of their last meeting his oaths and disrespectful behavior had been specially odious. He had abused almost every one of his relatives. His heir, he said, was a canting, Methodistical humbug. He had a relative (whom Bradgate said he would not name) who was a scheming, swaggering, swindling lick-spittle parasite, always cringing at his heels, and longing for his death. And he had another relative, the impudent son of a swindling doctor, who had insulted him two hours before in his own room—a fellow who was a pauper, and going to propagate a breed for the work-house; for, after his behavior of that day, he would be condemned to the lowest pit of Acheron before he, Lord Ringwood, would give that scoundrel a penny of his money. "And his lordship desired me to send him back his will," said Mr. Bradgate. "And he destroyed that will before he went away: it was not the first he had burned. And I may tell you, now all is over, that he had left his brother's grandson a handsome legacy in that will, which your poor friend might have had, but that he went to see my lord in his unlucky fit of gout." Ah, mea culpa! mea culpa! And who sent Philip to see his relative in that unlucky fit of gout? Who was so worldly-wise—so Twysden-like, as to counsel Philip to flattery and submission? But for that advice he might be wealthy now; he might be happy; he might be ready to marry his young sweet-heart. Our Christmas turkey choked me as I ate of it. The lights burned dimly, and the kisses and laughter under the mistletoe were but melancholy sport. But for my advice, how happy might my friend have been! I looked askance at the honest faces of my children. What would they say if they knew their father had advised a friend to cringe, and bow, and humble himself before a rich, wicked old man? I sat as mute at the pantomime as at a burial; the laughter of the little ones smote me as with a reproof. A burial?

With plumes and lights, and upholsterers' pageantry, and mourning by the yard measure, they were burying my Lord Ringwood, who might have made Philip Firmin rich but for me.

All lingering hopes regarding our friend were quickly put to an end. A will was found at Whipham, dated a year back, in which no mention was made of poor Philip Firmin. Small legacies—disgracefully shabby and small, Twysden said—were left to the Twysden family, with the full-length portrait of the late earl in his coronation robes, which, I should think, must have given but small satisfaction to his surviving relatives; for his lordship was but an ill-favored nobleman, and the price of the carriage of the large picture from Whipham was a tax which poor Talbot made very wry faces at paying. Had the picture been accompanied by thirty or forty thousand pounds, or fifty thousand—why should he not have left them fifty thousand?—how different Talbot's grief would have been! Whereas when Talbot counted up the dinners he had given to Lord Ringwood—all of which he could easily calculate by his cunning ledgers and journals, in which was noted down every feast at which his lordship attended, every guest assembled, and every bottle of wine drunk—Twysden found that he had absolutely spent more money upon my lord than the old man had paid back in his will. But all the family went into mourning, and the Twysden coachman and footman turned out in black worsted epaulets in honor of the illustrious deceased. It is not every day that a man gets a chance of publicly bewailing the loss of an earl his relative. I suppose Twysden took many hundred people into his confidence on this matter, and bewailed his uncle's death and his own wrongs while clinging to many scores of button-holes.

And how did poor Philip bear the disappointment? He must have felt it, for I fear we ourselves had encouraged him in the hope that his grand-uncle would do something to relieve his necessity. Philip put a bit of crape round his hat, wrapped himself in his shabby old mantle, and declined any outward show of grief at all. If the old man had left him money, it had been well. As he did not—a puff of cigar, perhaps, ends the sentence, and our philosopher gives no further thought to his disappointment. Was not Philip the poor as lordly and independent as Philip the rich? A struggle with poverty is a wholesome wrestling-match at three or five and twenty. The sinews are young, and are braced by the contest. It is upon the aged that the battle falls hardly, who are weakened by failing health, and perhaps enervated by long years of prosperity.

Firmin's broad back could carry a heavy burden, and he was glad to take all the work which fell in his way. Phipps, of the Daily Intelligence, wanting an assistant, Philip gladly sold four hours of his day to Mr. Phipps: translated page after page of newspapers, French and German; took an occasional turn at the Chamber of Deputies, and gave an account of a sitting of importance, and made himself quite an active lieutenant. He began positively to save money. He wore dreadfully shabby clothes, to be sure; for Charlotte could not go to his chamber and mend his rags as the Little Sister had done; but when Mrs. Baynes abused him for his shabby appearance—and indeed it must have been mortifying sometimes to see the fellow in his old clothes swaggering about in Madame Smolensk's apartments, talking loud, contradicting and laying down the law—Charlotte defended her maligned Philip. "Do you know why Monsieur Philip has those shabby clothes?" she asked of Madame de Smolensk. "Because he has been sending money to his father in America." And Smolensk said that Monsieur Philip was a brave young man, and that he might come dressed like an Iroquois to her soirée, and he should be welcome. And Mrs. Baynes was rude to Philip when he was present, and scornful in her remarks when he was absent. And Philip trembled before Mrs. Baynes; and he took her boxes on the ear with much meekness; for was not his Charlotte a hostage in her mother's hands, and might not Mrs. General B. make that poor little creature suffer?

One or two Indian ladies of Mrs. Baynes's acquaintance happened to pass this winter in Paris, and these persons, who had furnished lodgings in the Faubourg St. Honoré or the Champs Elysées, and rode in their carriages with, very likely, a footman on the box, rather looked down upon Mrs. Baynes for living in a boarding-house, and keeping no equipage. No woman likes to be looked down upon by any other woman, especially by such a creature as Mrs. Batters, the lawyer's wife, from Calcutta, who was not in society, and did not go to Government House, and here was driving about in the Champs Elysées, and giving herself such airs, indeed! So was Mrs. Doctor Macoon, with her lady's-maid, and her man-cook, and her open carriage, and her close carriage. (Pray read these words with the most withering emphasis which you can lay upon them.) And who was Mrs. Macoon, pray? Madame Bérét, the French milliner's daughter, neither more nor less. And this creature must scatter her mud over her betters who went on foot. "I am telling my poor girls, madame," she would say to Madame Smolensk, "that if I had been a milliner's girl, or their father had been a pettifogging attorney, and not a soldier, who has served his sovereign in every quarter of the world, they would be better dressed than they are now, poor chicks!—we might have a fine apartment in the Faubourg St. Honoré—we need not live at a boarding-house."

"And if I had been a milliner, Madame la Générale," cried Smolensk, with spirit, "perhaps I should not have had need to keep a boarding-house. My father was a general officer, and served his emperor too. But what will you? We have all to do disagreeable things, and to live with disagreeable people, madame!" And with this Smolensk makes Mrs. General

Baynes a fine courtesy, and goes off to other affairs or guests. She was of the opinion of many of Philip's friends. "Ah, Monsieur Philip," she said to him, "when you are married, you will live far from that woman; is it not?"

Hearing that Mrs. Batters was going to the Tuileries, I am sorry to say a violent emulation inspired Mrs. Baynes, and she never was easy until she persuaded her general to take her to the ambassador's, and to the entertainments of the citizen king who governed France in those days. It would cost little or nothing. Charlotte must be brought out. Her aunt, MacWhirter, from Tours, had sent Charlotte a present of money for a dress. To do Mrs. Baynes justice, she spent very little money upon her own raiment, and extracted from one of her trunks a costume which had done duty at Barrackpore and Calcutta. "After hearing that Mrs. Batters went, I knew she never would be easy," General Baynes said, with a sigh. His wife denied the accusation as an outrage, said that men always imputed the worst motives to woman; whereas her wish, Heaven knows, was only to see her darling child properly presented, and her husband in his proper rank in the world. And Charlotte looked lovely, upon the evening of the ball; and Madame Smolensk dressed Charlotte's hair very prettily, and offered to lend Auguste to accompany the general's carriage; but Ogoost revolted, and said, "Non, merce! he would do any thing for the general and Miss Charlotte—but for the générale, no, no, no!" and he made signs of violent abnegation. And though Charlotte looked as sweet as a rose-bud, she had little pleasure in her ball, Philip not being present. And how could he be present, who had but one old coat, and holes in his boots?

So, you see, after a sunny autumn, a cold winter comes, when the wind is bad for delicate chests, and muddy for little shoes. How could Charlotte come out at eight o'clock through mud or snow of a winter's morning, if she had been out at an evening party late overnight? Mrs. General Baynes began to go out a good deal to the Paris evening parties—I mean to the parties of us Trojans—parties where there are forty English people, three Frenchmen, and a German who plays the piano. Charlotte was very much admired. The fame of her good looks spread abroad. I promise you that there were persons of much more importance than the poor Vicomte de Garçon-boutique, who were charmed by her bright eyes, her bright smiles, her artless, rosy beauty. Why, little Hely of the Embassy actually invited himself to Mrs. Doctor Macoon's, in order to see this young beauty, and danced with her without ceasing. Mr. Hely, who was the pink of fashion, you know; who danced with the royal princesses; and was at all the grand parties of the Faubourg St. Germain. He saw her to her carriage (a very shabby fly, it must be confessed; but Mrs. Baynes told him they had been accustomed to a very different kind of equipage in India). He actually called at the boarding-house, and left his card, M. Walsingham Hely, attaché à l'Embassade de S. M. Britannique, for General Baynes and his lady. To what balls would Mrs. Baynes like to go? to the Tuileries? to the Embassy? to the Faubourg St. Germain? to the Faubourg St. Honoré? I could name many more persons of distinction who were fascinated by pretty Miss Charlotte. Her mother felt more and more ashamed of the shabby fly, in which our young lady was conveyed to and from her parties—of the shabby fly, and of that shabby cavalier who was in waiting sometimes to put Miss Charlotte into her carriage. Charlotte's mother's ears were only too acute when disparaging remarks were made about that cavalier. What? engaged to that queer red-bearded fellow, with the ragged shirt-collars, who trod upon every body in the polka? A newspaper writer, was he? The son of that doctor who ran away after cheating every body? What a very odd thing of General Baynes to think of engaging his daughter to such a person!

So Mr. Firmin was not asked to many distinguished houses, where his Charlotte was made welcome; where there was dancing in the saloon, very mild negus and cakes in the salle-à-manger, and cards in the lady's bedroom. And he did not care to be asked; and he made himself very arrogant and disagreeable when he was asked; and he would upset tea-trays, and burst out into roars of laughter at all times, and swagger about the drawing-room as if he was a man of importance—he indeed—giving himself such airs, because his grandfather's brother was an earl! And what had the earl done for him, pray? And what right had he to burst out laughing when Miss Crackley sang a little out of tune? What could General Baynes mean by selecting such a husband for that nice, modest young girl?

The old general sitting in the best bed-room, placidly playing at whist with the other British fogies, does not hear these remarks, perhaps; but little Mrs. Baynes, with her eager eyes and ears, sees and knows every thing. Many people have told her that Philip is a bad match for his daughter. She has heard him contradict calmly quite wealthy people. Mr. Hobday, who has a house in Carlton Terrace, London, and goes to the first houses in Paris, Philip has contradicted him point-blank, until Mr. Hobday turned quite red, and Mrs. Hobday didn't know where to look. Mr. Peplow, a clergyman and a baronet's eldest son, who will be one day the Rev. Sir Charles Peplow of Peplow Manor, was praising Tomlinson's poems, and offered to read out at Mr. Badger's—and he reads very finely, though a little perhaps through his nose—and when he was going to begin, Mr. Firmin said, "My dear Peplow, for Heaven's sake don't give us any of that rot. I would as soon hear one of your own prize poems." Rot, indeed! What an expression! Of course Mr. Peplow was very much annoyed. And this from a mere newspaper writer. Never heard of such rudeness! Mrs. Tuffin said she took her line at once after seeing this Mr. Firmin. "He may be an earl's grand-nephew, for what I care. He may have been at college, he has not learned good manners there. He may be clever, I don't profess to be a judge. But he is most overbearing, clumsy, and disagreeable. I shall not ask him to my Tuesdays; and Emma, if he asks you to dance, I beg you will do no such thing!" A bull, you understand, in a meadow, or on a prairie with a herd of buffaloes, is a noble animal; but a bull in a china-shop is out of place; and even so was Philip among the crockery of those little simple tea-parties, where his mane, and hoofs, and roar caused endless disturbance.

These remarks concerning the accepted son-in-law Mrs. Baynes heard, and, at proper moments, repeated. She ruled Baynes; but was very cautious, and secretly afraid of him. Once or twice she had gone too far in her dealings with the quiet old man, and he had revolted, put her down, and never forgiven her. Beyond a certain point she dared not provoke her husband. She would say, "Well, Baynes, marriage is a lottery: and I am afraid our poor Charlotte has not pulled a prize:" on which the general would reply, "No more have others, my dear!" and so drop the subject for the time being. On another occasion it would be, "You heard how rude Philip Firmin was to Mr. Hobday?" And the general would answer, "I was at cards, my dear." Again she might say, "Mrs. Tuffin says she will not have Philip Firmin to her Tuesdays, my dear:" and the general's rejoinder would be, "Begad, so much the better for him!" "Ah," she groans, "he's always offending some one!" "I don't think he seems to please you much, Eliza!" responds the general: and she answers, "No, he don't, and that I confess; and I don't like to think, Baynes, of my sweet child given up to certain poverty, and such a man!" At which the general with some of his garrison phrases would break out with a "Hang it, Eliza, do you suppose I think it is a very good match?" and turn to the wall, and, I hope, to sleep.

As for poor little Charlotte, her mother is not afraid of little Charlotte: and when the two are alone the poor child knows she is to be made wretched by her mother's assaults upon Philip. Was there ever any thing so bad as his behavior, to burst out laughing when Miss Crackley was singing? Was he called upon to contradict Sir Charles Peplow in that abrupt way, and as good as tell him he was a fool? It was very wrong certainly, and poor Charlotte thinks, with a blush perhaps, how she was just at the point of admiring Sir Charles Peplow's reading very much, and had been prepared to think Tomlinson's poems delightful, until Philip ordered her to adopt a contemptuous opinion of the poet. And did you see how he was dressed? a button wanting on his waistcoat, and a hole in his boot?

"Mamma," cries Charlotte, turning very red. "He might have been better dressed—if—if—"

"That is, you would like your own father to be in prison, your mother to beg her bread, your sisters to go in rags, and your brothers to starve, Charlotte, in order that we should pay Philip Firmin back the money of which his father robbed him! Yes. That's your meaning. You needn't explain yourself. I can understand quite well, thank you. Good-night. I hope you'll sleep well. I sha'n't, after this conversation. Good-night, Charlotte!" Ah, me! O course of true love, didst thou ever run smooth? As we peep into that boarding-house—whereof I have already described the mistress as wakeful with racking care regarding the morrow, wherein lie the Miss Bolderos, who must naturally be very uncomfortable, being on sufferance and as it were in pain, as they lie on their beds—what sorrows do we not perceive brooding over the night-caps? There is poor Charlotte, who has said her prayer for her Philip; and as she lays her young eyes on the pillow, they wet it with their tears. Why does her mother forever and forever speak against him? Why is her father so cold when Philip's name is mentioned? Could Charlotte ever think of any but him?

Oh, never, never! And so the wet eyes are veiled at last, and close in doubt and fear and care. And in the next room to Charlotte's a little yellow old woman lies stark awake; and in the bed by her side an old gentleman can't close his eyes for thinking—my poor girl is promised to a beggar. All the fine hopes which we had of his getting a legacy from that lord are over. Poor child, poor child, what will become of her?

Now, Two Sticks, let us fly over the river Seine to Mr. Philip Firmin's quarters; to Philip's house, who has not got a penny; to Philip's bed, who has made himself so rude and disagreeable at that tea-party. He has no idea that he has offended any body. He has gone home perfectly well pleased. He has kicked off the tattered boot. He has found a little fire lingering in his stove by which he has smoked the pipe of thought. Ere he has jumped into his bed he has knelt a moment beside it; and with all his heart—oh! with all his heart and soul—has committed the dearest one to Heaven's loving protection! And now he sleeps like a child.

Monthly Record of Current Events.

UNITED STATES.

OUR Record closes on the 8th of October. Up to this time nothing of special importance has taken place between the two great armies lying almost within view of each other near Washington. Early in September the Confederates advanced their outposts toward the Potomac, finally occupying Munson's Hill, within sight of the National Capitol. Toward the close of the month this position was abandoned, and the army fell back toward Fairfax Court House, the main body occupying nearly the same position as before the battle of Bull Run. Skirmishes between advance-guards and reconnoitering parties have taken place at different points along the line of the Potomac, but none of these have led to any important result. In a reconnoissance toward Fall's Church, on the night of the 29th of September, two bodies of our troops, mistaking each other for the enemy, opened fire, by which 10 were killed, and about 20 wounded. The number and condition of the troops in the two main armies is carefully concealed. The most reliable estimates, which are merely conjectural, represent each at about 150,000 men. It is clear that the condition and efficiency of the National army is greatly improved since General McClellan has been placed in command. Of the condition of the Confederates the accounts are unreliable: some represent them as in the highest state of efficiency; while according to others they are suffering severely from sickness and privation.

In Western Virginia a series of engagements has taken place, the results of which have been in favor of the National forces. On the 11th of September General Rosecrans attacked the Confederate troops, commanded by General John R. Floyd, Secretary of War under Mr. Buchanan, at Carnifex Ferry, driving him from his position. He crossed the Gauley River, destroying the bridge behind him, and thus escaped pursuit. Our loss was 20 killed and 100 wounded. Among the killed was Colonel Lowe, of the Ohio Twelfth, a sketch of whose life will be found in another part of this Magazine.—From the 12th to the 15th a series of skirmishes took place about Cheat Mountain, between the Confederates, under General Lee, and our troops, under General Reynolds, the general result of which was that the enemy were repulsed and fell back. Among the killed were John A. Washington, late proprietor of Mount Vernon.—A reconnoissance made on the 3d of October against the position of the Confederates at Greenbrier resulted in a sharp action, in which, though no decisive result was attained, the Confederate loss greatly exceeded our own, which is stated at 10 killed and 20 wounded. We give our own losses as put down in the official reports; those of the Confederates can only be estimated, their official reports not being accessible.

The most important events of the month have occurred in Kentucky and Missouri.

In Kentucky a strong effort has been made by the Executive of the State to keep it in a neutral position, with the design of acting as a mediator. But at the State election, held early in August, Mr. Garrow, the Union candidate for State Treasurer, received 83,000 votes, while but 16,000 were cast for two Secession candidates, showing a Union majority of 67,000. In each branch of the Legislature the majority in favor of the Union was about three to one. Forces had, in the mean time, under various names, been organized on both sides, and large bodies of the Confederates were gathered in Tennessee, ready to pass into Kentucky. It was clear that, in case absolute neutrality could not be maintained, the sympathy of the State Government was in favor of the Confederates, while that of the people, as manifested in the election, was with the Union. On the 19th of August Governor Magoffin sent Commissioners to the President of the United States, bearing a letter stating that the people of Kentucky wished to take no part in the pending war, and urging the immediate withdrawal of the United States forces, organizing and encamped within the State. President Lincoln replied that these forces were composed wholly of Kentuckians; that he did not believe that it was the wish of the people of the State that they should be withdrawn. He therefore declined to comply with the request of the Governor. The reply of the President closes with a regret that he can not find in the letter of Governor Magoffin any intimation that he desires the preservation of the Federal Union.—The Legislature of Kentucky assembled at Frankfort on the 2d of September. By a vote of 77 to 20, in the House, the United States flag was ordered to be displayed over the Capitol. This vote was an index to the sentiment of the Legislature. From the outset there was a conflict between the Governor and the Legislature. Governor Magoffin, in his Message, asserts the right of the State to maintain a neutral position; Kentucky had not sympathized, he said, with either party, while both had violated her neutrality. The State should raise all the military force that was needed.—On the 4th of September, almost simultaneously with the meeting of the Legislature, the Confederate forces from Tennessee, commanded by General Leonidas Polk, formerly Bishop, advanced into Kentucky, and took possession of Columbus. On the 9th General Polk dispatched a message to Governor Magoffin, justifying this measure on the ground that he had been assured that the Federal troops were about to take possession of the place, which would seriously endanger West Tennessee. His action had been submitted to the President of the Confederate States, and had been approved on the ground of military necessity. But he would withdraw his troops from Kentucky, provided that the Federal forces should also be withdrawn at the same time. The Legislature then passed a series of resolutions declaring that the neutrality of the State had been “grossly infringed by the so-called Confederate forces;” that the Governor be requested to call out the military force to repel invasion; that the United States be invoked to aid the State; that General Anderson, the defender of Fort Sumter, be requested to enter at once upon the discharge of his duties in this military district; and that the people of Kentucky be called upon to aid in “repelling and driving out the wanton violators of our peace and neutrality, the lawless invaders of our soil.” These resolutions having been vetoed by the Governor, were passed over his veto. He was also directed to issue a proclamation ordering the Confederate troops to evacuate Kentucky; a resolution ordering the National forces also to leave the State was negatived. Governor Magoffin thereupon issued a proclamation in the following terms: “The Government of the Confederate States, the State of Tennessee, and all others concerned, are hereby informed that Kentucky expects the Confederate or Tennessee troops to be withdrawn from her soil unconditionally.” Meanwhile Confederate troops were poured into the State in large numbers. On the west, Generals Polk and Pillow concentrated large forces at Columbus; on the east, General Zollicoffer took possession of Cumberland, near the Virginia line, announcing to the Governor of Kentucky that the safety of Tennessee demanded the occupation of that place, and that he should retain possession of it until the Union forces were withdrawn and the Union camps broken up. General Buckner, formerly commander of the State Guard, with a large body of forces in the Confederate interest, appeared in the northwestern part of the State, and pushed forward a party as far as Muldraugh's Hill, about 45 miles from Louisville. They fell back from this position to Bowling Green, an important strategic position at the junction of the two railways which enter Tennessee, from which place he issued a proclamation, dated September 18, stating that he had come at the head of a force “to aid the Government of Kentucky in carrying out the strict neutrality desired by the people.” A large portion of the Southern part of the State now appears to be in full possession of the Confederate forces. Meanwhile the Union men are active. The Legislature have passed bills calling out the military force of the State, and raising a war loan of $2,000,000. Arrests of a number of prominent men have been made; among these are James B. Clay, a son of Henry Clay, and Ex-Governor Morehead, the latter having been sent to Fort Lafayette. A bill passed the Senate, requesting Senators Breckinridge and Powell to resign. Mr. Breckinridge is said to have joined the Confederates in Virginia. The health of General Anderson unfitting him for active service, the military district under his command has been assigned to General Sherman. Every thing indicates that Kentucky will soon be the scene of active military operations.

In Missouri the battle of Springfield, and the retreat of the Union forces to Rolla—about 125 miles, instead of 50, as stated in our last Record—left the southwestern part of the State open to the Confederate forces under Price and M'Cullough. General Price advanced northward upon Lexington, where a body of National troops under Colonel Mulligan were intrenched. The attack commenced on the 12th of September, and continued until the 22d, when, finding himself surrounded by greatly superior forces, and cut off from water, Colonel Mulligan surrendered. His forces numbered about 3500 men. Our loss in killed and wounded is stated at about 130, while that of the enemy is reported to have been much greater. General Price, however, in his official report, says, “Our entire loss in this series of engagements amounts to 25 killed and 72 wounded. The enemy's loss was much greater. The visible fruits of this almost bloodless victory are great. About 3500 prisoners, among whom are Colonels Mulligan, Marshall, Peabody, and 120 other commissioned officers, five pieces of artillery, and two mortars; over 33,000 stand of infantry arms, a large number of sabres, about 750 horses, many sets of cavalry equipments, wagons, teams, ammunition, more than $100,000 worth of commissary stores, and a large amount of other property, have fallen into our hands. In addition to this I obtained the restoration of the Great Seal of the State, and the Public Records, which had been stolen from their proper custodian, and about $900,000 in money, of which the bank at this place had been robbed, and which I have caused to be returned to it.” At the latest intelligence, General Price is said to have evacuated Lexington, and General Frémont, with the entire force under his command, to be advancing in that direction with the purpose of offering battle.

President Lincoln has addressed a letter to General Frémont in relation to his proclamation enfranchising the slaves of the insurgents. He says: “Assured that you, upon the ground, could better judge of the necessities of your position than I could at this distance, on seeing your proclamation of August 30 I perceived no general objection to it; the particular clause, however, in relation to the confiscation of property and the liberation of slaves appeared to me to be objectionable in its non-conformity to the act of Congress, passed the 6th of last August, upon the same subjects, and hence I wrote you expressing my wish that that clause should be modified accordingly. Your answer just received expresses the preference on your part that I should make an open order for the modification, which I very cheerfully do. It is therefore ordered that the said clause of said proclamation be so modified, held, and construed as to conform with and not to transcend the provisions on the same subject contained in the act of Congress entitled 'An act to confiscate property used for insurrectionary purposes,' approved August 6, 1861, and that said act be published at length with this order."—The Secretary of State has issued a circular explaining and defining the confiscating act of Congress. He says: "No property is confiscated or subject to forfeiture except such as is in transit, or provided for transit to or from insurrectionary States, or used for the promotion of the insurrection. Real estate, bonds, promissory notes, moneys on deposit, and the like, are therefore not subject to seizure or confiscation in the absence of evidence of such unlawful acts. All officers, while vigilant in the prevention of the conveyance of property to or from the insurrectionary States, or the use of it for insurrectionary purposes, are expected to be careful in avoiding unnecessary vexation and cost by seizures not warranted by law."

Naval preparations on a large scale are pushed forward with great vigor, with the presumed object of making a formidable expedition to some prominent point on the Southern coast.—Several valuable prizes have been taken by our blockading squadron.—On the 13th of September the Southern privateer Judith, lying at Pensacola opposite Fort Pickens, was cut out by a boat expedition from the United States steamer Colorado, and burned at the wharf.—The steamer Bermuda, which appears to have been purchased in England and loaded with arms and munitions by the Confederate Commissioners, succeeded in running the blockade at Savannah. It is said that she is to be fitted out as a privateer.—On the 1st of October the steam transport Fanny, dispatched from Fort Monroe to Chickamacomico Inlet, with stores and supplies, and having on board twenty-five soldiers of the Twenty-fifth Indiana Regiment, was cut out by three Confederate steamers. The crew escaped to the shore in boats; but the soldiers were taken prisoners, and the vessel and cargo were captured.—The Emperor of Russia has addressed a letter to his Minister at Washington, which has been communicated to our Government. He says that for eighty years the Union has exhibited to the world a prosperity without example in the annals of history; and it would be deplorable if the compact which has made the strength of the country should now be broken up. United, the different interests of the country perfect themselves; isolated, they are paralyzed. The struggle, he says, can not be indefinitely prolonged, nor lead to the total destruction of either party; sooner or later there must be some settlement; and he trusts that it may be reached before a useless effusion of blood and squandering of strength shall have brought about the ruin of the commercial and political power of the country. Russia and the United States, he adds, placed at the extremities of two worlds, and both in the ascending period of their development, have a natural community of interests and sympathies, of which they have already given proofs to each other. Without touching upon the questions which divide the United States, the Emperor gives assurance that in any event the American nation may count upon his cordial sympathy during the important crisis through which it is now passing.

The Legislature of Maryland was to have assembled on the 17th of September, at Frederick. A large majority of the members were known to be in favor of Secession, and the passage of an ordinance to that effect was anticipated. The meeting of the Legislature was prevented by the Baltimore police, who arrested the clerks of the Houses and a large number of the members; these were detained for twenty-four hours. Meanwhile the Union members met in caucus, and resolved not to meet in Assembly. There being no quorum left, most of the other members, who had been released on taking the oath of allegiance, left the place, and no formal opening of the Legislature was attempted.

EUROPE.

A combined English, French, and Spanish naval expedition is to be fitted out against Mexico. By the terms of the treaty entered into between these Powers, their combined naval forces will occupy the principal Mexican ports on the Gulf, and will sequester the revenue accruing from customs, retaining one half to be applied to the payment of Mexican indebtedness, and making over the other half to the Mexican Government. Absolute war is not contemplated; but in case any opposition is attempted, an effectual blockade will be established.—M. Rouher, the French Minister of Agriculture and Commerce, has issued a circular clearly defining the position of his Government on the subject of blockade. He says that the right can not be denied to one belligerent, recognized as such, to injure the other by all direct and legitimate means, such as "seizing upon its possessions, besieging its cities, or blockading its ports. The exercise of the right of blockade involves the natural consequence of interdicting access to the blockaded places by other Powers. It is incontestable that the latter are sufferers by this interruption of their habitual commercial relations; but they are not justified in making complaint, for they are only indirectly compromised thereby.... The effectiveness of a blockade is now admitted to be the essential condition of its validity. From the moment that there are upon the spot to which a belligerent means to interdict access sufficient forces to prevent approach without exposure to certain danger, the neutral is constrained, whatever injury he may experience, to respect the blockade. If he violate it, he exposes himself to be treated as an enemy.... It is an error to suppose that a blockade exists only when notice of it has been given diplomatically, and that it is not binding upon neutral ships which have left their country previously to this notification. A blockade is binding the moment it is effectively established; the material result of a material fact, it does not require to be otherwise constituted.... That neutrals ignore the facts imports but little. If one of their vessels presents itself for the purpose of entering a blockaded port, the belligerent has the right to signify its prohibition. It is undoubtedly the general usage for a Government to inform others of the measures of a blockade to which it has recourse. But this notice, which is not an absolute rule, has no value of itself.... An agreement has now been made to the effect that the neutral shall only be considered duly warned of the existence of a blockade, when the warning is given on the spot."

Editor's Table.

OUR FARMERS.—In these dark and stormy times, when so many fair hopes have been rudely dashed, and so many great fortunes are utterly wrecked, we turn for relief to the solid ground, and look with wistful eyes to the men who live upon their own land and win a constant livelihood, however frugal or homely, from their own farms. Never, perhaps, in the history of our country, has there been so wide and severe a shock to our mercantile prosperity, and so good an occasion for reviewing seriously our ways of living, especially in our cities and large towns, and of asking whether we may not take as well as give some wholesome lessons in the conduct of life by a little more intimacy with our farmers. We propose now to treat of them in our usual colloquial and practical way; and at this season, when the harvests are gathered in and the light of the harvest-moon shines on so many rural fairs and merry-makings, we may be allowed to join for a while the robust and cheerful company, and be sure of being forgiven a little grave moralizing, if we only leave the dust and starch of the city behind us, and chat with the farmers as one of them, and try to look with a knowing eye upon their potatoes, and grain, and fruits, and cattle. We propose to speak especially of the farmer himself, and to consider his character and pursuits from our point of view. It is vain to try to cheat him by pretending to know more about his business than he knows himself, or to enlighten him upon soils, manures, seedlings, and breeds. It is better to leave him to guess how much we know about his affairs, and to win his favorable opinion by being inclined to appreciate him and his position fairly. We are disposed to be very good-natured in dealing with a party to whom we are indebted for the very bread that we put into our mouths; and we shall pay the debt all the more by throwing in, now and then, a bit of wholesome advice, that may show that man does not live by bread alone.

And let us begin by considering the farmer especially in his work, or as a workman. A workman he certainly is, and no man can be accused with less justice of being an idle cumberer of the ground than he. Yet it requires some little thought to state accurately what his work is; for farming seems at first to include all kinds of work, and to be more marked by its being a union of all trades, than by having a distinct specialty of its own. The farmer is certainly, in some respects, a mechanic, manufacturer, and merchant, and sometimes he is not a little of a lawyer, doctor, and minister. He is a mechanic, because he uses tools and is constantly contriving ingenious expedients to apply means to ends. So, too, he is a manufacturer, and his farm is the great factory in which he makes the raw material, the earth and the seed, the rain and the sunshine, into roots, and grain, and fruits. He is a merchant, moreover, for he generally buys and sells largely on his own account, and sometimes his expenses and sales mount to very high figures and give him a conspicuous name in the market. He must be physician enough to prescribe for infirm soils, trees, and cattle, if not for his own children; lawyer he readily becomes, so far as is necessary to verify titles or fulfill the duties of justice of peace; and in cases without number, where the sound of the Sabbath bell is not heard, the log-house or the grove is his temple, and as in old, patriarchal times, the father is the priest, and declares the word to his own household and his neighbors.

Yet, various as is the farmer's work, and closely as it may trench upon other callings, it has a decided specialty of its own; and this depends so directly upon a positive law of nature as to distinguish his from that of others. He is by eminence a grower, and the law of vegetative growth is the power which he in the main uses. It is not enough to say that he works upon the soil, for so does the miner or the brick-maker. He works upon it solely with an eye to its yielding crops, and when he raises cattle and sheep he does this mainly by providing them with pasture, as the name for this business, grazing, denotes. The manufacturer may also busy himself with the workings of organic nature; but his processes are chemical not vital, and he aims to produce new combinations of atoms, as in making salts or acids, or to transform commodities into more available shapes, as in carding or weaving. The merchant deals in all commodities; but as merchant he does not grow them, and this work belongs exclusively to the farmer. To make our distinction more philosophical, we may say that there are three aspects in which nature is known to us—the mechanical, the chemical, and the organic—relating severally to things viewed in the mass, or in atoms, or in the life. Now while the mechanic deals with things in the mass and gives them new shapes, and the chemist deals with atoms and gives them new combinations, the farmer deals with things as having life; and while he is a raiser of animals his chief business is in growing the products of vegetative life. Other things are incidental, but this is the main business of his calling. And as the main use of the growth of the soil is food, we regard the farmer's as first of all distinguished by providing food for man and beast. He provides clothing also, by raising fibril plants, such as flax, hemp, and cotton, that give materials for the weaver; but these require so much labor and skill from the manufacturers before they can be useful, as much to divide with others his service; and, moreover, in their relative amount and value, the products that are made into clothing bear a small proportion to the crops that supply food. We say, then, that the business of the farmer is to feed and incidentally to clothe the human race, by studying and applying the law of vegetative growth. He puts the seed into the soil wisely, and carefully tends the plant which yields the harvest. All the arrangements of his farm, however few or many, simple or stately—all of his broad acres, whether meadow, garden, vineyard, orchard, wood—all his fences, walls, drains, barns, dairies, tools, machines, vehicles, cattle, and servants, are but so many different interpretations of the ancient scripture: "Behold I have given you every herb bearing seed, which is upon the face of all the earth, and every tree, in the which is the fruit of a tree yielding seed; to you it shall be for meat."

The farmer's work, of course, begins with the soil, and his first task is to prepare the ground for the seed. Now this seems to be a very simple matter; and as in our petty pride we tread upon the brown and common earth, we may think that we know all about it; and if we are inclined to bow the knee at all to its rude majesty, it is because of the gold and silver and gems that may be hidden in its depths. Yet its great mysteries and richest treasures are near the surface, within reach of the farmer's plow and spade, without need of the miner's shaft, windlass, and safety-lamp. The substances upon which the potato, turnip, wheat, maize, flax, and cotton live give us our greatest wealth, and the yield of the mines of California shrink into insignificance before the two thousand millions of dollars that our soil in the best years bears to us from its surface. What more and better products it may bear we do not know; for we are but just beginning to study its nature and to dismiss the childish dream that we must take it as it is, and that its wild state is its true or best condition. The soil, like the soul, needs culture to show what it is and to yield its best fruits; for it may be said without question that the growths most valuable to mankind are only the fruit of careful tillage, and do not come to us by magic, or by the spontaneous movement of earths of native fatness, or climates of tropical luxuriance. Too much richness may be as fatal as too little; and Nature, like man, thrives best in the temperate zone, with its moderated elements and its healthy and laborious habits. In the temperate zone, where man best educates himself, he best educates the ground, and there the science and the art of agriculture have been developed.

A man's brain is ready to swim as he tries to conceive of the vastness of the territory open to the American farmer—the extent of the fields that call for his subduing hand. We have three millions of square miles, according to the latest returns, in our national domain, and of this immense region not more than one-twelfth part is under cultivation, and only about double that portion, or one-sixth, is occupied. Try to imagine the labor required to cultivate a single square mile of ground—as in the Central Park, which is a little more than a square mile in size—and multiply this by three millions, or by two and a half millions, and we have some idea of the extent of our country. Yet one-twelfth of that amount, or two hundred and fifty thousand square miles, which is near the extent actually cultivated, is more than we can have any definite conception of. Now try to estimate the amount of labor, skill, and cost needed to keep this land in cultivation. Remember, in the first place, that the whole of it must be in some way prepared mechanically for producing—as by plowing, harrowing, draining, etc.—in order that it may be duly opened to the light, and warmth, and rain, and the various ingredients of the soil may be so disintegrated as to act freely upon the growing plant. Consider, in the second place, how often the soil is to be mechanically changed by admixture with other earths and substances than it naturally contains, and whether clayey, sandy, gravelly, loamy, or peaty, its excesses may be corrected. Then, lastly, think of the great matter of fertilizing the soil, mainly by chemical changes through manures, natural and artificial, which look as carefully and scientifically to feeding the ground with precisely what it wants as we look to the feeding of our children. We may write volumes on the subject of manures, or may put it into a nut-shell, and state the whole matter simply thus: As the plant lives mainly out of the earth, the earth must be supplied with the materials which the plant takes away; and as these materials are of three principal kinds—minerals, or salts, such as lime, potash, and soda; carbon, such as charcoal and other woody fibre; and nitrogen, such as is most readily found in ammonia, and which most tends to renew the tissues of the body—that is the best manure which affords these three materials in the proportions fitted to the wants of the plants to be cultivated, and in the form most easily assimilated by them. The form of the manure is as important as the substance; for as plants do not through their roots absorb any element which is not dissolved in water, or do not eat their beef or potato until made into broth, the chemist asks carefully for the best solvents of his nutritive materials: and hence, in great part, the importance of acids in his combinations, and the great emphasis given to phosphates, carbonates, sulphates, etc., in the modern methods of fertilization. Now every practical farmer is to understand this philosophy of manures as he values his pocket, his fields, and his barn-yard; and without this knowledge he will make sad mistakes alike by doing what he had better leave undone, as by putting mineral manures upon limestone soil, or emptying his dung-heap upon soil fat with vegetable mould. He must learn that his soil has a temper of its own, and needs to be regulated as much as his horse. It seems to be ascertained that mineral manures give bottom without speed, and nitrogenous manures give speed without bottom, and of themselves may stimulate too much; while those that are mainly carbonaceous are especially warming and fattening, and bear something of the same relation to the mineral salts that fuel bears to water, while the nitrogen brings the two together, and sets the steam-engine a going. This subject of fertilizers may seem too abstruse to be applied to common practice; but we defy any man nowadays to manage a single acre of ground wisely and profitably without some knowledge of it, and most men are likely to part with much money and not a little patience before they consent to study and apply the first principles of agricultural science to the soil.

After the soil is ready the seed is to be sown, or the plant or tree is to be set out. What a world here opens upon us in the choice of the seed or plant! Our America has become now one of the great gardens of the earth, and every desirable farm, with a good variety of soils, levels, and exposures, can bear most of the growths that are known to man, and almost all such as are of chief value to our civilization. What shall the farmer try to raise? is the question; and he must settle the question by considering what quantity he needs, what quality he can produce, and what uses he has most in mind. No little judgment and enterprise are evidently needed to choose the proper growths for a large farm; for, like a large family, it embraces a broad variety of aptitudes, and our fields, like our children, can not always do the same thing; and, moreover, they need rotation of crops, as children need rotation of studies. Our fields too, like our children, undoubtedly suffer much from being put upon the wrong work—as when the orchard is planted in a damp meadow, and the meadow is expected to appear upon the dry hill-side. Every sensible farmer will insist upon having every great department of vegetation represented upon his soil, and will think himself poor indeed without a due portion of garden and orchard, forest and field, hill-side and meadow. Not caring now to discuss the due proportion in which the great staple crops should be cultivated, we may say that there is no excuse for his neglecting the finer fruits, and making his table a stranger to the best pears and apples, grapes, cherries, and berries. These have great market value, and are, moreover, refiners of the taste, and means of kindly fellowship and elevating competition. We confess to some little feeling of envy of the man who grows a new variety of fruit which takes his own name; and if it is ennobling to Herschel to have his name identified with a planet, or Americus to give his name to a continent, is there not something comforting in being named when friends meet to taste a delicious pear, like the Bartlett, or strawberry, like the Hovey?

But the farmer's work does not close with planting the soil with the seed. The culture but then begins; and who shall undertake to describe the judicious and faithful labor thus bestowed—whether to keep the ground open and free from weeds, or to protect the plant from drought, or blight, or insects, or too rank growth—to watch carefully its season of maturity, and gather duly the welcome harvest? What vigilance, what judgment, what nicety of touch, what skillful use of implements, and employment of animal strength, and human labor, must be expended every season! The farmer has of late called in the new and gigantic powers of mechanism to his assistance; and while the chemist analyzes for him the soils, the mechanician supplies him with vast motive powers more mighty and steadfast than a squadron of horses, that come without complaining to do his bidding; and steam, with its never-wearying pulse and never-fainting limbs, mows and reaps and plows for him as if the labor were sport, and it were no longer the sweat of the brow, but the sweat of the boiler, in which man is to eat his bread.

But we need not try to describe at length the completion of the farmer's work, when the culture of the soil and the plant is crowned by the harvest. We look upon him at once as standing in closer and ennobling relations with nature, civilization, and God's own providence. As his fields are white or yellow with their more than gold and silver treasure, and the orchards bow under the weight of their ruddy fruit, he sees before his eyes the reward of his long labor, and needs no longer walk by faith alone, in the assurance that he who goes forth weeping, bearing precious seed, shall come again rejoicing, bearing his sheaves with him. The intention of nature in the order of the seasons is written out clearly in the work of his hands, and he sees why it is that God calls us to patient toil, that all the more effectually, in the course of time, he may mature his gifts. Not only do the overflowing barns receive the treasure, but the cattle on the hills and in the stalls are living depositories of its wealth, walking granaries that not only preserve but transform the products of the ground into higher and more precious substances. The horse, the ox, and sheep are happy in their fullness, and he enjoys their happiness, and is like the hand of Providence itself to them. He finds himself bound by new ties to society by his returns, and as he buys and sells in the market, he finds himself anew a partner in the art, science, and wealth of the whole world; and in return for what he gives he chooses from the world's store-houses what most he needs for himself and his family, however frugal may be his habits, never failing in some way to take home with him some of the great products of civilized thought or ingenuity. His contribution to the public welfare makes him a partner in the wealth of the great nation; and it is out of such offerings as his that the country heaps up her riches, and we now see the astounding spectacle of a nation not a century old supplying the markets of Europe with food and clothing, and even in this time of our civil trouble and impoverishment drawing the gold of the old world to our treasury, and more than keeping the balance of trade in our favor. We can not contemplate this state of things, and the series of movements and ideas that have led to our agricultural prosperity, without owning the benign hand of Providence in the result, and giving glory to Him who is Ruler of nations and Lord of the harvest. Think of the time when a civilized man first put his spade to the virgin soil of our America, and try to follow him through all the difficulties and misgivings of that first day's work, whether near the bleak rock of Plymouth, by the rich banks of James River, or on the sandy island of Manhattan; then look now upon the harvest before us here in this great city, then along these bays and rivers, and from the Atlantic to the Pacific; follow the harvest-moon as she sheds her pale and mystical light upon a broad domain larger by far than all Europe as known to our ancestors, and we need add no words nor figures to exhibit to you the grandeur and the power of the American farmer's work. As yet, moreover, his task is but begun, and not only is but a fraction of our soil under improvement, but probably the richest lands are as yet untitled, and they await bolder enterprise, more skillful culture, and advanced civilization to develop their wealth. The work rises into dignity as well as spreads in grandeur when we contemplate the great intellectual, moral, and spiritual results that spring out of it; and remember that the wealth that comes out of the ground supports our schools, colleges, and churches, and educates families for this world and for the world to come. Thus it is that, under God's providence, the seed that is sown bears fruit not of bread alone, and the farmer, like the true artist, finds himself working according to a divine pattern, and modeling the rude clay into the likeness of the image of God. His fields and gardens, orchards and brooks, sometimes bear in their very face the features of high humanity, and the broad landscape as well as the open Bible teaches the worship that has the beauty of holiness.

If such be the work of the farmer, thus large and exalted, what ought the man to be? Let us say a few words upon the kind of manhood that ought to be found among the lords of the soil. We need not tell our readers that we are not canvassing for votes in the rural districts, and bound to eulogize its population as being of necessity all perfect—Arcadians in their simplicity, Spartans in hardihood, and Swiss in independence. We are trying to state facts, and not talk sentiment or retail deceits. We must confess that we know farmers who are not model men; and we are tempted to say, of a certain portion of them, that they come nearer to worshipping the almighty dollar than any people we have known on earth. Yet, while we condemn the miserly farmer, we must remember that he may be tempted to covetousness in part because he sees so little money; and that sometimes the city lavishness, that seems generosity, is but a wholesale way of getting the most money, and exchanging the petty hand-press of small niggardliness for a gigantic hydraulic squeeze of gross extortion.

There is much, certainly, in a farmer's position that should help his character. A certain manliness of character goes with independence of circumstance, and we presume that no class of men are so free from direct and invidious dependence upon others as the farmers who live upon their own land. They are not free from anxiety, indeed, and may lose their crops, and not always get their dues, and may be often much stinted in ready money. Yet their risks generally affect their income without endangering their principal; and herein they are more favored than merchants, whom they are so tempted to envy, since the merchant risks principal and income too, and most of the class who trade in our great towns and cities seem to be utterly wrecked every ten or twenty years. It is certainly a vast thing to have a sure home and daily bread, and opportunity to work and to train up a family where habits are simple and hard times are more tolerable, because hardships may be borne without exposure, and the meddlesome and artificial world is not looking on to see and tell what we eat and drink and wear. So important is it for a man to be sure of having a snug household of his own to fall back upon in dark days, that it is well for every prosperous man to own at least a cottage and a few acres in the country beyond all risks of business, and to settle it on his family, in addition to a life-insurance sufficient to keep soul and body together, in case of his being ruined by a financial crisis, or taken away without settling up his affairs.

Health is more important even than substance, and the farmer is in the way to secure substantial strength as well as property. His calling is the healthiest, as the official returns abundantly and universally show. The reason, too, is as obvious, as his out-door exercise, regular labor, frequent riding, and sufficient fare show. He is lucky enough never generally to have discovered that he has any nerves or organs of digestion, and he needs no anodynes to put him to sleep. When he combines, as he often does, the manly and skillful sports with his labor, his health has a high quality as well as ruddy fullness, and with his rod, or oar, or gun he learns a gentle courage that does much to soften and refine his massive force, and make him a welcome companion to his more cultivated neighbors of the book, or the sword, or the ledger. There is something, however, in his habitual occupations that gives him a certain fineness of touch as well as force of muscle. He must hold the plow and wield the spade, and so also must he handle the sickle and the pruning-knife; and in this and many other mechanical appliances he finds room for the use of much manual skill, and may indeed be readily something of a carpenter, locksmith, and cabinet-maker. No man is in a position to have more versatility of hand; and the farmer is very much like the sailor in being a Jack at all trades with his farm, as one field of labor which Jack with all his supple fingers can not get hold of while at sea.

His strength not only thus joins with dexterity, but tends also to a certain command which is above brute bulk as it is above effeminate ease and sentimentalism. The farmer's mind tends strongly to the hand, and he is obliged constantly to make his mark upon solid material and to guide living forces. He is not a dreamer, but by eminence a doer, and he has direct dominion over the field and the beasts; and thus the best specimens of the vocation have in their bearing a certain princely quality of command. The old Roman gentleman was of necessity a horseman; and every good farmer is of the equestrian order by owning a good horse, and winning from him not only pleasant rides and profitable work, but something of the air noble that comes from ruling a powerful creature in a worthy spirit. Sometimes the same spirit goes out in the mastery of unruly men; and the lord of the soil, of the old times or the new, has servants and laborers under him over whom he is called to exercise a wholesome control. Clearly, then, if he enters at all earnestly into his opportunities, he will be a man of varied force, and his right hand should have as much strength and cunning as any other man's.

What the farmer ought to be as a thinker or intellectual man, it would take much time to show with any tolerable fullness, so broad are the pursuits, so various are the labors, and so different the types of native character presented. Yet one or two points are sufficiently distinct to be positively noted, and briefly too. He certainly is led by his business to be decidedly a matter-of-fact person; and no man, who sees every day that bread and all wealth come out of the ground by hard and constant day's work, can very easily become a visionary. Undoubtedly much of the sound common sense that rules the thought and common life of this country comes from the practical judgment of our agricultural population, among whom the males over fifteen years of age are more numerous than all other classes of laborers combined, and make up nearly one-half of the entire people. The farmer is literally led to be a man of solid understanding, for he stands on the solid ground, and does not expect things to grow without having some root there; being in this respect unlike the frequent kind of theorists, who think that the world lives upon words and air, and a scheme may be done as easily as said. Especially in politics does his characteristic realism appear; and we may well rejoice that the conservatism of the rural districts has saved the nation from the grasp of monopolists and the madness of radicals. He does not believe, as so many traders and manufacturers do, that the wealth of a nation is measured by the extent of its non-intercourse with other nations, and that it is best to give more to a native for a poor article than to pay less to a foreigner for a good article; and not desiring to have any bounty paid him on his produce, he generally sees little wisdom in the high tariffs that pretend to protect other forms of labor, and tend to raise the price of his purchases in the stores of the cities and towns. He is not, moreover, tempted to fall in with the assuming radicals who talk as if the world must be turned upside-down, and nothing can go right without their fussy interposition. He sees that while he plants and tills the soil God gives the increase, and generally waters and warms it too. He is for letting things alone when they are best let alone; and hence it is that our farming class belong so generally to the better order of democracy, that leaves the people as far as possible to themselves, and assigns only as much power to the central, or federal, authority as is required to keep the nation one and powerful. He believes in a man's taking care of himself without being interfered with by official dictation; and precisely therefore he is a firm advocate for a strong government in the State and the nation that carries out the local and national law, and so secures to each citizen the largest liberty in the most regulated order. He uses his common sense, too, in his ideas of reform; and knows well that the great want is not of more imposing theories, but of more judicious and effective measures. Constantly applying actual powers to actual objects, he judges of all schemes from this point of view; and when men talk of improving the farms of the country, or enlarging the liberty of laborers, whether bond or free, he thinks little of high-sounding professions, and regards it as about as reasonable to vote his land to be twice as fertile and the whole country twice as productive because Liebig says it ought to be so, as to suppose that a million of rude hinds can rise to the state of civilized liberty merely by voting or proclaiming them free. He asks how the thing is to be done; and he knows full well that liberty is not merely a condition, but a quality; and that a man, like a child, is not free by being called so, or by being turned adrift into the world. Freedom is the gift, not of rude nature, but of civilized society; and any rustic knows that to be turned out of doors to herd with cattle, and be beset by wolves or savages, is exchanging a certain form of law and order for a fearful tyranny. Lover of liberty, he is a lover of order; and conscious of being the independent owner of his own soil, he knows that he holds it firmly under public law, and that every title-deed is the pledge of his citizenship, and should be the seal of his loyalty.

Yet, while no visionary, he is no materialist nor worshiper of the clod of the valley; no denier of the Spirit of God that giveth understanding. He looks constantly upon the earth and knows that to dust all of its growth, and man with the rest, must return. But he sees in the earth and above it the constant play of mysterious spiritual forces; and in the lightning, the moving planets, in vegetative and animal vitality, and in human thought and will, he discovers the presence of powers that can not be explained by any theory of matter and motion. He is obliged to note the different planes as well as the different amounts of things and their forces, and to see the majestic scale of being which rises from the crystal which shines at his feet to the light that flashes from the human eye with the ray that emanates from the Eternal Mind, and appears in every living thing, from the opening flower to the beating heart and the rational soul. He is thus something of a poet as well as a philosopher; and in Shakespeare as well as Bacon the sagacious farmer finds many a simile or maxim that comes home to him more than to any closet student, and answers well to the play of his own observation and the thought of his own mind. He likes best the books that are based upon facts; and although ready to meditate upon the causes of things, and rarely willing to be content with facts without ascending to principles or defining powers, he is more fond of the method of observation and inference than that of theory and deduction. Yet we know that many farmers are keen metaphysicians, and such books as "Edwards on the Will and the Affections" hold a place in our rural libraries such as Shakespeare or Milton might covet. But Edwards, in his way, was a mighty realist; and metaphysician as he was, he was mainly a student of Nature and the Bible, and with these manuals and the light within his own soul, he wrote his books, so marvelous for gentle charity, lowly trust, inward illumination, as well as fearful denunciations. He did all that he could to put the life of the natural world and the Bible into the most terrible of all creeds, and many were won by the power of his grasp who shrank from the motto of his standard. One cause of the fondness of farmers for such writers as affirm a positive spiritual faith, lies in the insufficiency of merely natural religion to meet their wants, or the religion that is based upon the observation of visible nature; for nothing is clearer than that while sentimental maidens and smoking students, who see little more of nature than a chance nosegay or a stray cow, are ready to call the light of nature enough for their wants and fellowship, they who live habitually in the country are constantly yearning for something more; and they find the rivers, trees, and stars—nay, even the birds, the bees, and the cattle, very unsatisfactory companions as the sole dependence. Hence the need of positive religion, with its Gospel and Church; hence the fact that faith is little likely to lose its strongholds among our valleys and mountains, and the homesteads and barns are never long far distant from the spire that crowns their wealth and points their aspiration.

On the whole, we may safely affirm that country life enables a thoughtful man to discern very well the various kinds of substances and powers that combine to make up the universe, and to save him from the follies of visionaries who fail to see the substances, and of the materialists who lose sight of the motive and vital powers. If there be any defect in the school in which he is a learner, it comes from the dearth of human society, and the absence of the complex social organization and humanizing influences that are found in large towns and cities. True, indeed, where men much congregate, folly and vice abound, and so, too, wisdom and virtue there centre, and we are obliged to say in truth that the best social powers centre in the choice circles and improved institutions of our towns and cities. The farmer will at once confess that he misses the stores, markets, schools, and arts of the city, but he hardly knows how much he loses in the absence of the unconscious influence that comes from the courteous manners, elevating conversation, and refined culture of the best society. He may have specimens of this in his neighborhood, or may fall in with it in his visits in town; yet one of his first dangers comes from want of the sympathy and incentives flowing from habitual associates of the right stamp. He is tempted to be slovenly in dress, manners, and speech, and live as if it were of little importance how he lives so long as he breaks no moral law and parts with no essential comfort. Hence the frequent absence of good taste and even of common decency in many country places. The sacrifice of the beautiful to the economical, even to the thrusting of the pig-pen and dung-heap into the eyes and nose of the family, and the desertion of the whole house for the shelter of the kitchen and the fumes of the pot and the gridiron. The rules of good-breeding suffer sometimes as much as the laws of taste, and the conversation and garb are as rough as the furniture and aspect are unseemly. A hard selfishness is apt sometimes to be the spirit of the family; and if they agree together tolerably, they may live as if they thought that there were nobody worth caring much for outside their own doors. The isolation of position may tempt isolation of feeling, and the abandonment of the great human fellowship for the imperious sway of private thrift and personal appetites. Yet every generous nature relucts from such perversion, and the very dangers of a comparatively lonely position will impel a true man to take especial pains to resist them, and to win by deliberate effort the advantages that other men have as a matter of course. Hence the good farmer will bring out as much as possible the gifts and powers and graces of his own family, and will try to cultivate the best society in his reach, and to use every fair opportunity of associating with superior men in the interchange of business, and in the pursuit particularly of rural interests and patriotic, literary, and religious objects. He may find great help among his own children, and a half dozen bright girls and boys of various capacities and attainments will do much to enliven the family, and even enrich the farm by their skill and associations. It is very important that he should have strong and frequent influence from companions bound together by fellowship of pursuit, and it is one of the good signs of the times that our farmers are becoming very gregarious in a new and better way than at the ale-house or the tavern, and now meet at fairs and institutes the master minds and the best products, implements, and ideas of their calling. A better standard of ambition is thus set before them, and the good effect of it appears not only in better crops and cattle, but in gentler manners and finer tastes. The farm itself often wears the look of the new age, and not only does thrift speak from the teeming fields and lowing herds, but beauty looks out from the landscape, and it is evident that the owner of the house and grounds has learned that fitness is the first principle of loveliness, and the farm is fair as well as fit when all its parts and uses combine in due order, and the unity and diversity that are the law of God's heavens rule the affairs of the earth and exalt man's many things and thoughts into harmony with the one great Being who sent all existences forth by His word and recalls them to Himself by His spirit.

What motive should more effectually check the farmer's too ready selfishness, and bring him into living human fellowship, than the great principle of patriotism? Who should love his country more than he, and who should feel more than he the stability, the honor, and the power of good government, with its firm law and merciful order? The mysterious power of the nation blesses him when he may least think of it, and the strong arm that protects his property, and gives sweet sleep to his weary pillow, and opens to him a good market for his products, and bears him faithful word of distant friends, and brings his absent son or daughter within reach of his pen and almost of his touch—what power does this but the country, the nation that gathers the many into one, and joins the remotest village to the capital, under the shield of the same broad and mighty nationality? To him the country is no abstraction; for he looks upon and traverses a large piece of its domain day by day, and no man can have more love for his native land than he who owns and inhabits some of its solid acres. But why philosophize upon the nature of the case, when experience proves so amply the patriotism of farmers? In fact, they made the nation; for they were almost the whole population when our liberty was won and our Constitution was fixed. Our great statesmen have been farmers, and in the strict practical sense of the term too. Our great patriot, Washington, stands rightfully at the head of the profession; for he owned 8000 acres, and to his death kept 4000 of them under regular culture. Our great statesmen, the Adamses, Jefferson, Madison, Clay, Webster, and others, have followed in his path, and while they undoubtedly found health and thrift in the soil, yet their great advantage was derived from its wholesome discipline and broad affinity, and they understood and served the people better from seeing with their own eyes how bread is earned, and labor done, and comfort enjoyed, and the nation is governed and blessed.

God's blessing upon our farmers, and may the next half century justify and reward the bright promise of the last fifty years! What the America that the twentieth century looks upon will be, is a question more fitting for a prophet, or at least for a poet, than for our prosaic pen.

Editor's Easy Chair.

LET it go on record that our war summer was one of the loveliest summers that the oldest Easy Chair remembers. The fiercely hot days have been very few, and all the days enjoyable. The usual summer resorts have naturally been less thronged than in other years. The wild revel of fashionable frivolity has been checked. Who can doubt that we have been a soberer, sadder, better people this summer than for many summers before?

There is probably many a philosophic loiterer upon Newport beach in one of those gleaming, golden twilights, when the world has just driven back to the Ocean, and Atlantic, and Bellevue, and Fillmore (if there be later and more luxurious caravansaries the antiquated Easy Chair humbly begs pardon for omitting their names), to array itself for the ball or concert of the evening, who, as his horse paced slowly along the edge of the sea, or he sat upon a rock snuffing the sea-weed, has mused upon the gilded youth of Rome and the watering-place splendors of Baïæ. For so we love to contemplate ourselves historically by putting others long dead in our places, and to feel how picturesque we are by seeing how they were so.

The ruins of our Newport villas, or our Saratoga and Sharon hotels, are not likely to furnish mosaics and marbles for the mosses and vines to overrun. Our temples of Venus will hardly survive like the famous temple at Baïæ. Given desertion and desolation for an equal period, and the only Newport ruin will be the old tower, that was already a ruin before any house now standing in Newport was built; and a ruin upon which all the busy and beautiful life of the watering-place will have made no impression whatever.

Yet our Newport nobility may be consoled. If their villas do not survive—if in a century they are all replaced, and Newport gayer than we have ever known—it is pleasant to reflect upon the greater comfort the heirs of the villas will enjoy. We think, of course, that we have touched the height of comfort and luxury. Do you think that Julius Cæsar, Augustus, Tiberius, Caligula, Caracalla, Nero, and the rest thought otherwise when they breathed the soft sea air at Baïæ? Yet who would not rather live to-day in a spacious house with "the conveniences" than in the marine villas of those Emperors? They rolled in coaches of solid silver, curiously carved. But they were only carts after all, and poorly exchanged for comfort with a well-hung wagon or stuffed carriage. They wore long robes of silk and purple fluttering in the wind, with rich tunics elaborately embroidered. Would a sane man prefer such clothes to the loose sack and the rational peg-top? They sailed in painted galleys from the Lucrine Lake to their villas upon the sea-coast. But how Italy would have remembered, how Horace would have sung, how Pliny would have recorded, if those classic dandies could have seen the yachts that light Newport harbor—the white swan Julia skirting the sunny shore, or the gentle Una gliding up the bay!

Newport can cry quits in comfort with Baïæ. Modern life, in its higher social varieties, is not intrinsically so splendid as the old life of Rome; but it is more substantially comfortable. In fact, in later times, the heir of an old English country mansion, rich in historic value, may often wish that he could build a comfortable house for himself, instead of supplying the defects of an earlier day by adding the conveniences of his own.

So if the loiterer upon the twilight beach should reflect that Baïæ was not better, even in its watering-place way, than Newport—if he should feel no envy of that older day—if he should remember how wanton and wicked was all that imperial luxury—if he should consider that although almond-trees and aloes and oleanders do not grow along the shore of Rhode Island, yet that, on the other hand, the Mediterranean is but a tideless lake, and that on the beach he treads he breathes the strong salt breath of the Atlantic, the philosopher may go home to tea satisfied with his own century and his own country.

IN respect of foreign Princes we observe a strict neutrality. Several weeks ago the Prince Napoleon arrived and went to Washington, and was properly dined and presented, and taken to a review. He represents the Powers that be. Hard upon his heels comes the Prince de Joinville—Cap'n Jineville, as the worthy Boston matron described him after the famous ball there of other days. He too goes to Washington, is properly dined and presented, and taken to a review. He represents the Powers that were.

Treat every man as if he might one day be your enemy, was Machiavelian advice. Treat every man as if he might one day be your biographer, is the method of many famous men. Treat every prince as if he might come to his own again, is certainly the rule of good conduct for all potentates. The pretty steam-yacht Jerome has run round to Boston with her freight of an Emperor's cousin and a King's daughter. "Cap'n Jineville" has put his son to school at the Naval Academy. Meanwhile the whirligig of Time spins on. And is it more unlikely that a few years may show Louis Philippe's son restored to his chance of a kingdom, than it was that the few years which have passed since Cap'n Jineville was here should have restored Napoleon Bonaparte's nephew to the chance of an empire?

The visit of Prince Napoleon is certainly one of the most sensible visits to a country that a man in his position could make. He really saw the country. "Saw the country, Sir!" cried an explosive Second Lieutenant. "By Jupiter, Sir, you'd better say so. Why, he came plump into Syracuse by the train one noon, and dined at the table d'hôte of the Globe Hotel at Convention time; and if that is not seeing the country, Sir, I should be glad to be told what is."

At least we may be very sure that the French Prince knows something more of us than the English Prince who was here a year before him. Jenkins tried very hard to "do" the Prince Napoleon, but Jenkins was turned out into the street, and to this day does not know whether the Prince wears separate collars, or has them sewed on to the shirt. He seems to have made a quiet, gentlemanly impression. A man whose uncle made himself Emperor, and whose cousin had to do the same thing, is naturally doubtful of his future. They who play for crowns, directly or indirectly, play high, but they play a dangerous game. It was the Prince de Joinville's turn twenty years ago, and there was a young Mr. Bonaparte of no importance upon the world. It is Prince Napoleon's turn now, and "Cap'n Jineville" is about.

A FRIEND suggests to the Easy Chair that his pastoral letter in August, informing every body that

VOL. XXIII.—No. 138.—3 H

what he wrote and sent to the Magazine would be fairly treated and considered, must have been peculiarly gratifying to the Editor by trebling and quadrupling his work, "as if any editor were not overwhelmed by the manuscripts which are sent to him without solicitation."

Let the Easy Chair, then, modify the letter. Good brethren of the quill, you will easily believe that most of what we all write is not worth reading; and when we add to the enormity of writing at all, the crime of writing illegibly, in what Abana or Pharpar shall we hope to be made clean? We must not suppose that because we have a fancy to write, and do write, we ought to pain any one else by compelling him to read it. Authors owe a duty to editors, as well as editors to authors, and the first duty is humanity. Besides, if you send a poor thing, and it is, as it will be, rejected, you will find that it has infected all that follows. If a man in a green coat has bored you once, you will always be wary of the bore in the green coat. You will not see him approach without the certainty that you are to be bored; and even if he have something really pleasant to say it will sound to you wearisome.

If the first duty, brethren, is humanity, the second is humility. If you don't think what you have written is good enough to publish, resist "a few friends" and "a famous author who assures you," and "the urgent solicitation of many." That is the worst form of conceit. If you send what you write because you believe in it, that is something. But if you send it because somebody else believes in it, you merely try to gild your vanity with humility. And, O dear brethren, that is so transparent! It is painting your tub yellow, and trying to palm it off for a golden goblet. If you read in the preface to a book that the author has been persuaded by a few friends that he has written something the world will not willingly let die, do you turn with avidity to the pages, or do you quietly lay the book down?

When you have written a poem, or a story, or an essay, the probability is—it is probable of all of us, beloved brethren—that you have written a very poor thing. It is well for us all to think so. But when we do think so, let us not send it to an editor and request his opinion. He is too busy. Every moment he is engaged with his legitimate duties; and it is not one of those that he shall decide the abstract question of merit in your productions. It is so easy to write, and so hard to write well. The Easy Chair receives many a modest and mannerly note accompanying a portentous manuscript. Here is one. It is written in perfect good faith, and it is so received and read:

"DEAR EASY CHAIR,—Being afflicted with a temperament which I am afraid is of a poetic tendency, as it breaks out in sundry effusions under a pressure of the hardest kind of work, and being unable to overcome the longings and aspirations which are said to belong to such characters, I here humbly wait on the 'Easy Chair,' and pray him for his advice and counsel under such trying circumstances. The malady develops itself in beautiful visions which haunt my mind, while the beauties of truth captivates my understanding, harmony in sound or form enchants my soul, and all the beautiful in nature and art, in the grand, the terrible, the sublime, find deep responses in my inmost soul. Amidst all those feelings and impressions the demands of existence calls for work; work and duty chains me to the material and irksome necessities of life, while the inquiring mind is wandering far away, giving hushed utterance to the tuneful vibrations called forth by time and circumstance and the varying events of our fleeting existence.

"To be or not to be, that is the question;"

and so I leave it to the worshipful 'Easy Chair.' I inclose three pieces for your consideration, and if it jumps with your inclination and duty, please to criticise. I am conscious of many imperfections, but as the old divines used to remark, I have 'the root of the matter in me,' if I had opportunity and qualifications to put it in form, not being a very efficient scholar. Though I feel the difficulty of giving the poetic sentiment an arbitrary direction, yet I will be glad to make an essay on any subject as a test of originality. With the sincere hope that I may never become a bore, I hope you will permit me, should neither of the inclosed pieces be suitable, to continue sending till I come up to the standard. Many times a theme presents itself to me which I mentally enjoy but I never bring to fruition, partly from want of time and sluggishness, and having no proper outlet to stimulate me to exertion. If your time and regulations will permit, I will be glad if, instead of consigning me to the Drawer or correspondents' column, you would let me have a few lines per post.

"I am, Dear Easy Chair,

"Yours in Hope, —————"

The writer incloses three poems. Will you hear the opening of the first?

ON SAPPHO SINGING.

On sea-girt isle, where many sounding caves
Give back the gentle murmurs of the waves,
O'er deep blue sea, where prospect far extending,
There sits a form divine, in wayward motion bending.

That is, perhaps, enough. It seems strange, dear brethren, that any body should suppose such lines to be poetry. Yet it is our own case magnified. Many of us who secretly smile at our neighbor's mote are rather proud of our own beam. Therefore let us all be on our guard, and let us not send poems and other literary performances for criticism to Editors, whatever we may send to Easy Chairs. The chair of an Editor is not easy. Common humanity requires that we should not put pins in it for him to sit down upon, and every body who sends him a crude, doubtful, long, illegible manuscript does stick a pin in it. Such a manuscript steals his time and kills his temper. Are you ready to become a thief and murderer? Let the Easy Chair beg every literary brother who may see these words to pause as he is mailing his article, and if he has the least doubt of its acceptance, to save the peace of the editor and his own postage stamps.

In every battle how many a hero falls, of whom often only the name, which tells no tale, survives! We read of the hundreds killed and the thousands wounded; but how little we think of the hearts that are broken at home! In every battle, wherever it may be, in Missouri, or Virginia, or Kentucky, the same qualities are visible that poetry and romance have always celebrated, and the human heart always loved. The history of a thousand heroes is briefly told. Their country called: they marched: they fought: they fell. The following letter tells the story of one, and yet of how many more than one, whose career honors themselves, their country, and mankind!

"MY DEAR EASY CHAIR,—I read this in the New York Evening Post:

"Colonel L——'s regiment engaged the enemy directly in front. L—— fell dead at the head of his regiment early in the hottest fire, by a ball in the forehead."

"And so ends the earthly record of a good and true man's life. His history is so characteristic of his country that it has more than a transient interest. Some forty years ago this great metropolis contained a young, motherless boy, with his sister, two years older than himself. There may have been nothing about him to attract a straying attention, except his bright eye, his pressed lip, a quick, firm tread, which showed that there was a soul within him that would not always slumber. The father, an educated man, had been reduced, by years of sickness, to very narrow circumstances. But for his children's sakes, perhaps, he had married again. Many a step-mother may love the children of a stranger at their own fireside as if they were her own. But this step-mother was not one of them. A brutal nature, heartless and selfish, vented its irritation upon those two helpless children. At some childish and not habitual act of forgetfulness the blood flowed from the little girl's shoulder, and I know not but that the scars are there to this day. And the child (they were then for a while in the vicinity of the city) went out more than once and kneeled down by the fence, and while the tears streamed down her young face prayed that one harder blow might end her life. And the little boy's eyes flashed, and his childish soul burned within him, that he could not protect his dear sister. And privately he said to her, 'Sister, if ever I live to grow larger and that woman comes to my door for a crust of bread, because she is starving and will die, I will drive her away without it!' Almost as brutal to her own little ones, she would be absent for days together, leaving them to those two poor children's care. Enough of that.

"A year or two more passed and the father was dead, and the helpless baby, who sadly missed a mother's care, was thrown, a heavy burden, upon the shoulders of these two orphan children. And resolutely did that noble-spirited boy toil early and late, bringing every cent he earned, except a single sixpence, weekly, to the woman who had proved any thing but a mother to him.

"But he was not satisfied with the mechanical work to which poverty had driven him. And when he came home at night, he said, 'Sister, God never meant me to spend my days at this:' so holding the little ones between his knees, while the step-mother was idling away the evenings among her neighbors, he studied hour after hour by the dim light of a tallow-candle, when the day's work was done. A free library provided him with books, until at last he said to his sister: 'I have done my part for these children. Now I must go away and do my part for you and me, for here I shall always be at the bottom of the well.'

"L—— is next found in a Western town among a struggling crowd of lawyers, making his way slowly upward. What he thought of the effort, you may judge from his letter to a young person who in after-years sought his advice concerning the choice of a profession. 'As for the law, if you are willing to work like a dog, live like a dog, be abused like a dog, and fight like a dog, buy a copy of Chitty's Blackstone and go to reading as soon as possible.'

"Yet he made his mark, and when he set his foot on a new rung of the ladder which he was climbing, he kept it there until he was ready to step up to another. Strange obstacles arose in his way. The 'belle of the town' was the daughter of the Judge of the Circuit Court—a double reason why the young lawyers of the town should be in search of her, and why some of them should not look very lovingly on the young stranger who had secured her affections by a love which burned as true and warm to the last hour of life as when it was first kindled. A strange plot was devised to ruin, if possible, the young lawyer. Nowhere but in a Puritan community would such have been even attempted. It was well known that the Judge was the very soul of honor and uprightness. So a letter came addressed to the Postmaster of the town and stamped N. Y., asking if one L—— were residing there; for he had incurred a host of debts for gambling, drinking, fast horses, etc., and then run away from New York, and some of his creditors would be glad to know if any money could be gotten out of him. It was more than a year after L——'s marriage before this ingenious villainy was shown to have been concocted by two young lawyers of the town.

"It was dogged determination and perseverance, joined with the purest honor and high-toned courage, which enabled him at length to write, 'Sweet is success when we have toiled for it through years of privation, and our high endeavor is crowned with glad success.' Some words he wrote long after give the key to his character: 'I adopted as my cry, "Be sure you're right, then go ahead;" and often, when it seemed that I must sink under the accumulation of troubles and difficulties, a recurrence to my motto has raised my head above the waves, and borne me safely through.'

"So at length, after nine years' absence, L—— was able to go back to his childhood's home. 'Sister,' said he, 'I bring you back no riches from my tough struggles in the West, but I bring you back an unsullied name.'

"The Mexican war broke out. A company was formed in his town, and he was solicited to take command of it. 'I rather think I shall decline such honor. M—— says that she will cut my toes off before I shall go. My pride and patriotism urge me on, but my interest and affection say nay.' In the end, however, patriotism triumphed, and he went. And he did his duty. But the patriot soldier had still a tender heart. 'I do not like this,' he wrote, speaking of scenes of sickness, and men sinking down in that burning heat and left by the wayside to the tender mercies of guerrillas. 'In my youth I might have had more of the disposition of the vulture; but I have mated myself so long with a dove that the fierce scenes of conflict have no charms for me. Every tender feeling must here be crushed at once, or the heart would break.'

"In 1849 the cholera came sweeping over the West, as L—— said, 'like a fire over the prairie.' Cholera there was a different thing from cholera in the cities. The 'cry of contagion was a most potent one for evil, as the women, whose services were most needed, shrunk from the presence of this dreadful disease when they heard men whom they believed brave and above fear pronounce it contagious. I am satisfied that the cry of contagion sprung from a coward heart, and was dictated by a selfish spirit. In a little town above us, H——, the idea was advanced, and the result was that the nature of the people seemed at once changed. Fathers and mothers forsook their children, and children refused to go near their parents in that sad hour; and we heard of occurrences that would almost make an angel weep over the weakness of human nature when perverted by that worst of weaknesses—fear.' 'If you are disposed to act the part of a man here you must nurse almost every one; watch with every corpse; lay them out; clothe them in their grave-clothes; place them in their coffins; help dig their grave; and at last place them in it. Such has been the case with a few of us in our town. Mother, M——, father, and about half a dozen others forsook all business, and devoted our time entirely to such offices.'

"At length this last tremendous struggle rent the heart of our people. L—— was no longer young. He calmly weighed the consequences. There was no personal end to seek in leaving home, and friends, and legal practice. But the people thought that no one else was so competent to lead their regiment. But in a spirit of the purest patriotism he wrote: 'I may never return again, nor see wife or children more; but if I fall, you will remember that I fell in the performance of a sacred duty to my God and country.' And he has fallen at the head of his men, with his face toward the foe, and in the hour of success. Requiescat in Pace! But the demon of civil war has received few nobler and more precious sacrifices than that upright, honorable, brave soul that was breathed out on the battle-field of September 10. Much more than this might have been said of him. Less would not have been just to a true man, a loving friend, a brave soldier, a humble, God-fearing Christian. Died September 10, 1861, at the battle of Carnifex Ferry, Virginia."

LONG ago Washington deprecated the rancor of party-spirit in this country, and it was certainly never more furious than under his own administration. Since that time its fury has, perhaps, not increased—that is to say, men of different parties during the last twenty years have not hated each other with the bitterness of the hate that existed between old Federalists and Jefferson Democrats. And one of the consolations of our present condition is, that it buries party feuds and brings together men who really belong together.

We must all make allowance for each other. In the hot career of political life it is a very easy thing to sophisticate yourself as well as other people. A thousand ties, a thousand traditions connect us with various parties. It is our view, our statement, our interpretation of their principles that we believe in. If something is done that we do not approve, we instantly excuse it to ourselves by the reflection that the party creed does not allow it. We make, in our political estimates of men, the same allowance that a Roman Catholic makes for a priest. If he is a bad man, it isn't because he is a priest. So if an officer of our party is false, we do not allow that it is because he belongs to the party. But if an officer who belongs to your party is false—aha! see what your principles lead to! "Orthodoxy is my doxy," said Dean Swift; "heterodoxy is your doxy." At least he is said to have said so.

But all special policies disappear before the question whether there shall be any policy at all. First catch your hare. The late parties in this country represented different policies under the Government. The question of government itself has superseded them. And that is a question which the people themselves will answer. By the time these lines are read the political conventions in many of the States will have been held. And Mr. Easy Chair is greatly at fault if the prevailing resolution everywhere is not found to be a wish to forget and forgive—not in any nursery millennium fashion, but in the spirit which alone can save us from certain destruction by parties.

One thing, at least, is very clear—the old party issues will no longer exist, whether their names survive or not. Those who value names will retain them. Those who prefer things will contemplate the disappearance of names with profound indifference.

THAT the consequences of the war, whatever its result, must be hard to every body, is clear enough, and especially hard to the poor. The war itself, of course, employs many of them, but the returning soldier has always been a doubtful problem to the statesman. In other days, when Julius Cæsar, or Sulla, or Pompey was the returning soldier, the future was about as clear as the past.

War is by no means an unmitigated evil. Many woes can befall every state which are a hundred-fold more to be deprecated than war. And war for a great cause necessarily strengthens and elevates national character. Men sound new depths of ability. Their eyes are cleared. In a time of peace a trading people, which knows that peace is the essential condition of trade, deprecates every thing which may possibly disturb that peace. If difficulties can only be staved off until to-morrow, a trading people is naturally contented. It may be worse to-morrow. The reckoning must surely come, and be a thousand times sharper for the delay. Yes, yes! cries Trade; but for Heaven's sake let us eat and drink, for to-morrow we die.

Thus a trading nation sophisticates itself. It shuts its eyes, and will not look upon the truth. It prefers not to consider the question. It wishes you would hold your infernal tongue. It wants people not to be meddling all the time. In one word, it wants to make fifty thousand dollars a year. Meanwhile, if war breaks out—if after all the effort, and wear and tear, and closing the mouth, and holding the ears, and shutting the eyes tight, the gun is loaded and fired, and before you can have peace again you must conquer peace—then the very same persons who sincerely, but foolishly, blinked the facts of the case out of sight, look squarely at them; study them, talk of them, bring their good sense to bear upon them, and finally help to settle them.

This is one of the first great advantages of war. The cannon-ball shoots away veils; it opens eyes, and ears, and mouths; and there is no subject tabooed but disgraceful surrender.

Then again, war for such a purpose as we suppose necessarily unites men in intelligent sympathy. The fraternity of a great and good cause is tender and beautiful. When two men are set to hold a post against an enemy, if they hold it because they have a right to, and because justice in that spot is only to be secured by the bayonet or the ball, a common cause, a common danger, a common devotion, links those men together as no other tie can, and they are indeed brothers from that moment. They stand upon the essential quality of their manhood. If their cause is just, or if they think it so, are they not a nobler spectacle than they would be as two rival traders, each struggling to outwit the other?

Because peace is good, it does not follow that all the pursuits of peace are so. Because peace is essential to trading prosperity, it by no means follows that that prosperity promotes public virtue or private integrity. When the Dutch put Holland under water rather than submit to a despotism, they were a moral power in the world. That was the historic moment of Holland. The men of that time were the great Dutchmen. Since then trade has flourished in Holland for three centuries. They are of the great merchants of the world. Would the citizens put their country under water to-day to escape a moral or religious tyranny? If not, why not? Why, but because prosperity does not necessarily strengthen a moral manhood.

So the prosperous colonists in our old revolution deprecated the fanaticism of Otis, the extravagance of Adams, the heedless impracticability of all the leaders. It was nothing to the prosperous class that our revolution, although a war with the English parliament, was really a defense of the principles of the English constitution. The tradition of Great Britain, of this country, and of the Saxon race is constitutional liberty: liberty regulated by law. To defend the great principle of the English system we were obliged to fight England, and having fought, to separate.

It is not worth while, then, nor is it just, to consider war an unmitigated evil. It has its sweet compensations to individuals and to nations. But in its details it falls heavily upon very many. When the streets are full of rejoicing crowds after the victory, and the windows blaze with festal lights, there is one house which is dark and silent in the general joy. Not less dear to that home is the cause, not less precious the victory. But why burn lights at the windows when the light of the home within is quenched?

It is but a symbol of the inevitable sorrow which the battle brings. And it is the kindly part of war that it softens the heart for sorrow. Therefore, if there is more want during the next winter than usual, there will be a greater readiness to relieve it.

Scarcely a family but has a personal pledge and interest in the war. The alms of this winter will come from the heart as well as the purse.

HAMILTON X—sends a poem to the Easy Chair. If the author could forget it for a month, and then have it presented to him, he would say: This is certainly very well; but then Mrs. Browning has done the same kind of poem in the same measure, or near it, very much better. This writer has evidently tenderness of feeling, quick sympathy, and a fluent pen; but there is not a reader familiar with the poetry of to-day who would not instantly feel that this poem is a suggestion of the author's reading, not his experience. Owen Meredith does so large a business of this kind that nobody else need engage in it. The author ought to understand that all gentlemen of poetic taste and reading write such verses as these. He speaks of Charlotte Brontë's trouble in finding a publisher. Now the fact is that Charlotte Brontë found a publisher the moment she produced any thing really worth publishing. True, "The Professor" went the rounds of the trade with no success, as he should have done. But how many hours was it from the time when "Jane Eyre" reached the publisher before it was accepted? Just so many, if we recollect rightly, as sufficed for the "Reader," by sitting up all night, to peruse the manuscript. The truth is that Publishers are shrewd men, and find it for their interest to call in the services of the best "Readers" to aid them in their judgment. These "Readers" have no interest in procuring the acceptance or rejection of any book. Their employment depends upon the general soundness of the advice which they give. The wisest of them may indeed occasionally err in judgment, and every author whose book is declined may, if he chooses, think that his case is the exceptional one. But if these exceptions become the rule, the "Reader" will soon find his services "declined" by the Publisher. But what if Hamilton's idea of Charlotte Brontë's case were true? Does he mean to intimate that every unsuccessful author is to consider himself, for that reason, a writer of unusual genius? If so, the great mass of writers in every country are persons of very remarkable power. Or again, does it follow that every body who has a wry neck is an unequalled General because Alexander the Great had a wry neck? Is a club-foot the certificate of Byronic genius?

This is unquestionably what Hamilton would say could he forget his poem and see it again.

Our Foreign Bureau.

EUROPE, too, has its Southern "question," with its periods of bloody outburst, its diplomatic subtleties, and its different phases of military treatment. The fierce blood of Calabria has not come kindly under the beneficent rule of liberal Piedmont. The corruptions and the excesses of a turbulent despotism have not furnished a people to the Neapolitan realm that accept of the new order, and the Italian unity, either with the pride of freemen or the zeal of those who toil for freedom. There are those who, like Massimo d'Azeglio, half despair of their capacity for freedom. Brigandage is rife through all the mountain villages of the Neapolitan territory; its instigators and abettors are in all the cities; the Jesuits give it the cloak of church blessings, and the white flag of the Bourbon is its standard. Governor has succeeded governor as swiftly and vainly as the Union governors of Kansas; ambitious politicians like the Chevalier Nigra have broken their hopes there; and now Cialdini, the first and most accomplished general of the Piedmontese service, is compelled to call for large reinforcements; while Ricasoli, the prime minister of Italy, is forced to make appeal to Europe, through a diplomatic letter, in favor of more summary means of coercion, and in reprobation of those arch Roman conspirators, the Pope and the exiled Bourbon, who foment the southern rebellion.

His letter is earnest and manly—not so trenchant or inspiring as Cavour would have dictated, but looking to no other solution of the difficulty than the master mind of Italy would have aimed at and wrought out. The people of the south, overtaken by the oppressions of years, received with exultation the heroic band that conquered their deliverance; by a solemn vote they ratified union with North Italy, and declared for the king Victor Emanuel.

That the malcontents should be numerous enough to foment disorders, in no way invalidates the dignity or the importance of the national resolve. Long after the time when England accepted deliverance at the hands of the Prince of Orange there were Stuart armies of rebellion that traversed the kingdom. So in France, the Vendéens were sturdy royalists long after a republic was inaugurated, and sturdy Napoleonists after Louis Philippe was king. Spain still struggles painfully with her periodic Carlist uprisings, and shall Italy be less staunch in defending the integrity of its kingdom than the Court of Madrid?

Those Neapolitan soldiery who yielded by thousands to the hundreds who came with Garibaldi, were not counted of a calibre to give efficiency to those Piedmontese armies which had learned valor after a different method, and were disbanded. But they had no habits of thrift; they had lived in an atmosphere of corruption, where superior force seemed to justify all manner of crime; their city residence had unfitted them for the tame pursuits of the peasantry of the mountains, and the dissipations of the city had taught them habits that could only be gratified among the peasantry by criminal violence; the traditions, too, of South Italy seem in some measure to give a color of nationality to lawless brigandage; and so it is, and for such reasons, that Cialdini with his thousands of bersaglieri, and Ricasoli with his diplomatic protests, are contending against the Neapolitan rebels.

In Rome they find arms and money as well as sympathy; and it is stated that recruits are obtained even in Marseilles and Nice, who are not insensible to the promises of the exiled king, and who land at Civita Vecchia, en route for the southern border, without challenge from the French sentries.

Of course Cialdini, with his masterly activity, and the hearty co-operation of the new Home (or National) Guard of his district, renders a good account of some of them. Every day ship-loads of unkempt, unwashed, lowering-faced Neapolitans are disgorged upon the piers of Genoa. Ordinary prisons are not sufficient for the crowds who come. Many of the earlier arrivals were sent to the Piedmontese fortress of Fenestrelle. It is a famous fortress for its position and strength, commanding as it does one of the old Alpine passes into the plains of Turin from Savoy, and further famous from the fact that Saintine has laid there the scene of his plaintive story of "Picciola." Whoever passes from Cesanna, in Savoy, to Perosa, in Piedmont, by the Col de Ses-trieres, being eleven hours of hard mountain walking, will see the fortress of Fenestrelle. It is like many another Alpine pass: a valley of a river first, with its rocky bed and its firs; secluded hamlets, with broad eaves and balconies; fresh bits of high-lying pasturage, where you hear the tinkle of bells from the necks of dun-colored cows; a zigzag road creeping tediously, the river and the hamlets dwindling below you; scant herbage, and hard breathing, and cool gushes of wind; then the top, the view, and the battlemented gate-way of a kingdom.

Fenestrelle is a succession of fortresses running up five rocky terraces of the mountain, and joined to each other by a casemated gallery of four thousand steps. Within this congeries of forts a few hundred of Neapolitan bandits have latterly plotted insurrection and a seizure of the strong-hold. They proposed to organize into four bands, one of which was to surprise the commander, another to close the gates of the fortress, the third to seize upon the armory, while the fourth possessed themselves of the upper and commanding portion of the works. A defense of the place was afterward to be regularly organized, and detachments to march out from time to time in revival of the old banditti service of Naples.

The plot was revealed to the commander only a few hours before the time fixed for its execution, and his promptitude alone saved the Sardinian Government the perils and awkwardness of a recapture.

Later arrivals of these soldier prisoners have been established in open camp, upon certain waste lands not far from Turin, where they are girdled by loyal inhabitants, watched over by a regiment or two of Sardinian troops, and occupied with incessant drill. It is questionable, however, if these brutish victims of so many years of tyranny can be educated to the condition of competent and willing soldiers for a liberal government. This generation in the south will hardly outlive the old prejudices against Piedmonters, nor will the northern troops stationed at Naples readily admit to companionship the brigands who have decimated them by assassinations. There can be no possible doubt of the power of Piedmont to subjugate utterly the disaffected populations of the south; but whether the subjugated people, envenomed by the bitterness of war, will not act as a canker upon the integrity of the new and united Italy, is another question.

In view of this continued rebellion, and the undoubted countenance given it by the advisers of the Papal Court, the relations of the Emperor Napoleon with Rome have become exceedingly interesting. A late pamphlet, of French origin, which has carried forward with more bitterness and zeal the Prince Napoleon's spring attack upon the temporal privileges of the Church, and which was credited a quasi Imperial authorship, has been openly repudiated by the Moniteur. As the case now stands, Napoleon virtually sustains the Pope; the Pope gives harbor and countenance to the exiled Bourbon; and the Bourbon, by his wealth (of which he has great private store), and by the pretty coquetry of his Bavarian wife, is every day adding new champions for the reactionary battles of Italy.

Yet, it is alleged, if the Emperor withdraw his army the Roman populace will at once declare for Victor Emanuel; the Pope becomes a fugitive; and the great priest party of France will rally to their aid Austria and Bavaria and Spain, and so provoke an intervention in favor of the Bourbon (as the last hope of the Church), and against heretical Piedmont, which shall work more harm to the cause of Liberalism and of Italian unity than the present intermittent warfare of brigands.

To show the opinions prevailing at the Sardinian capital, we quote this fragment from the leader of a journal of Turin :

"Brigandage is reduced to two provinces bordering on the territory still subject to the Pope, and would by this time be completely put down did not our soldiers, in pursuing the bandits, find themselves stopped by the god Terminus on the Pontifical frontier protected by the French troops. But suppose our soldiers, impelled by necessity, were to cross the frontier, and sweep the miscreants from the country, what might be the consequence? On what principle did Count Cavour invade the Marches and Umbria? When a country has become a nest of conspirators and a retreat for brigands, who, when they have performed their errand, find a secure asylum there; when a Government pays the dregs of society to disturb and lay waste the provinces of a neighboring State, does not international law authorize us to dislodge such bandits from the country where they assemble, the more so when that country belongs to us by right? If brigandage is to last any longer, either France must be requested to watch the Pontifical frontier more efficaciously, or our own troops must chase the brigands on the Pontifical territory. We can not believe, nor can France permit, that the troops of a generous nation should be placed to protect a territory where conspiracies are concocted, and expeditions of bandits prepared in order to disturb a friendly and allied State."

OF Hungary we have nothing new to tell. Its Diet is dissolved; but the Austrian parliament is still without its Magyar contingent. The Ministers of the Emperor, planting themselves upon the provisions of the new constitution, will not yield to the demands of Hungary; and the Hungarian patriots, with a proud and defiant assertion of their traditional dignities, will not consent to ingulf their nationality in the new constitutional empire. The difficulties of Austria, however, form no longer an engrossing European topic: its attitude and that of its provinces has now come to wear that chronic cloudiness which makes it wearisome to wait for the storm. But—the storm will come.

Poor Becker, who the other day courted a smoky kind of German heroism by firing upon the Prussian King, has been condemned to imprisonment for life. The boy resents this indignity, and under claim that his crime was high treason, demands a new trial, and upon conviction will suffer death. It seems half a pity that his savage pride should be balked of its aim.

We alluded a month or two since to the MacDonald comedy, which illustrated at once the conceit and insolence of British travelers upon the Continent, and the dogged insolence of German officials. The affair came near to the provocation of international rupture; and now bad blood is again stirred between the parties by a British-German row in the city of Heidelberg. The particulars are hardly worth our narration: a supper with its beer and pipes, and a tavern broil were at the bottom of the difficulty; and the swift escapade of all British travelers from the town is the result.

OF war, and of what concerns war, there is a great budget of talk, from the graceful rhetoric of "Lord Warden" Palmerston to the news-writers upon the respective merits of the Armstrong, the Whitworth, and the Blakely guns. France is quieter in her preparatives than England, but not a whit behind her. In the matter of the rifled guns, and the plated ships, France has been from the beginning the pioneer, and England is pushing after her with a giant stride. At the close of the late session the Admiralty obtained a vote of two millions and a half of pounds sterling for the further construction and equipment of iron frigates. And this large sum of twelve millions of dollars, it is estimated, will only complete five of the proposed size and strength. Up to the present time the cost of the Warrior in hull, engines, and rigging, has been in the neighborhood of four hundred thousand pounds; and the new ships are to rate larger by seven hundred tons. The armor, too, which upon the Warrior is four and a half inches in thickness, are upon the new frigates to be at least five and a half in thickness; while (unlike those of the Warrior) they will completely incase the vessel. Nine hundred tons of metal make the armor of the Warrior; while for the new frigates no less than two thousand tons each will be required. These last are also to be adapted for service as rams; and to that end will have a projecting beak, twenty feet in length, under the water; their bows thus offering the swan-neck profile of the ancient galleys. The beak will of course be constructed of immense strength; and immediately above, or upon the bow proper, an armor shield of no less than seven and a half inches in thickness will cross the vessel, with two ports for 200-pounder Armstrong guns. The question of rig is understood to be held in reserve: such spars as may be adopted will probably be of iron. At the Thames iron works are now lying the masts of wrought iron which have been constructed for the ship Defense. "Each is 115 feet long by only 32 inches diameter, and though only a ton heavier than a wooden spar of the same size, are more than ten times as strong. At the same yard is an iron spar of 120 feet by two feet diameter at the base, which has been made for a flag-staff for the Victoria tower of the new houses of Parliament. This huge flag-staff is built up of boiler plate half an inch thick, with six wrought iron T-shaped ribs passing along its entire length. Its weight is rather over ten tons, and the summit of the pole is surmounted with a gilt copper crown, almost large enough for a small party to dine in." We mention this to show the capability of the British artificers in the way of iron spar making.

The latest experiments at Shoeburyness in target practice seem to favor the ultimate adoption of the angular disposal of plate armor, in such sort that a ship built with this design would offer the appearance of a low, pent roof rising above the water. A target of four-inch iron, at an incline of 50 degrees, was found to withstand effectually twelve or fifteen successive Armstrong bolts at short range.

These experiments and designs are freely commented upon in the French journals, and, without doubt, sagaciously improved upon by the French Emperor.

He, meantime, in the great camp at Chalons, is understood to have directed particular attention to the improvement of his mounted force. The experience of the Italian campaign was not favorable to the efficiency of the old cavalry service. The rifled guns have given a new edge to battle, and the conical bolts outleap the horses. An intelligent observer upon the camp ground, after commenting upon the comparative uselessness of the cavalry at Solferino, even though assisted by guns and a numerous infantry, thus proceeds:

"No better occasions could have been found for cavalry, and yet some desultory charges at different points, just sufficient to fatigue the horse, but not to produce a result, were all the part which the cavalry took on either side, and I assure you the opinion about the efficiency and utility of French, and in general of all cavalry brought back by the French army was not flattering. The Emperor seems to have shared only one half of this opinion, namely, that which relates to French cavalry, but by no means the second half, which refers to cavalry in general; on the contrary, if one is to judge from the changes introduced, he thinks cavalry an important element, not only in outpost duties and pursuits, but in general actions. This matter has been seriously taken in hand. The direction of the improvements tends toward assimilating the cavalry evolutions to the character taken by those of infantry and artillery. Individual excellence, rapidity, and consequently simplicity of movements and action with large masses in extended lines—these are the three points which have been assumed as bases. The success gained by the efforts thus made is very creditable, but owing to the difficulties offered by the peculiarities of country and people to the formation of a really superior cavalry, it will take some time before a satisfactory solution of the problem can be come to.

* * * * *

“Having done a great deal to improve horses and saddles, the next step, even more difficult, was to improve the horseman. Who has not looked at the skies through a troop of cuirassiers riding at a trot? I remember in this respect a curious scene. The Villa Pieroslawsky, close to the Woronzow Road, leading to Baidar, was occupied by a heavy cavalry detachment, which had a picket on the roadside. A general officer is espied from afar, and the picket has to get on horseback. A pull at the bridle which makes the horse jib, a kick or two in the belly which makes him sidle, a few hearty charognes, disembroiling the bridles, trying to find the stirrup, throwing back all impediments, such as carbine, sabre, etc., hopping with one leg in the stirrup, at last falling into the saddle with only the danger of rolling over on the other side, a desperate pull at the bridle, accompanied by groans from the horse, and an attempt to pull out the sword, which, however, was given up, as the general officer had long reached Baidar. I could not but think it fortunate it was a friendly general officer, instead of a patrol of nimble Cossacks. Having such scenes in my memory, I was surprised at the progress which has been made in riding. This is owing to great labor, directed chiefly toward obtaining individual excellence before any combined movement is attempted. Formerly, as soon as a man who had never before sat on horseback could somehow or other manage to keep in the saddle while trotting, he was immediately practiced in evolutions. The result was, that all he could do never went beyond keeping, by means of hand and feet, in the saddle, and that was all. Now this individual practice in single files in all paces forms the most prominent part of the exercise. The stirrup has been somewhat shortened, so as to let the man sit down comfortably; he has thus the chance of keeping in his seat without the assistance of the bridle, and can use his hands to handle sword and lance, both of which he is taught to adapt to the movement of the horse. A new kind of puppet-heads has been put up on the practice-ground, and these rise again by a spring when they are struck by lance or sword. Barriers, too, are to accustom the horses and men to leaping. All these are, if you like, old things, but practiced as they are they give now a very different result. Both men and horses of the Lancers, who have gone regularly through this practice for the last two months, have acquired an agility which they never before possessed. Marshal Randon is spoken of as the initiator of these changes; but, without taking away any thing from the merits of the Marshal, one can not help remembering that the Emperor himself is one of the best horsemen in France.”

the Emperor conducts particular experiments in gunnery and target trials with a quietude and noiselessness in marked contrast with the British habit. Thus we learn, by a four-line paragraph in the official journal, that the other day the plated ship Gloire sailed from Toulon with a large gun amidships, in triple envelope and sealed, for gunnery practice at sea. After the firing, the envelopes and seals were replaced, and nothing will be known of results except through the official report to the Department of the Marine.

French confidence in the military sagacity of the Emperor, so far from showing any abatement, seems steadily upon the increase; within the lines of the camp and of the army it has even taken on somewhat of that exuberance and idol-worship which characterized the national feeling for the first Napoleon. The young Prince, too, is wearing his boyhood with a jovialty and a bonhomie that are fast making him the pet of the Guards, and if the years spare him for the handling of a man's musket, in place of his tiny one of to-day, he will find an army ready drilled to back his dynastic claim. Needless to say that the Emperor encourages his ready familiarity with the troops, and that the chivalrous regard which is universally felt for the pretty Empress confirms and promotes attachment to the Prince.

Two late speeches of MM. Chevalier and Delangle—both men whose past lives and whose dignity of character have raised them above the charge of sycophancy—are remarkable for their earnest laudation of the Emperor, and their boast of his successes in giving efficiency to the military power of France, and contentment and prosperity to her people.

The municipal improvements in Paris are pushed on with unabated zeal; the newly-opened Boulevards are rapidly filling up with princely houses. The southwestern angle of the Tuileries, that has so long leaned threateningly over the quay, has been razed to the ground only to give place to some new miracle of the stone-workers. A gem of a Russian church with its gold, and emerald, and cones—so many types of the Kremlin—has been dropped upon the Faubourg St. Honoré. And on the river is to be seen a weird craft which carries one back three centuries.

The Emperor some time last year gave an order for the construction of a vessel upon the model of an ancient galley with three banks of oars (trirème). This has been completed, and not long since was tried with its full complement of rowers, one hundred and thirty, upon the Seine. The vessel is some hundred and thirty feet long by eighteen feet beam, and draws four feet of water. It is furnished with one hundred and thirty oars, sixty-five upon either side, arranged in three banks. The lower range of oarsmen are seated below deck, the second range on deck, and the third upon elevated benches, in such manner that they can give oar stroke over the heads of those upon the deck.

Two rudders are arranged on either side as in the ancient bas-relief, and a rostrum surmounts the bows, armed with triple branches of steel, destined in the old wars to pierce the sides of hostile craft. In every respect the vessel has been wrought up to the fullest possible representation of the old galley (except only in size). The Emperor and Empress with a numerous suite, embarked upon their Trirème, for a trial trip in latter spring, and proceeded down the Seine under the vigorous and well-timed strokes of one hundred and thirty oarsmen at a speed of six miles the hour.

THE life and evolutions of the camp at Chalons are subject to the observations of all the world; but

Since the days when the last Doges of Venice, before the French conquest of Italy, wooed the Adriatic in the gilded Bucentaurs, there has been no such galley afloat; and it contrasts with the monster ribs and iron plates of La Normandie, as the effete civilization which went before the whirlwind of 1789 contrasts with the dash and energy of ours.

THE reminiscences of Guizot progress—an old galley of a statesman that lies beached while the armor-clad ships are slipping into action. But in retirement and in quiet—with only such arena for the declaration of his calm, philosophic judgment, as the sombre hall of the Academy gives, or his nervous, trenchant pen, he has yet, more than any cast-away statesman of the recent revolutions, sustained his dignity and his self-poise.

Thiers has coquetted adroitly with the souvenirs of the first empire: Victor Hugo (if he may be called statesman) has wearied and worried himself by irritating thrusts at a dynasty that forgets him: Louis Blanc, in the fogs of London, has chased the old visions that allure him into a realm of the vague and unreal: Dupin has bartered his former status and his wealth of judicial fame against place and perquisites: Montalembert has now assailed and now bepraised the Imperial action—has given adulation to England and then abuse—constant only in one thing, an insane admiration for the traditional pomp and prerogatives of the Romish Church: Lamartine forfeits over and over the respect we all once bore to him—we all wished to bear. Guizot himself, in the very memoirs which have prompted this mention, tells the sad truth of him. It is one Academician who speaks of another—one fallen statesman who speaks of another that has fallen—one old man tottering to his grave who speaks of another old man whose years are almost full:

"I can not encounter the name of M. de Lamartine in my reminiscences, or himself in our streets, without an impression of profound melancholy. No man ever received from God more valuable gifts—gifts of person and position, of intellectual power and social elevation. Neither have favorable circumstances been withheld from him, in addition to these original advantages; every chance, as well as every means of success, have attended his steps. He grappled them with ardor; for a moment he played a lofty part in a lofty drama; he reached the end of the highest ambition, and enjoyed its most consummate glories. Where is he now? I speak not of the reverses of his public career, nor of the trials of his private life. In our days who has not fallen? Who has not experienced the blows of fate, the anguish of the soul, the inflictions of fortune? Labor, disappointment, sacrifice, and suffering have held in all times, and will continue to hold, their place and portion in the destiny of man—with the exalted more than with the humble. What surprises and saddens me is that M. de Lamartine should be astonished or irritated at this. It is not alone the pain of his position, but the state of his feelings such as he has revealed them to us, which I can not contemplate without melancholy. How can a spectator who looks on events from such a height be so intensely moved by the accidents which affect himself? How can such a sagacious appreciator of other men be possessed of so little self-knowledge? How does he abandon himself to so much bitterness after such extensive enjoyment of the favors of Heaven and of the world? In that richly-endowed nature there must be great blanks and a want of controlling harmony to cause its fall into such internal trouble and its manifestation with so much vehemence. I have seen too little of M. de Lamartine to know and understand him thoroughly: he seemed to me like a beautiful tree covered with flowers, without fruit that ripens or roots that hold; a brilliant meteor without fixed place, and with no assigned course in the general system of the firmament; a great spirit incessantly passing and repassing from the regions of light to those of clouds, and catching at every step a glimpse of truth without being arrested by it; a noble heart, open to all generous sympathies, but still governed by personal prepossessions."

WE have alluded to the Count de Montalembert: he has latterly occupied himself with the Polish question; he has taken a summer jaunt into Poland; he has written eloquently—never writing otherwise—in defense of Polish liberties. That the royalist and the Romist should argue for revolution in support of a people's liberties, is explained by the fact that Poland is Papist and Russia schismatic. His new thirst for freedom is a thirst only for the waters of Rome. Both Pope and Poland will languish in spite of his rhetoric.

CROSSING the English Channel we find the public attention particularly and warmly exercised by two recent railway accidents, the results in each instance of undoubted carelessness, which in proportions and fatality approach nearly the level of American catastrophes. The first was upon the Brighton road, upon which a crowded excursion train, while in a tunnel, was run down and run over by a regular parliamentary train. The second occurred in the immediate vicinity of London, where an excursion train ran into a ballast train which was crossing the track. The killed by both accidents count up nearly two score, and the wounded twice as many more. The legal risks of railway companies in England are not well defined, and the extent and nature of those risks form the subject of many of the London leaders.

The failing cotton supply, and the falling off of exports to America, are, very naturally, the grand topics of discussion. And the eagerness and insistence shown in their discussion evince a fermentation of public feeling, and a poorly concealed dread of approaching trouble, that has not for many years been known in England. Your own journals will give surfeit of paragraphs to show the tone of the British press on these questions. With only very few and remarkable exceptions, English papers look upon the civil war in America as decisive of the permanent disruption of our country. "We perceive," say nine British observers out of ten, "that the force, distinction, and excellence of your government lies in the fact that it is a government of the people; but we also see that the exigencies and animosities of war are fast making two peoples of the one. We can understand how one may conquer the other, possess its forts, destroy its offensive power, but we can not perceive how it will ever reconquer that loyalty to the constitution which is essential to good citizenship, whether South or North. We can not perceive how voluntary assent to any Federal compact (which every election supposes and demands) can be accomplished by the most vigorous and complete reassertion of all the powers of the Federal Constitution. If you say you care not for assent or dissent if only the outraged National authority is made good, you say virtually that you will hold as a dependent province what you can not hold as a sister State."

THE British Association of Science is just now holding its sittings, and the opening address of Mr. Fairbairn, if very long, has been specially interesting. We notice that in his summing up of the recent conquests of steam-power he affirms that the steam-plow is yet to effect an entire revolution in agriculture. In support of this view, we remark that a recent carefully-conducted series of practical experiments by a Scotch farmer demonstrate the large economy of plowing by steam-power on a farm of less than two hundred acres.

Mr. Fairbairn, in allusion to the new uses of iron, expresses the confident belief that the day of old wooden war-ships is utterly gone by, and that the plated vessels of England and France will inevitably rule the seas. He praises largely the engineering skill which has brought the waters of Loch Katrine into the streets of Glasgow; and trusts that at an early day the streams of Wales will be brought across the whole breadth of England and poured through the streets of London.

An experimental conduit, upon the atmospheric principle, for the dispatch of papers and parcels, has been established from Battersea to the Victoria Road station. The conducting tubes are of iron, two feet nine inches in height, and of a transverse diameter of two feet six inches. The joints are hermetically sealed with lead. Within are two rails for the miniature wagon which serves as vehicle of transportation. An exhausting pump is in position at either end; the length of tubing being at present one-fourth of a mile. The result shows a speed of about twenty-five feet in a second, and the projectors promise ultimately transmission of dispatches at the rate of a mile a minute.

THE death of Mr. Atkinson, the famous Siberian traveler, is announced, at the age of sixty-two. He was of very humble origin, and for a time in his early life followed the pursuit of an ordinary stone-mason. He discovered soon a taste for architecture, and Manchester is indebted to him for the initiative in that architectural taste which has come to distinguish the town. He lived to tell the world more of Chinese Tartary and the surrounding regions than had been communicated since the days of the old Venetian travelers. A daughter of the deceased, Miss Emma Atkinson, is not unknown in the literary world.

Editor's Drawer.

BOSWELL is supposed to have gathered up and embalmed all the good things which his hero said, but he has not recorded the fact that one evening Goldsmith told a story which set the company in a roar, and when the truth of it was challenged by some incredulous dog in the party, Goldsmith turned imploringly upon Dr. Johnson, and said,

"Doctor, you can attest the truth of that story."

"Oh yes," said the surly old bear; "I know that to be true—I made it myself!"

The truth of many a good story has the same indisputable claim to the belief of mankind, if we could only, as in this case, get back to the original, and find the author who is willing to take the paternity of his own offspring. But if the authors will not own up, somebody ought to help the easy, good-natured public to the names of the men who place them under such obligations. A boy in Birmingham, England, being asked whether some shillings which he was passing were good, answered, with great simplicity, "Ay, that they be, for I seed father make 'em all this morning!" The making of jokes, like the making of shillings, is too common a trade, and the laws should be rigidly enforced against all manufacturers. Jokes are born, not made. It is so with poetry and all other follies of the sort. Nat Lee was thought to be a crazy poet, and one day Dick Hoffman said to him, "Nat, is it not mighty easy to write like a madman, as you do?" "No," said Lee; "but it must be very easy to write like a fool, as you do."

Who said the good thing first? would be a curious question to pursue with reference to half the standing jests on record. And even Joseph Miller, or Josephus Molitor, would be shorn of half his laurels if the jokes were all traced home to their legitimate parents. The other day a man was telling of the hard times in Philadelphia, and said that they have good workmen there who would get up the inside of a watch for three dollars. "Why, that's nothing," said his friend; "there are plenty of boys who will get up the inside of a chimney for a quarter." And that is as old as the hills.

Now this one, and soon we will have another old story worked up to be as good as new:

It was during the last Presidential campaign that the little incident we are about to relate transpired. Mr. Downy, a merchant of Falstaff proportions in a little country village, espoused warmly the cause of the Republican candidate for Presidential honors, and his store was the rendezvous of a large number of his townsmen of the same faith and order. Downy prided himself no little on saying harder, sharper, wittier things than any one else in the vicinity, and it was very seldom any one could be found daring and fool-hardy enough to break lances with him. One day, however, as Mr. Downy sat upon the counter picking his teeth, as was his wont when not otherwise engaged, surrounded by his admirers, and longing for a victim to handle, in comes Patrick M'Dougal, a ruddy son of Erin, and a most devoted adherent to another political party. The opportunity was too good to be lost, and forthwith the merchant began the attack, winking slyly to his devoted followers to look on and see the fun.

"Pat," said he, "how fares it with the 'Little Giant,' eh?"

"'Little' was ye afther sayin'?" quoth Pat, flushing up suspiciously.

"Why, yes, little, to be sure. Why, Pat"—and Downy winked knowingly to his friends—"I could pick up your pet candidate and swallow him at a mouthful."

Pat stood for a moment eying his obese friend, perfectly aghast; then he replied, with a low chuckle,

"Fath, and mesilf 'll not be fer disputin' the likes of ye; but if ye did, ye'd be afther havin' a dale sight more brains in yer stomach than ye iver had in yer head!"

Downy changed the subject.

A KIND correspondent sends the following to the Drawer, but it has been better told and printed a score of times. Bishop Hughes made the best version of it at the New England Society Dinner:

"There resided in our vicinity some years since a family by the name of Titus, who were not especially favored with powerful intellects, and who were particularly predisposed to imbibing whenever opportunity presented. One of the sons, a great stalwart youth of some twenty summers, was sent one day with an ox-team to one of our iron foundries for a load of pig-iron. On his return having, as usual, become quite oblivious on account of his too frequent potions, he deliberately lay down in the bottom of his wagon and was soon unconscious, in which state he remained for several hours. A wag happening along, detached the oxen from the wagon and removed them just out of sight into an adjoining piece of timber. Perhaps I ought to have stated previously that the teamster rejoiced in the rare cognomen of Amni Titus. Time, which works so great wonders, brought poor Amni finally to his senses, in part at least, who soon began to scratch his pate, and at the same time striving to recall the past. Noticing the absence of his oxen, he mused thus—"Am I Amni, or am I not Amni? for if I am Amni, I have lost a pair of oxen; and if I am not Amni, I have found a wagon and a ton of pig-iron." How he finally solved the perplexing problem dependent saith not.

"Another feat of Amni's, which is strictly true, is as follows: He was once attending some coal-pits, and devised the following very original plan of ridding himself of parental authority, which history informs us was exceeding irksome. He procured a sheep, and making an opening in the side of the burning coal-pit, threw him in to perish. At the same time he divested himself of the major part of his clothing, and laid it down carefully by the side of the opening and ran away. Search was soon made for missing Amni, the clothes were discovered near the opening, and it was at once surmised that he had voluntarily 'shuffled off this mortal coil' by precipitating himself into the burning mass. Search was accordingly made in that direction, and the bones of the sheep were brought forth and pronounced as all that was left of poor Amni; and, indeed, it is stated that one of our doctors was called in and pronounced the remains human. They were carefully collected and coffined, a funeral service held, and the remains carefully deposited in the village church-yard. If possible, judge of the surprise of the community when, at the end of two years, Amni appeared alive and well!"

RIDING one day on the outside of a stage-coach, in the interior of Minnesota, last summer, the driver, a funny little fellow, told the following story: Bill, one of the drivers on our line, was coming out of Rochester one morning early this spring. The weather was cold and frosty, the roads were bad, and the horses would not work well together. On the seat beside him was a clerical gentleman. Now Bill swore sometimes, and stuttered as well, when things went wrong, as did the horses this morning. Bill would haul them up and give them a crack with his whip, saying "G-g-git up, d-d-dam you!" The clerical gentleman requested him not to swear; to be patient. But Bill would swear. The clergyman, after a repetition of Bill's profanity, again appealed: "Be patient, be patient; Job was a man of patience." Bill cocked an eye at him, and said, "J-J-Job! wh-wh-who did he d-d-drive for?"

IN the vicinity of Cincinnati there resides an eccentric individual who has occupied the office of Squire for the last quarter of a century. He is generally known among his neighbors as the Chief-Justice of S—, that being the township in which he resides. He is not only a farmer, but an extensive grape-grower, cultivating a very large vineyard. Among his numerous buildings he has a stone wine-house, built in the side of a hill. The lower or ground floor is used for two purposes—one-half for a wine cellar, the other as a fruit cellar. The upper or second floor is occupied as a press room, in which is his wine-press. On the ground-floor the entrance is by a large circular door of great strength and solidity. Over the door is the word "Bastile"—showing to the stranger that the Squire has a jail of his own.

In the summer months he holds his court in the open air, selecting the shade of an apple-tree in his orchard for the purpose. During the extreme hot weather in the last of July he was thus comfortably seated one Sunday morning, when he was aroused from his meditations by a strange voice, saying, "Are you the Squire?" Answering "Yes," with "What do you want?" he was replied to by an old man of perhaps seventy years, who stated that he had been bitten by a dog belonging to a neighbor of the Squire's, and by the torn condition of his breeches and coat the Squire was satisfied there was truth in his complaint. Thereupon he called a hired man, made him a constable, and dispatched him for the owner of the cruel dog. In a short time the constable arrived, having in his custody a good and substantial German, whose business is that of a vine-dresser. Being in his best suit to accompany his wife to church, he was somewhat surprised that he was obliged to visit the Squire on that holy morning. The Squire in his usual way, says,

"Good-morning, Hans; how are you? Did you ever see this man (pointing to the old man who had made the complaint) before?"

"Yaw, Mr. Squire; he was dis mornin' by mine house on de road. Mine dog umped over de fence and makes a bite at him pehind, and de man he dries to run away, ven mine dog umps on him; den de man hollers murder and runs away, and I makes mine dog in mine house."

Whereupon the Squire says to him, "I must fine you five dollars."

To which Hans says, "Mine Got, Squire, five dollar is more monies as I has got, and de dog is not worth a dollar, de war times is so bad, and dings is worser mit me as dey was one yar ago, and I can nit pay de monies."

To which the Squire replied by ordering the constable to take them both to the Bastile, to strip both the men, and to have the old man put on the Dutchman's clothes and the Dutchman to dress up in the old man's clothes. The Dutchman objected; it was no use: the Squire had given his verdict, there was no appeal. The old man went on his way rejoicing, thinking, no doubt, that he, at least, had received justice if not law; while Hans was obliged to return home minus a tail to his coat, and pantaloons with a rent in arrears.

As he left the sanctum of justice his last remark was, "Squire, vat vill mine frow say ven she sees mine new clothes all gone, and dese worser as dem vat I vorkes in?"

The Squire says that he could fill the jail of the county in sixty days with parties whose offenses against the law are more trivial than the one narrated; yet he thinks good adjustments are better than putting his neighbors to look through grated bars.

"I HAVE always taken a great interest in the Drawer; and reading this morning the testimony of a witness in the case of a liveryman, who had sued for the value of a horse that had been killed by fast riding, it brought to my recollection a case somewhat similar that was tried in a justice court in the town of G—, not far from the lead mines in Northern Illinois.

"Some fifteen years ago come Christmas a few Irish boys hired horses from a livery-stable in the town of G—— and determined to have a good time generally. One of the horses never recovered from the effects of the ride, and the liveryman sued the rider for the value of him. The lawyer for the plaintiff was an ex-judge. He was a good lawyer, but fond of his toddy. He was trying to prove by one of the witnesses that all hands were drunk, and commenced by asking him,

"Where did you stop first after leaving the livery-stable?"

"We stopped at Michael N——'s."

"Did you take a horn there?" asked the judge.

"Yes."

"Where did you stop next?"

"At the —— Gardens?"

"Did you take a horn there?"

"Yes."

"Where did you stop next?"

"At the Four-Mile House."

"Did you take a horn there?"

"By this time the witness began to smell a rat. 'Horn!' says he; 'I want to know what has a horn got to do with this case. I suppose because you are a drinking kind of a fellow yourself you think that every other body is drunk.'

"You ought to have heard the explosion which shook the court-room. The ex-judge did not ask the witness any more questions."

THE FIRST RECORD OF CORPORAL PUNISHMENT.

MY DEAR EDITOR,—I will with pleasure write out that little play upon words about "the first record of corporal punishment," which, by-the-way, was not original with me. I do not think it is worth printing; few such things are. But you must judge: it will not take more than five lines. All its point lies in the fact that a couple of Hebrew proper names sound exactly like common English words, though spelled quite differently.

This frequent want of agreement between the spelling and pronunciation of English words must be a great puzzle to foreigners in reading English poetry. I know a poet who insists that no rhyme is allowable that does not, as he says, "rhyme to the eye as well as to the ear." This is hypercriticism. Miss Martineau has written a poem called "Rhymes by a Deaf Person," which are funny just because she makes the most dissimilar syllables rhyme merely because they are spelled alike. Thus through and cough are supposed to rhyme. But this is wandering from the subject of Hebrew names.

Speaking of Hebrew names, I wish instead of the conundrum (for really it is nothing more) which I am about to write out, that I could call to mind something infinitely better which my old theological teacher, Dr. S. H. Cox, used to tell his classes. In Hebrew, you know, all proper names have a significance, as I believe they originally had in all languages; and it would be a curious subject to trace our names through various languages back to their original significance. The Doctor would write down the names of the patriarchs, up to Noah or Abraham, I forget which, in the order of their birth. These make a perfect sentence, which, when literally translated by him, embodied all the cardinal doctrines of Calvinistic theology. I do not know whether this was original with him or not; but it is very curious, and if I can turn it up in some of my old note-books, I will send it to you.

Speaking of Dr. Cox, I must, by way of parenthesis, put in half a dozen lines about him. He was, and I trust is—for I have not heard him for some years—a most brilliant lecturer as well as preacher. He was clever before a miscellaneous audience; but was in his glory when lecturing to a class of students. Between him and his audience there was enough of personal acquaintance to put them en rapport with each other. He would then let his mind "break loose." If I have space in this note I will tell you a good thing said by the late Professor Bush about Dr. Cox's mind "breaking loose." But I must first finish what I had in mind about the Doctor.

On the platform he had a most imposing presence. Those who have only seen him in the pulpit, where all but head and bust are cut off by desk and cushion, can form no idea of his grand appearance upon an open stage. He stood more firmly than any man I ever saw. He seemed to have grown upon the platform. In looking upon him I always thought of a sturdy oak. I saw the other day in your Magazine a capital account of a reading by Charles Dickens. I was specially struck by the description of the way in which Mr. Dickens enjoyed his own good things. Dr. Cox is almost the only public speaker in whom I have observed this trait. When he had said a good thing, his whole face would be aglow with delight—not with vanity, but with the good honest pleasure which he would have felt at hearing it from any one else. Why indeed should it not? Should not a man take pleasure in his own children as well as in those of his neighbors? But I must cut short my own reminiscences of the Doctor, or I shall not have room for Professor Bush's mot, which, short as it is, is worth a dozen pages of mine, as a picture of the man.

But I must mention one feature of the Doctor's mind before I close. He had a wonderful memory, which perhaps had much to do with the discursive character of his discourses. In the midst of a lecture some anecdote or illustration would suggest itself; that would suggest another, and so on, until his hour was up. This discursiveness was not so common in his pulpit as in his platform discourses, but even in the pulpit I have heard him announce at the beginning the heads of his discourse down to "seventhly." But in the midst of "firstly," some fresh thought would strike him, which he would follow up, without ever getting back even as far as the "secondly" of his original skeleton.

But in his lectures to the students he gave himself free scope. We never had the least idea when the subject was announced what he would—or, rather, what he would not speak about. Only, of one thing we were sure. He would be certain to give a blow at "Puseyism" before he closed. Thus, in one of his lectures on History he had spoken of Xerxes crossing the Bosphorus. "Bosporus, gentlemen, not Bosphorus—bos, an ox, and porus, a ford: water over which an ox can swim—exactly like the English Ox-ford: Oxford, where they teach that—" And then came the onslaught upon tractarian theology. Again, he was speaking of the victory of Charles Martel over the Saracens at Tours, which checked the wave of Moslem conquest in Europe. "Had the Saracens been victorious there, perhaps, as Gibbon says, 'the interpretation of the Koran would now be taught in the schools of Oxford, and her pulpits might demonstrate to a circumcised people the sanctity and truth of the revelation of Mahomet'—and they might as well do that," interjected the lecturer, "as teach, what they now do, that—"

And then did not Dr. Pusey and his followers "catch it!"

It was this very discursiveness which made the Doctor one of the most charming talkers to whom I ever listened. No matter what was the matter on the tapis, it always suggested to him some apposite anecdote. No matter how good a story was told, he could always "cap" it with a better one. It was, I suppose, in reference to his brilliant conversation that Professor Bush "got off" the mot to which I referred, and which I will now give you. It was said at a social meeting of clergymen—one of those "Monday meetings" where they relax from the severe professional labors of the week, and recruit for new efforts. Indeed, if any work wears upon the mental powers it must be that of a clergyman who has to prepare his two sermons weekly. I remember hearing Dr. Erskine Mason, who I think was the most massive-minded of all the clergymen I have ever known, say that when he had finished one of his profound and elaborate discourses, it seemed to him as though he could never prepare another sermon. He had told all he knew—had, as it were, "emptied himself." I think Charlotte Brontë said much the same thing after she had written "Jane Eyre" and "Shirley." But somehow, in Dr. Mason's case, when next Sunday came, two more profound discourses were ready, and his hearers, at all events, saw no signs of the exhaustion of which he spoke. I imagine that the mental recuperation necessary was in a great measure supplied by these "ministers' meetings." At all events, if any man has found more brilliant talk and ready repartee in any society than at a social meeting of our gravest divines, his experience differs from mine.

In this conversational "fencing" Dr. Cox was the most dextrous of all. He was never at a loss—never to be caught at disadvantage. This makes me doubt the truth of the capital story which has been told about him, and which, I think, has appeared in print. It ran something in this wise: He was once riding homeward to "Rus-Urban" when his carriage came in contact with the vehicle of a carman, who, if the story is true, must have been a wit of the first order.

"My good man—" began the Doctor, apologetically.

"G—d—n!" exclaimed the carman, in apparent horror, "don't say that. Don't swear so. I hate to hear it. There's no great harm done; we'll be loose in a minute. There's no need of swearing."

"Swear! I swear!" exclaimed the Doctor.

"There, now, don't do that; what's the use of swearing? Keep your temper. I didn't mean to run against you."

By this time a crowd had gathered, and the wag-gish carman kept on, never giving the Doctor a chance to say more than three words. "Don't swear so—don't. It makes me feel bad to hear you. I don't profess to be a very good man myself, but I don't swear that way. I'm only a common man; but you—why, such a venerable-looking man I never saw. You might, from your looks, be a clergyman, or maybe a Doctor of Divinity; and to hear you a cussin' and swearing hurts my feelings. There, we're loose now, good-by! Don't swear any more about it." And, so goes the story, he drove off amidst the shouts of the crowd, every one of whom by this time recognized the well-known features of the Doctor, and appreciated the point of the carman's joke.

But, as I said, I do not believe this story. I think it is "made, not found." I do not believe any body ever got such an advantage over the Doctor.

Well, now to come to Professor Bush's mot about Dr. Cox.

But I have actually got to the bottom of my last sheet of paper, and not another scrap in the house. I must send to town for more. When it comes I will write out what Professor Bush said, and add the conundrum for which you asked me.

Yours ever,

H.

THE THREE SKATERS.

A PARODY ON KINGSLEY'S "THREE FISHERS."

THREE skaters went up to the Central Park,
To the Central Park when the moon was high;
Each felt as gay as the singing lark,
Each thought of his girl with a heavy sigh:
For gents must skate when the ice is strong,
Though oft they take the maidens along
To the Central Park, so far from the city.

Three maidens sat in a parlor together,
And sung and played when the moon was high;
Anon and anon they looked at the weather,
At the dark clouds drifting across the sky:
For though gents skate the wind oft blows,
As it did that night, and a storm arose
That drove the skaters back to the city.

Three overcoats hang on a rack in the hall,
And each gent is happy as any young spark;
While the maidens are laughing and hugging them all,
The skaters that early came back from the Park:
For gents may skate, and maidens may wait,
But that night the girls blessed fortune and fate,
And the storm that drove their beaux to the city.

"PLEATH, dear mamma, why does Mrs. Webster call Ruthy alwayth 'honey,' and me sometimes too?"

"Because Ruthy is a sweet little girl, and so are you, and 'honey' is sweet."

"Well, manma, if she calls Ruthy honey, then—then—then—she ought to call me molasses!"

A VENERABLE clergyman sends us a couple of old New England anecdotes:

"In the early settlement of Northern Vermont Sabbath privileges were rare and precious to the sparsely-settled people, and from far and near they gathered, when from farm to farm the notice sped of preaching at such time and place. Once a good man of the Free-Will-Baptist order sent word to the people of C—that on a certain day he would be there and preach. A place was sought for in which to hold the meeting; but none desirable was found save a large barn, which was offered and arranged for the occasion. The day and hour came, and the, for those times, large congregation were assembled and quietly seated in the main floor. The services commenced, and all went decorously on till, in the 'long prayer,' some mischievous boys, who could not resist the temptation to climb, had reached the 'great beams' overhead, and were amusing themselves by pelting one another with whatever they could reach, occasionally hitting here and there among the congregation seated below. Suddenly the minister opened his eyes and, without any rest or the least change of tone from that of prayer—'May the Lord bless the good people!'—he went on, 'Boys, be still, throwing down chips, and sticks, and little pieces of ba-a-rks!'—and then again came the prayer, as though there had been no interruption. It was too much for the risibilities of the people, and their devotions were somewhat disturbed. Several times have I had the pleasure of listening to the discourses of good Mr. W——, now an aged man, but never without a thought of what that scene must have been which took place so many years ago."

"IN the same North country lived by themselves an aged couple of the name of Crook: the old gentleman, celebrated for his quick motions, was known as 'Uncle' in all the country round, and 'As quick as 'Uncle Crook,'" became a household proverb. There being in those new settlements only now and then an opportunity to hear a sermon, or attend any religious services, people were not in the habit of leaving their homes on the Sabbath, at least such as had any religious principles; and very much astonished were the family of Mr. K—— by the arrival, one fine Sunday morning, of Uncle Crook and his wife, apparently for a visit. They were on the way to the mill 'with a grist,' and would stop and see their neighbors a while; so coming in, the old lady took out her knitting and went diligently to work. The family, surprised, puzzled over it a while; and then one said, 'Mr. Crook, do you know what day of the week it is?' 'Why, Saturday to be sure,' he replied. 'Oh no; you are mistaken: it is Sunday.' Amazement held the old man in absolute quiet a moment, and then chair and feet in an instant were square upon the floor, the knitting needles were as quickly pushed aside, and instantaneously were the old folks in their wagon, with faces turned toward home, from which no persuasions could longer keep them, and lamenting as they went their loss in reckoning of a day and thereby unintentional Sabbath-breaking."

CHARLEY had been passing several weeks in the country, and the dreaded period of departure was rapidly drawing nigh. Loth to forego his rural enjoyments, his many rambles by breezy meadow or willowy stream, his butterfly chases or bird-nest climbings, Charley formed the resolution of defeating his parents' intentions at least for one day longer. The coachman had been ordered to have his horses prepared at a certain hour, so that the departing guests might meet the only train which then communicated with the city. Hearing the order, and discerning the necessity for immediate action, Charley hurried to the stable, and carefully marked the driver's movements. Scarcely had the horses been harnessed on one side and the coachman repaired to the other, than Charley as quickly removed the traces and other gear, twisting the straps in inextricable confusion. The coachman was at first unaware of the variation; but it was soon discovered, and the respective pieces properly replaced. Ere, however, these had been arranged to entire satisfaction, Charley had visited the opposite side and reduced it to a similar situation. Thus he continued until the coachman, whose patience was now thoroughly exhausted, caught him in his arms and bore him from the spot; but the little fellow's satisfaction was wholly unalloyed, as the shriek of the locomotive and the rattling of the departing train bespoke the success of his manœuvre; and he exclaimed in an ecstasy, "Now, Barney, if you can hitch up a horse, never say that I can't unhitch him!"

AN Illinois correspondent writes: "In these times, when we all feel gloomy enough about State affairs, it is well to have something to keep off the blues, and the contents of your Monthly Drawer afford amusement in camp and cabin. The following river story may help to fill up a number: As one of our Western steamers was ascending the Father of Waters, among her crew was a sturdy fellow not long from the land of Erin, who was much afraid of snakes and varmints. One evening, a little after dark, the boat made a landing at a cabin on the Upper Mississippi, and Pat was ordered on shore to make fast a line. Now it so happened that the owner of the cabin had a pet bear, which on that evening was chained in front of his domicile. Pat shouldered the line and made up the bank, when seeing, as he thought, a stump, proceeded to march around it, intending to fasten the end and sing out to haul aboard. Bruin sat still until he came around, when he opened with a growl and jump toward our hero. 'Holy Mother of Christ protect me!' sung out Pat; and with two bounds he was in the Mississippi, screaming for help, and cursing the country where the stumps attacked Christian men wid their mouths open."

"THERE is an old fellow residing in South Royalton, Vermont, who has been for a lifetime the storyteller of the neighborhood. His experience has been great in that line, and his composure and placidity while he enunciates a 'whopper' unequalled. No matter what extraordinary event happens, he instantly remembers one which surpasses it. To give you an instance: One day he killed a common striped or garter snake while mowing in the meadow. When he came home to dinner he told his employer that he had killed the biggest striped snake he ever see, and asked him how big he s'posed it was. The farmer reflected never having seen one over two feet long, but knowing our friend's propensity he guessed it might have been eight feet long. With the emphasis of one who knows he is going to make your eyes stick out with astonishment, he brought down his fist upon the table, and said, in a tragic whisper, 'Twas nine!'"

"The last time we heard of him was in the tavern, talking with a number of farmers about the effects of poudrette upon corn. Poudrette was a new thing there, and each one who had tried it vied with the other in their statistics. Our friend, whose tactics were always to draw out the strength of the enemy before he ventured any thing himself, waited till every body was through, then took up the thread of the following tale: 'When I fust heerd of this here Poudrette I went an' got a pint, an' I put it all inter one hill, an' then I put five kernels of corn in the hill five inches apart (how very particular these fellows always are!), an' I stuck a stick inter the middle so's I'd know it agin. Wa'al, I never seed corn grow like that 'ere. It growed an' growed till it got to be ten feet high, an' when it eared every ear was fifteen inches long, an' when I harvested that 'ere hill I got five ears off of every stalk, and seven off the stick!'"

"WHEN Meeker County, Minnesota, was new, before lawyers found their way out there, two Dutchmen, Fifer and Steirne (brothers-in-law), undertook to cheat Uncle Sam by pre-empting two claims with one cabin, each furnishing half the lumber, the cabin to stand on the line between the two claims. Before the claims were pre-empted the brothers fell out. Steirne undertook to carry away his half of the lumber, when Fifer shot Steirne through 'the sacred soil' of the system. Steirne complains of Fifer for an assault with intent to kill, and Fifer settles up by giving Steirne a chattel mortgage on two yoke of oxen (all the property either party had in the world except a wife and seven children each).

was intended for kindlin', it's a consarned sight too fast."

L—— did not wait to press a sale, but giving the whip to his ponies he went out of that town at the rate of something like 2.50.

THE following comes from New Hampshire: "Enclosed is a copy of a note which I received when I was teaching school:

"WHITE RIVER JUNCTION, N. H., Dec. 6, 1859.

"DEAR SIR,—As I do not know your name I adress myself to you to inform you that I would like to have you give boy Oscar V. Adams a seat Where he can set so as th large Boys cant pull His hair when they go to and from their Seats as he is very bashfull He is afrade to speke to You he would let them pull his hair all out of his head before he woud tell you he is so bashful if you can dissmis MariOn & Oscar when Marion gits thru with her studys so that they can com home a lone You will mutch Oblige me when we are as sheep among wolves we must be Wise as Serpents & harmles as doves—Yours With respekt from Mrs caroline Adams—to The teacher"

"AN attorney named Capron, of our little town in Indiana, was employed to attend a case before Squire F——, and Judge B——, of an adjoining city, was the opposing counsel. Capron is a young man, though well versed in legal lore. Judge B—— is an old attorney, of great character in our 'neck of woods,' at one time Judge of Nebraska Territory, looking very much as our fancy paints the English barristers of old, and very fond of a joke. A legal point was raised of vital importance to Capron, and he made a labored speech, showing a great amount of law to sustain his position, and making the thing very clear. During his speech, the Squire, who was a most eccentric individual, and not a man of much legal knowledge, listened at first attentively, but was soon tired out, and amused himself in scratching the desk with his jack-knife, and such other employments as he could engage in. When Capron sat down, Judge B—— arose and made a few remarks, and submitted the point, doubtless thinking it scarcely worth while to contest the point very closely. When he had finished, the Squire, who had just been driving some boys out of his 'bench,' looked up, and remarked in a kind, consoling tone of voice, to Capron, 'Well, Capron, I guess the old man has got you where the hair is short,' and renewed his labors with the juveniles."

"THE literary progress of our little four-year old has, through devious ways, led him deep into the labyrinths of the double letters. He catches sight of every double L or double O on the paper, and demands an explanation at once. The other day he brought down the house by bringing me a printed envelope containing the name of a distinguished Western underwriter, and inquiring, with eager emphasis, 'Papa, what does J double B, E double N, E double T spell?'"

"WE live a mile in the country, and every now and then a bull, which is the terror of our little boy, comes bellowing along with the rumble and muttering peculiar to that animal, when the little fellow will fly for safety to his mother's lap, crying, 'Oh! mamma, the bull is coming.' The other night he woke up, and mistaking a small noise close by for a great one far off, he got up in his crib and woke his mother, exclaiming, in great distress, 'The bull is coming, mamma!' His mother laughed, and said, 'No, my child, it is only papa breathing hard.'

Comforted, he lay down again; but presently the long regular snore aroused him once more, and he cried out, 'Mamma, mamma!' 'What, my dear?' 'There comes the bull again!'"

FROM Rhode Island we have the following:

"Not many years ago, at an academy then very popular in the Green Mountain State, I witnessed the following good thing: It was examination-day, and the spacious hall was filled, as usual on that day, with visitors from abroad, while on the teacher's platform were ranged those august personages, the trustees, who composed the committee of examination. The grammar-class had the floor, and our worthy principal, calling up one after another, pronounced the name of Dewey. Dewey rose. Although still in his teens, he was a stout fellow, with heavy black whiskers, thick-tongued in speech, and awkward in manner, albeit nobody's fool. Now our teacher would sometimes propound questions very simple and very odd, as surely were these, to wit: 'What is a period?' 'It's a little dot,' hesitatingly spluttered the pupil, with a broad grin. 'About how large should you think?' persisted the teacher. Every eye was now turned on Dewey. 'Oh!' drawled he, 'I should think's 'bout's big's a fly-speck.' Dewey sat down.

"IN the same village dwelt a certain judge, who, being a widower, always accompanied his niece to church. One summer afternoon, while she was intent upon the sermon and the judge was having a quiet snooze, she discovered a grasshopper on her dress. Picking it off, she gently nudged the drowsy judge, that he might throw the intruder into the aisle. He took it with eyes half open, and supposing it to be a clove, quite unsuspectingly bit off its head!"

AN old contributor returns to the charge with several pleasantly-told stories:

A gentleman somewhat past his school-days, coming in the room one morning where his cousin, Miss D——, sat reading, inquired of her the botanical name of the flower-stalk.

"Peduncck," was the reply.

"Thank you, Cousin Mary. I knew it was an unck of some sort, but couldn't think of the precise term to be used for the life of me."

"No wonder, no wonder at all, Cousin More. It is only ped-ants that do use the term."

HERE is the account of a hard case of fever, related to me by a D.D.S. now residing in one of the pleasant villages situated on the line of the Michigan Central:

"When I first came West," says our friend the dentist, in his inimitable manner, "I was introduced to Dr. C——, and was somewhat imposed upon, at first, by his pretentious manner, and really was inclined to consider him one of the lights of medical science until accident one day dispelled that illusion. Going along by the Knapp House I saw the Doctor standing in the hall, saddle-bags on his arm, and looking as wise as the Sphinx. He was dressed well, and with his portly figure and look of solemn gravity would have imposed upon any one.

"Stepping toward him from the street, I accosted him politely, and made inquiries regarding the general salubrity of the place.

"'Drefful sickly, drefful sickly, Sir,' said the Doctor.

"Ah! indeed, Sir," said I, in a tone of interest; 'what is the general type of disease?'

"Typhoid type, Sir. Have got some drefful bad cases of typhoid on hand now: one of 'em is particularly uncommon: drefful, Sir, drefful!"

"May I inquire what there is peculiar in the case you have mentioned, Dr. C——?"

"Certingly, certingly: it's the pulse: that's drefful, Sir, drefful! Sixty at the wrist and ninety-seven at the forehead! drefful, Sir, drefful!"

"I thought it was 'drefful!'"

MR. SPRAGUE, of Bayou Sara, West Feliciana Parish, Louisiana, had been rather careless in his manner of bringing up his sons. One Sunday morning Parson Butler, an old Baptist clergyman of the neighborhood, in riding to town met Billy and Sammy Sprague going into the woods, evidently for the purpose of hunting. Feeling certain that any thing like direct remonstrance with the young gentlemen themselves would scarcely turn them from their ways, he waited until after "preaching," and sought the old gentleman. After recounting the circumstance of meeting Billy and Sammy as he had done, he closed an affecting appeal by inquiring of their father why they had not been "brought up in the fear of the Lord?"

"Fear of the Lord, Parson—fear of the Lord! Why, they hev! They're so 'feard of him now they dassent go out Sunday without double-bar'l'd shot-guns on their shoulders!"

"In the beautiful village of Waterloo this summer I was particularly amused with the words of a follower of Izaak Walton, which I consider too good to be lost. The little fellow's name was Le Grand, with a companion who answered to the decidedly classical sobriquet of 'Hank.' Le Grand and Hank, fully equipped, started for a fishing excursion. After the absence of an hour or more, Le Grand made his appearance with his basket well filled with fish. He asked all his friends to look at his fish, of which he seemed quite proud. When upon being interrogated as to how many he caught, he reluctantly replied: 'None: but I would have caught them, only Hank had the best place!' The incident fully illustrates how many things we are sure we could do if we only had the right place."

"THE anecdote in a recent Drawer of the girl who knew that it must be true because her father read it in a bound book, proves conclusively the truthfulness of printers and bookbinders. As one of the latter, who not only reads but binds Harper, permit me to cancel a portion of my indebtedness by the following installment:

"Two bookbinders in 'our village' quarreled and came to high words. One of them at length said, 'Your countenance shows what you are; you can't look an honest man in the face.' To which the reply was made, 'I can look you in the face.'

AN Illinois dealer in wheat writes to the Drawer:

"The anecdote in the Drawer of the July number of the Irishman who paid six shillings for flannel that was offered at five cents less, reminds me of a like case which I witnessed here—and, I think, better still.

"An old German offered for sale a load of wheat, and was told by a buyer that, owing to the late depression in prices, he could only give him seventy-five cents per bushel. He thought it over for some time, and then replied, 'Dat ish too low; you gif me sextee zent, and you take him; I no zell him for less!'

"The buyer was not certain whether he understood him rightly or not; but found, on questioning him, that sixty cents was really the figure, so he replied, 'Well, being as it's you, I'll do it;' and he actually bought the wheat at fifteen cents per bushel less than he first offered for it. You can imagine how difficult it was for me to keep my countenance long enough to get out of sight so as to give vent to my laughter. Doubtless the honest old German thinks to this day that he made at least five cents by setting a price."

And the Drawer wishes to add that he finds something more difficult to imagine—and that is, how any honest man could take advantage of a German's ignorance of the language, and so cheat him out of fifteen cents on a bushel of wheat. We would rather be the cheated than the cheat in such an operation, and though we put the story in the Drawer, we would not put any wheat into our garner that was got by such a bargain.

"RIDING one night over the P. W. and B. Railroad, the passengers were much amused by the prattle of a little girl whose age might be expressed with a single figure. The train stopped at a well-known place, opposite to some rather dilapidated-looking buildings. The moon was shining brightly, making the surrounding objects quite distinct. Our prattler, after gazing out of the window for a few moments, withdrew her head, and turning to her mother, said, 'Ma, wasn't this place built before any body was born?'"

OUR correspondence with the South is necessarily limited. A correspondent in North Carolina some months ago sent us the following obituary notice. He says it "looks like a burlesque, but I assure you it is genuine. It is taken from the Macon (Georgia) Journal and Messenger:"

"Departed this life in Macon County, Nov. 30, 1860, E PLURIBUS UNUM, youngest son of John T. and Catharine Oliver, aged 1 year 10 months and 9 days.

"We are seldom called upon to chronicle the death of such a promising child as E Pluribus. His amiable disposition and affectionate caresses rendered him the idol of all who knew him; but he is gone, and is an angel now. To the parents of the little boy we say weep not, but endeavor to be resigned to the will of Him who said, 'Suffer little children to come unto me, and forbid them not, for of such is the kingdom of heaven.'

Farewell thou charming little son,
We never shall hear thy voice again;
Farewell little E Pluribus Unum,
May we together in heaven rich blessings share."

VERY fair this is for a boy in Doylestown, Pennsylvania:

"We had in our school a boy of rather dull capacity, and he was particularly puzzled in his English Grammar. For the life of him he could not see into the distinction between nouns and pronouns, etc. On one occasion he was called up, with others of his class, to the Grammar exercise. He came to a word which he pronounced to be a verb. 'Well done!' says the teacher. 'Now if you will tell me what kind of a verb it is, I shall have hopes of making a grammarian out of you yet.' The boy's eye brightened up with a sudden flash of intelligence, and he roared out at the top of his voice, 'It's an ad-verb!'"

THE BENCH.

AN ENGLISH COURT.

THIS is Westminster Hall. The first thing you look for is a "place," which you find high up in the back seats; and when this has been climbed into, with more or less noise, you find yourself facing the bench. By the bench, of course, I mean the judges. They are peculiar. Their dress is rather startling at first, till you get used to it; but it is nothing to their caps, which are represented by a little black spot on the top of the wig.

But between the back seats and the bench look for the bar, and if you don't exactly see the bar, you will the counsel, which is the same thing. Possibly you may hear them—for they are given to talking; to each other, if they have no better resource; but to the jury, or at all events to the judge, if they can find an occasion: some who, curiously enough, have round noses, round eyes, round mouths, and double chins, are sonorous, emphatic, and what we will call portwiney: others are ponderous, slow, chest-speaking men, but these are mostly tall, lank, and coarse-haired, with terrible noses—long, from the bridge downward, and blunt at the point; some, again, of the sharp, acid, suspicious sort—shriek a great deal; while there are a few—great men these—who are so confidential and communicative, that they seem (using a colloquial phrase) to talk to the jury "like a father."

Well, having seen both Bench and Bar, and wishing to understand what they are both engaged in, let us suppose a case. We will say that an obstinate man, one Bullhead, has his action against a plausible man, one Floater. Now the unconquincible Bullhead, who thinks that he has never yet been taken in, has somehow at various times, and upon the flimsiest of all possible pretenses, handed over to said Floater sums of money to the amount of—say two hundred pounds: between the possible inconvenience of losing so large a sum of money and the wish to show that his wisdom is equal to his obstinacy, he has brought the little dispute out of his own frying-pan into the judicial fire.

There he stands, or rather leans in the witness-box, carefully checking off his short answers with his forefinger on the sleeve of his coat, and screwing his face on one side, as if to concentrate all his intellect into the left eye that is so widely open; he looks very untractable, with his stumpy brows knitted closely over his thick, stumpy nose; but what chance can he possibly have against such a cool hand as the defendant, Floater, Esq., with his very white stick-up hair bearing witness to his respectability, and his very black lay-down eyebrows covering the unbarnacled portion of those side-glancing eyes? How gently his jeweled fingers are laid on the edge of the witness-box! how shockingly informal the "document"—of whatever sort—proves to be during his examination—what a respectable man he is! Three letters after his name!

Of course, and as usual, the jury hardly know what to make of it; the stout foreman inclines to the plaintiff in despite of law; but he is evidently puzzled all the same; the thin man with the bridgy nose, the cold man with the round head, and the argumentative jurymen with the mutton-chop whisker, all look at it, as they say, "legally," and decide in favor of the defendant. The jocular "party," with the curly red hair and the two tufts of chin-growing beard, treats it all as good fun, and is ready to give his verdict for the defendant too, because, as he says, "He is such a jolly old humbug, you know," which mode of settlement, however, is not looked upon as sufficient by his two neighbors, to whom it is a much more serious matter. One of these is trying to make up his mind, a feat he has never yet successfully accomplished—so I suppose that, as usual, it will be made up for him by somebody else; as for the other, after three hours' reflection, he has really come to a decision, but, unfortunately, it is entirely opposed to every thing that the judge will tell them in his summing-up, and of course they will all be led by his lordship.

THE JUDGE.

My lord will take them in hand kindly, explain away both counsel for plaintiff and for defendant, and read them a great deal of his notes, which are a thousand-fold clearer, fuller, and more accurate than the reporter's "flimsy," although during the trial he has been distinctly seen to write four long letters, has gone twice to sleep, and has made seven recondite legal jokes, including the famous ever-recurring and side-splitting innuendo of calling upon the usher to cry silence, or "Sss-h!" whenever the somewhat indistinctly speaking junior for the plaintiff rises—there will be no withstanding his clear-headedness.

As you would imagine, these jurors have been in turn led away by the opposing counsel. For the plaintiff; they were made to admire the consummate common sense and discretion of the plaintiff,

THE COUNSEL.

Ballhead, who, having diluted his ordinary keenness with that admirable faith in human nature which is the keystone of all commercial transactions in this Arcadian world, has for the first time in his life found his confidence misplaced by the conduct of the defendant. Said the advocate: far be it from him to call Floater, Esq., M.Q.S., by any derogatory appellations; he was not a swindler, he was not a

THE PLAINTIFF.

THE DEFENDANT.

THE JURY.

THE ATTORNEYS.

rogue, he was not a wolf in sheep's clothing, he was perhaps the victim of a misconception or a want of memory, but a very honorable man all the same—an opinion which the jury would heartily indorse by giving full damages to his discreet and sensible client.

But, said the counsel for the defendant—a foxy man with reddish hair, angular eyes, and a mouth that seems to have a hole punched in each end of it: he would not call Mr. Bullhead a villain of the deepest dye, he would not say that he had laid a plot to blast the happiness of the domestic hearth of his unfortunate, his scrupulously respectable, and he would add his distinguished client; no, not he—far from it, he would suppose that an obtuseness of intellect on the part of the, at all events, short-tempered plaintiff, had led him to imagine, and so forth. And by-the-way, notice how these foxy counsel do cuddle themselves up, how they look askance, and wriggle about to show their honesty and straightforwardness—for indeed I suppose we must admit that they are honest and straightforward from their point of view, although they do shake their heads at his lordship whenever a particularly damaging statement is put forward by the opposite side, and although they do paint black with a gray tint, and find a few spots upon the purest white. Thank goodness, they have the attorneys to throw the blame upon when there happens to be any, and the attorneys sitting under the bar, and putting their heads together, have, I suppose, shoulders broad enough to bear it.

These two do not look ingenuous: here is the smooth and the rough. The rough one never seems to believe a word that is said to him, while the smooth one appears to take in every thing. The one, half shutting his eyes, draws his face down and his forehead up into all the fifty lines of unbelief, while Smoothman drags his cheeks into such a lovely smiling look of faith in every thing you have to propose, that you really begin to wonder how that underhung jaw and knitted brow came into the same company. Well, there is not very much to choose between them.

So we will say that this trial has gone against the angry plaintiff; that it is one more feather in the cap of Foxy, Q.C., and money in the purse to Float-er, M.Q.S.; that the jury are aware of having supported the glory of the English nation and the majesty of the law; that the learned judge, disrobed and unwigged, is no longer a good old lady, but a distinguished gentleman.

"ABOUT forty-five years since, Colonel P——, a Revolutionary veteran, but with all his youthful fondness for fun, kept a public house, which was much frequented in the long winter evenings by a number of the citizens, for the purpose of enjoying themselves in a social chat.

"On one of these occasions our conversation turned upon feats of activity, especially in jumping; and almost every one present had some tale to tell, either of how far or how high he could jump or had ever jumped.

"Colonel P——, who, although then well stricken in years, had been an uncommonly athletic and active man, listened with much apparent interest to our several tales, and when we had all spoken, he arose, and remarked,

"Well, gentlemen, I suppose you expect me to have something to say?"

"Yes, Colonel; we are anxious to hear you."

"Well, gentlemen, I don't know as you will believe it, but I pledge you my honor it is a fact, that I have seen the time when I could jump—yes, gentlemen, when I could jump—as far as ever I could in my life!"

Mr. Downey in Search of Physical Development

He tries Bowling :—

But can't get the Run.

Thinks he will like Skating :—

But finds that he does not.

Tries Riding :—

But gives it up.

Tries Rowing :—

But catches a Crab.

Tries Base-Ball playing :—

But finds it too rough.

Tries the Salt-Water :—
But gets more than he bargained for.At last he tries Lager-Bier :—
And is perfectly satisfied with the result.

Fashions for November.

Furnished by Mr. G. BRODIE, 300 Canal Street, New York, and drawn by VOIGT from actual articles of Costume.

FIGURES 1 AND 2.—CLOAK AND BOY'S DRESS.

FIGURES 3 AND 4.—EVENING COSTUME AND WALKING-DRESS.

THE CLOAK is of black cloth, with velvet and crochet passanterie.

The BOY'S DRESS is of poplin, of a rich scarlet hue, designated as rose sublime. The hat, Tudor style, is of velvet, with a plume.

The EVENING COSTUME and WALKING-DRESS are of silk, of any favorite color. In the Illustration the full costume is of the new azurline blue, with a quilling of the same en tunique; the heading being falls of Valenciennes.

